As soon as they had delivered their message, which one of them read, the king, with a displeased countenance, and in a warmer and more sprightly tone than was natural to him, told them, " that he was amazed at their message, and could " not conceive what they would have, nor what " they meant to do : that they made a great noise " with their privileges, but forgot that he had " privileges too, which they made no conscience " to violate : that they talked of their fears and " jealousies, for which they had not the least " ground ; but if they would well consider, they " would find that they gave him cause enough " for jealousy ;" and concluded, " that he would " think of their message, and send an answer to " the houses in convenient time : " without saying any thing of his journey, when or whether he meant to go ; nor held any further discourse with them. The manner and the matter of the king's short discourse to them wonderfully surprised the messengers, who were all persons of the best quality in both houses, the earl of Pembroke being the chief, and some of them were of known affections to his majesty's service ; who were wonderfully delighted with the king's quick and sharp treatment, with which the rest were as much troubled : and so they all returned the same night to London.

The king resolved to pursue the course agreed upon with the queen at her departure, and would no more resume the consideration of staying nearer the parliament ; very reasonably apprehending that he should render himself liable every day to new affronts. And the practice both houses had gotten, to send for persons by a sergeant at arms upon any suggestions of light discourse, or upon general and ungrounded suspicions, by which they were compelled to give long attendance, if they were not committed to prison, had so terrified all conditions of men, that very few resorted to the court. And they who did most diligently seem to attend their duty there, did in truth perform that service, that they might with the more ease betray their master, and gratify those who they thought would at last bring themselves into those places and offices, upon which they were to depend. So that he thought it most absolutely necessary to be at such a distance from Westminster, that people might be less apprehensive of their power : resolving likewise, that no person who attended him, or resorted to the place where he was, should yield any obedience to their summons upon those general suggestions, or any applications they should make to his majesty. And though it might have met with better success, if he had taken the contrary resolution, and stayed in or near Whitehall; yet the hazards or inconveniences which might very probably have attended that counsel, were too much in view for wise men to engage positively in the advice. Besides, the concert that had been made with the queen shut out all opposite consultations: and the king with a small court, after two days' stay at Theobalds, began his progress towards Newmarket; and sometimes resting a day in a place, he advanced by easy journeys northward.

He took the prince with him, the marquis likewise attending him; but left the duke of York still at Richmond, till he came to York: and then likewise he sent for his highness, who came thither to him: and the morning he left Theobalds he sent his answer to the two houses to their message they had sent to him thither. When the messengers who had presented the message to the king at Theobalds made their report to the houses of their reception there, and of what his majesty had said to them, in which they helped and assisted each other, so that there was not only every word he said related, but his manner of speaking and his looks described, which gave them infinite trouble, and much the more, because they saw joy and delight in the countenance of all those who they knew were not their friends, and a kind of dejection in many who used to concur with them; on the same day, or the next, they received an answer from his majesty to their last message, which took notice of every particular in it: answered all the reproaches they had cast upon him, and the unwarrantable manner in doing it; enlarged upon the large concessions he had granted upon their desires; and that all which the people could desire for their benefit and advantage was provided for by his grace, and that it would be acknowledged by them, if they had not fears and jealousies infused into their heads by them. He put them in mind of many indignities offered to him in the pulpits by seditious sermons, and by the press in publishing and printing those sermons, and many other scandalous pamphlets, and that all this found no discountenance from them. He said, he would deny nothing to them which by law they could require, and that the preservation of his own prerogative was necessary, that his subjects might enjoy the benefit of those laws; and after some sharp reflections upon some undutiful actions of theirs, and some unusual expressions in the addresses they had made to him, he concluded that, since they had appealed to the people, by printing all their unwarrantable votes and other proceedings, which they had no lawful authority to publish in that manner, his majesty was well contented that the people should judge between them, and discern who was most tender of their happiness, and most desired that it might be continued to them; and so ordered that his answer should be printed, as their message had been.

This new spirit in the king's actions, and steadiness in his proceedings, and his new dialect in his words and answers to them, so contrary to the softness they expected, infinitely discomposed them, and raised the spirits of others, who had sunk under their insolence. In the house of peers they found more opposition than of late they had done, and many in the house of commons recovered new mettle. Alderman Gourny, who was lord mayor of London, was a man of courage and discretion, very well affected to the king, and to the government in church and state, and perfectly abhorred the proceedings of the parliament; gave not that obedience to the orders they expected; did all he could to discountenance and suppress the riotous assemblies in the city, and especially the insolencies committed in churches; and expressly refused to call common-halls, and sometimes common-councils, when the house of commons desired it, which was the only way they had to scatter their fire about the city; and the refractoriness of this lord mayor discouraged them much by making it evident, that it was only the rabble and inferior sort of the city which was in truth devoted to them. But they were now gone too far to retire with their honour, or indeed with their safety; and they easily discerned, that if their spirits seemed to sink, their friends would leave them as fast as they had resorted to them; and if they now appeared more moderate in their demands from the king, they should but censure and condemn their own former fervour and importunity, and therefore they made all haste to make it appear that they had no such temper and inclination. They made committees to prepare new messages to the king, and to prepare new declarations; and sent their agents into the country to stir up the people in those counties and places through which the king was to pass; so that, wherever he made any stay, he was sure to be encountered with a petition from the county, that is, in the name of it, or of some eminent town in it where he lodged, that he would return to his parliament; but at the very time appeared to be the work of a few factious people, by the repair of the best persons of quality and interest to his majesty with all professions of affections and duty to him. They declared more hardness and resolution than before for the settling the militia of the kingdom; and since the king had refused to consent to the bill they had sent to him, they appointed a committee to prepare an ordinance for the government and settling of it, which, being passed both houses, they voted had in it the authority of a law, and that all persons were bound to obey it. They had before the king's leaving Windsor, or about that time, sent to the king, that in regard of the sickness and indisposition of the earl of Northumberland, the high admiral of England, so that he could not be able in person to command the fleets which his majesty had ordered to be ready for the guard of the seas, they desired that the earl of Warwick might, with his majesty's approbation, have a commission to execute that charge, (the earl of Northumberland having refused to grant any such commission without the king's consent,) which they said would much compose the minds of the people, in a conjuncture of so much jealousy; and the king answered them, that in the absence of the admiral, sir John Pennington, a person of good experience in command, well known, and of a fair reputation, had used to have that command, which his majesty resolved he should execute that year. They now resolved that the earl of Warwick should be admiral of that fleet, by an ordinance of both houses, which the earl accepted, and undertook the charge accordingly; the admiral having put in some officers and commanders of ships who would be forward to obey all his commands; and the king unhappily restraining some who had good interest in the navy from taking command then, though he permitted some others to go, who had less credit and reputation to serve him, though they were not without good affections. The king in his journey sent an answer from Huntingdon to some propositions they had sent to him, which contained not only a positive refusal of what they had desired, but making some sharp reflections upon somewhat they had said or done, put them into wonderful passion. They would not believe that it came from the king, but that it was forged in the town, for that it took notice of what had been done the night before, which could not be communicated to the king before the date of that despatch; and therefore they would make inquiry how it came to the speaker, to whom it had been delivered under the king's signet. The lord Falkland owning the having received it that morning from the king, and that he sent it by a messenger to the speaker, and putting them in mind that the matter they reflected upon as done the night before, had likewise been done three or four days before that, which, being manifest, they suppressed their choler as to the forgery, and took revenge upon the message itself, and voted, "that whosoever had advised the king to send that message, was a disaffected person, an enemy to the peace of the kingdom, and a promoter of the rebellion in Ireland;" which was a new style they took up upon that occasion, and continued afterwards in their most angry votes, to make those they liked not odious, and to make their punishment to pass with the more ease when they should be discovered. And now they tried all ways imaginable to find what new counsellors and secretary the king had found, who supplied him with so much resolution and bitterness; and though they made no doubt of the two new counsellors' concurrence in all, yet they did not impute the framing and forming the writing itself to either of them.

They had long detested and suspected Mr. Hyde, from the time of their first remonstrance, for framing the king's messages and answers, which they now every day received, to their intolerable vexation; yet knew not how to accuse him. But now that the earls of Essex and Holland had discovered his being shut up with the king at Greenwich, and the marquis of Hamilton had once before found him very early in private with the king at Windsor, at a time when the king thought all passages had been stopped; together with his being of late more absent from the house than he had used to be; and the resort of the other two every night to his lodging, as is mentioned before, satisfied them that he was the person; and they resolved to disenable him to manage that office long. Sir John Colepepper had as many eyes upon them as they had upon the other, and an equal animosity against them; and had familiarity and friendship with some persons, who from the second or third hand came to know many of the greatest designs, before they were brought upon the stage. For though they managed those councils with the greatest secrecy, and by few persons, which amounted to no more than pure designs in speculation; yet when any thing was to be transacted in public by the house, they were obliged, not only to prepare those of whom they were themselves confident, but to allow those confidants to communicate it to others in whom they confided: and so men, who did not concur with them, came to know sometimes their intentions time enough to prevent the success they proposed to themselves.

And by this means, sir John Colepepper, meeting at night with the lord Falkland and Mr. Hyde, assured them, that it had been resolved that day to have seized upon all three, and sent them to the Tower: of which he having received notice as he was going to the house, returned to his lodging, not being able to give the same information to the other two; but that his own being absent prevented the mischief. For he knew it was resolved the night before, that, when the three were together in the house, somebody should move the house, "that they would apply themselves to make some strict inquiry after the persons who were most like to give the king the evil counsel he had lately followed, and who prepared those answers and messages they received from his majesty:" upon which, by one and another, those three persons should be named, and particular reasons given for their suspicion; and that they did not doubt, but, if their friends were well prepared beforehand, they should be able to cause them to be all sent to the Tower; and then they doubted not they should be able to keep them there. But it was then likewise agreed, that they would not make the attempt but at a time when they were all three in the house; upon hearing whereof, and finding that they two were there, he went back to his lodging; knowing that thereupon there would be nothing done.

Upon this communication, though they were all of opinion that the design was so extravagant, and exceeding all the rules of common justice, that they would not be able to procure the consent of the major part of the house in it, if there were any considerable number present; yet because very many usually absented themselves, and they were not governed by any rules which had been formerly observed, they thought fit to resolve, that one of them would be always present in the house, that they might know all that was done; but that they would never be there all together, and seldom two of them; and when they were, they would only hear, and speak no more than was of absolute necessity. For it was now grown a very difficult thing for a man who was in their disfavour to speak against what they proposed, but that they would find some exception to some word or expression; upon which, after he had been called upon to explain, he was obliged to withdraw; and then they had commonly a major part to send him to the Tower, or to expel him the house; or at least to oblige him to receive a reprehension at the bar upon his knees. And so they had used sir Ralph Hopton at that time; who excepting to some expression that was used in a declaration prepared by a committee, and presented to the house, which he said was dishonourable to the king, they said, it was a tax upon the committee; caused him to withdraw, and committed him to the Tower; which terrified many from speaking at all, and caused more to absent themselves from the house; where too small numbers appeared any day. These three gentlemen kept the resolution agreed upon, till they all found it necessary to forbear any further attendance upon the house.

About the end of April, which was in the year 1642, Mr. Hyde received a letter from the king, wherein he required him, that, as soon as he could be spared from his business there, he should repair to his majesty at York, where he had occasion for his service: which when he had communicated to his two friends, they were all of opinion that it was necessary he should defer that journey for some time; there being every day great occasion of consulting together, and of sending despatches to the king. And it was a wonderful expedition that was then used between York and London, when gentlemen undertook the service, as enough were willing to do: insomuch, as when they despatched a letter on Saturday night, at that time of the year, about twelve at night, they received always the king's answer, Monday by ten of the clock in the morning. His majesty was content that he should stay as long as the necessity required; but that as soon as he might be dispensed with, he would expect him. And it was very happy that he did stay; for there was an occasion then fell out, in which his presence was very useful, [towards disposing the lord keeper Littleton to send the great seal to the king at York, and to resolve upon going thither himself as soon as possible to attend his majesty; which resolution being taken,] it was agreed between him and his two friends, that it was now time that he should be gone (the king having sent for him some time before) after a day or two; in which time the declaration of the nineteenth of May would be passed, which being very long, he might carry with him, and prepare the answer upon the way, or after he came to York.

It was upon a Wednesday that he resolved to begin his journey, having told the speaker, that ~~it~~ was very necessary, by the advice of his physician, that he should take the air of the country for his health; and his physician certified the same; which caution was necessary: for he had a week or two before made a journey into the country to his own house, and his absence being taken notice of, a messenger was immediately sent to him, to require him immediately to attend the house; upon which he found it necessary to return without delay; and was willing to prevent the like sudden inquiry, and so prepared the speaker to answer for him. He resolved with the lord Falkland to stay at a friend's house near Oxford, and little out of the road he meant to take for York, till he should hear of the keeper's motion, of which he promised to give him timely notice; not giving in the mean time any credit to his purpose of moving; but he was quickly convinced.

Much notice had been taken of Mr. Hyde's frequent resort to him, and of his being often shut up with him; and when he took his leave of him, the night before he left the town, the keeper was walking in his garden with Mr. Hollis and Mr. Glyn, who had, as they said, then observed, that as soon as the keeper's eyes were upon him, at his entrance into the garden, he had shewn some impatience to be free from them; and when they were gone, others took notice, (for there were many in the garden,) as they pretended, that, after they had walked some time together, they took their leave of each other in another manner than was usual; and which was not true. But he had not so good a name, as that any thing of that kind would not easily gain belief: so that Dr. Morley, (who is since bishop of Winchester,) being in Westminster hall on the Monday morning, when the news came of the lord keeper's flight, a person of great authority in the parliament met him, and, with great passion inveighing against the keeper, told him, that they knew well enough that his friend Mr. Hyde had contrived that mischief, and brought it to pass; for which he would be that morning, or the next, accused of high treason; which the doctor (who was ever very much his friend) hearing, went presently to the lord Falkland, and told him of it, and desired to know where he was, that he might give him timely notice of it; knowing a gentleman, a very near friend of his, who would immediately ride to him. The lord Falkland was then writing to him, to inform him of the keeper's having made good his word, of which he had but then notice, and to advise him to prosecute his northern journey with all expedition; and desired the doctor, that he would send for the gentleman, whom he would presently direct where he should find Mr. Hyde; who did make so good haste, that he delivered the lord Falkland's letter to him early the same night.

He was then at Ditchley with the lady Lee, (since countess of Rochester,) and the person who brought the advertisement to him was John Ayliffe, whom he dearly loved. He no sooner received the advertisement, but he thought it time for him to be gone; and as he was utterly unacquainted with the way, having never been in the northern parts, and apprehended that there would be care taken to intercept him, if he went in any common road; there was with him at that time Mr. Chillingworth, whose company he had desired from Oxford, purposely for that occasion; and who was well acquainted with those ways which led almost as far as Yorkshire. They sent their horses that night to a village near Coventry, where Mr. Chillingworth's brother had a farm; and then in the morning they put themselves into the lady's coach; which, with six horses, carried them to that village, thirty miles from Ditchley; where, after they had a little refreshed themselves, they took their horses; and that night, out of all roads, reached Lutterworth, a village in Leicestershire; where Mr. Chillingworth had likewise a friend, who was parson of the parish, who received them kindly. And so by unusual ways they got through Derbyshire, until they came to Yorkshire; and then rested at Nostall, the house of sir John Worstenholme; who, though he and his family were at London, had given order for his very good reception; it having been before resolved, with his majesty's consent, that he should stay in some private place near York, till his majesty was informed of it, and till his affairs absolutely required his presence there; there being many reasons that he should be concealed in those parts as long as might be convenient. Nostall was within twenty miles of York; and from thence he gave his majesty notice of his being there, and sent him the answer that was prepared to the declaration of the two houses. And the king the next day sent Mr. Ashburnham to him, with the declaration of the twenty-sixth of May, and which was the highest they had yet published; and to which he wished an answer should be prepared as soon as possible it might be, that the poison thereof might not work too long upon the minds of the people. By this time many persons of quality from the several quarters of the kingdom repaired to the king, and many gentlemen listed themselves with those of the country in the prince's troop, and usually attended upon his majesty when he rode abroad to take the air; and it was not possible but in such a number of men of all humours, many would discourse with freedom of the times, and of the proceedings of the parliament according to their tempers and passions; and there were spies enough to give quick advertisement to London of all that was said or done. Whereupon the houses sent messengers to apprehend some gentlemen, against whom they had received information of words spoken by them, which trench upon them and their actions, and to bring them before them; who appeared with the same confidence, even in the king's presence, as they could have done at Westminster, and shewed their warrants to the persons concerned, and required their submission; of which his majesty being informed, he forbade the gentlemen to yield any obedience to those summons, and sent for the messengers, and commanded them to depart the town, and to appear no more there on those errands at their utmost perils. The news of this protection, which his majesty knew well if he did not give, he should be quickly stripped of all his attendants, and that nobody should remain about him, but such who would betray him, was no sooner known, but persons of all conditions and from all places flocked to York, and many members of both houses of parliament left their attendance at Westminster, and repaired to his majesty, it being in truth not safe to continue longer there, they having now made their general, and solemnly engaged themselves to live and die with the earl of Essex; and shortly after sir Sydney Mountague was expelled the house of commons for refusing to take that engagement, and giving his reason, because, he said, he had a proclamation in his pocket by which the king had proclaimed the earl of Essex a traitor, and produced the proclamation, for which he was so treated as aforesaid. In the house of commons the members had publicly declared, and made subscriptions what horse and arms they would contribute or bring in to serve under the earl of Essex. It is true, though all the members were called upon by name to declare themselves, there was not yet any man punished for refusing; the case of sir Sydney Mountague fell out afterwards; and Harry Killigrew, of Cornwall, (a gallant gentleman, and generally known,) being asked in the house what he would subscribe, stood up and answered, that he would provide a good horse, and a good sword, and a good buffcoat, and then he would find a good cause; which, for that time, only raised laughter, though they knew well what cause he thought good, which he had never dissembled. However men easily discerned, that in a short time there could very few remain there, but of one party; and so very many repaired into their countries, there to expect what would follow; and very many resorted to the king, to offer him their service, and to receive his commands. Upon the return of the messengers to London, who were forbade by his majesty to come any more thither, after he forbade the gentlemen who had been sent for to obey the summons, the houses had a new reproach to cast upon the king, that he protected delinquents from justice; upon which they made new votes and declarations; and that the spirits of their friends in those parts might not sink, they sent a committee of both houses to deliver one of their usual messages to his majesty, and ordered them to reside at York, or whosoever his majesty should be, for the more convenient representing their desires and propositions, which would otherwise require particular messengers every [time]; whereas that committee, residing still there, would receive his majesty's answers upon all occasions, and transmit them to the parliament.

The king well knew that the persons were chosen to be spies upon him, and to raise factions in the country against him; yet thought it not yet time to break off all correspondence with the parliament, and so to dismiss that committee. That committee consisted of the lord Edward Howard, who hath been mentioned before so fully that there needs no enlargement upon him in this place; the lord Fairfax, sir Hugh Cholmondely, and sir John Stapleton; the three last being gentlemen of that county; who, in a short time, had so great an influence upon that people, that they made it appear to the king that he was not so entirely possessed of the hearts and affections of that great county, as by the conflux of the chief gentry to him he was willing to believe: for at a general appearance of that country in a great field or moor near York, his majesty riding thither to receive the acclamations of the people, who, he was told, were ready to receive any commands from him, sir Thomas Fairfax, the son of the lord Fairfax, and the same man who was afterwards general for the parliament, with some few other gentlemen of less account, in the head of a great number of substantial country people, presented the king with a petition that he would return to his parliament, and not violate their privileges by giving protection to delinquents; taking notice that he had many papists who attended about him, and had listed themselves in his troops of guards, and some particulars of the like nature; which petition, delivered confidently, in such a manner and at such a time, much surprised the king; and though most of the persons of condition expressed a public dislike and disapprobation of the petition, and the number of the common people, who knew nothing of it, was much superior to the other, which appeared many ways, and in particular by the affronts which were given to many of those who appeared with the petition; yet it made a great noise, and gave the parliament new courage, and persuaded them that they had many friends in that place, where it was believed that the king had most.

As soon as it was taken notice of in the parliament that Mr. Hyde was absent, inquiry was made what was become of him, and a motion made in the house, that he might be sent for. The speaker said, that he had acquainted him with his going into the country to recover his indisposition, which troubled him, by fresh air; and that Dr. Winston his physician was with him, and informed him that he was troubled with the stone; and that his having sat so much in the house in that very hot weather had done him much harm, and therefore that he had advised him to refresh himself in the country air; with which testimony they were for the present satisfied; though Mr. Peard said confidently, "that he was troubled with no other stone than the stone in his heart, "and therefore he would have him sent for where ever he was; for he was most confident that he "was doing them mischief wherever he was." But he prevailed not, till their committee from York sent them word that he was come thither, and almost always with the king. It is said before, that he stayed at Nostall, at the house of sir John Worstenholme, from whence he sent every day to the king, and received his majesty's commands; and he intended to have stayed longer there, where he could better intend and despatch any business he was to do; and he was willing for some time not to be seen at York, which he knew would quickly be taken notice of at Westminster.

When he came first thither, he found that the king was not satisfied with the lord keeper, which gave him much trouble; his majesty having sent him word, that he did not like his humours, nor know what to make of him. Mr. Elliot, who had brought the seal to the king, to magnify his own service, and not imagining that the keeper intended to follow him, had told many stories; as if the keeper had refused to deliver the seal, and that he got it by force, by having locked the door upon him, and threatened to kill him, if he would not give it to him, which, upon such his manhood, he did for pure fear consent unto. And this tale got so much credit with the king, that he hardly disbelieved it when he came himself; though it was in the nature of it very improbable, that a single man, from another man as strong as himself, (who was attended by many servants in the next room,) should suffer the door to be shut upon him, and suffer that to be extorted from him which he had no mind to part with; and suffer him to go out of his house, when there were persons enough in every room to have laid hands upon him, and to have taken that again by force, which he had ravished away. Besides that, his majesty knew he expected to be sent for at that time; and that if he had repented the promise he had made, and resolved not to perform it, he could have found several ways to have evaded it; and refused to have admitted Mr. Elliot to speak with him: but the prejudice his majesty had before contracted against him, and the great confidence Elliot had in the relation, which was natural in him, had shut out all those reflections. Yet when his majesty saw him, he received him graciously; and caused him to be lodged in the court, in a room very near his majesty; which many believed to be rather out of jealousy and care that he should not again return, than out of respect to him; his majesty keeping still the seal himself, and not restoring it to his custody; which could not but make some impression on him, and more on others, who from thence concluded that he would have no more to do with the seal; and carried themselves towards him accordingly.

The lords who were come from the house of peers, and had been offended at his behaviour there, gave him little respect now; but rather gave credit to Mr. Elliot's relation; and were forward to make relation of his carriage in the house to his disadvantage, to the king himself; so that it was no wonder that the poor gentleman grew very melancholic. And when he was sent for to attend the king, (who was himself present when the great seal was to be used, nor did ever suffer it to be used but in the presence of the keeper, who signed all things, as he ought to do by his office,) when any proclamation of treason, as that against the earl of Essex, or against the proceedings of the houses, as in the business of the militia, or the like, was brought to be sealed, he used all delays; and made many exceptions, and found faults in matters of form, and otherwise, sometimes very reasonably; yet in such a manner as made it evident he retained many fears about him, as if he was not without apprehension that he might fall again into their hands; which was the cause that the king had said, that he knew not what to make of him.

Mr. Hyde, as soon as he heard this, wrote a letter to the king, and put him in mind of all that had formerly passed in that affair; how absolutely the keeper had destroyed himself in the account of the parliament, by paying that obedience which he ought to do to his majesty's commands; and that if he should be deprived of his majesty's favour, he must be of all men the most miserable; and that himself should be most unfortunate, in having contributed so much to his ruin; which would call his majesty's good nature, and even his justice into question; and therefore besought him to be gracious to him, and to keep up his spirits with his countenance. However, he made it his own humble suit to his majesty, that he would not take any severe resolution against him, before he gave him leave to kiss his hand, and to offer him some further considerations. Upon the receipt of this letter, the king sent him word, that he would gratify him in the last part of his letter, and conclude nothing before he spake with him: in the mean time he wished him to send the keeper some good counsel; and that as soon as he should have despatched some business he had then upon his hands, that he would come to York, where he would find much to do; and that he thought now there would be less reason every day for his being concealed. And within four or five days after, his majesty sent Mr. Ashburnham to him, to let him know, that he had every day so much to do with the keeper, and found him so refractory and obstinate, that he should not be able to keep the promise he had made to him, if he did not make haste to York; and therefore bade him to be with him with all convenience: whereupon, within two days after, for he had somewhat to despatch that required haste, and sooner than he intended, he waited upon his majesty at York.

It was about a day or two after the appearance of the people of the country, when sir Thomas Fairfax had delivered the petition, mentioned before, that Mr. Hyde came to York, and when he came to the court, being about four of the clock in the afternoon, the king was at council, upon the publishing his answer to the declaration of the twenty-sixth of May; which, though it contained eight or nine sheets of paper, he brought to the board in his own hand writing; having kept the promise he had made at Greenwich to that hour, in writing out all the papers himself, which had been sent to him; which had been a wonderful task he had imposed on himself: so that he always spent more than half the day shut up by himself in his chamber, writing; which was most of the news the houses heard of him at London; and which perplexed them very much.

Mr. Hyde was in the gallery when the king came from council; and as soon as he saw him, he bade him welcome to York very graciously; and asked some questions aloud of him, as if he thought he had then come from London; and then called him into the garden, where he walked with him above an hour. He said at the beginning, "that they needed not now be afraid of 'being seen together,'" then used all the expressions of kindness to him that can be imagined, of the service he had done him, and of the great benefit he had received from it, even to the turning the hearts of the whole nation towards him again, and of his gracious resolutions of rewarding him with the first opportunity; and many expressions of that kind, which the other received with the modesty and reverence that became him. Then his majesty spake of his business, and the temper of that country; and quickly entered upon finding fault with the keeper, and protested, if it were not for his sake, he would turn him out of his place that very hour; and enlarged upon many particulars of his obstinacy, and of his want of courage, to such a degree, as if he did really apprehend that the gentleman usher of the black rod would come and take him out of his chamber.

Mr. Hyde told him, that he would discourage many good men, who desired to serve him very faithfully, if he were too severe for such faults, as the infirmities of their nature and defects in their education exposed them to: that if the keeper, from those impressions, had committed some faults which might provoke his majesty's displeasure, he had redeemed those errors by a signal service, which might well wipe out the memory of the other. The king said with some warmth, "that he was so far from another opinion, that 'he would hate himself, if he did not believe that 'he had made a full expiation; and though he 'did think that he had been wrought upon by 'him to perform that part, yet he thought the merit of it far above any of his transgressions; and that he was disposed, from the first minute of his coming to York, to have renewed his old kindness to him, and confidence in him; and 'would willingly have given the seal again into 'his hands, if he had found he had desired it; 'but that he found no serenity in his countenance, nor any inclination to do what necessity required: and whereas the parliament took 'advantage, that none of his majesty's acts, 'which he had caused to be published, were 'authentic, nor ought to be looked upon as his, 'because the great seal had not been affixed to them, which could not be done whilst the great seal was at Westminster; now he had the seal 'by him, and sent proclamations to be sealed, 'the keeper was still as unwilling that they 'should pass, as if he was still under their 'power; which made him angry, and nothing 'that he had done before.'"

Mr. Hyde replied, that "the poor gentleman 'could not but think himself disobliged to the 'highest extremity, in the presumption of Mr. 'Elliot; and that his extravagant and insolent 'discourses should find credit, without his majesty's reprehension and vindication, who knew 'the falsehood of them." And so put his majesty in mind of all that had passed; and of the other circumstances, which made all the other's brags impossible to be true. For his fears and apprehensions, he besought his majesty to remember, that "he had newly escaped out of that 'region where the thunder and lightning is 'made; and that he could hardly yet recover the 'fright he had been often in, and seen so many 'others in; and that his majesty need not distrust him; he had passed the Rubicon, and 'had no hope but in his majesty." His majesty concluded, that he should be sure to receive all necessary countenance and protection from him; of which he bade him to assure him, and presently to visit him; which going to do, he met him in the garden, and they there walked together.

He found him full of apprehension that he should be put out of his place, and of the ruin and contempt that he should be then exposed to, which he had brought upon himself; but when the other answered him, that there was no danger of that, and told him all that had passed between the king and him; and that if he would, he might have the seal in his own custody again within an hour, he was exceedingly revived, and desired him to entreat the king to keep the great seal still himself; that he would by no means be answerable for the safety of it, nor would trust any servant of his own to look to it; which, as it was wisely considered and resolved by him, so it increased the king's confidence in him; who would have been troubled if the other had accepted the grace that was offered. And from that time, when any thing was to be done that administered any argument for doubt, Mr. Hyde always prepared him by discourse; so that there was never after any unkindness from the king towards him: but the vigour of his mind grew every day less, under a great melancholy that oppressed him, from the consideration of the time, and of his own ill condition in his fortune; which was much worse than any body imagined it could be.

Before he went out of the garden, the lord Howard, sir Hugh Cholmely, and sir Philip Stapleton, (who were the committee from the parliament,) had intelligence that he was walking in the garden with the king; whereupon they came presently thither, and after they had saluted him with much civility, they shewed him an instruction they had from the parliament; by which they were required, if any member of either house came to York, they should let them know, that it was the pleasure of the house that they should immediately attend the house, and signify to them what answer they made; and so they desired he would excuse them for doing their duty. He told them, he was but just then come thither, in obedience to his majesty's commands, and knew not yet what service he was to do; but that as soon as his majesty would give him leave, he would return to the parliament.

There happened an accident, at Mr. Hyde's first coming to York, which he used often to speak of, and to be very merry at. One of the king's servants had provided a lodging for him, so that when he alighted at the court, he sent his servants thither, and stayed himself at the court till after supper, and till the king went into his chamber; and then he had a guide, who went with him, and conducted him to his chamber; which he liked very well, and began to undress himself. One of his servants wished that he had any other lodging, and desired him not to lie there: he asked why, it seemed to him a good chamber: his servant answered, that the chamber was good, but the people of the house the worst he ever saw, and such as he was confident would do him some mischief: at which wondering, his servant told him, that the persons of the house seemed to be of some condition by their habit that was very good; and that the servants, when they came thither, found the master and mistress in the lower room, who received them civilly, and shewed them the chamber where their master was to lodge, and wished them to call for any thing they wanted, and so left them: that shortly after, one of them went down, and the mistress of the house being again in the lower room, where it seems she usually sat, she asked him what his master's name was, which he told her: what, said she, that Hyde that is of the house of commons? and he answering yes, she gave a great shriek, and cried out, that he should not lodge in her house; cursing him with many bitter execrations. Upon the noise, her husband came in; and when she told him who it was that was to lodge in the chamber above, he swore a great oath that he should not; and that he would rather set his house on fire, than entertain him in it. The servant stood amazed, knowing that his master had never been in or near that city, and desired to know what offence he had committed against them; he told them, he was confident his master did not know them, nor could be known to them. The man answered, after two or three curses, that he knew him well enough, and that he had undone him, and his wife, and his children; and so, after repeating some new bitter curses, he concluded, that he would set his house on fire, as soon as the other should set his foot in it; and so he and his wife went away in a great rage into an inner room, and clapped the door to them.

When his servant had made this relation to him, he was no less surprised; knew not what to make of it; asked whether the people were drunk; was assured that they were very sober, and appeared before this passion to be well bred. He sent to desire the master of the house to come to him, that they might confer together; and that he would immediately depart his house, if he desired it. He received no answer, but that he and his wife were gone to bed: upon which he said no more, but that, if they were gone to bed, he would go to bed too; and did accordingly. Though he was not disturbed in the night, the morning was not at all calmer; the master and the mistress stormed as much as ever, and would not be persuaded to speak with him; but he then understood the reason: the man of the house had been an attorney in the court of the president and council of the north, in great reputation and practice there; and thereby got a very good livelihood; with which he had lived in splendour; and Mr. Hyde had sat in the chair of that committee, and had carried up the votes of the commons against that court, to the house of peers; upon which it was dissolved: which he confessed was a better reason for being angry with him than many others had, who were as angry, and persecuted him more. However, he thought himself obliged to remove the eyesore from them, and to quit the lodging that had been assigned to him; and he was much better accommodated by the kindness of a good prebendary of the church, Dr. Hodshon, who sent to invite him to lodge in his house, as soon as he heard he was come to town; where he resided as long as the court stayed there.

There was now a great conflux of the members of both houses of parliament to York; inasmuch as there remained not in the house of commons above a fifth part of the whole number; and of the house of peers so few, that there continued not at Westminster twenty lords. Yet they proceeded with the same spirit and presumption, as when their numbers were full; published new declarations against the king; raised soldiers for their army apace; and executed their ordinance for the militia in all the counties of England, the northern parts only excepted; forbade all persons to resort to the king; and intercepted many in their journey towards York, and committed them to prison: notwithstanding which, many persons of quality every day flocked thither; and it was no longer safe for those members to stay in the houses of parliament, who resolved not to concur with them in their unwarrantable designs; and therefore the lord Falkland and sir John Colepepper shortly after repaired likewise to York. The houses quickly found the reproach of their small numbers was some discredit to their transactions, and therefore renewed their summons to their absent members to return; and, when they saw no obedience given to those summons, they expelled those members of the house of commons who were with the king, and gave order that new writs should issue out for the electing new members in their places; but the king prevented that by giving order to the lord keeper not to seal any writs which should be prepared and sent to him for any new elections. Upon some information against the lord Savile, for some expressions he had used against the parliament, when the petition that is mentioned before was presented by sir Thomas Fairfax, that lord and eight more were summoned by an order from the house of peers, and required to attend that house. Upon which they making a joint answer, that they had received an express order to attend upon his majesty's person, the house of commons, taking notice of this answer, in a new and unheard-of way carried up a charge and impeachment to the house of peers against those nine lords for not attending the service of the parliament; and the house of peers thereupon, with all formality, and in their robes, passed a sentence and judgment upon those nine, (the number of the judges not much exceeding that number,) that they should be fined, and disabled to sit in parliament during the time that parliament should continue; which was looked upon as an act without any foundation of law or precedent, and was slighted accordingly by those who were most immediately concerned in it.

The noise of the king's journey to Beverley made a great impression upon the parliament; where, how great a concurrence soever there was, in those unwarrantable actions which begot the war, yet a small number of those who voted both the raising the army and making the general, did in truth intend, or believe, that there would be a war: and therefore, when they looked upon it as begun in this march of the king's to Hull, (for they considered their own actions as done only to prevent a war, by making the king unable to make it, who as they thought only desired it,) they moved presently for some overtures of an accommodation: which that angry party that resolved against it, never durst absolutely reject; but consenting cheerfully to it, got thereby authority to insert such things in the address, as must inevitably render it ineffectual. So at this time they sent the earl of Holland, a person whom at that time they knew to be most unacceptable to the king, with two members of the house of commons, who came to Beverley the day the king arrived there. The subject of their message was, after several specious expressions and professions of their duty, to dissuade his majesty from making war against his parliament, by proceeding in his enterprise against Hull, which the parliament was obliged to defend. And all the expedient they proposed for the avoiding this war was, that he would consent to the nineteen propositions, which they had formerly made to him at York, and to which he had long since returned his answer; and both the one and the other were printed.

These nineteen propositions, which contained the disinherison of the crown of all its choice regalities, and left only the shadow and empty name of the king, had been framed by the houses after Mr. Hyde left London. And because he had so much work then upon his hands, as they believed he would not be able to despatch soon enough, the lord Falkland and sir John Colepepper undertook to prepare an answer to them themselves; and so divided the propositions between them; and in a short time so finished their answer, that they sent it to the king, and desired that Mr. Hyde might peruse it, and then cause it to be published and printed. The answer was full to all particulars, and writ with very much wit and sharpness; but there were some expressions in it, which he liked not, as prejudicial to the king, and in truth a mistake in point of right, in that part which had been prepared by sir John Colepepper; who had taken it up upon credit, and, without weighing the consequence, did really believe that it had been true; which was, that in the discourse of the constitution of the kingdom, he had declared, that the king, and the house of peers, and the house of commons made the three estates: and for this reason Mr. Hyde did not advance the printing it; and told the king, that all the particulars in those propositions had been enough answered in former answers to other declarations, (which was true,) and therefore that this needed not be published: with which his majesty was satisfied, without knowing the particular true reason; which he thought not fit to communicate, for both the persons' sakes, of whose affection for the church (which was principally concerned in that mistake, since in truth the bishops make the third estate, the king being the head and sovereign of the whole) his majesty was always jealous.

But they no sooner came to York, than they appeared much unsatisfied, that that answer was not printed; and the lord Falkland finding it remained still in Mr. Hyde's hands, he expostulated warmly with him of the reasons; and in some passion said, "he therefore disliked it, because "he had not writ it himself." Upon which, without saying more, than that "he never expected so unkind a reproach from him," he delivered the written copy to him, and he immediately procured the king's consent, and sent it to the press that night, with order to lose no time in the impression. Of which the king was afterwards very sensible; and that excellent lord, who intended not the least unkindness, (nor did it produce the least interruption in their friendship,) was likewise much troubled when he knew the reason; and imputed it to his own inadvertency, and to the infusion of some lawyers, who had misled sir John Colepepper; and to the declarations which many of the prelatical clergy frequently and ignorantly made, that the bishops did not sit in parliament as the representatives of the clergy, and so could not be the third estate.

It happened that the day the earl of Holland came to Beverley, Mr. Hyde had been riding abroad; and returning to Beverley, happened to be in the same road, when the earl of Holland and his company prosecuted their journey to the king: when meeting together, there passed the usual salutations which are between persons well known to each other. "He hoped," the earl said, "that he should be welcome to all honest "men at the court, because he came to invite the "king to return to his parliament, and to abolish "all jealousies between them." The other answered, "he would be very welcome indeed, if "he brought proper expedients to produce either "of those effects; but then his errand must be "of another composition than what the king understood it to be." Upon which they entered upon a warmer discourse than it may be either of them intended; and as the earl spake in another style than he had used to do, of the power and authority of the parliament, and how much they were superior to any opposition or contradiction; so the other in the debate was less reserved, and kept a less guard upon himself than he used to do; so that they seemed nothing pleased with each other: nor did Mr. Hyde visit him after his coming to Beverley, because he was informed that the earl had, to many persons who resorted to him, repeated with some liberty and sharpness, what had passed between them; and not without some menaces what the parliament would do. And as soon as he did return, there was a new vote passed by name against him, and two or three more, by which he was exempted from pardon, in any accommodation that should be made between the king and parliament.

Mr. Hyde had been absent four or five days from the court, and came into the presence when the king was washing his hands before dinner; and as soon as the king saw him, he asked him aloud, "Ned Hyde, when did you play with my "band-strings last?" upon which he was exceedingly out of countenance, not imagining the cause of the question, and the room being full of gentlemen, who appeared to be merry with what the king had asked. But his majesty observing him to be in disorder, and to blush very much, said pleasantly, "Be not troubled at it, for I have "worn no band-strings these twenty years:" and then asked him whether he had not seen the diurnal; of which he had not heard till then; but shortly after, some of the standers-by shewed him a diurnal, in which there was a letter of intelligence printed, where it was said, that Ned Hyde was grown so familiar with the king, that he used to play with his band-strings. Which was a method of calumniating they began then, and shortly after prosecuted and exercised upon much greater persons.

In the afternoon the earl of Holland came to deliver his message with great formality; whom the king received with much coldness and manifestation of neglect: and when the earl approached, and kneeled to kiss his hand, he turned, or withdrew his hand in such a manner, that the earl kissed his own. When the message was read, the king said little more, than that they should not stay long for an answer; and so went to his chamber. The earl was not without many friends there; and some of them moved the king, that he would give him leave to say somewhat to him in private, which they believed would be very much for his service; but his majesty would by no means yield to it. By this time his majesty had notice of the governor's irresolution at Hull; and so was glad of this opportunity to have a fair excuse for making no attempt upon that place: and sent the next day for the earl of Holland to receive his answer; which being read aloud in the king's presence, and a full room, by the clerk of the council, was very grateful to the auditors, who feared some condescension in the king, though very mortifying to the earl. For besides that it was thought very sharp towards the houses, it declared his brother, the earl of Warwick, a traitor, for possessing himself of the king's fleet against his consent; and concluded, that he would forbear any attempt upon Hull for fourteen days; in which time, if the parliament would enter into a treaty for a happy peace, they should find him very well inclined to it; after the expiration of that time, he should pursue those ways which he thought fit. In the mean time, he made a short progress into the adjacent counties of Nottingham and Leicester, to see what countenance they wore, and to encourage those who appeared to have good affections to his service: and then returning to Beverley within the limited time, and hearing no more from the parliament, or any thing from Hull that he expected, he returned again to York, as hath been said before.

Mr. Hyde was wont often to relate a passage in that melancholic time, when the standard was set up at Nottingham, with which he was much affected. Sir Edmund Varney, knight-marshal, who was mentioned before as standard-bearer, with whom he had great familiarity, who was a man of great courage, and generally beloved, came one day to him, and told him, "he was very glad to see him, in so universal a damp, under which the spirits of most men were oppressed, retain still his natural vivacity and cheerfulness; that he knew that the condition of the king, and the power of the parliament, was not better known to any man than to him; and therefore he hoped that he was able to administer some comfort to his friends, that might raise their spirits, as well as it supported his own." He answered, "that he was, in truth, beholden to his constitution, which did not incline him to despair; otherwise, that he had no pleasant prospect before him, but thought as ill of affairs as most men did; that the other was as far from being melancholic as he, and was known to be a man of great courage, (as indeed he was of a very cheerful and a generous nature, and consequently valiant,) and that they could not do the king better service, than by making it their "business to raise the dejected minds of men, and root out those apprehensions which disturbed them, of fear and despair, which could do no good, and did really much mischief."

He replied smiling, "I will willingly join with you the best I can, but I shall act it very scurvily. My condition," said he, "is much worse than yours, and different, I believe, from any other man's; and will very well justify the melancholic that, I confess to you, possesses me. You have satisfaction in your conscience that you are in the right; that the king ought not to grant what is required of him; and so you do your duty and your business together: but for my part, I do not like the quarrel, and do heartily wish that the king would yield and consent to what they desire; so that my conscience is only concerned in honour and in gratitude to follow my master. I have eaten his bread, and served him near thirty years, and will not do so base a thing as to forsake him; and choose rather to lose my life (which I am sure I shall do) to preserve and defend those things which are against my conscience to preserve and defend: for I will deal freely with you, I have no reverence for the bishops, for whom this quarrel [subsists]." It was not a time to dispute; and his affection to the church had never been suspected. He was as good as his word; and was killed, in the battle of Edgehill, within two months after this discourse. And if those who had the same and greater obligations, had observed the same rules of gratitude and generosity, whatever their other affections had been, that battle had never been fought, nor any of that mischief been brought to pass that succeeded it.

After the king came to Oxford with his army, his majesty one day speaking with the lord Falkland very graciously concerning Mr. Hyde, said he had such a peculiar style, that he could know any thing written by him, if it were brought to him by a stranger, amongst a multitude of writings by other men. The lord Falkland answered, he doubted his majesty could hardly do that, because he himself, who had so long conversation and friendship with him, was often deceived; and often met with things written by him, of which he could never have suspected him, upon the variety of arguments. To which the king replied, he would lay him an angel, that, let the argument be what it would, he should never bring him a sheet of paper (for he would not undertake to judge of less) of his writing, but he would discover it to be his. The lord Falkland told him it should be a wager; but neither the one nor the other ever mentioned it to Mr. Hyde. Some days after, the lord Falkland brought several packets, which he had then received from London, to the king, before he had opened them, as he used to do: and after he had read his several letters of intelligence, he took out the prints of diurnals, and speeches, and the like, which were every day printed at London, and as constantly sent to Oxford: and amongst the rest there were two speeches, the one made by the lord Pembroke for an accommodation, and the other by the lord Brooke against it; and for the carrying on the war with more vigour, and utterly to root out the cavaliers, which were the king's party.

The king was very much pleased with reading the speeches, and said, he did not think that Pembroke could speak so long together; though every word he said was so much his own, that nobody else could make it. And so after he had pleased himself with reading the speeches over again, and then passed to other papers, the lord Falkland whispered in his ear, (for there were other persons by,) desiring him he would pay him the angel; which his majesty in the instant apprehending, blushed, and put his hand in his pocket, and gave him an angel, saying, he had never paid a wager more willingly; and was very merry upon it, and would often call upon Mr. Hyde for a speech, or a letter, which he very often prepared upon several occasions; and the king always commanded them to be printed. And he was often wont to say, many years after, that he would be very glad he could make a collection of all those papers, which he had written occasionally at that time; which he could never do, though he got many of them.

There was at that time a pleasant story upon those speeches. The lord Brooke had met with them in print, and heard that he was much reproached for so unchristian a speech against peace, though the language was such as he used in all opportunities: whereupon one morning in the house of peers, and before the house sat, he came to the earl of Portland, (who yet remained there with the king's approbation, and knew well enough from whence the speeches came, having himself caused them to be printed,) and shewing them to him, desired he would move the house, that that speech might, by their order, be burned by the hand of the hangman; by which means the kingdom would be informed, that it had never been spoken by him. The earl said, he would willingly do him the service; but he observed, that the speeches were printed in that manner, that where the earl of Pembroke's speech ended on the one side of the leaf, his (the lord Brooke's) speech began on the other side, so that one could not be burned, without burning the other too; which he knew not how the earl of Pembroke would like; and therefore he durst not move it without his consent. Whereupon they both went to the earl, who was then likewise in the house; and Portland told him what the lord Brooke desired, and asked him whether he wished it should be done. He, who heard he was very well spoken of, for having spoke so honestly for peace, said, he did not desire it. Upon which Brooke, in great anger, asked, if he had ever made that speech; he was very sure he had never made the other; and the other with equal choler replied, that he was always for peace; and though he could not say he had spoken all those things together, he was sure he had spoken them all at several times; and that he knew as well, that he had always been against peace, and had often used all those expressions which were in the speech, though, it may be, not all together. Upon which they entered into a high combat of reproachful words against each other, to the no small delight of the earl, who had brought them together, and of the rest of the standers-by; though upon the king's advance from Colebrooke, and the imagination that he purposed to have brought his army to London, both the parliament and the city was so far provoked, that they laid aside all thoughts of treaty; and upon his retreat, the view of the number and ill condition of his army, the furious party was much exalted, and thought of nothing but of forming new armies, which might subdue the other parts of the kingdom; yet when they had better collected themselves, the principal persons of the parliament, and those of the city, who had formerly very importunately pressed the message to the king for a treaty, returned to the same temper. The parliament was full of faction, and they who had concurred too much in the entering into the war, were now most solicitous to get out of it; they said the expense was already unsupportable; their army was wasted, so that they were upon the matter to begin again. They had spent very much of the money which had been raised for Ireland, and employed great numbers of those soldiers which were levied for that kingdom, which did not only redound to the great hazard of losing that kingdom, but would exceedingly turn to their reproach with the people of England, as soon as it should be taken notice of, and it could not be long concealed. They foresaw likewise that the vast sum of money, which must be got for the carrying on the war, must all be raised out of the city, which appeared discontented enough. There was likewise no union in the army; many officers gave up their commissions; and those who were members of both houses, and had carried regiments and troops into the field, were weary of the service, and disengaged themselves, and gave up their commands; so that the motions were again renewed for sending to the king for a peace: and at last a message was sent to the king, that he would send a safe conduct for four lords and eight commoners to attend his majesty with an humble petition from both houses, which they hoped might produce a good accommodation; which safe conduct was immediately granted, with which the messenger returned; and within few days after, the earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, Salisbury, and Holland, together with Pierrepont, lord Wenman, Whitlocke, Waller, and other members of the house of commons, came to Oxford with a petition to the king; which contained no more than a desire from the parliament, in terms more modest than they had been accustomed to, that his majesty would permit them to send a committee of both houses to attend him, that they might treat about a happy peace, and, in the first place, of a cessation of all acts of hostility. There was a pleasant observation at that time, which made the artifices appear by which they imposed upon their friends at London. The people there did generally believe that the king, and the little army he had with him, were in so great straits for want of provision in Oxford, that they were compelled to eat horseflesh; and that they would in a short time be forced to return to the parliament, that they might avoid the being starved; and either to keep up this imagination, or that they did themselves believe the scarcity to be very great, these commissioners brought with them a great quantity of provisions, even of bread and beer, as well as of beef and mutton and fowl, sufficient to feed the whole company that came with them, during such time as they believed they should stay there; of which they were ashamed as soon as they entered Oxford, and saw the great plenty in the markets, not only of the usual common fare, but of those choice fowl, of pheasants, partridge, cocks, snipes, in that abundance, as they were not so well furnished in London; besides the best fish and wild fowl, which was brought in every day, from the western part, in such plenty, that it can hardly be imagined. So that they were quickly converted from giving credit to that rumour, and it may be by it judged the better of the want of integrity in many other reports. The commissioners, after three or four days, returned with a gracious answer from the king, and with a safe conduct for such persons as the two houses should send to treat with the king; and men began to entertain good hope of a peace, and fair accommodation of all differences.

It may not be unfit in this place, for the better understanding the unhappy temper of the court and of the king's affairs, to remember, that, as soon as the commissioners were gone out of the town, there appeared a general indisposition in court, in army, and amongst the persons of quality which filled the town, to the peace, and a wonderful apprehension that it would be brought to pass, and therefore there were many cabals and meetings to consult how the treaty might be prevented, or at least made ineffectual. Though the king was in pleasant and plentiful quarters, where he wanted no provision of victuals, and out of which (for he was possessed of most of the countries between Oxford and Chester, and of the greatest part of Wales) he might reasonably hope to recruit his army; yet there was no hope of procuring money to pay them; and though the soldiers yet behaved themselves modestly in their quarters, so that there were no complaints, it could not be imagined that the country would long endure free-quarters, and submit likewise to pay contributions in money, which was assigned to the horse. The battle of Edge-hill, and the supplying the few garrisons which were made with very slender proportions of ammunition, had already so exhausted the stores, that there were not left at this time in Oxford above forty barrels of powder, and match and bullet proportionable; and though there was set up there a mill to make powder, newly erected, yet the undertakers in it would not promise to provide above twenty barrels in a week, which could produce no provision suitable to the necessity. It is true there was a reasonable supply of arms and ammunition arrived at Newcastle, the only port in the king's obedience; but, besides the great use there was to be of it in those parts, where the earl of Newcastle had been left to raise an army, and had now Yorkshire added to his commission, which stood in great need of his protection, the distance was so great between that and Oxford, that there was little hope of getting any of it with a less convoy than an army. Above all this, it was apparent to all men, who could discern at any distance, that the good humour of the lords and persons of quality, which kept up the humour every where else, would decay, and turn into murmuring and discontent, as soon as that money should be spent which they had brought with them from London, and which alone had made some show of plenty in the court; and therefore it was looked upon by wise men as a judgment from Heaven, that now, when that seemed to be in view which men of all conditions had prayed for since the setting up the standard at Nottingham, there should be even a conspiracy amongst those very persons to drive that blessing from them. And it was the more wonderful, that even the king himself was not without apprehension that he might suffer by making peace, and countenanced those who spake most against it, and laboured to prevent it; of which there will be occasion anon to speak more at large, and in that place to mention the true reason which produced that aversion. At this time there was a change in Mr. Hyde's fortune, by a preferment the king conferred upon him. Every body knew that he was trusted by the king in his most secret transactions; but he was under no character in his service. When the commissioners who were sent for the safe-conduct came to Oxford, some who came in their company, amongst other matters of intelligence, brought the king a letter of his own to the queen, printed, that had been intercepted, and printed by the license, if not order, of the parliament. In this letter, of the safe conveyance whereof his majesty had no apprehension, the king had lamented the uneasiness of his own condition, in respect of the daily importunity which was made to him by the lords and others, for honours, offices, and preferments; and named several lords, who were solicitous by themselves, or their friends, for this and that place; in all which he desired to receive the queen's advice, being resolved to do nothing with reference to those pretences, till he should receive it. But he said there were some places which he must dispose of without staying for her answer, the necessity of his service requiring it; which were the mastership of the wards; applications being still made to the lord Say in those affairs, and so that revenue was diverted from him: and therefore, as he had revoked his patent, so he was resolved to make secretary Nicholas master of the wards; "and then," (these were his majesty's own words,) "I must make Ned Hyde secretary of state, for the truth is, I can trust nobody else." Which was a very envious expression, and extended by the ill interpretation of some men, to a more general comprehension than could be intended. This was quickly made public, for there were several prints of it in many hands; and some men had reason to be troubled to find their names mentioned in that manner, and others were glad that theirs were there, as having the pretence to pursue their importunities the more vehemently, being, as the phrase was, brought upon the stage, and should suffer much in their honour, if they should be now rejected; which kind of argumentation was very unagreeable and grievous to the king.

One morning, when the king was walking in the garden, as he used to do, Mr. Hyde being then in his view, his majesty called him, and discoursed of the trouble he was in at the intercepting that letter; and finding by his countenance that he understood not the meaning, he asked him, "whether he had not heard a letter of his, which he writ to the queen, had been intercepted and printed." And he answering, "that he had not heard of it," as in truth he had not, the king gave him the printed letter to read, and then said, that "he wished it were as much in his power to make every body else amends as he could him; for," he said, "he was resolved that afternoon to swear him secretary of state, in the place of Nicholas, whom he would likewise then make master of the wards." Mr.

Hyde told him, "he was indeed much surprised with the sight of the letter; which he wished had not been communicated in that manner: but he was much more surprised to find his own name in it, and his majesty's resolution upon it, which he besought him to change; for as he never had the ambition to hope or wish for that place, so he knew he was very unfit for it, and unable to discharge it." To which the king with a little anger replied, that "he did the greatest part of the business now;" and he answered, that "what he did now would be no part of the business, if the rebellion were ended; and that his unskilfulness in languages, and his not understanding foreign affairs, rendered him very incapable of that trust." The king said, "he would learn as much as was necessary of that kind very quickly." He continued his desire, that his majesty would lay aside that thought; and said, "that he had great friendship for secretary Nicholas, who would be undone by the change; for he would find that his majesty would receive very little, and he nothing, by that office, till the troubles were composed." The king said, "Nicholas was an honest man, and that his change was by his desire;" and bade him speak with him of it; which he went presently to do, leaving his majesty unsatisfied with the scruples he had made.

When he came to the secretary's lodging, he found him with a cheerful countenance, and embracing him, called him his son. Mr. Hyde answered him, that "it was not the part of a good son to undo his father, or to become his son to whom he might undo him;" and so they entered upon the discourse; the one telling him what the king had resolved, and how grateful the resolution was to him; and the other informing him of the conference he had then had with the king, and that for his sake, as well as his own, he would not submit to the king's pleasure in it. And so he debated the whole matter with him, and made it evident to him, that he would be disappointed in any expectation he should entertain of profit from the wards, as the state of affairs then stood: so that he should relinquish an honourable employment, which he was well acquainted with, for an empty title, with which he would have nothing to do: and so advised him to consider well of it, and of all the consequences of it, before he exposed himself to such an inconvenience.

Whilst this was in suspense, sir Charles Caesar, who, with great prejudice to the king, and more reproach to the archbishop of Canterbury, Laud, had been made master of the rolls, died: and sir John Colepepper had long had a promise from the king of that place, when it should become void, and now pressed the performance of it: which was violently opposed by many, partly out of ill-will to him, (for he had not the faculty of getting himself much loved,) and as much out of good husbandry, and to supply the king's necessities with a good sum of money, which Dr. Duck was ready to lay down for the office. And the king was so far wrought upon, that he paid down three thousand pounds in part of what he was to give; but his majesty caused the money to be repaid, and resolved to make good his promise to sir John Colepepper, who would by no means release him. This was no sooner declared, than the lord Falkland (who was much more solicitous to have Mr. Hyde of the council, than he was himself for the honour) took an opportunity to tell the king, that he had now a good opportunity to prefer Mr. Hyde, by making him chancellor of the exchequer, in the place of sir John Colepepper; which the king said he had resolved to do, and bid him take no notice of it, until he had told him so himself: and shortly after sent for him, and said, "that he had now found an office for him, which he hoped he would not refuse: that the chancellorship of the exchequer was void by the promotion of Colepepper, and that he resolved to confer it upon him;" with many gracious expressions of the satisfaction he had in his service. The other answered, "that though it was an office much above his merit, yet he did not despair of enabling himself by industry to execute it, which he would do with all fidelity."

As soon as this was known, no man was so much troubled at it as sir John Colepepper, who had in truth an intention to have kept both places, until he should get into the quiet possession of the rolls. And though he professed much friendship to the other, he had no mind he should be upon the same level with him; and believed he would have too much credit in the council. And so delayed, after his patent for the rolls was passed, to surrender that of the chancellorship of the exchequer, until the lord Falkland and the lord Digby expostulated very warmly with him upon it, and until the king took notice of it; and then, seeming very much troubled that any body should doubt the integrity of his friendship to Mr. Hyde, to whom he made all the professions imaginable, he surrendered his office of chancellor of the exchequer: and the next day Mr. Hyde was sworn of the privy-council, and knighted, and had his patents sealed for that office. And the king, after he rose from the council, and after many expressions of the content he took himself in the obligation he had laid upon him, with much grace, that was not natural in him upon such occasions, told him, that "he was very fortunate, because he verily believed nobody was angry at his preferment; for besides that the earl of Dorset and others, who he knew loved him, had expressed much satisfaction in the king's purpose," he said, "the lord Maltrevors, and the lord Dunsmore, who he did not think had any acquaintance with him, seemed very much pleased with him; and therefore he thought nobody would envy him; which was a rare felicity." But his majesty was therein mistaken; for he had great enviers, of many who thought he had run too fast; especially of those of his own profession, who looked upon themselves as his superiors in all respects, and did not think that him age, (which was not then above thirty-three,) or his other parts, did entitle him to such a preference before them. And the news of it at Westminster exceedingly offended those who governed in the parliament; to see the man whom they most hated, and whom they had voted to be incapable of pardon, to be now preferred to an office the chief of them looked for. Besides, there was another unusual circumstance accompanied his preferment, that it was without the interposition or privy of the queen, which was not like to make it the more easy and advantageous; and it was not the more unwelcome to him from that circumstance.

Notwithstanding all the discourse of, and inclination to a treaty, the armies were not quiet on either side. The king's quarters were enlarged by the taking of Marlborough in Wiltshire, and of Cirencester in Gloucestershire; which, though untenable by their situation and weak fortifications, were garrisoned by the parliament with great numbers of men; who were all killed, or taken prisoners. And the parliament forces were not without success too; and, after the loss of Marlborough, surprised the regiment of horse, that was commanded by the lord Grandison, a gallant gentleman, who, if not betrayed, was unhappily invited to Winchester, with promise of forces ready to defend the place; which being in no degree performed, he was, the next day after he came, enclosed in the castle of Winchester, and compelled to become, all, officers and soldiers, prisoners of war: though he and some other of the principal officers, by the negligence or corruption of their guard, made their escape in the night, and returned to Oxford.

This was the state of the kingdom, of the king, and of the parliament, in the beginning of the year 1643, at the time when Mr. Hyde was made of the privy-council, and chancellor of the exchequer: which was between the return of the commissioners, who had been sent to the king to propose a treaty, and the coming of those commissioners to Oxford, who were afterwards sent from the parliament to treat with the king; which being about the end of the year 1642, this part shall be closed here.

Pezenas, the 24th of July, 1669.

PART III.

IT was about the beginning of March (which by that account was about the end of the year 1642, and about the beginning of the year 1643) that the commissioners of the parliament came to Oxford, to treat with his majesty; and were received graciously by him; and by his order lodged conveniently, and well accommodated in all respects.

The persons were the earl of Northumberland, (the rest appointed by the house of peers were dispensed with,) and of the commons the lord Wenman, Mr. Pierrepont, Mr. Whitlocke, . . . . . and the king intended to have appointed some of his council to have treated with them; but they discovered at their first audience, that they had authority only to treat with his majesty himself, and not with any other persons; whereupon his majesty gave them admission whenever they desired it, and received what they had to propose in writing, and then consulted and debated it at his council, and delivered his answer again in writing, the chancellor of the exchequer being always appointed to prepare those answers. The commissioners had very sincere desires to have made a peace, none of them having ever had inclination to alter the government, and the short experience they had, made it manifest to them that others were possessed with contrary resolutions; but their instructions were very strict, and nothing left to their own discretions; they who sent them well knowing how their affections stood, and though they had not power to hinder a treaty, which all the kingdom called for, and to refuse it had been to declare that they would continue the war that was universally abominated; yet they knew well how to elude it, which they were the less suspected to incline to, because they were still willing that such persons should be employed to treat who were known to be most solicitous for peace. When the propositions were formed in the house, upon the debate of them, when objections were made of their unreasonableness: that the king had already refused those very overtures when his condition was much lower, and therefore that it was not probable he would yield to the same when he was in the head of a good army: it was answered by those who resolved it should come to nothing, that it was the course and rule in all treaties iniquum petere ut æquum feras; that they did not expect that the king would yield to all they desired, or indeed that a peace would ever be made upon what they did or could propose; but that thereupon the king would be wrought upon to make his propositions, which must be the ground of the peace; and that they must first know what the king would grant before they abated any thing of their demands; and hereby (which seemed to have somewhat of reason) they still prevailed to keep up their propositions to the utmost they had insisted upon, in their proudest and most insolent conjuncture, but still implied that they would be glad to depart from any thing of it, when they should see any approach made towards peace by any concessions from the king that would make it safe and valid: yet they bound up their commissioners to the strictest letter of their propositions; nor did their instructions at this time (which they presented to the king) admit the least latitude to them, to interpret a word or expression, that admitted a doubtful interpretation. Inasmuch as the king told them, "that he was sorry that they had no more trust reposed in them; and that the parliament might as well have sent their demands to him by the common carrier, as by commissioners so restrained." They had only twenty days allowed them to finish the whole treaty: whereof they might employ six days in adjusting a cessation, if they found it probable to effect it in that time; otherwise they were to decline the cessation, and enter upon the conditions of the peace; which, if not concluded before the end of the twenty days, they were to give it over, and to return to the parliament.

These propositions and restrictions much abated the hopes of a good issue of the treaty. Yet every body believed, and the commissioners themselves did not doubt, that if such a progress should be made in the treaty, that a peace was like to ensue, there would be no difficulty in the enlargement of the time; and therefore the articles for a cessation were the sooner declined, that they might proceed in the main business. For though what was proposed by them in order to it was agreeable enough to the nature of such an affair; yet the time allowed for it was so short, that it was impossible to make it practicable: nor could notice be timely given to all the quarters on either side to observe it.

Besides that, there were many particulars in it, which the officers on the king's side (who had no mind to a cessation) formalized much upon; and (I know not from what unhappy root, but) there was sprung up a wonderful aversion in the town against a cessation. Inasmuch as many persons of quality of several counties, whereof the town was full, applied themselves in a body to the king, not to consent to a cessation till a peace might be concluded; alleging, that they had several agitations in their countries, for his majesty's and their own conveniences, which would be interrupted by the cessation; and if a peace should not afterwards ensue, would be very mischievous. Which suggestion, if it had been well weighed, would not have been found to be of importance. But the truth is, the king himself had no mind to the cessation, for a reason which shall be mentioned anon, though it was never owned: and so they wayed all further mention of the cessation, and betook themselves to the treaty; it being reasonable enough to believe, that if both sides were heartily disposed to it, a peace might as soon have been agreed upon as a cessation could be. All the transactions of that treaty having been long since published, and being fit only to be digested into the history of that time, are to be omitted here. Only what passed in secret, and was never communicated, nor can otherwise be known, since at this time no man else is living who was privy to that negotiation but the chancellor of the exchequer, will have a proper place in this discourse. The commissioners, who had all good fortunes and estates, had all a great desire of peace, but knew well that there must be a receding mutually on both sides from what they demanded; for if the king insisted on justice, and on the satisfaction and reparation the law would give him, the lives and the fortunes of all who had opposed him would be at his mercy; and there were too many concerned to submit to that, and that guilt was in truth the foundation of their union. On the other side, if the parliament insisted on all that they had demanded, all the power of the crown and monarchy itself would be thrown off the hinges, which as they could never imagine the king would ever consent to, so they saw well enough their own concernment in it, and that themselves should be as much involved in the confusion as those they called their enemies.

The propositions brought by the commissioners in the treaty were so unreasonable, that they well knew that the king would never consent to them: but some persons amongst them, who were known to wish well to the king, endeavoured underhand to bring it to pass. And they did therefore, whilst they publicly pursued their instructions, and delivered and received papers upon their propositions, privately use all the means they could, especially in conferences with the lord Falkland and the chancellor of the exchequer, that the king might be prevailed with in some degree to comply with their unreasonable demands.

In all matters which related to the church, they did not only despair of the king's concurrence, but did not in their own judgments wish it; and believed, that the strength of the party which desired the continuance of the war, was made up of those who were very indifferent in that point; and that, if they might return with satisfaction in other particulars, they should have power enough in the two houses, to oblige the more violent people to accept or submit to the conditions. They wished therefore that the king would make some condescensions in the point of the militia; which they looked upon as the only substantial security they could have, not to be called in question for what they had done amiss. And when they saw nothing could be digested of that kind, which would not reflect both upon the king's authority and his honour, they gave over insisting upon the general; and then Mr. Pierrepont (who was of the best parts, and most intimate with the earl of Northumberland) rather desired than proposed, that the king would offer to grant his commission to the earl of Northumberland, to be lord high admiral of England. By which condescension he would be restored to his office, which he had lost for their sakes; and so their honour would be likewise repaired, without any signal prejudice to the king; since he should hold it only by his majesty's commission, and not by any ordinance of parliament: and he said, if the king would be induced to gratify them in this particular, he could not be confident that they should be able to prevail with both houses to be satisfied therewith, so that a peace might suddenly be concluded; but, as he did not despair even of that, he did believe, that so many would be satisfied with it, that they would from thence take the occasion to separate themselves from them, as men who would rather destroy their country than restore it to peace.

And the earl of Northumberland himself took so much notice of this discourse to secretary Nicholas, (with whom he had as much freedom as his reserved nature was capable of, (as to protest to him, that he desired only to receive that honour and trust from the king, that he might be able to do him service; and thereby to recover the credit he had unhappily lost with him. In which he used very decent expressions towards his majesty; not without such reflections upon his own behaviour, as implied that he was not proud of it: and concluded, that if his majesty would do him that honour, as to make that offer to the houses, upon the proposition of the militia, he would do all he could that it might be effectual towards a peace; and if it had not success, he would pass his word and honour to the king, that as soon, or whensoever his majesty would please to require it, he would deliver up his commission again into his hands; he having no other ambition or desire, than by this means to redeliver up the royal navy to his majesty's as absolute disposal, as it was when his majesty first put it into his hands; and which he doubted would hardly be done by any other expedient, at least not so soon.

When this proposition (which, from the interest and persons who proposed it, seemed to carry with it some probability of success, if it should be accepted) was communicated with those who were like with most secrecy to consult it; secretary Nicholas having already made some approach towards the king upon the subject, and found his majesty without inclination to hear more of it; it was agreed and resolved by them, that the chancellor of the exchequer should presume to make the proposition plainly to the king, and to persuade his majesty to hear it debated in his presence; at least, if that might not be, to enlarge upon it himself as much as the argument required: and he was not unwilling to embark himself in the affair.

When he found a fit opportunity for the representation, and his majesty at good leisure, in his morning's walk, when he was always most willing to be entertained; the chancellor related ingenuously to him the whole discourse, which had been made by Mr. Pierrepont, and to whom; and what the earl himself had said to secretary Nicholas; and what conference they, to whom his majesty gave leave to consult together upon his affairs, had between themselves upon the argument, and what occurred to them upon it: in which he mentioned the earl's demerit towards his majesty with severity enough, and what reason he had not to be willing to restore a man to his favour, who had forfeited it so unworthily. Yet he desired him to consider his own ill condition; and how unlike it was that it should be improved by the continuance of the war; and whether he could ever imagine a possibility of getting out of it upon more easy conditions than what was now proposed; the offer of which to the parliament could do him no signal prejudice, and could not but bring him very notable advantages: for if the peace did not ensue upon it, such a rupture infallibly would, as might in a little time facilitate the other. And then he said as much to lessen the malignity of the earl as he could, by remembering, how dutifully he had resigned his commission of admiral upon his majesty's demand, and his refusal to accept the commission the parliament would have given him; and observed some vices in his nature, which would stand in the place of virtues, towards the support of his fidelity to his majesty, and his animosity against the parliament, if he were once reingratiated to his majesty's trust.

The king heard him very quietly without the least interruption, which he used not to do upon subjects which were not grateful to him; for he knew well that he was not swayed by any affection to the man, to whom he was more a stranger than he was to most of that condition; and he, upon occasions, had often made sharp reflections upon his ingratitude to the king. His majesty seemed at the first to insist upon the improbability that any such concession by him would be attended with any success; that not only the earl had not interest in the houses to lead them into a resolution that was only for his particular benefit, but that the parliament itself was not able to make a peace, without such conditions as the army would require; and then he should suffer exceedingly in his honour, for having shewn an inclination to a person who had requited his former graces so unworthily: and this led him into more warmth than he used to be affected with. He said, "indeed he had been very unfortunate in conferring his favours upon many very ungrateful persons; but no man was so inexcusable as the earl of Northumberland." He said, "he knew that the earl of Holland was generally looked upon as the man of the greatest ingratutude; but," he said, "he could better excuse him than the other: that it was true, he owed all he had to his father's and his bounties, and that himself had conferred great favours upon him; but that it was as true, he had frequently given him many mortifications, which, though he had deserved, he knew had troubled him very much; that he had oftener denied him, than any other man of his condition; and that he had but lately refused to gratify him in a suit he had made to him, of which he had been very confident; and so might have some excuse (how ill soever) for being out of humour, which led him from one ill to another: but that he had lived always without intermission with the earl of Northumberland as his friend, and courted him as his mistress; that he had never denied any thing he had ever asked; and therefore his carriage to him was never to be forgotten."

And this discourse he continued with more commotion, and in a more pathetic style than ever he used upon any other argument. And though at that time it was not fit to press the matter further, it was afterwards resumed by the same person more than once; but without any other effect, than that his majesty was contented that the earl should not despair of being restored to that office, when the peace should be made; or upon any eminent service performed by him, when the peace should be despaired of. The king was very willing and desirous that the treaty should be drawn out in length; to which purpose a proposition was made to the commissioners for an addition of ten days, which they sent to the parliament, without the least apprehension that it would be denied. But they were deceived; and for answer, received an order upon the last day but one of the time before limited, by which they were expressly required to leave Oxford the next day. From that time all intercourse and commerce between Oxford and London, which had been permitted before, was absolutely interdicted under the highest penalties by the parliament.

If this secret underhand proposition had succeeded, and received that encouragement from the king that was desired, and more application of the same remedies had been then made to other persons, (for alone it could never have proved effectual,) it is probable, that those violent and abominable counsels, which were but then in projection between very few men of any interest, and which were afterwards miserably put in practice, had been prevented. And it was exceedingly wondered at, by those who were then privy to this overture, and by all who afterwards came to hear of it, that the king should in that conjuncture decline so advantageous a proposition; since he did already discern many ill humours and factions, growing and nourished, both in his court and army, which would every day be uneasy to him; and did with all his soul desire an end of the war. And there was nothing more suitable and agreeable to his magnanimous nature, than to forgive those, who had in the highest degree offended him: which temper was notorious throughout his whole life. It will not be therefore amiss, in this discourse, which is never to see light, and so can reflect upon nobody's character with prejudice, to enlarge upon this fatal rejection, and the true cause and ground thereof.

The king's affection to the queen was of a very extraordinary alloy; a composition of conscience, and love, and generosity, and gratitude, and all those noble affections which raise the passion to the greatest height; insomuch as he saw with her eyes, and determined by her judgment; and did not only pay her this adoration, but desired that all men should know that he was swayed by her: which was not good for either of them. The queen was a lady of great beauty, excellent wit and humour, and made him a just return of noblest affections; so that they were the true idea of conjugal affection, in the age in which they lived. When she was admitted to the knowledge and participation of the most secret affairs, (from which she had been carefully restrained by the duke of Buckingham whilst he lived,) she took delight in the examining and discussing them, and from thence in making judgment of them; in which her passions were always strong.

She had felt so much pain in knowing nothing, and meddling with nothing, during the time of that great favourite, that now she took pleasure in nothing but knowing all things, and disposing all things; and thought it but just, that she should dispose of all favours and preferments, as he had done; at least, that nothing of that kind might be done without her privacy: not considering that the universal prejudice that great man had undergone, was not with reference to his person, but his power; and that the same power would be equally obnoxious to murmur and complaint, if it resided in any other person than the king himself. And she so far concurred with the king's inclination, that she did not more desire to be possessed of this unlimited power, than that all the world should take notice that she was the entire mistress of it: which in truth (what other unhappy circumstances soever concurred in the mischief) was the foundation upon which the first and the utmost prejudices to the king and his government were raised and prosecuted. And it was her majesty's and the kingdom's misfortune, that she had not any person about her, who had either ability or affection, to inform and advise her of the temper of the kingdom, or humour of the people; or who thought either worth the caring for.

When the disturbances grew so rude as to interrupt this harmony, and the queen's fears, and indisposition, which proceeded from those fears, disposed her to leave the kingdom, which the king, to comply with her, consented to; (and if that fear had not been predominant in her, her jealousy and apprehension, that the king would at some time be prevailed with to yield to some unreasonable conditions, would have dissuaded her from that voyage;) to make all things therefore as sure as might be, that her absence should not be attended with any such inconvenience, his majesty made a solemn promise to her at parting, that he would receive no person into any favour or trust, who had disserved him, without her privacy and consent; and that, as she had undergone so many reproaches and calumnies at the entrance into the war, so he would never make any peace, but by her interposition and mediation, that the kingdom might receive that blessing only from her.

This promise (of which his majesty was too religious an observer) was the cause of his majesty's rejection, or not entertaining this last overture; and this was the reason that he had that aversion to the cessation, which he thought would inevitably oblige him to consent to the peace, as it should be proposed; and therefore he had countenanced an address, that had been made to him against it, by the gentlemen of several counties attending the court: and in truth they were put upon that address by the king's own private direction. Upon which the chancellor of the exchequer told him, when the business was over, that he had raised a spirit he would not be able to conjure down; and that those petitioners had now appeared in a business that pleased him, but would be as ready to appear, at another time, to cross what he desired; which proved true. For he was afterwards more troubled with application and importunity of that kind, and the murmurs that arose from that liberty, when all men would be counsellors, and censure all that the council did, than with the power of the enemy.

About the time that the treaty began, the queen landed in the north, having been chased by the parliament ships into Burlington bay, their ships discharging all their cannon upon a small village where she lodged after her landing, that she was glad to resort for shelter to some banks in the field, where she spent most part of the night, and was the next day received by the earl of Newcastle, with some troops of his army, and was by him conveyed to York. Her majesty had brought with her a good supply of arms and ammunition, which was exceedingly wanted in the king's quarters; and she resolved, with a good quantity of ammunition and arms, to make what haste she could to the king; having at her first landing expressed, by a letter to his majesty, her apprehension of an ill peace by that treaty; and declared, that she would never live in England, if she might not have a guard for the security of her person: which letter came accidentally afterwards into the hands of the parliament; of which they made use to the queen's disadvantage. And the expectation of her majesty's arrival at Oxford, was the reason that the king so much desired the prolongation of the treaty. And if it had pleased God that she had come thither time enough, as she did shortly after, she would have probably condescended to many propositions for the gratifying particular persons, as appeared afterwards, if thereby a reasonable peace might have been obtained.

It was some few days before the commissioners from the parliament came to Oxford to treat, that some commissioners from Scotland came likewise to the king; and, having taken London in their way, had concerted with their old friends how to behave themselves, and how they might be able, by being present there, to advance their pretences. They were sent by the council and kingdom of Scotland, and they pretended to desire his majesty to issue out his letters of summons for the convening a parliament in that kingdom, which they said the affairs of that nation required; the rather, because of the present distractions in England. The earl of Loudon, so often mentioned before, who had been so deeply engaged in the beginning, and throughout the rebellion of Scotland, and had been gratified upon the pacification, (in treaty whereof he had been a principal commissioner,) at the king's late being in Edinburgh, with being made an earl and chancellor of Scotland, was the principal commissioner now sent to Oxford, together with Alexander Henderson, their high priest, who had modelled the church government there, after he had inflamed the people against the bishops there. In that parliament, when his majesty had been lately present, and they had obtained all those concessions from his majesty which gave them power to keep all they had got, and left the empty name of king to his majesty, there was an act passed for the dissolving that parliament, with a provision in it, that if the king should not call another parliament within three years after the dissolution of that, that then, upon such day, in such a year, summons should be sent out by the several officers, so that infallibly, on such a Tuesday, in such a year, another parliament should meet at Edinburgh according to such a model as they had carried with them from London. Now when these commissioners came to Oxford to demand a parliament, there were above two years to come to the day upon which that act of parliament would authorize them to meet; but it is true the king might, if he thought fit, convene one sooner. His majesty knew well, that, with reference to Scotland itself, there was no occasion for a parliament to meet, and knew as well, that it was desired only in order the better to support the rebellion in England; and, without a parliament, he did not believe that the disaffected party in that kingdom would have power enough to do him any notable disservice; his majesty always unhappily overvaluing the authority of those there, who he believed true to him; and therefore he gave for answer to those commissioners, that he would send out his summons time enough for a parliament to meet before that time: nor could all the importunity they could use, which was very great, nor the professions and promises which they could make, which were very many, how great benefit and service his majesty should receive by speedily calling a parliament, prevail with him to give them any other answer.

When they despaired of having his majesty's leave to have a parliament, which would have served their turn, and suspended all other propositions, they dealt more ingenuously and openly; and taking notice of the present treaty, and desiring such an end thereof as might establish peace and quiet to the nation, to the glory of God, and settlement of the true religion, they presented a long paper to the king, containing a bitter invective against bishops, and the whole government of the church; as being contrary to the word of God, and to the advancement of true religion: and concluded with a very passionate desire for the alteration of that government, as the only means to settle peace throughout his majesty's dominions. In all their other demands, concerning the kingdom of Scotland, and calling a parliament there, the king had only conferred with two or three of those he most trusted, whereof the chancellor of the exchequer was always one, and drew the answers he gave: but this last paper, which only concerned England, he brought to the council-board, and required their advice, what answer he should give to it. The king himself was very desirous to take this occasion, to shew his affection and zeal for the church; and that other men's mouths might be hereafter stopped in that argument, and that nobody might ever make the same proposition to him again, he had a great mind to have made an answer to every expression in their paper, and to have set out the divine right of episcopacy; and how impossible it was ever for him in conscience to consent to any thing, to the prejudice of that order and function, or to the alienating their lands; enlarging himself more in the debate, than he used to do upon any other argument; mentioning those reasons which the ablest prelate could do upon that occasion; and wished that all those, and such others as might occur, should be contained in his answer.

Many of the lords were of opinion that a short answer would be best, that should contain nothing but a rejection of the proposition, without giving any reason; no man seeming to concur with his majesty; with which he was not satisfied; and replied with some sharpness upon what had been said. Upon which the lord Falkland replied, having been before of that mind, desiring that no reasons might be given; and upon that occasion answered many of those reasons the king had urged, as not valid to support the subject, with a little quickness of wit, (as his notions were always sharp, and expressed with notable vivacity,) which made the king warmer than he used to be; reproaching all who were of that mind with want of affection for the church; and declaring, that he would have the substance of what he had said, or of the like nature, digested into his answer: with which reprehension all sat very silent, having never undergone the like before. Whereupon the king recollecting himself, and observing that the chancellor of the exchequer had not yet spoke, called upon him to deliver his opinion, adding, that he was sure he was of his majesty's mind, with reference to religion and the church.

The chancellor stood up, and said, that he would have been glad to have said nothing that day, having observed more warmth than had ever been at that board, since he had the honour to sit there, (which was not many days before;) that in truth he was not of the opinion of any one who had spoken; he did not think that the answer ought to be very short, or without any reasons; and he did as little think that the reasons mentioned by his majesty ought to be applied to the paper, which the Scots had been so bold as to present to the king. He said, all those reasons were fit to be offered in a synod, or in any other place, where that subject could be lawfully ventilated; and he believed them all to be of that weight, that Mr. Henderson and all his assembly of divines could never answer; but he should be very sorry that his majesty should so far condescend to their presumption, as to give those reasons; as if he admitted the matter to be disputed. He asked his majesty, what answer he would give to the king of France, if he should send to him to alter the government of the city of London, or any other city, and that he would substitute other magistrates in the place of those who are; which, as a king, he might more reasonably demand, than these gentlemen of Scotland could do what they propose; whether his majesty would think it more agreeable to his honour, to make a reasonable discourse of the antiquity of the lord mayor of London, and of the dependence the present magistrates had upon the law, and the frame of the government; or whether he would only send him word, that he should meddle with what he had to do. He did think, that it was very fit that his majesty's answer to this paper should contain a very severe and sharp reprehension for their presumption; and take notice, how solicitous they were for the preservation of what they called the right and privilege of their country, that his majesty might not bring any thing into debate at his council-board here, that concerned the kingdom of Scotland; though it had often too much relation to the affairs and government of England: yet that they would take upon them to demand from his majesty, at least to advise him to make, an alteration in the government of England, which would quite alter the frame of it, and make such a confusion in the laws, which they could no more comprehend than they could any thing of the same kind that related to any other foreign kingdom; and therefore, that for the future they should not practise the like presumption.

The king discovered himself to be very well pleased all the time he was speaking; and when he had done, his majesty said again, he was sure the chancellor was entirely of his mind, with reference to the church; and that he had satisfied him that this was not the season, nor the occasion, in which those arguments which he had used were to be insisted on; and that he was willing to depart from his own sense; and was in truth so well pleased, that he vouchsafed to make some kind of excuse for the passion he had spoken with: and all the lords were very well satisfied with the expedient proposed; and all commended the chancellor: and the answer was given to the Scottish commissioners accordingly; who had too good intelligence not to know all that had passed: and upon their long discourses with the king, (who was always forward to enlarge upon that subject, in which he was so well versed,) expected such an answer as might give them opportunity to bring the whole matter of episcopacy upon the stage, and into public disputation. And so they returned to London, with manifest dissatisfaction, before the commissioners of the parliament; and with avowed detestation of a person, against whom they were known always to have an inveterate and an implacable displeasure. It appeared quickly that the parliament had refused to enlarge the time of the treaty, and so positively commanded the commissioners to return before the last day was expired that was assigned for the treaty. They who intended nothing but the carrying on of the war, and believed there could be no security for them but by an entire victory of the king, and a total subduing his party, had not power enough to hinder and prevent the treaty, and therefore satisfied themselves with limiting the commissioners to such propositions and by such instructions as are mentioned before. But from that time they met with little opposition in the houses; they who desired peace, and had raised their hopes upon the treaty, thinking it reasonable that all preparations should be made for the war, and they who abhorred the thought of peace, and all those who affected it, using all imaginable diligence in advancing those preparations; insomuch as, having by ordinances and seizures drawn in great supplies of money, they had made such wonderful haste in recruiting the army, (to which the earl of Essex had contributed all his endeavours, believing that he had yet performed less than had been expected from him,) that the very day that the commissioners left Oxford, the earl of Essex had a rendezvous of his whole army, and marched towards Reading, which was about the beginning of April.

The king was much troubled [at the disunion between the princes Rupert and Maurice, and the marquis of Hertford,* after the taking of Bristol;] which he knew must exceedingly disorder and divide that army: for composing whereof, his majesty resolved, the next day after the news, to go himself to Bristol; which was very necessary in many respects. The settlement of the port, which was of infinite importance to the king in point of trade, and his customs, and with reference to Ireland, and the applying the army to some new enterprise, without loss of time, could not be done without his majesty's presence. But there was nothing more disposed his majesty to that resolution, than to be absent from his council at Oxford, when he should settle the differences between the prince and the marquis; for as he was always swayed by his affection to his nephew, which he did not think partiality; so the lords, towards whom the prince did not live with any condescension, were very solicitous that the marquis might receive no injustice or disobligation. And the king, to avoid all counsel in this particular, resolved to declare no resolution till he should come himself to Bristol; and so went from Oxford thither: taking with him, of the council, the duke of Richmond, the lord Falkland, the master of the rolls, and the chancellor of the exchequer. The king lodging the first night at Malmesbury; and the lord Falkland, the master of the rolls, and some other gentlemen lodging that night with the chancellor of the exchequer, at his house at Pirton, which lay in the way to Bristol; where they were the next day within an hour after the king.

The disorders at Bristol were greater than could have been imagined; the factions and jealousies ran through all kinds and degrees of men, of the army, of the city, of the country; and the loss of many officers and common men upon the assaults had weakened the army beyond imagination, and the number of the sick and wounded was very great. The natural murmurs of the Cornish were now turned into direct mutiny, and they declared positively that they would not march further southward, but would return to their own country to look to their houses, their wives, and their children, which they said were infested by the garrison at Plymouth. There was no money to give them, nor were there any officers left, who had credit and authority over them; and now all men saw the infinite loss the king had sustained in the death of Greenvil, Slanning, and Trevanion, who governed that people absolutely. It was evident, that if they were compelled to march further, many of them would run away, and the rest be full of discontent; and therefore it was resolved, that they, and all the rest who had been officers or soldiers formerly designed for the western services under the marquis and prince Maurice, should return again to the west, upon a presumption that they would be able, with the reputation they would carry back upon the taking of Bristol, in a short time to subdue those maritime places, which were possessed by small garrisons for the parliament; and being recruited by good winter quarters, an army would be ready by the next spring to attend his majesty; and all the Cornish made solemn promises that, as soon as Plymouth should be reduced, they would with great alacrity return to any service they should be required. The expectation was very reasonable, and the counsel much advanced by prince Rupert, that his brother Maurice might be in the head of an army; for he had prevailed with the king to resolve that the marquis of Hertford should be no more employed as general, though it was not discovered to him, nor his commission taken from him.

* The account of this disunion is to be found in page 413, &c. of the History of the Rebellion.

Besides the king's inclination to his nephew, he found that work not so difficult, nor the marquis so popular, as it appeared in the first consultation at Oxford. The marquis's unactivity in all things relating to the war, and his too much retirement to his ease, had lost all the reverence and devotion of the soldiers; and prince Maurice's living with them sociably and familiarly, and going with them upon all parties and in all actions, in which he had received some hurts, had made both his person and his command very acceptable to them. Then the marquis's leaning too much to the advice of his domestic officers and the stewards of his lands, and people of that condition, (many whereof were thought very disaffected to the king's service, as most of his tenants were,) made the chief persons of the country less solicitous for his command over them than they had been, whereof the lord Paulet was the chief, who was then at Bristol, and spake with great freedom to the king of the marquis's unfitness to exercise that command; which advice, besides that it was very grateful, made the more impression, because he was thought to have good affection for the marquis, and had little knowledge of the prince.

This matter being thus settled in the king's own thoughts and resolutions, he discovered it no further than by appointing those troops to be ready for their march, and prince Maurice to conduct them, whilst the marquis of Hertford attended his majesty till the business of Bristol should be settled, and some other affairs of the country; the marquis intending, when those should be settled, (in doing whereof he was willing to be present,) to make haste to the army, and his majesty, according to his natural custom of discovering any disobliging resolution as late as was possible, did not at all impart his purpose to him, and being first to resolve what obligation to confer upon him at the same time, to make the other the better digested; and to that purpose he was pleased to confer with freedom and without reservation with the chancellor of the exchequer, and bidding him inform himself of the opinion both the army and the country had of the marquis, and asking him, whether the lord Paulet and others had not spoken to him of the laziness of the marquis, and of the credit and power Hirtton had with him; and of some actions done by his secretary, who was a fellow of an ill reputation; and wished him to think of it, and to dispose the marquis to decline that employment, as less agreeable to his nature and constitution, and to remain about the person of the king, in order to which he would think upon some place, for he knew he was weary of being governor to the prince. The chancellor had great reverence for the marquis, and knew the benefit his fidelity had brought to the king, and the insupportable damage that would accrue from his declared discontent, and had no other esteem of the prince's parts and conduct and discretion, than good manners obliged him to; and yet he had with much trouble heard the little credit the marquis had in the army, and more of his unactivity than he believed he could have been guilty of; for though he knew he was naturally lazy, and did so much love his ease, he knew too that he had a clear courage and a very good understanding; and if he had a friend by him to put him in mind of any thing that concerned his honour, he would be very counsellable. Whereupon he told the king, that though he had heard many discourses which he had not expected, and found that some persons had changed their opinions of the marquis, yet he was so apprehensive of the ill consequence that might probably attend his majesty's inclination to remove him from the command, and giving the entire trust to his nephew, that he could not give his counsel for the putting it in execution; but that when his majesty upon full thoughts had fixed himself, he would use the credit he had with the marquis to dispose him to conform himself to his majesty's determination, and that he could with a much better conscience dissuade the marquis from affecting that command, than he could persuade his majesty to take it from him.

The other matter concerning the government of Bristol was of as nice a nature, but not like to give the king so much trouble; for sir Ralph Hopton had neither set his heart upon the command, nor would embrace any title that might give any umbrage to his majesty, but laid all his pretences at the king's feet, and himself to be disposed of by him. By which unconcernedness and ingenuity the marquis was sensibly disobliged, having chosen him as a subject fit to support his authority against the pretences of the prince; and therefore this unwarm condescension was looked upon as a forsaking the marquis, who was never thoroughly reconciled to him afterwards. But that which gave the king trouble was, the clear and unquestionable credit and reputation of sir Ralph Hopton, who was now the only man left, who had out of nothing, and when the marquis had given over all hopes of the west and abandoned it, and fled into Wales, (which was now remembered with many reproaches,) raised that force, and upon the matter reduced that part of the kingdom to his majesty's obedience. He was a person of one of the best families, and one of the fairest fortunes, of all the gentlemen in that large, rich, and populous county of Somerset, and inferior to none in the love and affection of that people. He was of a very generous nature, a pious and devout man, and an exact observer of justice, which made the city infinitely desire that he might be their governor, who would not suffer them to be made a prey to the soldier. On the other side, by being himself ungrievous to them by any exactions, it was very probable he would be able to persuade and induce them cheerfully to submit to such impositions as were necessary for their own defence; and that such a man should be rejected by the king upon the prince's pretence, who could not reside there himself, and must leave it to a deputy who would never be grateful, seemed unreasonable to the king himself in reference to his own service, and to the envy which would be increased by it towards his nephew, prince Rupert, who was already become very unpopular; but on the other side, the granting it to him would be generally looked upon as the triumph of the marquis of Hertford over prince Rupert, which his majesty could not think of with any patience. The easy temper and disposition of sir Ralph Hopton, and prince Rupert's being willing to come off from this matter with his honour, gave the king an expedient to compose this difficult affair to his own satisfaction: prince Rupert should have the name of governor of Bristol, according to his pretence, by a grant from the king, and sir Ralph Hopton should be his lieutenant governor, which he without scruple accepted: but the prince promised to the king that he would never in the least degree meddle in the government, but leave it entirely to sir Ralph Hopton; which being all concluded, two were only satisfied, the king and sir Ralph Hopton; the other two, the prince and the marquis, were both offended, the latter thinking himself injured by sir Ralph's declining his commission to be governor, and submitting to be lieutenant under prince Rupert, though he had it by commission from the king himself; and prince Rupert being as angry that he had only the title, and could not make his own lieutenant; and that the same man's having the place, who was designed to it by the marquis, as was generally known, would be believed to be put in by his authority; and from that time he never favoured sir Ralph Hopton, but always discountenanced him all he could. But the king, to publish to all the world the esteem he had of him, made him at the same time a baron, and created him lord Hopton of Witham, a noble seat of his own in the county of Somerset, of whom there will be more occasion of discourse hereafter upon several occasions.

When the king had settled these particulars, which had very much disquieted him, he considered what he was to do now this success at Bristol gave him great reputation every where; and the possessing the second city of the kingdom for trade and wealth of the inhabitants much enlarged his quarters.

The chancellor of the exchequer had undergone some mortification during the short abode at Bristol, which was the only port of trade within the king's quarters; which was like to yield a considerable benefit to the king, if it were well managed; and the direction thereof belonged entirely to his office: but when he sent to the officers of the customs, to be informed of the present state of trade, he found that some treaty was made, and order given in it by Mr. Ashburnham, a groom of the bedchamber; who, with the assistance and advice of sir John Colepepper, had prevailed with the king to assign that province to him, as a means to raise a present sum of money for the supply of the army: which the chancellor took very heavily; and the lord Falkland, out of his friendship to him, more tenderly; and expostulated it with the king with some warmth; and more passionately with sir John Colepepper and Mr. Ashburnham, as a violation of the friendship they professed to the chancellor, and an invasion of his office; which no man bears easily.

They were both ashamed of it, and made some weak excuses, of incogitance and inadvertence; and the king himself, who discerned the mischief that would ensue, if there should be an apparent schism amongst those he so entirely trusted, was pleased to take notice of it to the chancellor, with many gracious expressions; and said, "that Mr. Ashburnham being treasurer and paymaster of the army, he did believe some money might have been raised for the present occasion; and only intended it for the present, without considering it would be an invasion of his right; and therefore directed, that an account should be given to him of all that had been done, and he should do in it as he thought fit." But when he understood all that had been done, he would make no alteration in it, that his majesty might be convinced that his service was not looked after in the design. And it was discernible enough, that Mr. Ashburnham, who usually looked very far before him, had not so much intended to disoblige the chancellor, as, by introducing himself this way into the customs, to continue one of the farmers of the customs, when the war should be at an end; of which he got a promise from the king at the same time; who had great affection for him, and an extraordinary opinion of his managery. If there remained after this any jealousy or coldness between the chancellor of the exchequer and the other two, as the disparity between their natures and humours made some believe there did, it never brake out or appeared, to the disturbance or prejudice of the king's service; but all possible concurrence in the carrying it on was observed between them.

They who had judged only of the improbability of relieving Gloucester, by the slow progress that seemed to be made in the parliament towards it, and the small increase that was made in the army by new levies, found themselves deceived; and, before it was imagined possible, saw the earl of Essex march out of London with a much better army, and better provided for, than he had yet commanded since the beginning of the troubles. The city had supplied him with five thousand foot of their train-bands, consisting all of citizens of good account, who were commanded by their own officers; and made it appear, that their city order and discipline very well prepared and disposed men for the boldest service and enterprise. The march of the earl of Essex from London to Gloucester, over as large a campaign as any in England, when the king had an army of above eight thousand horse, reputed victorious, without being put to strike one stroke; the circumstances of that siege, and the raising it; the earl's march after he had performed that great work, and when the king's army watched only to engage him in a battle, and passing over a large and open campaign three days before the king had notice that he was come out of Gloucester; the overtaking his army, and the battle by Newbury; and his retreat afterwards to London; contained so many particular actions of courage and conduct, that they all deserve a very punctual and just relation; and are much above the level of this plain and foreign discourse.

In this battle of Newbury, the chancellor of the exchequer lost the joy and comfort of his life; which he lamented so passionately, that he could not in many days compose himself to any thoughts of business. His dear friend the lord Falkland, hurried by his fate, in the morning of the battle, as he was naturally inquisitive after danger, put himself into the head of sir John Byron's regiment, which he believed was like to be in the hottest service, and was then appointed to charge a body of foot; and in that charge was shot with a musket bullet, so that he fell dead from his horse. The same day that the news came to Oxford of his death, which was the next after he was killed, the chancellor received a letter from him, written at the time when the army rose from Gloucester; but the messenger had been employed in other service, so that he came not to Oxford till that day. The letter was an answer to one the chancellor had then sent to him; in which he had told him, how much he suffered in his reputation with all discreet men, by engaging himself unnecessarily in all places of danger; and that it was not the office of a privy counsellor, and a secretary of state, to visit the trenches, as he usually did; and conjured him, out of the conscience of his duty to the king, and to free his friends from those continual uneasy apprehensions, not to engage his person to those dangers which were not incumbent to him. His answer was, that the trenches were now at an end; there would be no more danger there: that his case was different from other men's; that he was so much taken notice of for an impatient desire of peace, that it was necessary that he should likewise make it appear, that it was not out of fear of the utmost hazard of war: he said some melancholic things of the times; and concluded, that in few days they should come to a battle, the issue whereof, he hoped, would put an end to the misery of the kingdom.

Much hath been said of this excellent person before; but not so much, or so well, as his wonderful parts and virtues deserved. He died as much of the time as of the bullet: for, from the very beginning of the war, he contracted so deep a sadness and melancholy, that his life was not pleasant to him; and sure he was too weary of it. Those who did not know him very well imputed, very unjustly, much of it to a violent passion he had for a noble lady; and it was the more spoken of, because she died the same day, and, as some computed it, in the same hour that he was killed: but they who knew either the lord or the lady, knew well that neither of them was capable of an ill imagination. She was of the most unspotted, unblemished virtue; never married; of an extraordinary talent of mind, but of no alluring beauty; nor of a constitution of tolerable health, being in a deep consumption, and not like to have lived so long by many months. It is very true, the lord Falkland had an extraordinary esteem of her, and exceedingly loved her conversation, as most of the persons of eminent parts of that time did; for she was in her understanding, and discretion, and wit, and modesty, above most women; the best of which had always a friendship with her. But he was withal so kind to his wife, whom he knew to be an excellent person, that, though he loved his children with more affection and fondness than most fathers used to do, he left by his will all he had to his wife; and committed his three sons, who were all the children he had, to her sole care and bounty.

He was little more than thirty years of age when he was killed; in which time he was very accomplished in all those parts of learning and knowledge, which most men labour to attain till they are very old; and in wisdom, and the practice of virtue, to a wonderful perfection. From his age of twenty years, he had lived in an entire friendship with the chancellor, who was about six months elder; and who never spake of him afterwards, but with a love, and a grief, which still raised some commotion in him. And he very often used to lament him in the words of Cicero concerning Hortensius, "Quod magna sapientium et civium bonorum penuria, vir egregius, conjunctissimusque mecum consiliorum omnium societate, alienissimo reipublicæ tempore extinctus, et auctoritatis, et prudentiæ suæ, triste nobis desiderium reliquerat." And without doubt, it was in a conjuncture of time, when the death of every honest and discreet person was a very sensible and terrible loss in the judgment of all good men.

After the unhappy death of the lord Falkland, the king much desired that the chancellor of the exchequer should be secretary of state in his place; which the queen did not oppose, though she rather wished that the lord Digby might have it; who had so much kindness and friendship for the chancellor, (which was at that time, and long after, as sincere as could receive harbour in his breast,) that he professed, he would not have it, if the other would receive it: but the chancellor gratified his civility, and refused the office the second time, as he had once before. And he had so much more reason now, by the coming of a very specious embassy from France, in the person of the count of Harcourt, who was already arrived in London; in which the chancellor knew his own want of ability to act that part the office of secretary would have obliged him to; and for which, as far as the perfection of the French tongue could qualify him, the lord Digby was very proper; and so he was made secretary of state; professing to every body, that, as he had the office by the chancellor's refusal of it, so he would wholly advise with him in all things pertaining to it, which he always did; and the confidence and friendship between them was mutual, and very notorious, until that lord changed his religion. And he was no sooner admitted and sworn secretary of state, and privy counsellor, and consequently made of the junto, which the king at that time created, consisting of the duke of Richmond, the lord Cottington, the two secretaries of state, and sir John Colepepper, but the chancellor of the exchequer was likewise added; to the trouble, at least the surprise, of the master of the rolls; who could have been contented that he should have been excluded from that near trust, where all matters were to be consulted before they should be brought to the council-board. And this committee was appointed to treat with the count of Harcourt; whom the king believed to be sent from France, to demand any thing from the parliament in that king's name, as his majesty should direct; and therefore they were appointed to consider well what he should be directed to propose.

But the ambassador no sooner came to the town in great state and lustre, but he quickly saved them any further labour, by declaring, that he would treat with nobody but the king himself; his business being only to serve the king, with reference to the differences between his majesty and the parliament; and pretended, that, in his short stay at London, he had already discovered that his majesty was betrayed; and that his most secret counsels were discovered: and so there was never any communication between him and the king's council; but all matters were transacted with the king himself, and queen, and lord Jermyn, who was not of the council, and the lord Digby; the queen promising herself very much from his negotiation; the ambassador being then of great reputation, having been general of the French army in two or three great actions, in which his success had been very notable; and the queen looked upon him as a person particularly devoted to her service; and being of the house of Lorrain, (the younger son of the duke d'Elbeuf,) he was not without some alliance to the king: and so he returned to London with such instructions and advice as they thought fit to intrust him with, which were too particular; and with the privacy only of the two other persons mentioned before.

But it quickly appeared after, that he was not sent with any purpose to do the king service; but that cardinal Mazarin (who was newly entered upon the ministry, after the death of cardinal Richelieu) might take such a view of the affairs of England, as the better to judge what he was to do; and that an accommodation there might not break his measures, with reference to his other designs; which the ambassador was easily satisfied it was not like to do. And so, after three or four months spent between Oxford and London, he returned to France; leaving the king's affairs so much worse than he found them, by having communicated some instructions which had been given him at Oxford, with overmuch confidence, and which less disposed some persons to peace than they had been at London.

The king called the chancellor one day to him, and told him, "that he thought there was too much honour done to those rebels at Westminster in all his declarations, by his mentioning them as part of the parliament; which as long as they should be thought to be, they would have more authority, by their continuing their sitting in the place whither they were first called, than all the other members, though so much more numerous, would have, when they should be convened any where else; (there being a thought of convening them to Oxford:) therefore he knew no reason why he should not positively declare them to be dissolved; and so forbid them to sit or meet any more there." He said, "that he knew learned men of an opinion, that that act for the continuance of the parliament was void from the beginning; and that it is not in the power of the king to bar himself from the power of dissolving it; which is to be deprived of an essential part of his sovereignty: but if the act were good and valid in law, they had dissolved themselves by their force, in driving so many members, and even his majesty himself, who was their head, from the parliament; and had forfeited their right of sitting there, and all that the act had given them, by their treason and rebellion; which the very being a parliament could not support: and therefore he wished, that a proclamation might be prepared, to declare them actually dissolved; and expressly forbidding them to meet, or any "body to own them, or submit to them as a parliament."

The chancellor told him, that "he perceived by his majesty's discourse, that he had very much considered the argument, and was well prepared in it; which for his part he was not. But he besought him to think it worth a very strict reflection; and to hear the opinion of learned men before he resolved upon it. That it was of a very nice and delicate nature, [at] which not only the people in general, but those of his own party, and even of his council, would take more umbrage, than upon any one particular that had happened since the beginning of the war. That he could not imagine that his forbidding them to meet any more at Westminster would make one man the less to meet there; but he might forbid them upon such grounds and reasons as might bring more to them: and that they who had severed themselves from them, upon the guilt of their actions, might return and be reconciled to them, upon their unity of opinion. That it had been the first powerful reproach they had corrupted the people with towards his majesty, that he intended to dissolve this parliament, notwithstanding the act for continuance thereof; and if he had power to do that, he might likewise, by the same power, repeal all the other acts made this parliament, whereof some were very precious to the people: and as his majesty had always disclaimed any such thought, so such a proclamation, as he now mentioned, would confirm all the fears and jealousies which had been infused into them, and would trouble many of his own true subjects."

"That for the invalidity of the act from the beginning, he was in his own opinion inclined to hope that it might be originally void, for the reasons and grounds his majesty had mentioned; and that the parliament itself, if this rebellion was suppressed, might be of the same judgment, and declare it accordingly; which would enable him quickly to dissolve it. But till then, he thought all the judges together, even those who were in his own quarters, and of unquestionable affection to his majesty, would not declare any such invalidity; and much less, that any private man, how learned soever, would avow that judgment: in which his majesty might easily satisfy himself, having so many of the judges, and many other excellent men of the robe then at Oxford. For their having dissolved themselves, or forfeited their right of sitting there, by their treason and rebellion," he said, "he could less understand it than the other argument of invalidity; for that the treason and rebellion could only concern and be penal to the persons who committed them: it was possible many might sit there, he was sure many had a right to sit there, who had always opposed every illegal, and every rebellious act; and therefore the faults of the others could never forfeit any right of theirs, who had committed no fault: and, upon the whole matter, he concluded as he had begun, that his majesty would very thoroughly consult it, before he did so much as incline in his own wishes."

His majesty said, he had spoken more reason against it, than he had thought could have been alleged: however, he bade him confer with his attorney general, who, he believed, was of another opinion. The chancellor moved his majesty, that since the ground of what should be resolved on in this point must be expressed in the proclamation, the attorney might put his own conceptions in writing, and then his majesty would the better judge of them. The king said, it seemed reasonable to him, and he had proposed it to him, but he had declined it, and commended the pen his majesty had used to employ, as very clear and significant; and said, if he had an hour's conference with that person, the business would be done. Whereupon the chancellor went immediately to his lodging, choosing rather to use that civility towards him, than to send for him; who did not love him so well as he had done before he was his superior officer.

After a long conference together, and many circumlocutions, (which was his natural way of discourse,) and asking questions, Why not this? and, Why not that? without expressing his own opinion; at last he confessed, that there must be no attempt to dissolve them, "though it might be even that might be lawful in many respects," but that it would be sufficient to declare the force which had been, and still was upon them, that rendered them not free; and so they ought not to be looked upon as a parliament; and that they might be required to adjourn from time to time, till all the members might with safety repair to, and sit with them: in all which the other agreed with him, and so they parted; the chancellor promising, that, against the next morning, he would prepare a proclamation agreeable to that, which he thought to be their joint meaning; for he did not observe any difference to be between them. The next morning the attorney came to his lodging, where he found the draught prepared; which, as soon as he had read, he said did in no degree express or comprehend the sense that had been agreed between them: and thereupon he entered again into the same discourse he had made before, and more perplexed than before; being most offended with the preamble, wherein it was declared, that the king neither could or intended to break the parliament: which was so contrary to what he had infused into the king, and which the chancellor thought most necessary, to contradict that reproach which naturally would be cast upon his majesty. In the end, when he had wearied himself with the debate, they came both again to mean the same thing; which was no other than was agreed before, though, as the attorney said, it was not expressed in the draught before them: whereupon it was agreed between them, that, against the next morning, either of them should make a draught apart; and then, when they came together, it would easily be adjusted.

But the next morning they were as far asunder as before, and the attorney had prepared no paper, and said, it needed not, the difference being very small, and would be rectified with changing or leaving out a word or two; which the chancellor desired him to do, and to leave out or put in what he pleased: which when he went about to do, twenty other things occurred to him; and so he entered upon new discourses, without concluding any thing; and every day entertained the king with an account, as if all were agreed; but upon conference with the chancellor, his majesty wondered at the delay, and told him, he wondered at it, for the attorney spake still as clearly to him as it was possible for any man to do, and therefore the putting it in writing could not be hard. The other answered him, that it would never be done any other way, than that which he had first proposed to him; and therefore besought his majesty, that he would oblige the attorney to put his own conceptions, which he made so clear to him, into writing; and then, his majesty having likewise what the chancellor prepared in his hands, he would easily conclude which should stand; and otherwise there would never be any conclusion.

About two days after, the chancellor came into the garden where the king was walking; and calling him shortly to him, in some disorder, his majesty told him, "he was never in that amazement in his life; that he had at last, not without a very positive command, obliged the attorney to bring him such a draught in writing, as was agreeable to his own sense; and that he had now done it; but in such a manner, that he no more understood what the meaning of it was, than if it were in Welch, which was the language of the attorney's country; only," he said, "he was very sure it contained nothing of the sense he had ever expressed to him:" and so bade him follow him into a little room at the end of the garden; where, as soon as he was entered, he shut the door, because there were many people in the garden; and then pulled a paper out of his pocket, and bade him read it; which when he had done, it being all in the attorney's own hand, he said, "it deserved wonder indeed;" and it was so rough, perplexed, and insignificant, that no man could judge by it, or out of it, what the writer proposed to himself. And it made so great an impression upon the king, (who had before thought him a man of a master reason, and that no man had so clear notions,) that he never after had any esteem of him.

The truth is, he was a man very unlike any other man; of a very good natural wit, improved by conversation with learned men, but not at all by study and industry: and then his conversation was most with men, though much superior to him in parts, who rather admired than informed him; of which his nature (being the proudest man living) made him not capable, because not desirous. His greatest faculty was, and in which he was a master, to make difficult matters more intricate and perplexed; and very easy things to seem more hard than they were. The king considered the matter and subject of that proclamation at the council; where that draught the chancellor had provided was agreed to; and the attorney seemed to be satisfied in it, and was content to have it believed that it had been consulted with him; though he never forgave the chancellor for exposing him in that manner; by which he found he had lost much ground.

After the treaty of Uxbridge, most of the commissioners had given so good a testimony of the chancellor's diligence and industry, that the king, shortly after his return, very graciously took notice of it to him; and, above all, of his affection to the church, of which, he said, Dr. Steward had so fully informed him, that he looked upon him as one of the few who was to be relied upon in that particular:

at which, he said, himself was not at all surprised, having long known his affection and judgment in that point; but confessed he was surprised with the carriage of some others, from whom he had expected another kind of behaviour in matters of the church; and named sir Orlando Bridgman, upon whom, he said, he had always looked, being the son of a bishop, as so firm, that he could not be shaken; and therefore he was the more amazed, to hear what condescensions he had been willing to have made, in what concerned religion: and pressed the chancellor to answer some questions he asked him about that transaction: to the particulars whereof he excused himself from answering, by the protestation they had all taken before the treaty, with his majesty's approbation: though indeed himself had been very much surprised with the first discovery of that temper in that gentleman, which he had never before suspected: and ever after said, that "he was a man of excellent parts, and honestly inclined; and would choose much rather to do well than ill; but if it were not safe for him to be steady in those resolutions, he was so much given to find out expedients to satisfy unreasonable men, that he would at last be drawn to yield to any thing he should be powerfully pressed to do."

[The king at that time having resolved to separate the prince his son from himself, by sending him into the west,] the chancellor had a great desire to excuse himself from attending upon the prince in that journey; and represented to his majesty, that his office made it more proper for him to be near his majesty's person; and therefore renewed his suit again to him, that his service might be spared in that employment; which he was the less inclined to, because he had discovered, that neither the duke of Richmond or the earl of Southampton did intend to wait upon his highness in that expedition: but the king told him positively, and with some warmth, that if he would not go, he would not send his son: whereupon he submitted to do any thing which his majesty should judge fit for his service.

The chancellor speaking one day with the duke of Richmond, who was exceedingly kind to him, of the ill state of the king's affairs, and of the prince's journey into the west; the duke asked him, whether he was well resolved to carry the prince into France, when he should be required. He answered, that there had been no such thing mentioned to him, nor could he ever be made instrumental in it, but in one case, which was, to prevent his falling into the hands of the parliament; and in that case, he did believe every honest man would rather advise his going any whither, than to be taken by them: yet even in that case, he should prefer many places before France. The duke wished he might stay till then, implying, that he doubted it was the present design; but there was never any thing discovered to make it believed, that there was a design at that time formed to such a purpose: yet the lord Digby, who had all familiarity and confidence with the chancellor, shortly after gave him occasion to apprehend that there might even then be some such intention.

After a long discourse of the great satisfaction the king had in his (the chancellor's) service, and how much he was pleased with his behaviour in the treaty at Uxbridge, and that he had not a greater confidence in any man's affection and fidelity; he said, his majesty had a great mind to confer with him upon a point of the last importance; but that he was kept from it by an apprehension that he was of a different judgment from his majesty in that particular. The other answered, that he was very sorry that the king was reserved for such a reason; for though he knew the chancellor did never pretend to think one thing when he did think another, and so might take the boldness to differ from his majesty in his judgment; yet the king could not believe that he would discover the secret, or refuse to do any thing that became an honest man, upon his command, though he did not believe it counsellable. Whereupon he entered upon a very reasonable consideration of the low condition of the king; of the discontent and murmur of the court, and of the camp; how very difficult a thing it was like to be, to raise such an army as would be fit to take the field; and how much more unfit it would be for the king to suffer himself to be enclosed in any garrison; which he must be, if there were no army for him to be in. If the first difficulty should be mastered, and an army made ready to march, there could be little doubt, how great soever their distractions were at London, but that the parliament would be able to send another more numerous, and much better supplied than the king's could be; and then, if the king's army was beaten, he could have no hope ever to raise another, his quarters already being very strait; and after a defeat, the victorious army would find no opposition; nor was there any garrison that could oppose them any considerable time; London would pour out more forces; that all the west would be swallowed up in an instant; and in such a case he asked him, whether he would not think it fit, and assist to the carrying the prince out of the kingdom.

The chancellor told him, he would deliver his opinion freely to him, and was willing he should let the king know it. That such a prospect as he had supposed, might and ought to be prudently considered; but that it must be with great secrecy, for that there were already, to his knowledge, some whispers of such a purpose; and that it was the true end of sending the prince into the west; which, if it should be believed, it would never be in their power to execute, though the occasion should be most pressing: therefore desired there might not be the least whisper of any contingency that might make it fit. For the matter itself, it must never be done upon any supposition of a necessity; but when the necessity should be real, and in view, it ought to be resolved and executed at once; and he would make no scruple of carrying him rather into Turkey, than suffering him to be made a prisoner to the parliament.

The lord Digby replied, that though the king would be very well pleased with this opinion of his, yet he would not be surprised with it; since he knew his affection and wisdom to be such, that in such an extremity he could not but have that resolution: therefore that was not the point that the king doubted he would differ with him in. Then he continued the discourse, that he hoped there would not such an occasion fall out, and that the divisions at London would yet open some door for a good peace to enter at; but if they should unite, and should send out a strong army, and likewise appoint the Scots to march towards them; how the king would do between two such armies, was a terrible prospect: and then the least blow would raise so general a consternation, that the king would be more disquieted by his friends and servants, than by the enemy; that his council was so constituted, that they would look upon the prince's leaving the kingdom, as less advisable than giving himself up to the parliament; and that many men were yet so weak as to believe, that the best way the king could take for his security, and preservation of his posterity, was to deliver up both himself and all his children into the hands of the parliament; and that they would then give him better conditions than they had offered in their treaties, having it then in their power to keep all such persons from him as they were dissatisfied with.

If this opinion should once spread itself, as upon any signal defeat it would undoubtedly do, it must be expected, that the council, and most of the lords, who looked upon themselves as ruined for their loyalty, out of their natural apprehension, would imagine, that the prince being then in the west, and at liberty to do what should be thought fit, would be directed by the king to transport himself into parts beyond the sea; and the queen his mother being then in France, most probably thither; which was a circumstance that would likewise make his transportation more universally odious. So that upon this reflection and erroneous animadversion, the king would be, in the first unfortunate conjuncture, importuned by all about him to send for the prince; or at least to send such orders to those to whose care he was intrusted, that they should not presume to transport him beyond the seas, in what exigent soever. Most men would believe, that they should merit of the parliament by this advice, and would prosecute it with the more earnestness and importunity; whilst those few who discerned the mischief and ruin that must flow from it, would not have the courage to deliver their opinions in public, for fear of being accused of the counsel; and by this means the king might be so wearied and tired with importunity, that, against his judgment, he might be prevailed with to sign such a direction and order as is before mentioned; though his majesty was clearly satisfied in his understanding, that if both himself and the prince were in their hands together, the best that could happen would be murdering him and crowning his son; whereas if his son were at liberty, and out of their reach, they would get nothing by his death, and consequently would not attempt it.

This, he said, was the fatal conjuncture the king apprehended; and he then asked the chancellor, what he would do. To which he answered, without pausing, that he hoped the king had made up a firm resolution never to depart from his own virtue, upon which his fate depended; and that if he forsook himself, he had no reason to depend upon the constancy of any other man, who had nothing to support that confidence but the conscience of doing what was just: that no man could doubt the lawfulness of obeying him, in carrying the prince out of the kingdom, to avoid his being taken by the rebels; and he was not only ready to obey in that case, but would confidently advise it, as a thing in policy and prudence necessary to be done. But if the king, being at liberty, and with his own counsellors and servants, should under his hand forbid the prince to transport himself, and forbid all about him to suffer it to be done, he would never be guilty of disobeying that express command; though he should be very sorry to receive it. He wished the king would speak with him of it, that he might take the boldness to conjure him never to put an honest and a faithful servant to that unjust strait, to do any thing expressly contrary to his plain and positive command, upon pretence of knowing his secret pleasure; which is exposing him to public justice and reproach, which can never be wiped out by the conscience of the other; and that the artifice was not worthy the royal breast of a great monarch. This, he said, was still upon the supposition of the king's liberty; but if he were a prisoner in the hands of his enemies, (though that should not shake his resolution, or make him say things he doth not intend, upon imagination that others will know his meaning,) the case would be different; and honest men would pursue former resolutions, though they should be countermanded, according to circumstances.

The conference ended; and was never after resumed: nor did the king ever, in the least degree, enter upon the argument with the chancellor, though he had many private conferences with him upon all that occurred to him, with reference to what the prince should do in the west; and of all the melancholic contingencies which might fall out in his own fortune. And it was generally believed, that his majesty had a much greater confidence in the chancellor than in the other, whose judgment he had no reverence for; and this made the chancellor afterwards believe, that all the other discourse from the lord Digby proceeded rather from some communication of counsels he had with the queen, than any directions from the king. And he did upon concurrent circumstances ever think, that the queen did, from the first minute of the separation of the prince from the king, intend to draw his highness into France, that he might be near her, and under her tuition, before any thing in the declension of the king's fortune required it, or made it counsellable; and therefore had appointed the lord Digby, her creature, who she knew had great friendship with the chancellor, to feel his pulse, and discover, whether he (in whom she had never confidence) might be applicable to her purposes. But he often declared, that the king himself never intimated the least thought of the prince's leaving the kingdom, till after the battle of Naseby; and when Fairfax was marched with his army into the west, and himself was in despair of being able to raise another army; and even then, when he signified his pleasure to that purpose, he left the time, and the manner, and the place to them, who were especially trusted by him about the prince; as will appear by the particular papers which are preserved of that affair; and wherein it will likewise appear, that his majesty received infinite satisfaction and content in the whole management of that affair, and the happy and secure transportation of the prince, in the just and proper season, and when all the kingdom was right glad that it was done.

As his majesty was more particularly gracious to the chancellor from the time of the treaty at Uxbridge; so there was no day passed without his conferring with him in private upon his most secret considerations and apprehensions, before his departure with the prince for the west. One day he told him, he was very glad of what the duke of Richmond had done the day before; and indeed he had done somewhat the day before which very much surprised the chancellor. When his majesty arose from council, the duke of Richmond whispered somewhat privately to him, upon which the king went into his bedchamber; and the duke called the chancellor, and told him, the king would speak with him, and so took him by the hand, and led him into the bedchamber; the privilege and dignity of which room was then so punctually preserved, that the king very rarely called any privy counsellor to confer with him there, who was not of the bedchamber: which maintained a just reverence to the place, and an esteem of those who were admitted to attend there.

As soon as he came into the room, before he said any thing to the king, who was there alone, the duke spake to the chancellor, and told him, that he had been brought up from his childhood by the crown, and had always paid it the obedience of a child; that as he had taken a wife with the approbation and advice of the crown, so he had never made a friendship, which he took to be a kind of marriage, without the king's privy and particular approbation; that he had long had a kindness for him, but had taken time to know him well, which he thought he now did; and therefore had asked his majesty's consent, that he might make a friendship with him: and then said to the king, "Sir, have I not your approbation to this conjunction?" to which his majesty said, "Yes, my lord, I am very glad of it; and I will pass my word to you for the chancellor, that you will not repent it;" with many gracious expressions to them both: and so the duke led him out of the room again, saying, "Now, Mr. Chancellor, it is in your power to deceive me." And to this it was, that his majesty's discourse related the next day, when he told him he was glad of what had passed, &c. and said, he hoped he would give him good counsel; for he had not of late lived towards him in the manner he was used to do; that he knew well the duke was a very honest and worthy man, and had all the kindness, as well as duty for his majesty; but that he was grown sullen, or discontented, and had not the same countenance he used to have; for which he could imagine no other reason, but that his man Webb gave him ill counsel: he said, he was well contented that he should take notice, that his majesty was not well satisfied; and asked him suddenly, when the duke was at Oriel college with them; (Oriel college was the lodging of the lord treasurer, where that committee for secret affairs, of which the duke was one, used to meet.) The chancellor answered, that indeed the duke had not been there lately, which he thought had proceeded from his attendance upon his majesty, or some other necessary divertisement. The king said, it proceeded not from thence; and that he might take occasion from his absence from thence, to let himself into that discourse, and afterwards proceed as he thought fit.

The duke was a person of a very good understanding; and of so great perfection and punctuality in all matters of honesty and honour, that he was infinitely superior to any kind of temptation. He had all the warmth and passions of a subject, and a servant, and a friend for the king, and for his person; but he was then a man of a high spirit, and valued his very fidelity at the rate it was worth; and not the less, for that it had almost stood single for some time. The chancellor was very sorry for this discovery; and chose to wait upon the duke the same day, near the hour when the meeting used to be at Oriel college: and when he had spent a short time with him, he said, he thought it was time to go to Oriel college, and asked his grace, whether he would please to go thither; for which he making some excuse, the other pressed him with some earnestness, and said, it was observed that he had a good time declined that meeting, and if he should not now go thither, he should be doubtful there was some reason for it.

The duke replied, that he had indeed been absent from thence for some time, and that he would deal clearly with him as his friend, but desired it should not be known; that he was resolved to be there no more. Then complained, that the king was not kind to him; at least, had not that confidence in him which he had used to have: and then spake of many particulars loosely; and especially, that before the treaty, he had advised the king to use all the means he could to draw them to a treaty, for many advantages which were like to be gotten by it; and to that purpose produced a letter that he had newly received from the countess of Carlisle, and read it to his majesty, who then seemed not to be moved with the contents; but afterwards, in several discourses, reflected upon it in such a manner, as if he were jealous that the duke held too much correspondence with that people: which he looked upon as such a point of diffidence, that it was no longer fit for him to be present where the secret part of his affairs was transacted; and so he had and would forbear to meet in that place, till his majesty should entertain a better opinion of him: yet he concealed the trouble of mind which he sustained; and wished that no notice might be taken of it.

The chancellor told him, it was too late for that caution; that the lords themselves could not but observe his long absence, who before used to be the most punctual; and confessed to him, that the king himself had spoken to him of it with a sense of wonder and dislike; which, he said, he was to blame himself for; since the honour he had done him to the king, had likewise disposed his majesty to trust him so far, as to express some dissatisfaction he had in his grace's late carriage and behaviour. The duke seemed not displeased with the communication, but thereupon entered into a fuller and warmer discourse than before; how much the king had withdrawn his confidence from him, and trusted others much more than him. In sum, it was easy to discern, that the thing that troubled him was the power and credit that John Ashburnham had with the king; which his vanity made him own to that degree, that he was not content to enjoy the benefit of it, except he made it public, and to be taken notice of by all men; which could not but reflect upon his honour: and when the chancellor seemed to think it impossible, that himself could believe that the king could prefer a man of Mr. Ashburnham's talent before his grace, he proceeded with many instances, and insisted with most indignation upon one.

That about a year before, sir John Lucas, who was well known to his grace, having met him abroad in his travels, and ever after paid a particular respect to him, had applied himself to him, and desired his favour; that when there should be any opportunity offered, he would recommend him to the king, to whom he was not unknown: that his affection to his majesty's service was notorious enough, and that his sufferings were so likewise, his house being the first that was plundered in the beginning of the war; by which, the loss he sustained in furniture, plate, money, and stock, was very considerable; so that he might modestly hope, that when his majesty scattered his favours upon others of his own rank, his poor service might likewise be remembered: but he had seen men raised to dignities, who he was sure had not the advantage over him in their sufferings, whatever they might have in their actings; and he desired no more, but (since it was too evident that his majesty's wants were great, and that money would do him some service) that he might receive that degree of honour which others had, and he would make such a present to him as should manifest his gratitude; and he desired to owe the obligation to his grace, and to receive it only by his mediation.

He said, he had moved this matter, with the relation of all the circumstances, to his majesty, who spake very graciously of the gentleman, as a person of merit, but said, he was resolved to make no more lords; which he received as a very good answer, and looked upon as a good resolution, and commended it; desiring only, that if at any time his majesty found it necessary to vary from that resolution, he would remember his proposition, and gratify that gentleman; which he promised to do; and with all which he acquainted the person concerned; thinking it could not but well satisfy him. But he told him, that he was sorry that he could not receive the honour by his grace's recommendation; but for the thing itself, he could have it when he would; and shortly after it was despatched by Mr. Ashburnham: he asked, whether this was not preferring Mr. Ashburnham very much before him. The chancellor told him, he was preferred as the better market man; and that he ought not to believe that the king's affection swayed him to that preference, but an opinion that the other would make the better bargain. He replied, his majesty was deceived in that, for he had told him what the other meant to give, without the least thought of reserving any thing for himself; whereas his majesty had now received five hundred pounds less, and his market man had gotten so much for his pains.

In conclusion, he prevailed so far with him, that they went that afternoon together to the committee to Oriel college; and the next day the chancellor spake with the king again, and told him, that the duke had been in the afternoon with the committee, where many things had been consulted; and that he found all his trouble proceeded from an apprehension, that his majesty had withdrawn his affection from him; at least, that he, the duke, had not the same credit with his majesty which he had formerly had; and that the sense and fear of that, could not but make an impression upon a good servant, who loved his master as well as he did. His majesty said, they two should not live as well together as they had done, as long as the duke kept his man Webb; who made him believe that the king was wholly governed by Ashburnham, and cared not for anybody else. He said, nobody who knew him could believe he could be governed by Ashburnham; who, though an honest man, and one that he believed loved him well, no man thought was of an understanding superior to his majesty; and enlarged himself upon this argument so much, that he seemed as it were glad of the opportunity to clear himself from that aspersion or imputation.

It is a very great misfortune for any prince to be suspected to be governed by any man; for as the reproach is of all others the most grievous, so they think the trusting weak men, who are much short of their own vigour of wit and understanding, is a sufficient vindication from that calumny; and so, before they are aware of it, they decline wiser men, who are fit to advise them, and give themselves to weaker, upon an imagination, that nobody will ever suspect they can be governed by them. In fine, he found the work too hard for him; the king being so much incensed against Webb, that he expected the duke should turn him away: and the duke himself looked upon the king's prejudice as infused into him by Ashburnham, upon particular malice; having often desired, that some accuser might charge Webb, and he be heard to answer for himself; which the king not being willing to admit, the other was unwilling to dismiss a servant, his secretary, who had served him long, and was very useful to him; and who indeed was never suspected for any infidelity or want of affection to his master: and so the chancellor, to his great trouble, was not able to remove that cloudiness that remained in both their countenances; which never produced the least ill effect in the view or observation of any; the duke's duty being never in any degree diminished; and the king's kindness to him continuing with many gracious evidences to his death.

The last conference his majesty had with the chancellor was the very day the prince began his journey towards the west, and indeed after he had received his blessing; when his majesty sent for him into his bedchamber, and repeated some things he had mentioned before. He told him, "there had been many things which had troubled him, with reference to his son's absence from him; for all which, but one, he had satisfied himself: the one was, the inconvenience which might arise from the weakness and folly of his governor; against which he had provided, as well as he could, by obliging the prince to follow the advice of his council in all things; which he was well assured he would do; and he had given them as much authority as they could wish: another was, that there was one servant about the prince, who he thought had too much credit with him, which was Elliot; who he did not intend should be with him in the journey; and had therefore sent him into France to the queen, with direction to her majesty, to keep him there; and if he should return whilst the prince remained in the west, that he should be sent to his majesty, and not suffered to stay with his highness; and that was all the care he could take in those two particulars: but there was a third, in which he knew not what to do, and that troubled him much more than the other

"two." When the chancellor seemed full of expectation to know what that might be, the king said, "I have observed of late some kind of sharpness, upon many occasions, between Colepepper and you; and though you are joined with other honest men, yet my great confidence is upon you two: I know not that the fault is in you; nay, I must confess, that it is very often in him; but let it be where it will, any difference and unkindness between you two must be at my charge; and I must tell you, the fear I have of it gives me much trouble: I have spoken very plainly to him my apprehension in this point, within this hour; and he hath made as fair promises to me as I can wish; and upon my conscience I think he loves you, though he may sometimes provoke you to be angry."

The king here making a pause, the chancellor, out of countenance, said, "he was very sorry that he had ever given his majesty any occasion for such an apprehension, but very glad that he had vouchsafed to inform him of it; because he believed he should give his majesty such assurance in that particular as would fully satisfy him: he assured his majesty, that he had a great esteem of the lord Colepepper; and though he might have at some times passions which were inconvenient, he was so confident of himself, that they should not provoke or disturb him, that he was well content that his majesty should condemn, and think him in the fault, if any thing should fall out, of prejudice to his service, from a difference between them two." With which his majesty appeared abundantly satisfied and pleased; and embracing him, gave him his hand to kiss; and he immediately went to horse, and followed the prince: and this was the last time the chancellor ever saw that gracious and excellent king.

It was upon the fourth of March, in the year 1644, that the prince parted from the king his father. He lodged that night at Farringdon, having made his journey thither in one continued storm of rain from the minute he left Oxford; and from thence went the next day to the garrison of the Devizes; and the third to the city of Bath; which being a safe place, and within seven or eight miles of Bristol, he stayed there two or three days. And in this journey the chancellor was first assaulted with the gout, having never had the least apprehension of it before; but from his coming to Bath, he was not able to stand, and so went by coach to Bristol; where in few days he recovered that first lameness, which ever after afflicted him too often. And so the year 1644 ended, which shall conclude this part.

Montpelier, November 6, 1669.

PART IV.

A VERY particular memorial of all material affairs in the west, during the subsequent year of 1645, during the prince's residence in the west—The state and temper of that country, after the defeat of his majesty's army at Naseby—The several plots and devices of the lord Goring, to get the prince into his power—The debauchery of that army and amongst the officers of it, and the defeats it suffered from the enemy through that debauchery—Goring's departure out of the kingdom, and the posture he left his army in—The beating up of their quarters afterwards—The entering of Fairfax into the west with his army; and his sudden taking the towns there—The mutinous behaviour of sir Richard Greenvil, and the quarrels and conflicts between the troops under his command with those under the lord Goring—The prince's retreat by degrees backward into Cornwall, as Fairfax advanced—The several messages and orders from the king, for the transporting the prince out of England, and all the directions and resolutions thereupon; and the several messages from the queen and the earl of St. Alban's; with the assurance of a supply of six thousand foot, under the command of Ruvignie, promised confidently to be landed in Cornwall within one month, when there was not any such thing in nature, nor one company raised, or ship in readiness, or in view for such an expedition, &c.—The king's obliging the lord Hopton to take charge of those broken and dissolute troops—The commitment of sir Richard Greenvil, for not submitting to be commanded by him, and for endeavouring to raise a party in the country to treat with the enemy for the security and neutrality of Cornwall, and the routing the lord Hopton's troops at Torrington—The prince's retreat thereupon to Pendennis; and the factions and conspiracies between some of his own servants, and some gentlemen of the country, to hinder the prince from going out of the kingdom; and the departure of his highness from Pendennis, in the end of that year 1645, and his arrival in the island of Scilly, is contained in papers, orderly and methodically set down; which papers and relation are not now at hand, but are safe, and will be easily found; together with his highness's stay in the island of Scilly: from whence, the next day, the lord Colepepper was despatched with letters to the queen to Paris, to give notice of his highness's being in that island; and to desire money, arms, and ammunition for the defence thereof: and at the same time another vessel was sent into Ireland, to give the marquis of Ormond likewise information of it, and to desire that two companies of foot might be sent thither, to increase that garrison, and to defend it, in case the enemy should attack it—His highness's stay in Scilly near six weeks, until the lords Capel and Hopton came thither, after they had made conditions for the disbanding their troops with Fairfax; which Goring's troops made it necessary to do; they not only refusing to obey all orders, but mingling every day with the troops of the enemy, and remaining quietly together in the same quarters, drinking and making merry with each other—The report of a fleet designed from the parliament for Scilly, and those lords viewing the island, and not looking upon it as tenable, caused a new consultation to be held, whether it were fit for his highness to remain there, till the return of the lord Colepepper, or to remove sooner; and whither he should remove; the frigate which brought the prince from Pendennis being still kept in readiness at Scilly, upon the foresight that his remove might come to be necessary—That upon this consultation it was resolved, that it would not be safe for his highness to remain there, but that he should transport himself from thence into the island of Jersey; which was done accordingly—And his highness's arrival there about the beginning of April, 1645—The prince's reception in Jersey, by sir George Carteret; and the universal joy of the island for his arrival; with the situation and strength of the island—The lord Digby's arrival in Jersey, with two frigates from Ireland, and with two hundred soldiers; having been at Scilly, and there heard of his highness's departure for Jersey—His earnest advice for the prince's going for Ireland; and when he could not obtain his highness's consent, till the return of the lord Colepepper, his going to Paris, to persuade the queen, and to protest against the prince's going for France; against which he inveighed with more passion than any man—The arrival of Mr. Thomas Jermyn from Paris, with very positive orders for the prince's repair thither, from the queen—And shortly after, the lord Colepepper's arrival, who had been despatched from her majesty to return to Scilly, before she knew of his highness's remove from thence; which advertisement overtook the lord Colepepper at Havre de Grace, after he was embarked; and so he bent his course thither, and had the same orders for the prince's going to Paris, as Mr. Jermyn had likewise brought.

There was none of the council inclined that his highness, being in a place of unquestionable safety, should suddenly depart from thence, till the state and condition in which his majesty was, and his pleasure might be known: it was then understood that his majesty had left Oxford, and was with the Scottish army before Newark; which he had caused to be rendered, that the army might retire; which it presently did, and the king in it, to Newcastle: the prince was yet in his father's dominions; some places in England still holding out, as Oxford, Worcester, Pendennis, and other places; that it would be easy, in a short time, to understand the king's pleasure, and that there could be no inconvenience in expecting it, the prince's person being in no possible danger; but that the mischief might be very great, if, without the king's direction, it were done, whether his majesty should be well or ill treated by the Scots; and that the parliament might make it a new matter of reproach against the king, that he had sent the heir apparent of the crown out of the kingdom; which could be no otherwise excused, at least by those who attended him, than by evident and apparent necessity: those reasons appeared of so much weight to the prince himself, (who had not a natural inclination to go into France,) and to all the council, that the lord Capel and the lord Colepepper were desired to go to Paris, to satisfy the queen why the prince had deferred yielding a present obedience to her command.

The treatment they received at Paris, and their return again to Jersey, together with the lord Jermyn and lord Digby, and some other persons of quality: the lord Digby being to return to Ireland with eight thousand pistoles, which the cardinal sent towards the supply of the king's service there; and being by it and the cardinal so thoroughly convinced of the necessity of the prince's going for France, that he was more positive for it than any of the rest; and had promised the queen that he would convert the chancellor, and make him consent to it; with whom he had a great friendship—The debate at Jersey upon their coming back—The lord Capel adhering to his former opinion, that we might first know the king's opinion; towards the receiving of which he had offered the queen, and now offered again, to go himself to Newcastle, where the king still was; nobody knowing what would be the issue of the controversy between the Scots and the parliament; and if the king should direct it, every man would willingly attend his highness, and punctually observe whatsoever the king commanded; and because the objection might be removed, of his being taken prisoner by the parliament, or his being not suffered by the Scots to speak with the king, he did offer, and all who were of his opinion consented to it, that if he did not return to Jersey within one month, the prince should pursue the queen's orders, and every man would attend his highness into France; and a month's delay could be of no ill consequence—The prince's resolution to go presently for Paris—and the reasons which moved the lords Capel and Hopton, and the chancellor, to excuse themselves—and his highness's permission to remain in Jersey; from whence they would attend his commands, when he had any service for them—And the sudden reservedness and strangeness that grew between those who advised the going, and those who were for staying—and the prince's embarking himself for France about July, in the year 1646—

All these particulars are so exactly remembered in those papers, remaining in a cabinet easy to be found, that they will quickly be put into a method; and contain enough to be inserted in the fourth part of this relation<sup>a</sup>.

Montpelier, November 9, 1669.

<sup>a</sup> These materials were afterwards made use of by the author, when he completed the History of the Rebellion, where these occurrences are treated of more at large.

PART V.

THE prince having left Jersey about July in the year 1646, the chancellor of the exchequer remained there about two years after; where he presently betook himself to his study; and enjoyed, as he was wont to say, the greatest tranquillity of mind imaginable. Whilst the lords Capel and Hopton stayed there, they lived and kept house together in St. Hilary's; which is the chief town of the island: where, having a chaplain of their own, they had prayers every day in the church, at eleven of the clock in the morning; till which hour they enjoyed themselves in their chambers, according as they thought fit; the chancellor betaking himself to the continuance of the History, which he had begun at Scilly, and spending most of his time at that exercise. The other two walked, or rode abroad, or read, as they were disposed; but at the hour of prayers they always met; and then dined together at the lord Hopton's lodging, which was the best house; they being lodged at several houses, with convenience enough. Their table was maintained at their joint expense only for dinners; they never using to sup; but met always upon the sands in the evening to walk, often going to the castle to sir George Carteret; who treated them with extraordinary kindness and civility, and spent much time with them; and, in truth, the whole island shewed great affection to them, and all the persons of quality invited them to their houses, to very good entertainments; and all other ways expressed great esteem towards them; and appeared very unanimous and resolute to defend the island against any attempt the parliament should make against it.

[And from hence they writ a joint letter to the king, which they sent to him by Mr. Fanshaw; in which they made great profession of their duty to his majesty, and their readiness to proceed in his service, and to wait upon the prince upon the first occasion; with such reasons for their not attending him into France, as they thought could not but be satisfactory to his majesty; declaring, that they had only desired that he would stay so long in a place of his own, of unquestionable security, as that they might receive the signification of his majesty's pleasure for his remove; upon which they were all resolved to have waited upon him: though it was evident enough to them, that their advice would be no longer hearkened unto, after his highness should arrive with the queen.]—(See Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 604.)

In England, men's hopes and fears were raised according to their tempers; for there was argument for both affections in the transactions and occurrences of every day; it being no easy matter to make a judgment which party would prevail, nor what they would do if they did. The lord Capel received advice from his friends in England, to remove from Jersey into some part of the United Provinces; that so, being in a place to which there could be no prejudice, his friends might the more hopefully solicit for liberty for him to return into his own country, and that he might live in his own house; which they had reason to hope would not be denied to a person who had many friends, and could not be conceived to have any enemies, his person being worthily esteemed by all. Whereupon, with the full concurrence and advice of his two friends, from whom he had great tenderness to part, and with whom he renewed his contract of friendship at parting in a particular manner, upon foresight of what might happen; he went from thence, and first waited upon the prince at Paris, that he might have his royal highness's approbation for his return into England, if he might do it upon honourable conditions: and from thence, with all possible demonstration of grace from the prince, he transported himself to Middleburgh in Zealand; where he remained till his friends procured liberty for him to return, and remain at his own house. The worthy and noble things he did after, will be mentioned in order, and deserve to be transmitted to posterity in some more illustrious testimony, that may be worthy to be recorded.

The lord Capel thus leaving Jersey, the lord Hopton and the chancellor remained still there, in the same conjunction, until, some few months after, the lord Hopton received the news of the death of his wife, and of the arrival in France of his uncle, sir Arthur Hopton; who, having been ambassador from the king in Spain, had left that court, and retired to Paris; from whence he shortly after removed to Rouen, with a purpose, as soon as he had at large conferred with his nephew, to go into England, for the good and benefit of both their fortunes: and upon this occasion the lord Hopton likewise left Jersey, with all possible professions of an entire friendship to the chancellor, which was never violated in the least degree to his death. And the chancellor being thus left alone, he was with great civility and friendship invited by sir George Carteret to remove from the town, (where he had lived with his friends till then,) and to live with him in the castle Elizabeth; whither he went the next day after the departure of the lord Hopton, and remained there, to his wonderful contentment, in the very cheerful society of sir George Carteret and his lady; in whose house he received all the liberty and entertainment he could have expected in his own family; of which he always retained so just a memory, that there was never any intermission or decay of that friendship he then made: and he remained there till he was sent for again to attend the prince, which will be mentioned in its time.

He built a lodging in the castle, of two or three convenient rooms, to the wall of the church, which sir George Carteret had repaired and beautified; and over the door of his lodging he set up his arms, with this inscription, Bene vixit, qui bene latuit: and he always took pleasure in relating, with what great tranquillity of spirit (though deprived of the joy he took in his wife and children) he spent his time here, amongst his books (which he got from Paris) and his papers; between which he seldom spent less than ten hours in the day : and it can hardly be believed how much he read and writ there ; insomuch as he did usually compute, that during his whole stay in Jersey, which was some months above two years, he writ [daily] little less than one sheet of large paper with his own hand ; most of which are still to be seen amongst his papers.

From Hampton Court, his majesty writ to the chancellor of the exchequer with his own hand ; in which he took notice, that he was writing the History of the late Troubles ; for which he thanked him, saying, that he knew no man could do it so well ; and that he would not do it the worse, by the helps that he would very speedily send him : (as his majesty shortly after did, in two manuscripts very fairly written, containing all matters of importance that had passed from the time that the prince of Wales went from his majesty into the west, to the very time that his majesty himself went from Oxford to the Scottish army ; which were all the passages in the years 1645 and 1646.) He used many gracious expressions in that letter to him ; and said, he looked upon him as one of those who had served him with most fidelity, and therefore he might be confident of his kindness ; and that he would bring him to him with the first ; though, he said, he did not hold him to be infallible, as he might discern by what he had commanded Dr. Sheldon, who was then clerk of his closet, to write to him ; and at the same time the doctor writ him word, that the king was sorry that he, the chancellor, stayed at Jersey, and did not attend the prince into France ; and that if he had been there, he would have been able to have prevented the vexation his majesty had endured at Newcastle, by messages from Paris.

The doctor likewise sent him word, that great pains had been taken from Paris to incense the king against him ; but that it had so little prevailed, that his majesty had with some sharpness reprehended those who blamed him, and had justified the chancellor. He made haste to answer his majesty's letter, and gave him so much satisfaction, that his majesty said, he was too hard for him. And about the same time the lord Capel came into England ; and though he was under security to the parliament for behaving himself peaceably, he was not restrained from seeing the king ; and so gave him a very particular information of all that had passed at Jersey ; and many other things, of which his majesty had never been informed before ; which put it out of any body's power to make any ill impressions in him towards the chancellor.

[Upon the king's refusing to give his assent to the four acts sent to him from the parliament when he was in the Isle of Wight, they voted, "that no more addresses should be made to the king ;" and published a declaration to that effect, which contained severe charges against his majesty.]—(See p. 630.)

The chancellor of the exchequer no sooner received a copy of it in Jersey, than he prepared a very large and full answer to it ; in which he made the malice and the treason of that libellous declaration to appear ; and his majesty's innocence in all the particulars charged upon him, with such pathetic applications and insinuations, as were most like to work upon the affections of the people : all which was transmitted (by the care of Mr.

Secretary Nicholas, who resided at Caen in Normandy, and held a constant correspondence with the chancellor) to a trusty hand in London ; who caused it to be well printed and divulged, and found means to send it to the king : who, after he had read it, said he durst swear it was writ by the chancellor, if it were not that there was more divinity in it than he expected from him, which made him believe he had conferred with Dr. Steward. But some months after, being informed by secretary Nicholas, he sent the chancellor thanks for it ; and expressed upon all occasions, that he was much pleased with that vindication.

[The lord Capel had written to the chancellor of the exchequer, who remained still in Jersey, signifying the king's commands, that as soon as the chancellor should be required to wait upon the prince, he should without delay obey the summons. The king had writ to the queen, that when it should be necessary for the prince to remove out of France, the chancellor should have notice of it, and be required to attend him. About the beginning of April, in the year 1648, the lord Capel writ again to the chancellor, giving him notice, that he would probably be sent for soon, and desiring him to be ready. About the middle of May, the queen sent to the chancellor of the exchequer to Jersey, commanding, that he would wait upon the prince at Paris, upon a day that was past before the letter came to his hands ; but as soon as he received the summons, he immediately transported himself into Normandy, and went to Caen ; from thence he hastened to Rouen, where he found the lord Cottington, the earl of Bristol, and secretary Nicholas, who had received the same commands. They were informed that the prince was passed by towards Calais ; and direction was sent, that the chancellor and the rest should stay at Rouen till they should receive new orders from Calais. Within few days they received advice, that the prince had put himself on board a ship that he found at Calais bound for Holland, where they were to hear from him ; whereupon they removed from Rouen to Dieppe ; from whence they might embark for Holland when required.]—(See p. 645.)

After the lord Cottington, the earl of Bristol, and the chancellor of the exchequer had stayed at Dieppe some days, and were confirmed by reports every day that the prince was in Holland, and that the fleet wanted some provisions, without which it could not put out to sea ; they resolved to make use of the first vessel, of which there were many then in the harbour, that should be bound for Holland, and to transport themselves thither ; and there was one which within two or three days would set out for Flushing. The earl of Bristol had no mind to venture himself in such a vessel ; and since the fleet that had declared for the king was then in Holland, he apprehended that the parliament might have other vessels abroad, that might easily seize upon that small bark ; and so, after some debate with the lord Cottington, (they two being seldom of one mind,) the earl resolved to return to his old habitation at Caen, and expect another occasion.

The chancellor, who knew nothing of the sea, nor understood the hazards thereof, (being always so afflicted upon that element with sickness, that he considered nothing about it ; and holding himself obliged to make what haste he could to the prince,) committed himself entirely to the lord Cottington: and when they resolved to embark themselves in the vessel bound for Flushing, a French man of war, which was called the king's ship, came into the road of Dieppe, and offered to carry them the next day to Dunkirk; which they took to be the safer passage: and so giving the captain as much money as he demanded, they put themselves upon his miserable frigate, where they had no accommodations but the open deck; and were safely set on shore at Dunkirk, where marshal Ranzaw was then governor. And they no sooner landed in the evening, but Carteret, a servant of the prince's, came to them, and informed them, that the prince was entered the river of Thames with the fleet; and that he was sent by his highness to the marshal for a frigate, which he had offered to lend the prince: and that he had delivered the letter, and the marshal (who had been out all the night before upon a design upon the enemy, and was newly arrived, and gone to bed) had promised him that the frigate should be ready the next day. This seemed an extraordinary good fortune to them, that they might now embark directly for the fleet without going into Holland, which they were willing to avoid; and so resolved to speak with the marshal as soon as they could, that they might be confirmed by him, that his frigate should be ready the next day; and thereupon sent a servant to wait at the marshal's lodging, that they might know when he waked, and was to be spoken with.

The marshal had notice of their arrival before the servant came to him, and of their desire to go to the prince; and sent one of his officers to welcome them to the town, and to see them well accommodated with lodging; and to excuse him, that he did not wait upon them that night, by reason of the fatigue he had undergone the night before, and that day; and to oblige them to dine with him the next day, against which time the vessel would be made ready to receive them, and transport them to the prince's fleet; with which they were abundantly satisfied; and betook themselves to their rest for that night: and were early up the next morning to see the marshal; but it was late before he rose.

He received them with great civility, being a very proper man, of a most extraordinary presence and aspect, and might well be reckoned a very handsome man, though he had but one leg, one hand, one eye, and one ear, the other being cut off with that side of his face; besides many other cuts on the other cheek, and upon his head, with many wounds in the body; notwithstanding all which, he stood very upright, and had a very graceful motion, a clear voice, and a charming delivery; and if he had not, according to the custom of his nation, (for he was a German,) too much indulged to the excess of wine, he had been one of the most excellent captains of that age. He professed great affection to the prince, and much commended the frigate he intended to send to him; which, for the swiftness of it, was called the Hare, and outsailed, as he said, all the vessels of that coast: and after he had treated them with a very excellent and a jovial dinner, about four of the clock in the afternoon he brought them to their boat, that put them on board their frigate; which was but a small vessel of twenty guns, much inferior to what they expected, by the description the marshal had made of it. However, it was very proper for the use they were to make of it, to be delivered at the fleet; and so, the moon shining very fair, they weighed anchor about sunset, with a very small gale of wind.

The prince being master at sea, they had no manner of apprehension of an enemy; not knowing or considering that they were very near Ostend, and so, in respect of the vessel they were in, liable to be made a prize by those men of war; as it fell out: for about break of day, in a dead calm, they found themselves pursued by six or seven ships, which, as they drew nearer, were known by the seamen to be the frigates of Ostend. There was no hope to escape by the swiftness of the vessel, for there was not the least breath of wind; and it was to no purpose to resist; for, besides that the vessel was not half manned, four or five of the pursuers were stronger ships; so that it was thought best to let the sails fall, that they might see there was no purpose of resistance; and to send Carteret in the boat, to inform the ships who the persons were that were on board, and that they had a pass from the archduke: for an authentic copy of a pass the archduke had sent to the prince, had been sent to them. All the ships, though they had the king of Spain's commission, were freebooters, belonging to private owners, who observed no rules or laws of nations; but they boarded the vessel with their swords drawn and pistols cocked, and without any distinction plundered all the passengers with equal rudeness; save that they stripped some of the servants to their very shirts: they used not the rest with that barbarity, being satisfied with taking all they had in their pockets, and carefully examined all their valises and trunks, in which they found good booty.

The lord Cottington lost in money and jewels above one thousand pounds; the chancellor, in money about two hundred pounds, and all his clothes and linen; and sir George Ratcliff and Mr. Wansford, who were in the company, above five hundred pounds in money and jewels. And having pillaged them in this manner, they carried them all, with the frigate they had been in, prisoners to Ostend; where they arrived about two of the clock in the afternoon; all the men and women of the town being gathered together to behold the prize that was brought in within so few hours: for intelligence had been sent from Dunkirk the night before, (according to the custom and good intelligence observed in those places,) of the going out of this vessel, which had such persons on board. When they were on shore, they were carried through all the spectators to a common inn; from whence they sent to the magistrates, to inform them of what condition they were, and of the injuries they had received, by having been treated as enemies; and demanded restitution of ship and goods.

The magistrates, who were called the lords of the admiralty, came presently to them; and when they were fully informed of the whole matter, and had seen the archduke's pass, they seemed very much troubled; and with much civility assured them, that they should not only receive all that had been taken from them, but that the men should be severely punished for their transgression. They immediately discharged those guards that kept them as prisoners, and provided the best lodgings in the town for them : and because it was growing towards the evening, and the frigates were not yet come in, they excused themselves that they could do no more that night, but promised to go themselves on board the ships the next morning early ; and desired that some of the gentlemen of their company might go with them, to the end that they might discover at least some of those who had been most rude towards them ; who should be sure to be imprisoned till full satisfaction were made by the rest.

As soon as the lords of the admiralty were gone, the governor, an old Spaniard, came to visit them, with all professions of civility and service, and seemed to abhor the barbarity with which they had been treated ; asked very particularly of the manner of them, and of every particular that had been taken from them ; and told them, they should be sure to have it all returned ; for that they did not trouble themselves in such cases to find out the seamen who were the plunderers, but resorted always to the owners of the ships, who lived in the town, and were substantial men, and bound to answer and satisfy for all misdemeanours committed by the company ; and said, he would be with them the next day, and take care that all should be done that was just. These professions and assurances made them believe that they should receive full reparation for the damages they had received ; and the lord Cottington began to commend the good order and discipline that was observed under the Spanish government, much different from that in other places ; and in how much better condition they were, after such usage, to be brought into Ostend, than if they had been so used by the French, and carried into any of their ports.

The next morning two of the lords of the admiralty called upon them in their way to the ships, retaining the same professions they had made the night before ; and sir George Ratcliff, Mr. Wansford, and some of their servants accompanied them according to their desire ; and as soon as they were on board the admiral's vessel, that had brought them in, and had taken them out of their own, they knew some of those seamen who had been most busy about them ; which were immediately seized on and searched ; and about some of them some pieces of chains of gold, and other things of value belonging to the lord Cottington were found ; and some mails, in which were linen and clothes ; all which were presently restored and delivered to some of the servants who were present, and brought them to their masters. The chancellor was more solicitous for some papers he had lost, than for his money ; and he was used to say, that he looked upon it as a singular act of Providence, that those officers prevailed with a seaman, who had taken it out of his pocket, to restore a little letter which he had lately received from the king whilst he was in the bands of the army ; which, for the grace and kindness contained in it, he did ever exceedingly value.

Those of the admiralty, though they had not yet found out either any of the jewels or money of which they had been robbed, thought they had done enough for the morning, and so returned to dinner ; declaring that they would return in the afternoon ; and directed the ships to be drawn nearer together, to the end they might visit them together : and they did return in the afternoon, accompanied as before, but their reception by the seamen was not as in the morning. The captains answered those questions which were asked of them negligently and scornfully ; and those seamen who had been searched in the morning, and were appointed to be produced in the afternoon to be further examined, could not be found ; and instead of bringing the ships nearer together, some of them were gone more out to sea ; and the rest declared, that they would go all out to sea that night : and when the magistrates seemed to threaten them, they swore they would throw both them and all who came with them overboard ; and offered to lay hands upon them in order to it ; so that they were all glad to get off ; and returned to the town, talking loud what vengeance they would take upon the captains and seamen when they returned again into port, (for they already stood out to sea in their sight ; and in the mean time they would prosecute the owners of the vessels, who should satisfy for the damage received : but from this time the governor nor the lords of the admiralty cared to come near them ; and they quickly found that the reason of all the governor's civility the first night, and the many questions he had asked concerning all the particulars they had lost of any kind, was only to be the better informed, to demand his share from the seamen ; and that the lords of the admiralty were the owners of the several vessels, or had shares in them, and in the victualling, and so were to divide the spoil, which they pretended should be restored. So that after they had remained there four or five days, they were contented to receive one hundred pistoles for discharging the debts they had contracted in the town, (for there was not any money left amongst them,) and to carry them to the prince ; which those of the admiralty pretended to have received from some of the owners, and to wait for further justice when the ships should return, which they doubted not should be effectually called for by the commands of the archduke, when he should be informed : and so they prosecuted their journey to the prince, making their way by Bruges, and from thence by the way of Sluys to Flushing : and those hundred pistoles were the only recompense that they ever received for that affront and damage they had sustained, which in the whole amounted to two thousand pounds at the least ; though the king's resident, De Vic, at Brussels prosecuted the pretence with the archduke as long as there was any hope.

The chancellor was often used to relate an observation that was generally made and discoursed at Ostend at that time, that never any man who adventured in setting out those frigates of rapine, which are called men of war, or in victualling or bearing any share in them, died rich, or possessed of any valuable estate : and that as he walked one morning about the town and upon the quay with an English officer, who was a lieutenant in that garrison, they saw a poor old man walk by them, whom the lieutenant desired the chancellor to observe ; and when he was passed by, he told him, that he had known that man the richest of any man in the town ; that he had been the owner of above ten ships of war at one time, without any partner or sharer with him ; that he had had in his warehouses in the town as much goods and merchandise together as amounted to the value of one hundred thousand pounds, within seven years before the time he was then speaking; and after the loss of two or three frigates, he insensibly decayed so fast, that having begun to build another frigate, which he shewed him as they walked, and which lay then not half finished, he was not able to go through with it; and that he was at that time so poor, that he had not wherewith to maintain him, but received the charity of those who had known him in a plentiful estate: and this relation he made in confirmation of that discourse and observation; and it made so deep an impression upon the chancellor, that afterwards, when the war was between England, and Holland, and France, and when many gentlemen thought it good husbandry to adventure in the setting out such ships of war, he always dissuaded his friends from that traffic, relating to them this story, of the truth whereof he had such evidence; and did in truth moreover in his own judgment believe, that all engagements of that kind were contrary to the rules of justice and a good conscience.

When they came to Flushing, they thought it best to stay there, as the most likely place to have commerce with the fleet; and they found there colonel William Vavasour, who had, by the prince's commission, drawn some companies of foot together, and expected some vessel to be sent from the fleet for their transportation; and Carteret was already despatched, to inform the prince of what had befallen the treasurer and chancellor, and that they waited his commands at Flushing: and because Middleburgh would be as convenient to receive intelligence, and more convenient for their accommodation, they removed thither, and took a private lodging; where, by having a cook, and other servants, they might make their own provisions. They had been at Middleburgh very few days, before the Hind frigate was sent by the prince to bring them to the fleet, with direction that they should make as much haste as was possible; and they had no occasion to delay, but the wind was so directly against them for two or three days, that they could not put themselves on board. It was now about the middle of July, when the wind appeared fair, and they presently embarked, and weighed anchor, and sailed all the night; but in the morning the wind changed, and blew so hard a gale, that they were compelled to turn about, and came before night again to Flushing; whence they endeavoured three times more to get into the Downs, from whence they might easily have got to the fleet; but as often as they put to sea, so often they were driven back, and once with so violent a storm that their ship was in danger, and was driven in under the Ramekins, a fort near the mouth of the river that goes to Middleburgh; whither they again repaired: and the winds were so long contrary, that they received order from the prince to repair into Holland; for that his highness resolved within very few days, it being now towards the end of August, to carry the fleet thither; as he shortly after did. And by this means the lord Cottington and the chancellor were not able to attend the prince whilst he remained with the fleet within the river of Thames; but were well informed, when they came to him, of all that had passed there.

The lord Cottington and the chancellor of the exchequer, as soon as they received advertisement at Middleburgh that the prince resolved to return with the fleet into Holland, made all the haste they could to the Hague; it being then about the end of August; and came thither within one day after the prince's arrival there.

[The next morning after the lord Cottington and the chancellor of the exchequer came to the Hague, the prince appointed his council to meet together, to receive and deliberate upon a message the lord Lautherdale had brought from the parliament of Scotland, earnestly pressing him to repair forthwith to their army; which was already entered into England, under the command of the duke of Hamilton—the chancellor reproves the lord Lautherdale for his insolent behaviour before the council.]—(See p. 660.)

[The factions in the prince's family, and the great animosity which prince Rupert had against the lord Colepepper, infinitely disturbed the counsels, and perplexed the lord Cottington and the chancellor of the exchequer—Colepepper had passions and infirmities which no friends could restrain; and prince Rupert, though very well inclined to the chancellor, was absolutely governed by Herbert the attorney general, who industriously cultivated his prejudice to Colepepper.]—(See p. 670.)

[Whilst the prince was at the Hague, he received the shocking account of the murder of the king his father; and soon after, the queen wrote to him from Paris, advising him to repair into France as soon as possible, and desiring him not to swear any persons to be of his council, till she could speak with him: but before he received her letter, he had already caused those of his father's council who had attended him to be sworn of his privy council; adding only Mr. Long his secretary. He had no mind to go into France; and it was evident that he could not be long able to reside at the Hague, an agent from the parliament being there at that very time: so that it was time to think of some other retreat. Ireland was then thought most advisable; some favourable accounts having been received from thence of the transactions of the marquis of Ormond and lord Inchiquin, and of the arrival of prince Rupert at Kinsale with the fleet.]—(See p. 706.)

[The chancellor of the exchequer was sent to confer with the marquis of Mountrose in a village near the Hague upon the state of affairs in Scotland. The marquis came now into Holland to offer his service to his majesty; expecting that he would presently send him to Scotland with some forces, to prepare the way for his majesty to follow after.]—(See p. 708.)

[The king declared his resolution of going into Ireland, and preparations were made for that expedition; which however, from accidents that afterwards fell out, did not take effect. The lord Cottington, wishing to avoid the fatigue of such expeditions, took that occasion to confer with the chancellor of the exchequer upon the expediency of the king's sending an embassy into Spain; and proposed, that himself and the chancellor should be appointed ambassadors to that court; to which the chancellor consented: and upon the lord Cottington's representation of the matter to the king, his majesty soon after publicly declared his resolution to send those two, ambassadors extraordinary into Spain.]—(See p. 714.)

This was no sooner known, but all kind of people, who agreed in nothing else, murmured and complained of this counsel; and the more, because it had never been mentioned or debated in council. Only the Scots were very glad of it, (Mountrose excepted,) believing that when the chancellor was gone, their beloved covenant would not be so irreverently mentioned; and that the king would be wrought upon to withdraw all countenance and favour from the marquis of Mountrose; and the marquis himself looked upon it as a deserting him, and complying with the other party: and from that time, though they lived with civility towards each other, he withdrew very much of his confidence, which he had formerly reposed in him. They who loved him were sorry for him and themselves; they thought he deserted a path he had long trod, and was well acquainted with; and was henceforward to move "extra sphaeram activitatis," in an office he had not been acquainted with; and then they should want his credit to support and confirm them in the king's favour and grace: and there were many who were very sorry when they heard it, out of particular duty to the king; who, being young, they thought might be without that counsel and advisement, which they knew well he would still administer to him.

No man was more angry and offended with the counsel than the lord Colepepper, who would have been very glad to have gone himself in the employment, if he could have persuaded the lord Cottington to have accepted his company; which he would by no means do; and though he and the chancellor were not thought to have the greatest kindness for each other, yet he knew he could agree with no other man so well in business; and was very unwilling he should be from the person of the king. But the chancellor himself, from the time that the king had signified his own pleasure to him, was exceedingly pleased with the commission; and did believe that he should in some degree improve his understanding, and very much refresh his spirits, by what he should learn by the one, and by his absence from being continually conversant with those wants which could never be severed from that court, and that company which would be always corrupted by those wants. And so he sent for his wife and children to meet him at Antwerp, where he intended they should reside whilst he continued in Spain, and where they were like to find some civilities in respect of his employment.

[The ambassadors took leave of the king before the middle of May, and went to Antwerp, where the chancellor's wife and family were arrived, who were to remain there during his embassy—After staying two or three days at Antwerp, they went to Brussels, to deliver their credentials to the archduke and to the duke of Lorraine, and to visit the Spanish ministers there, &c.]—(See p. 718.)

[When the ambassadors had despatched all their business at Brussels, they returned to Antwerp, to negotiate the remittance of their money to Madrid.]—(See p. 719.)

[The queen is much displeased that the king had taken any resolutions before she was consulted, and imputed all that had been done principally to the chancellor of the exchequer; suspecting he meant to exclude her from meddling in the affairs.]—(See p. 719.)

[Lord Cottington and the chancellor, hearing that the king was on his way to France, resolve to defer going to St. Germain's till the king's first interview with the queen should be over.]—(See p. 730.)

[About a week after the king left Brussels, the two ambassadors prosecuted their journey to Paris; stayed only one day there, and then went to St. Germain's; where the king, and the queen his mother, with both their families, and the duke of York then were—They found that court full of jealousy and disorder—The queen much troubled at the king's behaviour to her, as if he had no mind that she should interfere in his affairs—She now attributes this reservedness of the king towards her, more to the influence of somebody else than to the chancellor of the exchequer—He had a private audience of the queen—She complained of the king's unkindness to her, and of the great credit Mr. Elliot (one of his majesty's grooms of the bedchamber) had with the king.]—(See p. 725.)

[About the middle of September, the king left St. Germain's, and began his journey towards Jersey, and the queen removed to Paris—The two ambassadors attended her majesty thither, and prepared for their journey into Spain.]—(See p. 725.)

During the time of their short stay at Paris, the queen used the chancellor very graciously; but still expressed trouble that he was sent on that embassy, which, she said, would be fruitless, as to any advantage the king would receive from it; and, she said, she must confess, that though she was not confident of his affection and kindness towards her, yet she believed that he did wish that the king's carriage towards her should be always fair and respectful; and that she did desire that he might be always about his majesty's person; not only because she thought he understood the business of England better than any body else, but because she knew that he loved the king, and would always give him good counsel towards his living virtuously; and that she thought he had more credit with him than any other, who would deal plainly and honestly with him.

There was a passage at that time, of which he used to speak often, and looked upon as a great honour to him. The queen one day, amongst some of her ladies in whom she had most confidence, expressed some sharpness towards a lord of the king's council, whom she named not; who, she said, always gave her the fairest words, and promised her every thing she desired, and had persuaded her to affect somewhat that she had before no mind to; and yet she was well assured, that when the same was proposed to the king on her behalf, he was the only man who dissuaded the king from granting it. Some of the ladies seemed to have the curiosity to know who it was; which the queen would not tell: one of them, who was known to have a friendship for him, said, she hoped it was not the chancellor; to which her majesty replied with some quickness, that she might be sure it was not he, who was so far from making promises, or giving fair words, and flattering her, that she did verily believe, that "if he thought her to be a whore, he would tell her of it;" which when that lady told him, he was not displeased with the testimony.

[The two ambassadors began their journey from Paris on Michaelmas day, and continued it without one day's rest to Bourdeaux.]—(See p. 725.)

[They continued their journey to Bayonne; and from thence to St. Sebastian's; where they were told by the corregidor that he had received directions from the secretary of state, to persuade them to remain there till the king's further pleasure might be known; and they received a packet from sir Benjamin Wright at Madrid, enclosing a pass for them, under the title of ambassadors from the prince of Wales. They immediately sent an express to the court, complaining of their treatment, and desiring to know whether their persons were unacceptable to his catholic majesty; and if otherwise, they desired they might be treated in the manner due to the honour and dignity of the king their master. They received an answer full of civility, imputing the error in the style of their pass to the negligence or ignorance of the secretary; and new passes were sent to them in the proper style; with assurance, that they should find a very good welcome from his majesty.—They left St. Sebastian's about the middle of November.]—(See p. 726.)

When they came to Alcavendas, within three leagues of Madrid, sir Benjamin Wright came to them, and informed them that all things were in the state they were when he writ to them at St. Sebastian's; that no house was yet prepared for their reception; and that there was an evident want of attention for them in the court; the Spanish ambassador in England having done them ill offices, lest their good reception in Spain might incense the parliament.—After a week's stay in that little town, they accepted of sir Benjamin Wright's invitation to his house at Madrid; they went privately thither, to reside incognito—The court knew of their arrival, but took no notice of it—Lord Cottington desired and obtained a private audience of don Lewis de Haro—Don Lewis excused the omissions towards the ambassadors, on pretence that the fiestas for their new queen's arrival had engrossed the whole attention of all the officers about the court; and promised immediate reparation—Lord Cottington returned home well satisfied—The ambassadors are invited to see the exercises of the fiestas; and the chancellor accordingly went to the place assigned.]—(See p. 727.)

The masquerade is an exercise they learned from the Moors, performed by squadrons of horse, seeming to charge each other with great fierceness, with bucklers in their left hands, and a kind of cane in their right; which, when they come within little more than a horse's length, they throw with all the strength they can; and against them they defend themselves with very broad bucklers; and as soon as they have thrown their darts, they wheel about in a full gallop, till they can turn to receive the like assault from those whom they had charged; and so several squadrons of twenty or five and twenty horse run round and charge each other. It hath at first the appearance of a martial exercise; the horses are very beautiful, and well adorned; the men richly clad, and must be good horsemen, otherwise they could not obey the quick motions and turns of their horses; all the rest is too childish, the darts being nothing else but plain bulrushes of the biggest growth. After this, they run the course; which is like our running at the ring; save that two run still together, and the swifter hath the prize; a post dividing them at the end: from the start they run their horses full speed about fifty paces, and the judges are at that post to determine who is first at the end. There the king and don

Lewis ran several courses, in all which don Lewis was too good a courtier to win any prize; though he always lost it by very little. The appearance of the people was very great, and the ladies in all the windows made a very rich show, otherwise the show itself had nothing wonderful. Here there happened to be some sudden sharp words between the admirante of Castile, a haughty young man, and the marquis de Liche, the eldest son of don Lewis de Haro; the which being taken notice of, they were both dismissed the squadrons wherein they were, and committed to their chambers.—(See p. 729.)

The next day, and so for two or three days together, both the ambassadors had a box prepared for them to see the toros; which is a spectacle very wonderful; different from what they had seen at Burgos, where the bulls were much tamer, and where they were not charged by men on horseback, and little harm done. Here the place was very noble, being the market-place, a very large square, built with handsome brick houses, which had all balconies, which were adorned with tapestry and very beautiful ladies. Scaffolds were built round to the first story; the lower rooms being shops, and for ordinary use; and in the division of those scaffolds, all the magistrates and officers of the town knew their places. The pavement of the place was all covered with gravel, which in summer time was upon those occasions watered by carts charged with hogsheads of water. As soon as the king comes, some officers clear the whole ground from the common people; so that there is no man seen upon the plain, but two or three alguazils, magistrates with their small white wands. Then one of the four gates which lead into the streets is opened; at which the torreadors enter, all persons of quality richly clad, and upon the best horses in Spain; every one attended by eight, or ten, or more lackeys, all clinquant with gold and silver lace; who carry the spears which their masters are to use against the bulls; and with this entry many of the common people break in, for which sometimes they pay very dear. The persons on horseback have all cloaks folded up upon their left shoulder; the least disorder of which, much more the letting it fall, is a very great disgrace; and in that grave order they march to the place where the king sits, and after they have made the reverences, they place themselves at a good distance from one another, and expect the bull.

The bulls are brought in the night before from the mountains, by people used to that work; who drive them into the town when nobody is in the streets, into a pen made for them, which hath a door that opens into that large space, the key whereof is sent to the king; which the king, when he sees every thing ready, throws to an alguazil, who carries it to the officer that keeps the door; and he causes it to be opened when a single bull is ready to come out. When the bull enters, the common people who sit over the door, or near it, strike him, or throw short darts with sharp points of steel, to provoke him to rage: he commonly runs with all his fury against the first man he sees on horseback; who watches him so carefully, and avoids him so dexterously, that when the spectators believe him to be even between the horns of the bull, he avoids him by the quick turn of his horse; and with his lance strikes the bull upon a vein that runs through his pole, with which in a moment he falls down dead. But this fatal stroke can never be struck, but when the bull comes so near upon the turn of the horse, that his horn even touches the rider's leg; and so is at such a distance, that he can shorten his lance, and use the full strength of his arm in the blow; and they who are the most skilful in the exercise, do frequently kill the beast with such an exact stroke; insomuch as in a day, two or three fall in that manner: but if they miss the vein, it only gives a wound that the more enrages him.

Sometimes the bull runs with so much fierceness, (for if he escapes the first man, he runs upon the rest as they are in his way,) that he gores the horse with his horns, so that his guts come out, and he falls before the rider can get from his back. Sometimes, by the strength of his neck, he raises horse and man from the ground, and throws both down; and then the greatest danger is another gore upon the ground. In any of these disgraces, or any other by which the rider comes to be dismounted, he is obliged in honour to take his revenge upon the bull by his sword, and upon his head; towards which the standers-by assist him, by running after the bull, and hocking him, by which he falls upon his hinder legs; but before that execution can be done, a good bull hath his revenge upon many poor fellows. Sometimes he is so unruly that nobody dares to attack him; and then the king calls for the mastiffs, whereof two are let out at a time; and if they cannot master him, but are themselves killed, as frequently they are, the king then, as the last refuge, calls for the English mastiffs; of which they seldom turn out above one at a time, and he rarely misses taking the bull, and holding him by the nose till the men run in; and after they have hocked him, they quickly kill him.

In one of those days there were no fewer than sixteen horses, as good as any in Spain, the worst of which would that very morning have yielded three hundred pistoles, killed, and four or five men; besides many more of both hurt, and some men remained perpetually maimed: for after the horsemen have done as much as they can, they withdraw themselves, and then some accustomed nimble fellows, to whom money is thrown, when they perform their feats with skill, stand to receive the bulls, whereof the worst are reserved till the last; and it is a wonderful thing to see with what steadiness those fellows will stand a full career of the bull, and by a little quick motion upon one foot, avoid him, and lay a hand upon his horn, as if they guided him from them; but then the next standers-by, who have not the same activity, commonly pay for it; and there is no day without much mischief. It is a very barbarous exercise and triumph, in which so many men's lives are lost, and always ventured; but so rooted in the affections of that nation, that it is not in the king's power, they say, to suppress it; though if he disliked it enough, he might forbear to be present at it.

There are three festival days in the year, whereof midsummer is one, on which the people hold it to be their right to be treated with these spectacles; not only in great cities, where they are never disappointed, but in very ordinary towns, where there are places provided for it. Besides those ordinary annual days, upon any extraordinary accidents of joy, as at this time for the arrival of the queen, upon the birth of the king's children, or any signal victory, these triumphs are repeated; which no ecclesiastical censures or authority can suppress or discountenance: for pope Pius the Fifth, in the time of Philip the Second, and very probably with his approbation, if not upon his desire, published a bull against the toros in Spain, which is still in force; in which he declared, that nobody should be capable of Christian burial who lost his life at those spectacles; and that every clergyman who should be present at them stood excommunicated ipso facto: and yet there is always one of the largest galleries assigned to the office of the inquisition, and the chief of the clergy, which is always filled; besides that many religious men in their habits get other places; only the Jesuits, out of their submission to the supreme authority of the pope, are never present there; but on those days do always appoint some such solemn exercise to be performed that obliges their whole body to be together.

Though it is not the course for the ambassadors to make their visits to those who come last, before they receive their first audience from the king; yet the very night they came to the town, the Venetian ambassador sent to congratulate their arrival, and to know what hour they would assign of the next day to receive a visit from him: to which they returned their acknowledgments; and that when they had obtained their audience of the king, they would be ready to receive that honour from him. However, the very next day he came to visit them; and he was no sooner gone, but the German ambassador, not sending notice till he was at the bottom of the stairs, likewise came to them; and then the other ambassadors and public ministers took their times to make their visits, without attending the audience.

There was one thing very notable, that all the foreign ministers residing then in Madrid (the English ambassadors and the resident of Denmark only excepted) were Italians; and all, but the Venetian, subjects of the great duke. Julio Rospigliosi, nuncio for the pope, was of Pistoja, and so a subject to the duke of Florence; a grave man, and at that time, save that his health was not good, like to come to be, what he was afterwards, pope, as he was Clement the Ninth. The emperor's ambassador, the marquis of Grana, was likewise an Italian, and a subject of Florence; he had been general of one of the emperor's armies, and was sent afterwards ambassador to Madrid; he was a man of great parts; and the removing the conde-duke Olivarez from court was imputed to his artifice. He made the match between the king and the present queen, for which he expected to have the cap of a cardinal; and had received it, if he had not died before the following creation; the cardinal of Hease being nominated by the emperor upon his death. He was a man of an imperious and insolent nature, and capable of any temptation; and nobody was more glad of his death than his own servants, over whom he was a great tyrant.

The ambassador of Venice, [Pietro Basadonna,] a noble Venetian, was a man, as all that nation is, of great civility, and much profession; he was the first who told the ambassadors that the king their master had a resident at Venice; which was

Mr. Killigrew; which they did not at first believe, having before they left St. Germain's dissuaded the king from that purpose; but afterwards his majesty was prevailed upon, only to gratify him, that in that capacity he might borrow money of English merchants for his own subsistence; which he did, and nothing to the honour of his master; but was at last compelled to leave the republic for his vicious behaviour; of which the Venetian ambassador complained to the king, when he came afterwards to Paris.

The ambassador of the king of Poland was likewise a Florentine, who was much in favour with the king Uladislaws, from whom he was sent; and continued by king Casimir. He had lived in great splendour; but by his vicious course of life, and some miscarriages, he fell very low, and was revoked with some circumstances of dishonour. He was a man of a great wit, if it had not served him to very ill purposes. The ambassador of Florence was a subject of his master, and an abbot, a grave man; and though he was frequently called ambassador, he was in truth but resident; which was discovered by a contest he had with the Denmark resident for place; who alleged, that the other was no more than resident; which was true, and made the discovery that the Florentines send no ambassadors to Madrid, because they are not suffered to cover, which they use to do in many other courts. The archduke of Inspruck's minister was likewise a Florentine, and had been bred in Spain, and was a knight of the order; and supported that character upon a small assignation from his master, for some benefit and advantage it gave him in negotiations and pretences he had in that court.

The resident of Denmark was don Henrique Williamson, (he was afterwards called Rosewell,) who came secretary to Hannibal Zested; who had been the year before ambassador in that court, and lived in extraordinary splendour, as all the northern ministers do; who have not their allowance from the king, but from a revenue that is purposely set aside for that kind of service. When he went away, he left this gentleman to remain there as resident. He was a grave and a sober man, wiser than most of his nation; and lived with much more plenty, and with a better retinue than any other minister of that rank in that court.

They had not been many days in Madrid, when don Lewis sent them the news of the imprisonment of the prince of Condé, prince of Conti, and the duke of Longueville, and that marshal Turenne was fled into Flanders; so much the cardinal had improved his condition from the time that they had left Paris. There was yet no house provided for them, which they took very heavily; and believed that it might advance that business, if they had once a public reception as ambassadors; and therefore they resolved to demand an audience. Don Lewis came to be advertised that the ambassadors had prepared mourning for themselves, and all their train, against their audience; which was true; for they thought it the most proper dress for them to appear in, and to demand assistance to revenge the murder of their master, it being yet within the year: but don Lewis sent to them, that he hoped that when the whole court was in gala, upon the joy of the marriage of the king, and to give the queen a cheerful reception, they would not dishonour the festival by appearing in luto, which the king could not but take unkindly; which, he said, he thought fit to advertise them of, out of friendship, and without any authority. Whereupon, as well to comply in an affair which seemed to have somewhat of reason in it, as out of apprehension, that from hence they might take occasion to defer their audience, they changed their purpose, and caused new clothes to be made; and then sent to demand their audience: upon the subject whereof, and what followed of the negotiation, the relation shall be continued.

Montpelier, March 1, 1670.

PART VI.

[THE ambassadors were conducted in form to their audience of the king of Spain; and afterwards of the queen and infanta; and at last a house was provided for them.]—(See p. 732.)

[They perceived that court was more inclined to cultivate a strict friendship with the new commonwealth of England, than with the king their master, from an opinion of his condition being irrecoverable—After all ceremonies were over, the ambassadors had a private audience of the king, to whom they delivered a memorial containing their propositions and demands—They received shortly after such an answer as was evidence enough to them, how little they were to expect from any avowed friendship of that crown—They rested for some time without giving the court any further trouble,] (see p. 735.) and enjoyed themselves in no unpleasant retreat from business, if they could have put off the thought of the miserable condition of their master, and their own particular concerns in their own country. The chancellor betook himself to the learning their language, by reading their books; of which he made a good collection; and informing himself the best he could of their government, and the administration of their justice: and there began his Devotions upon the Psalms, which he finished in another banishment.

[Prince Rupert came upon the coast of Spain with the fleet under his command; and wrote to the chancellor, acquainting him, that he had brought away all the fleet from Ireland; and desiring him to procure orders from the court, that he might find a good reception in all the Spanish ports, if his occasions brought him thither—The news of a fleet of the king of England being on their coast at a time when their galeons were expected home, occasioned great alteration in the behaviour of that court; and all that the ambassadors asked was easily granted: but that seeming favourable disposition was of short duration; for on the arrival afterwards of a strong fleet sent out by the parliament, and the commander thereof writing an insolent letter to the king of Spain, the ambassadors found themselves less regarded.] (See p. 735.)

[The king had now determined to go into Scotland, upon the invitation of the council and parliament of that kingdom; and the ambassadors, who in reality disapproved of that measure, notified it to the court of Spain as a happy turn in the king's affairs; setting forth, that his majesty was now master of that kingdom, and therefore might reasonably hope to be restored to the possession of the rest of his dominions—The court of Spain then began again to treat the ambassadors with more regard.] (See p. 753.)

[Upon the news of Cromwell's victory over the marquis of Argyll's army in Scotland, the ambassadors received a message from the king of Spain, desiring them to depart, since their presence in the court would be prejudicial to his affairs—They imagined this proceeded from the expectation of the arrival of an ambassador from the commonwealth of England, which was then reported; but they knew afterwards that the true cause of this impatience to get rid of them was, that their minister in England having purchased many of the king's pictures, and rich furniture, had sent them to the Groyne; from whence they were expected to arrive about that time at Madrid: which they thought could not decently be brought to the palace while the ambassadors remained at the court.] (See p. 752.)

[Lord Cottington resolves, and obtains leave to stay as a private man in Spain; but is not permitted to reside at Madrid.]—(See p. 753.)

The other ambassador made his journey by Alcalá; and stayed a day there to see that university; where the college and other buildings made by the cardinal Ximenes are well worth the seeing; and went through the kingdom of Navarre to Pampeluna, where the vice-king, the duke of Escalona, received him; and lodged him two days in the palace, and treated him with great civility. There he was seized upon with the gout; yet he continued his journey by mules, there being no passage by coach or litter, over the Pyrenees to Bayonne; where he was forced to keep his bed, and to bleed, for many days: but was so impatient of delay, that after a week's rest, and before he was fit for the journey, he put himself into a litter, and reached Bourdeaux; where he was forced to follow the prescription of Dr. Lopez, a very learned Jew and physician; and yet went too soon from thence too; so that when he came to Paris, he was cast into his bed by a new defluxion of the gout, more violent than ever.

As soon as he had recovered any strength, he waited upon the queen mother, who received him very graciously; complained very much to him of the duke of York; who having been left with her by the king when he parted with her majesty at Beauvais, had, expressly against her consent and command, transported himself to Brussels, upon imaginations which had no foundation, and upon some treaty with the duke of Lorraine, which she was sure could produce no good effect. Her majesty seemed most offended with sir Edward Herbert, the attorney general, and sir George Ratcliff, as the two persons who prevailed with the duke, and had engaged him in that journey, and governed him in it, against the advice of the lord Byron, who was his governor; and that being disappointed of what they had unreasonably looked for at Brussels, they had carried his royal highness into Holland, to his sister; who suffered much by his presence, the States of Holland being resolved not to suffer him to reside within their province; the prince of Orange being lately dead of the smallpox, and his son, who was born after his death, being an infant, and depending so entirely upon the good-will of the States: and therefore the princess royal was much troubled that the coming of the duke her brother into those parts gave the States any occasion of offence. The queen said, that she had writ to the duke to return into France, but had received no answer; and therefore she desired the ambassador, as soon as he should come into those parts, (for he meant to go to Antwerp, where his wife and children then were,) that he would make a journey to the Hague, to reduce the duke, and to prevail with him to return into France; which the ambassador could not refuse to promise.

He found there the queen's own family in some disorder, upon some declaration she had made, that the protestant chaplain should be no more permitted to perform his function in the Louvre; where the queen's court resided, and where there was a lower room, which had been always used as a chapel, from the time of the princes first coming thither to that time; and where twice a day the common prayer was read to those who were protestants, in both families; and now the queen had signified to Dr. Cosins (who was the chaplain assigned by the late king to attend in her majesty's family, for the protestant part of it) that he should be no more permitted to have the use of that room.

The chancellor of the exchequer took this occasion to speak with the queen; and put her in mind of some promise she had made him, when he took his leave of her to go for Spain, that she would not withdraw her stipend which she allowed to Dr. Cosins; whereby he must be compelled to withdraw; and so the protestant part of her family would be deprived of their public devotions; which promise she had observed to that time: but if now the room should be taken from that use, it would be the same thing as if the chaplain was turned away. He put her majesty in mind of the ill impression it might make in the hearts of the protestants in England, who retained their respects and duty for her majesty; and of what pernicious consequence it might prove to the king, who was still in Scotland, in a hopeful condition, and depended most upon the affections of his protestant subjects of England; and in the last place, whether it might not prove a better argument to those who were suspected by her to mislead the duke of York, to dissuade him from returning to her, since she would not permit him to have the exercise of his religion. The queen seemed to think that what he said was not without reason, and confessed that she was not the author of this new resolution, which she did not believe to be seasonable.

Mr. Walter Mountague, who had some years ago changed his religion, and was become catholic, after he had sustained a long imprisonment in the Tower of London, procured his release from thence, upon assurance that he would no more return into England; and so came into France; where he was very well known in the French, as well as the English court, and in great reputation and esteem with both queens. He appeared a man wholly restrained from all the vanity and levity of his former life; and perfectly mortified to the pleasures of the world, which he had enjoyed in a very great measure and excess.

He dedicated himself to his studies with great austerity, and seemed to have no affection or ambition for preferment, but to live within himself upon the very moderate exhibition he had left to him by his father; and in this melancholic retreat he had newly taken the order of priesthood; which was, in truth, the most reasonable way to satisfy his ambition, if he had any left; for both the queen regent and the cardinal could not but liberally provide for his support in that profession; which they did very shortly after: and this devout profession and new function much improved the interest and credit he always had in his old mistress; who very much hearkened to him in cases of conscience: and she confessed to the chancellor, that he was a little too bigotted in this affair; and had not only pressed her very passionately to remove the scandal of having a protestant chapel in her house, as inconsistent with a good conscience, but had likewise inflamed the queen regent with the same zeal; who had very earnestly pressed and importuned her majesty no longer to permit that offence to be given to the catholic religion. And upon this occasion she lamented the death of her late confessor, father Phillips, who, she said, was a very discreet man, and would never suffer her to be troubled with such infusions and scruples. In conclusion, she wished him to confer with Mr. Mountague, and to try if he could withdraw him from that asperity in that particular; to which purpose the chancellor conferred with him, but without any effect.

He said, the house was the king of France's, who only permitted the queen to live there; and that the queen regent thought herself bound in conscience no longer to suffer that reproach, of which she had never had information till very lately: that if the duke of York came thither, there was no thought or purpose to deny him the exercise of his religion; he might have his chaplain say prayers to him in his own chamber, or in some room adjacent, which served likewise to all other purposes; but that the setting a room apart, as this was, for that service, was upon the matter dedicating it as a chapel for the exercise of a religion contrary to what was established in that kingdom; which the king of France would not suffer to be done in a house of his, though the king should return thither again. He undervalued all the considerations which were offered of England, or of a protestant interest, as if he thought them all, as no doubt he did, of no importance to the king's restoration, which could never be effected but by that interest which was quite opposite to it. When he gave the queen an account of this discourse, he prevailed so far with her, that she promised, in case she should be compelled to take away that room, as she foresaw she should be, the family should be permitted to meet in some other room; and if the duke of York came, the place that should be appointed for his devotions, should serve for all the rest to resort to.

As soon as the chancellor had recovered his strength, he took leave of the queen, and pursued his journey for Flanders. At Brussels he stayed till he had an audience of the archduke, to whom he had letters from the king of Spain and don Lewis; by which the king signified his pleasure that he should reside any where in those provinces he best liked, until he could conveniently repair to the king his master; and that in the mean time he should enjoy all the privileges due to an ambassador: and so he had his audience in that quality. He spake in Latin; and the archduke, answering in the same, assured him of all the respects he could pay him whilst he stayed in those parts: and thereupon he went to his family at Antwerp, and kept that character till the king's coming into France, and his return to him; by means whereof he enjoyed many privileges and exemptions in the town; and had the freedom of his chapel, not only for his own devotions, but for the resort of all the protestants who were then in the town; whereof the marquis of Newcastle, the earl of Norwich, and sir Charles Cavendish were the principal; who came always on the Sundays, and frequently on the week days, to the common prayer, to the grief of many English and Irish Roman catholics; who used all the malicious artifices they could to procure that liberty to be restrained; and which could not have been enjoyed under any other concession than by the privilege of an ambassador.

Whilst he was preparing to make a journey to the Hague, to wait upon the duke of York, according to the promise he had made to the queen, he received information from the Hague, that his royal highness would be at Breda such a day; whereupon he was glad to shorten his journey, and at the day to kiss his hands there; where he found his highness newly arrived, and in an inclination enough to return to the queen; so that the chancellor had no great task to confirm him in that resolution; nor in truth did he know what else to do: however, all about him were very glad of the chancellor's presence, every body hoping to get him to their party, that he might be ready to make a fair report of their behaviour to the king; whom they knew the queen would endeavour to incense against them.

Never little family was torn into so many pieces and factions. The duke was very young, yet loved intrigues so well, that he was too much inclined to hearken to any men who had the confidence to make bold propositions to him. The king had appointed him to remain with the queen, and to obey her in all things, religion only excepted. The lord Byron was his governor, ordained to be so by his father, and very fit for that province; being a very fine gentleman; well bred both in France and Italy, and perfectly versed in both languages; of great courage and fidelity; and in all respects qualified for the trust; but his being absent in the king's service when the duke made his escape out of England, and sir John Berkley being then put about him, all pains had been taken to lessen his esteem of the lord Byron: and sir John Berkley, knowing that he could no longer remain governor when the lord Byron came thither, and hearing that he was in his journey, infused into the duke's mind, that it was a great lessening of his dignity at that age (when he was not above fourteen years of age, and backward enough for that age) to be under a governor; and so, partly by disesteeming the person, and partly by reproaching the office, he grew less inclined to the person of that good lord than he should have been.

But what title soever any body had, the whole authority was in the queen, not only by the direction of the king, but by inevitable necessity; for there was no kind of fund assigned for the support of the duke; but he depended entirely upon the queen his mother's bounty, who had no more assigned for herself than they, to whom the management thereof was committed, knew well how to dispose of, nor was it enough to serve their occasions; so that her majesty herself certainly spent less upon her own person, or in any thing relating to herself, than ever any queen or lady of a very eminent degree did. This visible and total dependence of the duke upon his mother made her majesty the less apprehensive of his doing any thing contrary to her liking; and there was not that care for the general part of his education, nor that indulgence to his person, as ought to have been; and the queen's own carriage and behaviour towards him was at least severe enough, as it had been before to the king, in the time that he was prince; which then and now gave opportunity to those who were not themselves at ease, to make many infusions; which, how contrary soever to their duties, were not so unreasonable as to be easily rejected, or to make no impression.

The king, at his going from Beauvais in his voyage for Scotland, had given some recommendation to the duke his brother of sir George Ratcliff; to whose care his father had once designed to commit him, when he meant to have sent him into Ireland; and his majesty had likewise, at the same time at Beauvais, made some promise to sir George Ratcliff of some place about his brother, when his family should be settled, of which there was then little appearance: however, it was enough to entitle him to give his frequent attendance upon the duke; and the general reputation he had of having been the person of the nearest trust with the earl of Strafford, might well dispose the duke to think him a wise man, and the better to esteem any thing he said to him.

Sir Edward Herbert thought himself the wisest man that followed the king's fortune, and was always angry that he had no more to do; and now prince Rupert was absent, endeavoured all he could to get credit with the duke of York; and came very frequently to him, and held him in long whispers, which the duke easily indulged to him, out of a real belief that he was a man of great wisdom and experience. The queen liked neither of these two; which they well enough discerning, grew into a friendship, or rather a familiarity together, though they were of the most different natures and humours imaginable: Ratcliff being a man very capable of business; and if the prosperity of his former fortune had not raised in him some fumes of vanity and self-conceitdness, was very fit to be advised with, being of a nature constant and sincere; which the other was not: yet they agreed well in the design of making the duke of York discontented and weary of his condition; which was not pleasant enough to be much delighted in.

The news from England, of the state of the king's affairs in Scotland, made most men believe that his majesty was irrecoverably lost; and there was for some time a rumour scattered abroad, and by many believed, that the king was dead. These two gentlemen, upon the fame of this, consulted together, whether, if the news were or should be true, the duke of York, who must succeed, were in a good place; and both concluded, that in that case it would not be fit that he should be with his mother. Hereupon they persuaded the duke, that it was not fit for him to remain idle in France, but to employ himself abroad; whereby his experience might be improved, and he might put himself into a posture to be able to assist the king his brother; or if any misfortune should befall him, in some degree to provide for himself; and proposed to him, that he would resolve to make a journey to Brussels, to advise and consult with the duke of Lorraine, who was a prince of great wisdom, wealth, and courage; and being driven out of his own country by too powerful and potent a neighbour, had yet, by his own activity and virtue, made himself so considerable, that Spain depended upon his army, and France itself would be glad of his friendship; that he was very rich, and would not be only able to give the duke good counsel, but assistance to make it effectual.

The duke, without further examining the probability of the design, which he concluded had been thought upon enough by two such wise men, gave his full consent to it; and they having likewise found credit for so much money as would defray the charges of the journey, and really believing that the king was dead, the duke one day told the queen, that he was resolved to make a journey to Brussels to see the duke of Lorraine; with which the queen being surprised, used both her reason and her authority to dissuade him from it, but could not prevail by either; his highness telling her very obstinately, that he would begin his journey within two days. She found that none of his servants were privy to the design, or were at all acquainted with the purpose; and quickly discovered the two counsellors; who, having no relation to his service that she knew, were prepared to wait on him, and had drawn Dr. Steward (who was dean of the chapel to the king, and left behind when his majesty went for Scotland, with direction to be with the duke of York) to be of their party.

The doctor was a very honest and learned gentleman, and most conversant in that learning which vindicated the dignity and authority of the church; upon which his heart was most entirely set; not without some prejudice to those who thought there was any other object to be more carefully pursued. Sir George Ratcliff seemed to be of his mind, and so was looked upon by him as one of the best friends of the church; which was virtue enough to cover many defects. He told him of the rumour of the death of the king, and what conference had been between him and the attorney general upon it, which they both believed; and how necessary they thought it was for the duke to be out of France when the certainty of that news should arrive: that they had spoken with the duke of it, who seemed very well disposed; yet they knew not how his mother's authority might prevail over his obedience; and therefore wished that he would speak with the duke, who had great reverence for him in all matters of conscience, and remove any scruples which might arise. The doctor did not think himself so much regarded by the queen as he expected to be, and did really believe the case to be such as the other had informed him; and confirmed the duke in his resolution, notwithstanding any thing his mother should say to the contrary; and the queen could neither say or do any thing to dissuade him from the journey.

The lord Byron his governor, and Mr. Bennet his secretary, both well liked by the queen, and of great confidence in each other, thought it their duty to attend upon him. Sir John Berkley stayed behind, as well to avoid the being inferior to another, which he always abhorred, as to prosecute an amour which he was newly embarked in; and sir George Ratcliff, and sir Edward Herbert, and the good doctor, were so to improve their interest, that neither the queen or any who depended on her might have any credit with the duke. Most of the inferior servants depended upon them, because they saw they had most interest with their master; and with these thoughts and resolutions they all set out for Brussels: and these wild notions were the true reasons and foundation of that journey, which many sober men so much wondered at then, and so much censured afterwards.

When his highness came to Brussels, he was accommodated in the house of sir Henry de Vic, the king's resident there: and he was no sooner there, but they began to model his house and regulate his family; towards which sir George Ratcliff was designed to manage all the affairs of money; the attorney contenting himself with having the greatest power in governing the councils; and all looking for other stations upon the arrival of the news from Scotland. But in a short time the intelligence from thence was quite contrary to what they expected; the king was not only in good health, but his affairs in no desperate condition; all factions seemed reconciled, and he was at the head of an army that looked Cromwell in the face.

Hereupon they were at a great stand in their councils. The duke of Lorrain had been civil to the duke, and had at his first coming lent him some money; but when he found he was without any design, and by what persons his counsels were directed, he grew colder in his respects; and they who had gone thus far, took upon them the presumption to propose a marriage between the duke of York and a natural daughter of the duke of Lorrain; his marriage with madame de Cantecroy, the mother of the said lady, being declared void in the court of Rome: but the duke of Lorrain was so wise as not to entertain the motion, except it should be made with the king's privacy. So apt are unexperienced men, when they are once out of the way, to wander into bogs and precipices, before they will be sensible of their false conduct. When they found there was nothing to be done at Brussels, they persuaded the duke to go to the Hague, with as little design; and when they had wearied all people there, they came to Breda, where the chancellor had met them.

The duke himself was so young, that he was rather delighted with the journeys he had made, than sensible that he had not entered upon them with reason enough; and they had fortified him with a firm resolution, never to acknowledge that he had committed any error. But his counsellors had lost all the pleasure of their combination, and reproached each other of their follies and presumptions with all the animosity imaginable. The lord Byron and Mr. Bennet, who had comforted each other in their sufferings, were glad enough to see that there was some end put to their peregrinations, and that by returning to the queen they were like to find some rest again; and they entertained the chancellor with many ridiculous relations of the politics of the attorney and sir George Ratcliff, and of the pleasant discourses the duke of Lorrain made of the Latin orations sir George Ratcliff had entertained him with.

On the other hand, sir George was well pleased with the grace he had received from the duke of Lorrain, and with the testimony he had given of him to some men who had told him of it again, that he was a very grave and a wise man, and that he wished he had such another to look after his affairs. He and Dr. Steward continued their affections towards each other, and concurred in most bitter invectives against sir Edward Herbert, as a madman, and of that intolerable pride, that it was not possible for any man to converse with him; and the attorney as frankly reproached them all with being men of no parts, of no understanding, no learning, no principles, and no resolution; and was so just to them all, as to condemn every man alike; and in truth had rendered himself so grievous to them all, and behaved himself so insolently towards all, that there was not a man who desired to be in his company: yet by the knack of his talk, which was the most like reason, and not it, he retained still great credit with the duke; who being still confounded with his positive discourse, thought him to be wiser than those who were more easy to be understood.

The duke upon the receipt of the queen's letters, which the chancellor delivered to him, resolved upon his journey to Paris without further delay; and the chancellor waiting upon his highness as far as Antwerp, he prosecuted his journey with the same retinue he had carried with him; and was received by his mother without those expostulations and reprehensions which he might have expected; though her severity was the same towards all those who she thought had the credit and power to seduce him.

The chancellor was now at a little rest again with his own family in Antwerp; and had time to be vacant to his own thoughts and books; and in the interval to enjoy the conversation of many worthy persons of his own nation, who had chosen that place to spend the time of their banishment in. There was the marquis of Newcastle, who having married a young lady, confined himself most to her company; and lived as retired as his ruined condition in England obliged him to; yet with honour, and decency, and with much respect paid him by all men, as well foreigners as those of his own country. The conversation the chancellor took most delight in was that of sir Charles Cavendish, brother to the marquis; who was one of the most extraordinary persons of that age, in all the noble endowments of the mind. He had all the disadvantages imaginable in his person; which was not only of so small a size that it drew the eyes of men upon him, but with such deformity in his little person, and an aspect in his countenance, that was apter to raise contempt than application: but in this unhandsome or homely habitation, there was a mind and a soul lodged that was very lovely and beautiful; cultivated and polished by all the knowledge and wisdom that arts and sciences could supply it with. He was a great philosopher, in the extent of it; and an excellent mathematician; whose correspondence was very dear to Gassendus and Descartes; the last of which dedicated some of his works to him. He had very notable courage; and the vigour of his mind so adorned his body, that being with his brother the marquis in all the war, he usually went out in all parties, and was present, and charged the enemy in all battles with as keen a courage as could dwell in the heart of man. But then the gentleness of his disposition, the humility and meekness of his nature, and the vivacity of his wit was admirable. He was so modest, that he could hardly be prevailed with to enlarge himself on subjects he understood better than other men, except he were pressed by his very familiar friends; as if he thought it presumption to know more than handsomer men use to do. Above all, his virtue and piety was such, that no temptation could work upon him to consent to any thing that swerved in the least degree from the precise rules of honour, or the most severe rules of conscience.

When he was exceedingly importuned by those whom he loved best to go into England, and compound for his estate, which was very good, that thereby he might be enabled to help his friends, who were reduced into great straits; he refused it, out of apprehension that he might be required to take the covenant or engagement, or to do somewhat else which his conscience would not permit him to do: and when they endeavoured to undervalue that conscience, and to persuade him not to be governed by it, that would expose him to famine, and restrain him from being charitable to his best friends; he was so offended with their argumentation, that he would no more admit any discourse upon the subject. Upon which they applied themselves to the chancellor; who they thought had most credit with him; and desired him to persuade him to make a journey into England; the benefit whereof to him and themselves was very intelligible; but informed him not of his refusal, and the arguments they had used to convert him.

The next time they met, which they usually did once a day, the chancellor told him, he heard he had a purpose to make a journey into England; to which he suddenly answered, that indeed he was desired to do so, but that he had positively refused; and thereupon, with much warmth and indignation, related what importunity and what arguments had been used to him, and what he had answered: and thereupon said, that his present condition was in no degree pleasant or easy to him, (as in truth it was not, he being in very visible want of ordinary conveniences,) but, he protested, that he would rather submit to nakedness, or starving in the street, than subscribe to the covenant or engagement, or do any thing else that might reflect upon his honour or his conscience. To which the chancellor replied, that his resolution became him, and was worthy of his wisdom and honesty; and that if he found him inclined to do any thing that might trench upon either, he was so much his friend, that he would put him in mind of his obligations to both; that indeed the arguments which had been used to him could never prevail upon a virtuous mind: however, he told him, he thought the motion from his friends might be a little more considered before it was rejected; and confessed to him, that he was desired to confer with him about it, and to dispose him to it, without being informed that any attempt had been already made: and then asked him, whether he did in truth believe that his journey thither might probably produce those benefits to himself and his friends as they imagined; and then it would be fit to consider, whether those conveniences were to be purchased at a dearer price than they were worth.

He answered, there could be no doubt, but that if he could go thither with safety, and be admitted to compound for his estate, as others did, he could then sell it at so good a price, that he could not only provide for a competent subsistence for himself, when he returned, but likewise assist his friends for their better support; and that he could otherwise, out of lands that were in trust, and not known to be his, and so had not been yet sequestered, raise other sums of money, which would be attended with many conveniences; and he confessed nothing of all this could be done without his own presence. But then that which deprived him of all this was, in the first place, the apprehension of imprisonment; which, he said, his constitution would not bear; but especially, because by their own ordinance nobody was capable to compound till he had subscribed to the covenant and engagement; which he would not do to save his life; and that in what necessity soever he was, he valued what benefit he could possibly receive by the journey only as it might consist with his innocence and liberty to return; and since he could not reasonably presume of either, he had no thought of going.

The chancellor told him, that they were both of the same mind in all things which related to conscience and honour; but yet, since the benefits that might result from this journey were great, and very probable, and in some degree certain, and the mischiefs he apprehended were not certain, and possibly might be avoided, he thought he was not to lay aside all thoughts of the journey, which he was so importuned to undertake by those who were so dear to him. That he was of the few who had many friends, and no enemies; and therefore had no reason to fear imprisonment, or any other rigour extraordinary; which was seldom used, but to persons under some notable prejudice. That after he once came to London, he would not take much pleasure in going abroad; but might despatch his business by others, who would repair to him: and that for the covenant and engagement, they were so contrary, that both were rarely offered to the same person; and they had now so much justled and reviled each other, that they were neither in so much credit as they had been, and were not pressed but upon such persons against whom they had a particular design; however, he went well armed, as to that point, with a resolution not to submit to either; and the worst that could happen, was to return without the full effect of his journey. Whereas if those mischiefs could be avoided, which the skilful upon the place could only instruct him in, he would return with great benefit and satisfaction to himself and his friends; and if he were subjected to imprisonment, (which he ought not to apprehend, and could be but short,) even in that case his journey could not be without fruit, by the conference and transactions with his friends; though no composition could be made. Upon revolving these considerations, he resolved to undertake the journey; and performed it so happily, without those obstructions he feared, that he finished all he proposed to himself, and made a competent provision to support his brother during his distress; though when he had despatched it, he lived not to enjoy the repose he desired, but died before he could return to Antwerp: and the marquis ever after publicly acknowledged the benefit he received hereby to the chancellor's advice.

As soon as the chancellor had reposed himself at Antwerp, after so much fatigue, he thought it necessary to give some account of himself to the king; and though the prohibition before his going into Scotland, and the sending away many of the servants who attended him thither out of the kingdom, made it unfit for him to repair thither himself, he resolved to send his secretary, (a man of fidelity, and well known to the king,) to inform his majesty of all that had passed, and to bring back his commands; but when he was at Amsterdam, ready to embark, upon a ship bound for Scotland, the news arrived there of his majesty's being upon his march for England; upon which he returned to Antwerp; where he found the spirits of all the English exalted with the same advertisement.

[As soon as the king came to Paris, (after his wonderful deliverance from the battle of Worcester,) and knew that the chancellor of the exchequer was at Antwerp, his majesty sent to him to repair thither, which he accordingly did; and for the first four or five days after his arrival, the king spent many hours with him in private; and informed him of many particulars of the treatment he had met with in Scotland; of his march into England; of the confusion at Worcester; and all the circumstances of his happy escape and deliverance.] (See p. 772.)

The chancellor was yet looked upon with no ungracious eye by her majesty; only the lord Jermyn knew well he would never resign himself to be disposed of, which was the temper that could only endear any man to him: for besides former experience, an attempt had been lately made upon him by sir John Berkley; who told him, that the queen had a good opinion of him; and knew well in how ill a condition he must be, in respect of his subsistence; and that she would assign him such a competent maintenance, that he should be able to draw his family to him out of Flanders to Paris, and to live comfortably together, if she might be confident of his service, and that he would always concur with her in his advice to the king. To which he answered, that he should never fail in performing his duty to the queen, whom he acknowledged to be his most gracious mistress, with all possible integrity: but as he was a servant and counsellor to the king, so he should always consider what was good for his service; and never decline that out of any compliance whatsoever; and that he did not desire to be supported from any bounty but the king's; nor more by his, than in proportion with what his majesty should be able to do for his other servants. And shortly after the queen herself speaking with him, and complaining that she had no credit with the king; the chancellor desired her not to think so; he knew well the king had great duty for her, which he would still preserve towards her; but as it would not be fit for her to affect such an interest as to be thought to govern, so nothing could be more disadvantageous to the king, and to his interest, than that the world should believe that he was absolutely governed by his mother; which he found (though she seemed to consent to it) was no acceptable declaration to her. However, she did often employ him to the king, upon such particulars as troubled or offended her; as once, for the removal of a young lady out of the Louvre, who had procured a lodging there without her majesty's consent; and with whom her majesty was justly offended, for the little respect she shewed towards her majesty: and when the chancellor had prevailed so far with the king, that he obliged the lady to remove out of the Louvre, to satisfy his mother, the queen was well content that the lady herself and her friends should believe, that she had undergone that affront merely by the malice and credit of the chancellor.

[The king remained at Paris till the year 1654; when, in the month of June, he left France; and passing through Flanders, went to Spa; where he proposed to spend two or three months with his sister, the princess royal. His stay at Spa was not so long as he intended, the smallpox breaking out there. His majesty and his sister suddenly removed to Aix-la-Chapelle.]—(See p. 815, &c.)

* At this time there fell out an accident not pertinent to the public history of that time, but necessary to be inserted in the particular relation of the chancellor's life; which had afterwards an influence upon his fortune, and a very great one upon the peace and quiet of his mind, and of his family. Mr. O'Neile, who professed much kindness to the chancellor, and by his friendship with the lady Stanhope had much credit in the family of the princess, came to him and told him that the princess royal had a very good opinion of him, and kind purposes towards his family; which she knew suffered much for his fidelity to the king; and therefore that she was much troubled to find that her mother the queen had less kindness for him than he deserved; that by the death of Mrs. Killigrew there was a place now fallen, which very many would desire; and that it would no sooner be known at Paris, than the queen would undoubtedly recommend some lady to the princess; but he was confident that, if the chancellor would move the king to recommend his daughter, who was known to the princess, her highness would willingly receive her. He thanked him for his particular kindness, but conjured him not to use his interest to promote any such pretence; and that "himself would not apply the king's favour to such a request; that he had "but one daughter, (for he had then no more,) "who was all the company and comfort her "mother had in her melancholic retirement, and "therefore he was resolved not to separate them, "nor to dispose his daughter to a court life;" which he did in truth perfectly detest. O'Neile, much disappointed with the answer, and believing that the proposition would have been very grateful to him, confessed, that the princess had been already moved in it by the lady Chesterfield; and that it was her own desire that the king should move it to her, to the end that she might be thereby sheltered from the reproach which she expected from the queen; but that the princess herself had so much kindness for his daughter, that she had long resolved to have her upon the first vacancy. The chancellor was exceedingly perplexed, and resolved nothing more, than that his daughter should not live from her mother; and therefore renewed his conjurations to Mr. O'Neile, that he would not further promote it, since it would never be acceptable to him; and concluded, that his making no application, and the importunity of others who desired the honour, would put an end to the pretence.

* For a more circumstantial account of the entrance of the chancellor's daughter into the family of the princess royal, the reader is referred to p. 1007.

The king had heard of the matter from the princess, and willingly expected when the chancellor would move him for his recommendation; which when he saw he forbore to do, he spake himself to him of it, and asked him why he did not make such a suit to him: upon which the chancellor told him all that had passed between O'Neile and him; and that for many reasons he declined the receiving that obligation from the princess; and therefore he had no use of his majesty's favour in it. The king told him plainly, that "his sister, upon having seen his daughter "some days, liked her so well, that she desired "to have her about her person; and had herself "spoken to him to move it to her, for the reason "aforesaid, and to prevent any displeasure from "the queen; and he knew not how the chancellor "could, or why he should, omit such an opportunity of providing for his daughter in so "honourable a way." The chancellor told him, "he could not dispute the reasons with him; "only that he could not give himself leave to deprive his wife of her daughter's company, nor "believe that she could be more advantageously "bred than under her mother." Hereupon he went to the princess, and took notice of the honour she was inclined to do him; but, he told her, the honour was not fit for him to receive, nor the conjuncture seasonable for her royal highness to confer it; that she could not but know his condition, being deprived of his estate; and if her highness's bounty had not assigned a house at Breda, where his wife and family lived rent free, they had not known how to have subsisted: but by that her favour, the small supplies his friends in England secretly sent over to them sustained them in that private retirement in which they lived; so that it was not in his power to make his daughter such an allowance as would enable her to live in her court in that manner as would become her relation.

The princess would not permit him to enlarge;

but very generously told him, that she knew well the straitness of his condition, and how it came to be so low; and had no thought that he should be at the charge to maintain his daughter in her service; that he should leave that to her: and so used many expressions of esteem of him, and of kindness and grace to his daughter. He, foreseeing and expecting such generosity, replied to her, that since her goodness disposed her to such an act of charity and honour, it became his duty and gratitude to provide, that she should bring no inconvenience upon herself; that he had the misfortune (with all the innocence and integrity imaginable) to be more in the queen her mother's disfavour, than any gentleman who had had the honour to serve the crown so many years in some trust; that all the application he could make, nor the king's own interposition, could prevail with her majesty to receive him into her gracious opinion; and that he could not but know, that this unseasonable act of charity, which her highness would vouchsafe to so ungracious a family, would produce some resentment and displeasure from the queen her mother towards her highness, and increase the weight of her severe indignation against him, which so heavily oppressed him already; and therefore he resolved to prevent that mischief, which would undoubtedly befall her highness; and would not submit to the receiving the fruits of her favourable condescension.

To this the princess answered with some warmth, that she had always paid that duty to the queen her mother which was due to her, and would never give her a just cause to be offended with her: but that she was mistress of her own family, and might receive what servants she pleased; and that she should commit a great fault against the queen, if she should forbear to do a good and a just action, to which she was inclined, out of apprehension that her majesty would be offended at it. She said, she knew some ill offices had been done him to her mother, for which she was sorry; and doubted not, but her majesty would in due time discern that she had been misinformed and mistaken; and then she would like and approve of what her highness should now do. In the mean time she was resolved to take his daughter, and would send for her as soon as she returned into Holland. The chancellor, not in any degree converted, but confounded with the gracious and frank discourse of the princess royal, knew not what more to say; replied only, that he hoped her highness would think better of what she seemed to undervalue, and that he left his daughter to be disposed of by her mother, who he knew would be very unwilling to part with her; upon which her highness answered, "I'll warrant you, my lady and I "will agree upon the matter." To conclude this discourse, which, considering what fell out afterwards, is not impertinent to be remembered; he knew his wife had no inclination to have her daughter out of her own company; and when he had by letter informed her of all that had passed, he endeavoured to confirm her in that resolution: but when the princess, after her return into Holland, sent to her, and renewed her gracious offer, she, upon consultation with Dr. Morley, (who upon the old friendship between the chancellor and him, chose in his banishment, from the murder of the king, to make his residence for the most part in his family, and was always perfectly kind to all his interests,) believed it might prove for her daughter's benefit, and writ to her husband her opinion, and that the doctor concurred in the same.

The chancellor looked upon the matter itself, and all the circumstances thereof, as having some marks of divine Providence, which he would not resist, and so referred it wholly to his wife; who when she had presented her daughter to the princess, came herself to reside with her husband, to his great comfort; and which he could not have enjoyed if the other separation had not been made; and possibly that consideration had the more easily disposed her to consent to the other. We have now set down all the passages and circumstances which accompanied or attended that lady's first promotion to the service of the princess royal; which the extreme averseness in her father and mother from embracing that opportunity, and the unusual grace and importunity from them who conferred the honour being considered, there may appear to many an extraordinary operation of Providence in giving the first rise to what afterwards succeeded; though of a nature so transcendent, as cannot be thought to have any relation to it.

[After an unsuccessful insurrection of some of the king's friends in England, Cromwell exercised the utmost severity and cruelty against them; putting many to death, and transporting others as slaves to Barbadoes; and by his own authority, and that of his council, made an order, that all persons who had ever borne arms for, or declared themselves of, the royal party, should be decimated; that is, pay a tenth part of all the estate they had left, to support the charge of the commonwealth; and published a declaration to justify his proceedings, (See p. 823-830.) which confidently set down such maxims, as made it manifest to all who had ever served the king, or would not submit to Cromwell's power and government, that they had nothing that they could call their own, but must be disposed of at his pleasure; which as much concerned all other parties as the king's, in the consequence; though for the present none but that party underwent that insupportable burden of the decimation, which brought in a vast incredible sum of money into his coffers, the greater part whereof was raised upon those who never did, nor ever would have given his majesty the least assistance, and were only reputed to be of the king's party, because they had not assisted the rebels to any considerable proportion, but had a good mind to have sat neuters, and not to be at any charge with reference to either party.

This declaration, as soon as printed, was sent over to Cologne, [where the king then was,] and the chancellor was commanded by the king to write some discourse upon it, to awaken the people, and shew them their concernment in it; which he did by way of "a Letter to a Friend;" which was likewise sent into England, and there printed; and when Cromwell called his next parliament, it was made great use of to inflame the people, and make them sensible of the destruction that attended them; and was thought then to produce many good effects. And so we conclude this part.

Montpelier, May 27, 1670.

[The seventh and last part of the manuscript is dated at Montpelier, August 1, 1670, and continues the history from the king's residence at Cologne, to the restoration of the royal family in 1660; containing the substance of what is printed in the two last books of The History of the Rebellion. The only remarkable circumstance of the author's life during that period is, that in the year 1657, while the king was at Bruges, his majesty appointed the chancellor of the exchequer to be lord high chancellor of England; and delivered the great seal into his custody, upon the death of sir Edward Herbert, the last lord keeper thereof.] (See p. 831-910.)

THE
CONTINUATION OF THE LIFE OF
EDWARD EARL OF CLARENDON.

---

Moulins, June 8, 1672.

Reflections upon the most material passages which happened after the king's restoration to the time of the chancellor's banishment; out of which his children, for whose information they are only collected, may add some important passages to his Life, as the true cause of his misfortunes.

THE easy and glorious reception of the king, in the manner that hath been mentioned, without any other conditions than what had been frankly offered by himself in his declaration and letters from Breda; the parliament's casting themselves in a body at his feet, in the minute of his arrival at Whitehall, with all the professions of duty and submission imaginable; and no man having authority there, but they who had either eminently served the late king, or who were since grown up out of their nonage from such fathers, and had thoroughly manifested their fast fidelity to his present majesty; the rest, who had been enough criminal, shewing more animosity towards the severe punishment of those, who having more power in the late times had exceeded them in mischief, than care for their own indemnity: this temper sufficiently evident, and the universal joy of the people, which was equally visible, for the total suppression of all those who had so many years exercised tyranny over them, made most men believe, both abroad and at home, that God had not only restored the king miraculously to his throne, but that he had, as he did in the time of Hezekiah, "prepared the people, for the thing was done suddenly." (2 Chron. xxix. 36.) in such a manner that his authority and greatness would have been more illustrious than it had been in any of his ancestors. And it is most true, and must never be denied, that the people were so admirably disposed and prepared to pay all the subjection, duty, and obedience, that a just and prudent king could expect from them, and had a very sharp aversion and detestation of all those who had formerly misled and corrupted them; so that, except the general, who seemed to be possessed entirely of the affection of the army, and whose fidelity was now above any misapprehension, there appeared no man whose power and interest could in any degree shake or endanger the peace and security the king was in; the congratulations for his return being so universal from all the counties of England, as well as from the parliament and city; from all those who had most signally disserved and disclaimed him, as well as from those of his own party, and those who were descended from them: insomuch as the king was wont merrily to say, as hath been mentioned before, "that it could be nobody's fault but his own" that he had stayed so long abroad, when all "mankind wished him so heartily at home." It cannot therefore but be concluded by the standers-by, and the spectators of this wonderful change and exclamation of all degrees of men, that there must be some wonderful miscarriages in the state, or some unheard of defect of understanding in those who were trusted by the king in the administration of his affairs; that there could in so short a time be a new revolution in the general affections of the people, that they grew even weary of that happiness they were possessed of and had so much valued, and fell into the same discontents and murmurings which had naturally accompanied them in the worst times. From what fatal causes these miserable effects were produced, is the business of this present disquisition to examine, and in some degree to discover; and therefore must be of such a nature, as must be as tenderly handled, with reference to things and persons, as the discovery of the truth will permit; and cannot be presumed to be intended ever for a public view, or for more than the information of his children of the true source and grounds from whence their father's misfortunes proceeded, in which nothing can be found that can make them ashamed of his memory.

The king brought with him from beyond the seas that council which had always attended him, and whose advice he had always received in his transactions of greatest importance; and his small family, that consisted of gentlemen who had for the most part been put about him by his father, and constantly waited upon his person in all his distresses, with as much submission and patience undergoing their part in it, as could reasonably be expected from such a people; and therefore had the keener appetites, and the stronger presumption to push on their fortunes (as they called it) in the infancy of their master's restoration, that other men might not be preferred before them, who had not "borne the heat of the day," as they had done.

Of the council were the chancellor, the marquis of Ormond, the lord Colepepper, and secretary Nicholas, who lived in great unity and concurrence in the communication of the most secret counsels. There had been more of his council abroad with him, who, according to the motions he made, and the places he had resided in, were sometimes with him, but other remained in France, or in some parts of Holland and Flanders, for their convenience, ready to repair to his majesty when they should be called. The four nominated above were they who constantly attended, were privy to all counsels, and waited upon him in his return.

The chancellor was the highest in place, and thought to be so in trust, because he was most in private with the king, had managed most of the secret correspondence in England, and all despatches of importance had passed through his hands; which had hitherto been with the less envy, because the indefatigable pains he took were very visible, and it was as visible that he gained nothing by it. His wants and necessities were as great as any man's, nor was the allowance assigned to him by the king in the least degree more, or better paid, than every one of the council received. Besides, the friendship was so entire between the marquis of Ormond and him, that no arts that were used could dissolve it; and it was enough known, that as he had an entire and full confidence from the king, and a greater esteem than any man, so, that the chancellor so entirely communicated all particulars with him, that there was not the least resolution taken without his privy and approbation. The chancellor had been employed by the last king in all the affairs of the greatest trust and secrecy; had been made privy counsellor and chancellor of the exchequer in the very beginning of the troubles; and had been sent by that king into the west with his son, when he thought their interest would be best preserved and provided for by separating their persons. A greater testimony and recommendation a servant could not receive from his master, than the king gave of him to the prince, who from that time treated him with as much affection and confidence as any man, and which (notwithstanding very powerful opposition) he continued and improved to this time of his restoration; and even then rejected some intimations rather than propositions, which were secretly made to him at the Hague, that the chancellor was a man very much in the prejudice of the presbyterian party, as in truth he was, and therefore that his majesty would do best to leave him behind, till he should be himself settled in England: which the king received with that indignation and disdain, and answered the person, who privately presumed to give the advice, in such a manner, that he was troubled no more with the importunity, nor did any man ever own the advice. Yet the chancellor had besought the king, upon some rumours which had been spread, that if any exception or prejudice to his person should be so insisted on, as might delay his return one hour, he would decline giving him any protection, till he should find it more in his power, after his arrival in England: which desire of his, though it found no reception with the king, proceeded from so much sincerity, that it is well known the chancellor did positively resolve, that if any such thing had been urged by any authority, he would render the king's indulgence and grace of no inconvenience to his majesty, by his secret and voluntary withdrawing himself, without his privy, and without the reach of his discovery for some time: so far he was from being biassed by his own particular benefit and advantage.

The marquis of Ormond was the person of the greatest quality, estate, and reputation, who had frankly engaged his person and his fortune in the king's service from the first hour of the troubles, and pursued it with that courage and constancy, that when the king was murdered, and he deserted by the Irish, contrary to the articles of the peace which they had made with him, and when he could make no longer defence, he refused all the conditions which Cromwell offered, who would have given him all his vast estate, if he would have been contented to have lived quietly in some of his own houses, without further concerning himself in the quarrel; and transported himself, without so much as accepting a pass from his authority, in a little weak vessel into France, where he found the king, from whom he never parted till he returned with him into England. And having thus merited as much as a subject can do from a prince, he had much more credit and esteem with the king than any other man: and the lustre the chancellor was in, was no less from the declared friendship the marquis had for him, than from the great trust his majesty reposed in him.

The lord Colepepper was a man of great parts, a very sharp and present wit, and an universal understanding; so that few men filled a place in council with more sufficiency, or expressed themselves upon any subject that occurred with more weight and vigour. He had been trusted by the late king (who had a singular opinion of his courage and other abilities) to wait upon the prince when he left his father, and continued still afterwards with him, or in his service, and in a good correspondence with the chancellor.

Secretary Nicholas was a man of general good reputation with all men, of unquestionable integrity and long experience in the service of the crown; whom the late king trusted as much as any man to his death. He was one of those who were excepted by the parliament from pardon or composition, and so was compelled to leave the kingdom shortly after Oxford was delivered up, when the king was in the hands of the Scots. The present king continued him in the office of secretary of state, which he had so long held under his father. He was a man of great gravity, and without any ambitious or private designs; and had so fast a friendship with the chancellor for many years, that he was very well content, and without any jealousy for his making many despatches and other transactions, which more immediately related to his office, and which indeed were always made with his privy and concurrence.

This was the state and constitution of the king's council and his family, when he embarked in Holland, and landed at Dover: the additions and alterations which were after made will be mentioned in their place.

It will be convenient here, before we descend to those particulars which had an influence upon the minds of men, to take a clear view of the temper and spirit of that time; of the nature and inclination of the army; of the disposition and interest of the several factions in religion; all which appeared in their several colours, without disassembling their principles, and with equal confidence demanded the liberty of conscience they had enjoyed in and since the time of Cromwell; and the humour and the present purpose and design of the parliament itself, to whose judgment and determination the whole settlement of the kingdom, both in church and state, stood referred by the king's own declaration from Breda, which by God's inspiration had been the sole visible motive to that wonderful change that had ensued. And whosoever takes a prospect of all those several passions and appetites and interests, together with the divided affections, jealousies, and animosities of those who had been always looked upon as the king's party, which, if united, would in that conjuncture have been powerful enough to have balanced all the other; I say, whoever truly and ingenuously considers and reflects upon all this composition of contradictory wishes and expectations, must confess that the king was not yet the master of the kingdom, nor his authority and security such as the general noise and acclamation, the bells and the bonfires, proclaimed it to be; and that there was in no conjuncture more need, that the virtue and wisdom and industry of a prince should be evident, and made manifest in the preservation of his dignity, and in the application of his mind to the government of his affairs; and that all who were eminently trusted by him should be men of unquestionable sincerity, who with industry and dexterity should first endeavour to compose the public disorders, and to provide for the peace and settlement of the kingdom, before they applied themselves to make or improve their own particular fortunes. And there is little question, but if this good method had been pursued, and the resolutions of that kind, which the king had seriously taken beyond the seas, when he first discerned his good fortune coming towards him, had been executed and improved; the hearts and affections of all degrees of men were so prepared by their own natural inclinations and integrity, by what they had seen and what they had suffered, by their observations and experience, by their fears, or by their hopes; that they might have been all kneaded into as firm and constant an obedience and resignation to the king's authority, and to a lasting establishment of monarchic power, in all the just extents which the king could expect, or men of any public or honest affections could wish or submit to.

The first mortification the king met with was as soon as he arrived at Canterbury, which was within three hours after he landed at Dover; and where he found many of those who were justly looked upon, from their own sufferings or those of their fathers, and their constant adhering to the same principles, as of the king's party; who with joy waited to kiss his hand, and were received by him with those open arms and flowing expressions of grace, calling all those by their names who were known to him, that they easily assured themselves of the accomplishment of all their desires from such a generous prince. And some of them, that they might not lose the first opportunity, forced him to give them present audience, in which they reckoned up the insupportable losses undergone by themselves or their fathers, and some services of their own; and thereupon demanded the present grant or promise of such or such an office. Some, for the real small value of one, though of the first classis, pressed for two or three with such confidence and importunity, and with such tedious discourses, that the king was extremely nauseated with their suits, though his modesty knew not how to break from them; that he no sooner got into his chamber, which for some hours he was not able to do, than he lamented the condition to which he found he must be subject; and did in truth from that minute contract such a prejudice against the persons of some of those, though of the greatest quality, for the indecency and incongruity of their pretences, that he never afterwards received their addresses with his usual grace or patience, and rarely granted any thing they desired, though the matter was more reasonable, and the manner of asking much more modest.

But there was another mortification, which immediately succeeded this, that gave him much more trouble, and in which he knew not how to comport himself. The general, after he had given all necessary orders to his troops, and sent a short despatch to the parliament of the king's being come to Canterbury, and of his purpose to stay there two days, till the next Sunday was passed, he came to the king in his chamber, and in a short secret audience, and without any preamble or apology, as he was not a man of a graceful elocution, he told him, "that he could not do "him better service, than by recommending to "him such persons who were most grateful to "the people, and in respect of their parts and "interests were best able to serve him;" and thereupon gave him a large paper full of names, which the king in disorder enough received, and without reading put it into his pocket, that he might not enter into any particular debate upon the persons; and told him, "that he would be "always ready to receive his advice, and willing "to gratify him in any thing he should desire, "and which would not be prejudicial to his service." The king, as soon as he could, took an opportunity, when there remained no more in his chamber, to inform the chancellor of the first assaults he had encountered as soon as he alighted out of his coach, and afterwards of what the general had said to him; and thereupon took the paper out of his pocket and read it. It contained the names of at least threescore and ten persons, who were thought fittest to be made privy counsellors; in the whole number whereof, there were only two who had ever served the king, or been looked upon as zealously affected to his service, the marquis of Hertford and the earl of Southampton; who were both of so universal reputation and interest, and so well known to have the very particular esteem of the king, that they needed no such recommendation. All the rest were either those counsellors who had served the king, and deserted him by adhering to the parliament; or of those who had most eminently deserved him in the beginning of the rebellion, and in the carrying it on with all fierceness and animosity, until the new model, and dismissing the earl of Essex: then, indeed, Cromwell had grown terrible to them, and disposed them to wish the king were again possessed of his regal power; and which they did but wish. There were then the names of the principal persons of the presbyterian party, to which the general was thought to be most inclined, at least to satisfy the foolish and unruly inclinations of his wife. There were likewise the names of some who were most notorious in all the other factions; and of some who, in respect of their mean qualities and meaner qualifications, nobody could imagine how they could come to be named, except that by the very odd mixture any sober and wise resolutions and concurrence might be prevented.

The king was in more than ordinary confusion with the reading this paper, and knew not well what to think of the general, in whose absolute power he now was. However, he resolved in the entrance upon his government not to consent to such impositions, which might prove perpetual fetters and chains upon him ever after. He gave the paper therefore to the chancellor, and bade him "take the first opportunity to discourse the "matter with the general," (whom he had not yet saluted,) "or rather with Mr. Morrice, his most "intimate friend;" whom he had newly presented to the king, and "with both whom he presumed he would shortly be acquainted," though for the present both were equally unknown to him. Shortly after, when mutual visits had passed between them, and such professions as naturally are made between persons who are like to have much to do with each other, and Mr. Morrice being in private with him, the chancellor told him "how "much the king was surprised with the paper he "had received from the general, which at least "recommended (and which would have always "great authority with him) some such persons "to his trust, in whom he could not yet, till they "were better known to him, repose any confidence." And thereupon he read many of their names, and said, "that if such men were made "privy counsellors, it would either be imputed to "the king's own election, which would cause a "very ill measure to be taken of his majesty's "nature and judgment; or (which more probably "would be the case) to the inclination and power "of the general, which would be attended with as "ill effects." Mr. Morrice seemed much troubled at the apprehension, and said, "the paper was of "his handwriting, by the general's order, who, he "was assured, had no such intention; but that "he would presently speak with him and return;" which he did within less than an hour, and expressed "the trouble the general was in upon the "king's very just exception; and that the truth "was, he had been obliged to have much communication with men of all humours and inclinations, and so had promised to do them good "offices to the king, and could not therefore avoid "inserting their names in that paper, without any "imaginings that the king would accept them; "that he had done his part, and all that could be "expected from him, and left the king to do what "he had thought best for his own service, which "he would always desire him to do, whatever "proposition he should at any time presume to "make to his majesty, which he would not promise should be always reasonable. However, "he did still heartily wish that his majesty would "make use of some of those persons," whom he named, and said, "he knew most of them were "not his friends, and that his service would be "more advanced by admitting them, than by "leaving them out."

The king was abundantly pleased with this good

temper of the general, and less disliked those who he discerned would be grateful to him than any of the rest: and so the next day he made the general knight of the garter, and admitted him of the council; and likewise at the same time gave the signet to Mr. Morrice, who was sworn of the council, and secretary of state; and sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, who had been presented by the general under a special recommendation, was then too sworn of the council; and the rather, because having lately married the niece of the earl of Southampton, (who was then likewise present, and received the garter, to which he had been elected some years before,) it was believed that his slippery humour would be easily restrained and fixed by the uncle. All this was transacted during his majesty's stay at Canterbury.

Upon the 29th of May, which was his majesty's birthday, and now again the day of his restoration and triumph, he entered London the highway from Rochester to Blackheath, being on both sides so full of acclamations of joy, and crowded with such a multitude of people, that it seemed one continued street wonderfully inhabited. Upon Blackheath the army was drawn up, consisting of above fifty thousand men, horse and foot, in excellent order and equipage, where the general presented the chief officers to kiss the king's hands, which grace they seemed to receive with all humility and cheerfulness. Shortly after, the lord mayor of London, the sheriffs, and body of the aldermen, with the whole militia of the city, appeared with great lustre; whom the king received with a most graceful and obliging countenance, and knighted the mayor, and all the aldermen, and sheriffs, and the principal officers of the militia: an honour the city had been without near eighteen years, and therefore abundantly welcome to the husbands and their wives. With this equipage the king was attended through the city of London, where the streets were railed in on both sides, that the livery of all the companies of the city might appear with the more order and decency, till he came to Whitehall; the windows all the way being full of ladies and persons of quality, who were impatient to fill their eyes with a beloved spectacle, of which they had been so long deprived. The king was no sooner at Whitehall, but (as hath been said) the speakers and both houses of parliament presented themselves with all possible professions of duty and obedience at his royal feet, and were even ravished with the cheerful reception they had from him. The joy was universal; and whosoever was not pleased at heart, took the more care to appear as if he was; and no voice was heard but of the highest congratulation, of extolling the person of the king, admiring his condescensions and affability, raising his praises to heaven, and cursing and detesting the memory of those villains who had so long excluded so meritorious a prince, and thereby withheld that happiness from them, which they should enjoy in the largest measure they could desire or wish. The joy on all sides was with the greatest excess, so that most men thought, and had reason enough to think, that the king was even already that great and glorious prince which the parliament had wantonly and hypocritically promised to raise his father to be.

The chancellor took his place in the house of peers with a general acceptance and respect; and all those lords who were alive and had served the king his father, and the sons of those who were dead and were equally excluded from sitting there by ordinances of parliament, together with all those who had been created by this king, took their seats in parliament without the least murmur or exception. The house of commons seemed equally constituted to what could be wished; for though there were many presbyterian members, and some of all other factions in religion, who did all promise themselves some liberty and indulgence for their several parties, yet they all professed great zeal for the establishing the king in his full power. And the major part of the house was of sober and prudent men, who had been long known to be very weary of all the late governments, and heartily to desire and pray for the king's return. And there were many who had either themselves been actual and active malignants and delinquents in the late king's time, or the sons of such, who inherited their fathers' virtues. Both which classes of men were excluded from being capable of being elected to serve in parliament, not only by former ordinances, but by express caution in the very writs which were sent out to summon this parliament; and were notwithstanding made choice of, and returned by the country, and received without any hesitation in the house, and treated by all men with the more civility and respect for their known malignity: so that the king, though it was necessary to have patience in the expectations of their resolutions in all important points, which could not suddenly be concluded in such a popular assembly, was very reasonably assured, that he should have nothing pressed upon him that should be ungrateful, with reference to the church or state.

It is true, the presbyterians were very numerous in the house, and many of them men of good parts, and had a great party in the army, and a greater in the city, and, except with reference to episcopacy, were desirous to make themselves grateful to the king in the settling all his interest, and especially in vindicating themselves from the odious murder of the king by loud and passionate inveighing against that monstrous parricide, and with the highest animosity denouncing the severest judgments not only against those who were immediately guilty of it, but against those principal persons who had most notoriously adhered to Cromwell in the administration of his government, that is, most eminently opposed them and their faction. They took all occasions to declare, "that the power and interest of their party had been the chief means to bring home the king;" and used all possible endeavours that the king might be persuaded to think so too, and that the very covenant had at last done him good and expedited his return, by the causing it to be hung up in churches, from whence Cromwell had cast it out; and their ministers pressing upon the conscience of all those who had taken it, "that they were bound by that clause which concerned the defence of the king's person, to take up arms, if need were, on his behalf, and to restore him to his rightful government;" when the very same ministers had obliged them to take up arms against the king his father by virtue of that covenant, and to fight against him till they had taken him prisoner, which produced his murder. This party was much displeased that the king declared himself so positively on behalf of episcopacy, and would hear no other prayers in his chapel than those contained in the Book of Common Prayer, and that all those formalities and solemnities were now again resumed and practised, which they had caused to be abolished for so many years past. Yet the king left all churches to their liberty, to use such forms of devotion which they liked best; and such of their chief preachers who desired it, or were desired by their friends, were admitted to preach before him, even without the surplice, or any other habit than they made choice of. But this connivance would not do their business; their preaching made no proselytes who were not so before; and the resort of the people to those churches where the Common Prayer was again introduced, was evidence enough of their inclinations; and they saw the king's chapel always full of those who had used to possess the chief benches in their assemblies; so that it was manifest that nothing but the supreme authority would be able to settle their discipline: and therefore, with their usual confidence, they were very importunate in the house of commons, "that the ecclesiastical government might be settled and remain according to the covenant, which had been practised many years, and so the people generally well devoted to it; whereas the introducing the Common Prayer (with which very few had ever been acquainted or heard it read) would very much offend the people, and give great interruption to the composing the peace of the kingdom." This was urged in the house of commons by eminent men of the party, who believed they had the major part of their mind. And their preachers were as solicitous and industrious to inculcate the same doctrine to the principal persons who had returned with the king, and every day resorted to the court as if they presided there, and had frequent audiences of the king to persuade him to be of the same opinion; from whom they received no other condescensions than they had formerly had at the Hague, with the same gracious affability and expressions to their persons.

That party in the house that was in truth devoted to the king and to the old principles of church and of state, which every day increased, thought not fit so to cross the presbyterians, as to make them desperate in their hopes of satisfaction; but, with the concurrence with those who were of contrary factions, diverted the argument by proposing other subjects of more immediate relation to the public peace, (as the act of indemnity, which every man impatiently longed for, and the raising money towards the payment of the army and the navy, without which that insupportable charge could not be lessened,) to be first considered and despatched; and the model for religion to be debated and prepared by that committee which had been nominated before his majesty's return to that purpose; they not doubting to cross and puzzle any pernicious resolutions there, till time and their own extravagant follies should put some end to their destructive designs.

In the mean time there were two particulars which the king, with much inward impatience, though with little outward communication, did most desire; the disbanding the army, and the settling the revenue, the course and receipt whereof had been so broken and perverted, and a great part extinguished by the sale of all the crown lands, that the old officers of the exchequer, auditors or receivers, knew not how to resume their administrations. Besides that the great receipt of excise and customs was not yet vested in the king; nor did the parliament make any haste to assign it, finding it necessary to reserve it in the old way, and not to divert it from those assignments which had been made for the payment of the army and navy; for which, until some other provision could be made, it was to no purpose to mention the disbanding the one or the other, though the charge of both was so vast and insupportable, that the kingdom must in a short time sink under the burden. For what concerned the revenue and raising money, the king was less solicitous; and yet there was not so much as any assignation made for the support of his household, which caused a vast debt to be contracted before taken notice of, the mischief of which is hardly yet removed. He saw the parliament every day doing somewhat in it; and it quickly dissolved all bargains, contracts, and sales, which had been of any of the crown lands, so that all that royal revenue (which had been too much wasted and impaired in those improvident times which had preceded the troubles) was entirely remitted to those to whom it belonged, the king and the queen his mother; but very little money was returned out of the same into the exchequer in the space of the first year: so difficult it was to reduce any payments, which had been made for so many years irregularly, into the old channel and order. And every thing else of this kind was done, how slowly soever, with as much expedition as [from] the nature of the affair, and the crowd in which it was necessary to be agitated, could reasonably be expected; and therefore his majesty was less troubled for those inconveniences which he foresaw must inevitably flow from thence.

But the delay in disbanding the army, how unavoidable soever, did exceedingly afflict him, and the more, because for many reasons he could not urge it nor complain of it. He knew well the ill constitution of the army, the distemper and murmuring that was in it, and how many diseases and convulsions their infant loyalty was subject to; that how united soever their inclinations and acclamations seemed to be at Blackheath, their affections were not the same: and the very countenances then of many officers as well as soldiers did sufficiently manifest, that they were drawn thither to a service they were not delighted in. The general, before he had formed any resolution to himself, and only valued himself upon the presbyterian interest, had cashiered some regiments and companies which he knew not to be devoted to his person and greatness; and after he found it necessary to fix his own hopes and dependence upon the king, he had dismissed many officers who he thought might be willing and able to cross his designs and purposes when he should think fit to discover them, and conferred their charges and commands upon those who had been disfavoured by the late powers; and after the parliament had declared for and proclaimed the king, he cashiered others, and gave their offices to some eminent commanders who had served the king; and gave others of the loyal nobility leave to list volunteers in companies to appear with them at the reception of the king, who had all met and joined with the army upon Blackheath in the head of their regiments and companies: yet, notwithstanding all this providence, the old soldiers had little regard for their new officers, at least had no resignation for them; and it quickly appeared, by the select and affected mixtures of sullen and melancholic parties of officers and soldiers, that as ill-disposed men of other classes were left as had been disbanded; and that much the greater part so much abounded with ill humours, that it was not safe to administer a general purgation. It is true that Lambert was close prisoner in the Tower, and as many of those officers who were taken and had appeared in arms with him when he was taken were likewise there, or in some other prisons, with others of the same complexion, who were well enough known to have the present settlement that was intended in perfect detestation: but this leprosy was spread too far to have the contagion quickly or easily extinguished. How close soever Lambert himself was secured from doing mischief, his faction was at liberty, and very numerous; his disbanded officers and soldiers mingled and conversed with their old friends and companions, and found too many of them possessed with the same spirit; they concurred in the same reproaches and revilings of the general, as the man who had treacherously betrayed them, and led them into an ambuscade from whence they knew not how to disentangle themselves. They looked upon him as the sole person who still supported his own model, and were well assured that if he were removed, the army would be still the same, and appear in their old retrenchments; and therefore they entered into several combinations to assassinate him, which they resolved to do with the first opportunity. In a word, they liked neither the mien nor garb nor countenance of the court, nor were wrought upon by the gracious aspect and benignity of the king himself.

All this was well enough known to his majesty, and to the general, who was well enough acquainted and not at all pleased with the temper and disposition of his army, and therefore no less desired it should be disbanded than the king did. In the mean time, very diligent endeavours were used to discover and apprehend some principal persons, who took as much care to conceal themselves; and every day many dangerous or suspected men of all qualities were imprisoned in all counties: spies were employed, who for the most part had the same affections which they were to discover in others, and received money on both sides to do, and not to do, the work they were appointed to do. And in this melancholic and perplexed condition the king and all his hopes stood, when he appeared most gay and exalted, and wore a pleasantness in his face that became him, and looked like as full an assurance of his security as was possible to be put on.

There was yet added to this slippery and uneasy posture of affairs, another mortification, which made a deeper impression upon the king's spirit than all the rest, and without which the worst of the other would have been in some degree remediable; that was, the constitution and disunion of those who were called and looked upon as his own party, which without doubt in the whole kingdom was numerous enough, and capable of being powerful enough to give the law to all the rest; which had been the ground of many unhappy attempts in the late time; that if any present force could be drawn together, and possessed of any such place in which they might make a stand without being overrun in a moment, the general concurrence of the kingdom would in a short time reduce the army, and make the king superior to all his enemies; which imagination was enough confuted, though not enough extinguished, by the dearbought experience in the woful enterprise at Worcester. However, it had been now a very justifiable presumption in the king, to believe as well as hope, that he could not be long in England without such an appearance of his own party, that wished all that he himself desired, and such a manifestation of their authority, interest, and power, that would prevent, or be sufficient to subdue, any froward disposition that might grow up in the parliament, or more extravagant demands in the army itself. An appearance there was of that people, great enough, who had all the wishes for the king which he entertained for himself. But they were so divided and disunited by private quarrels, factions, and animosities; or so unacquainted with each other; or, which was worse, so jealous of each other; the understandings and faculties of many honest men were so weak and shallow, that they could not be applied to any great trust; and others, who wished and meant very well, had a peevishness, frowardness, and opiniatry, that they would be engaged only in what pleased themselves, nor would join in any thing with such and such men whom they disliked. The severe and tyrannical government of Cromwell and the parliament had so often banished and imprisoned them upon mere jealousies, that they were grown strangers to one another, without any communication between them: and there had been so frequent betrayings and treacheries used, so many discoveries of meetings privately contrived, and of discourses accidentally entered into, and words and expressions rashly and unadvisedly uttered without any design, upon which multitudes were still imprisoned and many put to death; so that the jealousy was so universal, that few men who had never so good affections for the king, durst confer with any freedom together.

Most of those of the nobility who had with constancy and fidelity adhered to the last king, and had greatest authority with all men who professed the same affections, were dead; as the duke of Richmond, the earl of Dorset, the lord Capel, the lord Hopton, and many other excellent persons. And of that classis, that is, of a powerful interest and unsuspected integrity, (for there were some very good men, who were without any cause suspected then, because they were not equally persecuted upon all occasions,) there were only two who survived, the marquis of Hertford and earl of Southampton; who were both great and worthy men, looked upon with great estimation by all the most valuable men who could contribute most to the king's restoration, and with reverence by their greatest enemy, and had been courted by Cromwell himself till he found it to no purpose. And though the marquis had been prevailed with once and no more to give him a visit, the other, the earl, could never be persuaded so much as to see him; and when Cromwell was in the New Forest, and resolved one day to visit him, he being informed of it or suspecting it, removed to another house he had at such a distance as exempted him from that visitation. But these two great persons had for several years withdrawn themselves into the country, lived retired, sent sometimes such money as they could raise out of their long-sequestered and exhausted fortunes, by messengers of their own dependence, with advice to the king, "to sit still, and expect a reasonable revolution," "without making any unadvised attempt;" and industriously declined any conversation or commerce with any who were known to correspond with the king: so that now, upon his majesty's return, they were totally unacquainted with any of those persons, who now looked as men to be depended upon in any great action and attempt. And for themselves, as the marquis shortly after died, so the other with great abilities served him in his most secret and important councils, but had been never conversant in martial affairs.

There had been six or eight persons of general good and confessed reputation, and who of all who were then left alive had had the most eminent charges in the war, and executed them with great courage and discretion; so that few men could with any reasonable pretence refuse to receive orders from them, or to serve under their commands. They had great affection for and confidence in each other, and had frankly offered by an express of their own number, whilst the king remained in France, "that if they were approved" and qualified by his majesty, they would by "joint advice intend the care of his majesty's service; and as they would not engage in any" "absurd and desperate attempt, but use all their credit and authority to prevent and discountenance the same, so they would take the first" "rational opportunity, which they expected from" "the divisions and animosities which daily grew" "and appeared in the army, to draw their friends" "and old soldiers who were ready to receive their" "commands together, and try the utmost that" "could be done, with the loss or hazard of their" "lives:" some of them having, beside their experience in war, very considerable fortunes of their own to lose, and were relations to the greatest families in England. And therefore they made it their humble suit, "that this secret correspondence might be carried on, and known to none" "but to the marquis of Ormond and to the chancellor; and that if any other counsels were set" "on foot in England by the activity of particular" "persons, who too frequently with great zeal and" "little animadversion embarked themselves in" "impossible undertakings, his majesty upon advertisement thereof would first communicate" "the motives or pretences which would be offered" "to him, to them; and then they would find" "opportunity to confer with some sober man of" "that fraternity," (as there was no well-affected person in England, who at that time would not willingly receive advice and direction from most of those persons,) "and thereupon they would" "present their opinion to his majesty; and if the" "design should appear practicable to his majesty,

"they would cheerfully embark themselves in it, "otherwise use their own dexterity to divert it." These men had been armed with all necessary commissions and instructions, according to their own desires; the king consented to all they proposed; and the cyphers and correspondence were committed to the chancellor, in whose hands, with the privacy only of the marquis of Ormond, all the intelligence with England, of what kind soever, was intrusted.

Under this conduct, for some years all things succeeded well; many unseasonable attempts were prevented, and thereby the lives of many good men preserved: and though (upon the cursory jealousy of that time, and the restless apprehension of Cromwell, and the almost continual commitments of all who had eminently served the king, and were able to do it again) these persons who were thus trusted, or the major part of them, were seldom out of prison, or free from the obligation of good sureties for their peaceable behaviour; yet all the vigilance of Cromwell and his most diligent inquisitors could never discover this secret intercourse between those confidants and the king, which did always pass and was maintained by expresses made choice of by them, and supported at their charge out of such monies as were privately collected for public uses, of which they who contributed most knew little more than the integrity of him who was intrusted, who did not always make skilful contributions.

It fell out unfortunately, that two of these principal persons fell out, and had a fatal quarrel, upon a particular less justifiable than any thing that could result from or relate to the great trust they both had from the king, which ought to have been of influence enough to have suppressed or diverted all passions of that kind: but the animosities grew suddenly irreconcilable, and if not divided the affections of the whole knot, at least interrupted or suspended their constant intercourse and confidence in each other, and so the diligent accounts which the king used to receive from them. And the cause growing more public and notorious, though not known in a long time after to the king, exceedingly lessened both their reputations with the most sober men; insomuch as they withdrew all confidence in their conduct, and all inclination to embark in the business which was intrusted in such hands. And which was worse than all this, one person amongst them, of as unblemished a reputation as either of them, and of much better abilities and faculties of mind, either affected with this untoward accident, or broken with frequent imprisonments and despair of any resurrection of the king's interest, about this time yielded to a foul temptation; and for large supplies of money, which his fortune stood in need of, engaged to be a spy to Cromwell, with a latitude which he did not allow to others of that ignominious tribe, undertaking only to impart enough of any design to prevent the mischief thereof, without exposing any man to the loss of his life, or ever appearing himself to make good and justify any of his discoveries. The rest of his associates neither suspected their companion, nor lessened their affection or utmost zeal for the king; though they remitted some of their diligence in his service by the other unhappy interruption.

This falling out during his majesty's abode in

Cologne, he was very long without notice of the grounds of that jealousy which had obstructed his usual correspondence; and the matter of infidelity being not in the least degree suspected, he could not avoid receiving advice and propositions from other honest men, who were of known affection and courage, and who conversed much with the officers of the army, and were unskilfully disposed to believe that all they, who they had reason to believe did hate Cromwell, would easily be induced to serve the king: and many of the officers in their behaviour, discourses, and familiarity, contributed to that belief; some of them, not without the privacy and allowance of Cromwell, or his secretary Thurlow. And upon overtures of this kind, and wonderful confidence of success, even upon the preparations which were in readiness, of and by his own party, several messengers were sent to the king; and by all of them sharp and passionate complaints against those persons, who were so much and still in the same confidence with him, as men who were at ease, and uninclined to venture themselves upon dangerous or doubtful enterprises. They complained, "that "when they imparted to them or any one of them," (for they knew not of his majesty's reference to them, but had of themselves resorted to them as men of the greatest reputation for their affections and experience,) "a design which had been well "consulted and deliberated by those who meant "to venture their own lives in the execution of it, "they made so many excuses and arguments and "objections against it, as if it were wholly unadvisable and unpracticable; and when they proposed the meeting and conferring with some of "the officers, who were resolved to serve his majesty, and were willing to advise with them, as "men of more interest and who had managed "greater commands, upon the places of rendezvous, and what method should be observed in "the enterprises, making no scruple themselves "to receive orders from them, or to do all things "they should require which might advance his "majesty's service, these gentlemen only wished "them to take heed they were not destroyed, and "positively refused to meet or confer with any of "the officers of the army: and hereupon," they said, "all the king's party was so incensed against "them, that they no more would have recourse "to them, or make any conjunction with them." They informed his majesty at large of the animosity that was grown between two of the principal persons, and the original cause thereof, and therefore desired "that some person might be sent, to "whom they might repair for orders, until the "king himself discerned that all preparations were "in such a readiness, that he might reasonably "venture his royal person with them."

Though he was not at all satisfied with the grounds of their expectation and proceedings, and therefore could not blame the wariness and reservedness of the other, and thought their apprehension of being betrayed, (which in the language of that time was called trepanded,) which befell some men every day, very reasonable; yet the confidence of many honest men, who were sure to pay dear for any rash undertaking, and their presumption in appointing a peremptory day for a general rendezvous over the kingdom, but especially the division of his friends, and sharpness against those upon whom he principally relied, was the cause of his sending over the lord Rochester, and of his own concealment in Zealand; the success whereof, and the ill consequence of those precipitate resolutions, in the slaughter of many worthy and gallant gentlemen with all the circumstances of insolence and barbarity, are mentioned in their proper places.

But these unhappy and fatal miscarriages, and the sad spectacles which ensued, made not those impressions upon the affections and spirits of the king's friends as they ought to have done; nor rendered the wariness and discretion of those who had dissuaded the enterprise, and who were always imprisoned upon suspicion, how innocent soever, the more valued and esteemed: on the contrary, it increased the reproaches against the knot, as if their lâcheté and want of appearance and engaging had been the sole cause of the misfortune. And after some short fits of dejection and acquiescence, upon the shedding so much blood of their friends and confederates, and the notorious discovery of being betrayed by those, who had been trusted by them, of the army; they began again to resume courage, to meet and enter upon new counsels and designs, imputing the former want of success to the want of skill and conduct in the undertakers, not to the all-seeing vigilance of Cromwell and his instruments, or to the formed strength of his government, not to be shaken by weak or ill-seconded conspiracies. Young men were grown up, who inherited their fathers' malignity, and were too impatient to revenge their death, or to be even with their oppressors, and so entered into new combinations as unskilful, and therefore as unfortunate as the former; and being discovered even before they were formed, Cromwell had occasion given him to make himself more terrible in new executions, and to exercise greater tyranny upon the whole party, in imprisonments, penalties, and sequestrations; making those who heartily desired to be quiet, and who as much abhorred any rash and desperate insurrection, to pay their full shares for the folly of the other, as if all were animated by the same spirit. And this unjust and unreasonable rigour increased the reproaches and animosities in the king's friends against each other: the wiser and more sober part, who had most experience, and knew how impossible it was to succeed in such enterprises, and had yet preserved or redeemed enough of their fortunes to sit still and expect some hopeful revolution, were unexpressibly offended, and bitterly inveighed against those, who without reason disturbed their peace and quiet, by provoking the state to fresh persecutions of them who had given them no offence: and the other stirring and enraged party, with more fierceness and public disdain, protested against and reviled those who refused to join with them, as men who had spent all their stock of allegiance, and meant to acquiesce with what they had left under the tyranny and in the subjection of Cromwell. And thus they who did really wish the same things, and equally the overthrow of that government, which hindered the restoration of the king, grew into more implacable jealousies and virulencies against each other, than against that power that oppressed them both, and "poured out their blood like water." And either party conveyed their apologies and accusations to the king: one insisting upon the impertinency of all such attempts; and the other insisting that they were ready for a very solid and well-grounded enterprise, were sure to be possessed of good towns, if, by his majesty's positive command, the rest, who professed such obedience to him, would join with them.

It was at this time, and upon these reasons, that the king sent the marquis of Ormond into England, to find out and discover whether in truth there were any sober preparations and readiness for action, and then to head and conduct it; or if it was not ripe, to compose the several distempers, and unite, as far as was possible, all who wished well, to concur in the same patience for the present, and in the same activity when it should be seasonable. And he, upon full conference with the principal persons of the most contradictory judgments, quickly found that they who were accused to be lazy and unactive were in truth discreet men, and as ready vigorously to appear as the other, when the season should be advisable, which he clearly discerned it was not then; and that the presumption of the other, upon persons as well as places, was in no degree to be depended upon. And so, after he had done what was possible towards making a good intelligence between tempers and understandings so different, the marquis had the same good fortune to retire from thence and bring himself safe to the king; which was the more wonderful preservation, in that, during the whole time of his abode in London, he had trusted no man more, nor conferred with any man so much, as with that person of the select knot, who had been corrupted to give all intelligence to Cromwell: and as he had now blasted and diverted some ill laid designs, so he had discovered the marquis's arrival to him, but could not be prevailed with to inform him of his lodging, which was particularly known to him upon every change, or to contrive any way for his apprehension: on the contrary, as in all his conferences with him he appeared a man of great judgment and perspicacity, and the most ready to engage his person in any action that might be for his majesty's advantage, so he seemed bent to understand the temper of the time, and the parts, faculties, and interest of all the king's party; and left the marquis abundantly satisfied with him, and of the general good reputation he had with all men: which had afterwards an ill effect, for it kept the king and those who were trusted by him from giving credit to the first information he received, from a person who could not be deceived, of his tergiversation; his late fidelity to the marquis of Ormond weighing down with them all the intimations, until the evidence was so pregnant that there was no room for any doubt.

After all these endeavours by the king to discountenance and suppress all unreasonable action amongst his party, and to infuse into them a spirit of peace and quiet till he himself could appear in the head of some foreign forces, which he looked upon as the only reasonable encouragement that could animate his friends to declare for him, the generous distemper and impatience of their nature was incorrigible. They thought the expectation of miracles from God Almighty was too lazy and stupid a confidence, and that God no less required their endeavours and activity, than they hoped for his benediction in their success. New hopes were entertained, and counsels suitable entered upon.

Mr. Mordaunt, the younger son and brother to the earls of Peterborough, who was too young in the time of the late war to act any part in it, had lately undergone, after Cromwell himself had taken great pains in the examination of him, a severe trial before the high court of justice; where by his own singular address and behaviour, and his friends having wrought by money upon some of the witnesses to absent themselves, he was by one single voice acquitted; and after a longer detention in prison by the indignation of Cromwell, who well knew his guilt, and against the rules and forms of their own justice, he was discharged, after most of his associates were publicly and barbarously put to several kinds of death. And he no sooner found himself at liberty, than he engaged in new intrigues, how he might destroy that government that was so near destroying him. The state of the kingdom was indeed altered, and he had encouragement to hope well, which former undertakers, and himself in his, had been without. Cromwell had entered into a war with Spain; and the king was received and permitted to live in Flanders, with some exhibition from that king for his support, and assurance of an army to embark for England, (which made a great noise, and raised the broken hearts of his friends after so many distresses,) which his majesty was contented should be generally reputed to be greater and in more forwardness than there was cause for. He had likewise another advantage, much superior and of more importance than the other, by the death of Cromwell, which fell out without or beyond expectation, which seemed to put an end to all his stratagems, and to dissolve the whole frame of government in the three kingdoms, and to open many doors to the king to enter upon that which every body knew to be his own. And though this reasonable hope was, sooner than could be imagined, blasted and extinguished by an universal submission to the declaration that Cromwell had made at his death, "that his son Richard should succeed him;" upon which he was declared protector by the council, army, navy, with the concurrence of the forces of the three kingdoms, and the addresses of all the counties in England, with vows of their obedience; inasmuch as he appeared in the eyes of all men as formidably settled as his father had been: yet Mr. Mordaunt proceeded with alacrity in his design, contrary to the opinion and advice of those with whom he was obliged to consult, who thought the conjuncture as unfavourable as any that was past, and looked upon Mr. Mordaunt as a rash young man, of a daring spirit, without any experience in military affairs, and upon themselves as unkindly treated by those about the king, in being exposed to the importunity of a gentleman who was a stranger to them, and who was equally qualified with them for the forming any resolution which they could not concur in.

But the intermission of the severe persecution which had been formerly practised against the royal party, in this nonage of Richard's government, gave more liberty to communication; and the Presbyterian party grew more discontented and daring, and the Independent less concerned to prevent any inconvenience or trouble to the weak son of Oliver, whom they resolved not to obey. Mr. Mordaunt, who had gained much reputation by his steady carriage in his late mortification, and by his so brisk carriage so soon after, found credit with many persons of great fortune and interest; as sir George Booth and sir Thomas Middleton, the greatest men in Cheshire and North Wales, who were reputed Presbyterians, and had been both very active against the king, and now resolved to declare for him; sir Horatio Townsend, who was newly become of age, and the most powerful person in Norfolk, where there were many gallant men ready to follow him; and many others the most considerable men in most of the counties of England: who all agreed, in so many several counties of England, to appear upon a day, in such bodies as they could draw together; many considerable places being prepared for their reception, or too weak to oppose them. And Mr. Mordaunt secretly transported himself and waited upon the king at Brussels, with that wariness that he was known to none but to them with whom he was to consult. The king received by him a full information of the engagement of all those persons to do him service with the utmost hazard, and of the method they meant to proceed in, and the probability, most like assurance, of their being to be possessed of Gloucester, Chester, Lynne, Yarmouth, all Kent, and the most considerable places in the west, where indeed his own friends were very considerable.

Upon the whole matter the king thought it so reasonable to approve the whole design, that he appointed the day, with a promise to be himself, with his brother the duke of York, concealed at Calais or thereabout, that they might divide themselves to those parts which should be thought most proper for the work in hand. Mr. Mordaunt lamented the wariness and want of confidence in those persons upon whom the king depended, and acknowledged them most worthy of that trust, and of much reputation in the nation; and imputed their much reservation to the troubles and imprisonments which they had been seldom free from, and their observation how little ground there had been for former enterprises, without the least suspicion of want of affection and resolution in any one of them, and less of integrity. But the king was by this time fully convinced where the treachery was, without any blemish to any one of the rest, who needed not to be ashamed of being deceived by a man whom all the kingdom would have trusted. The ridiculous dethroning of Richard by the army, and the reassembling that part of the old parliament which was called the Rump, and which was more terrible than any single person could be, because they presently returned into their old track, and renewed their former rigour against their old more than their new enemies, rather advanced than restrained this combination; too much being known to too many to be secure any other way than by pursuing it. So the king and duke, according to their former resolution, went to Calais and Boulogne, and prepared as well to make a descent into Kent with such numbers of men as the condition they were in would permit. How many of those designs came to be wonderfully and even miraculously disappointed, and sir George Booth defeated by Lambert, are particularly set down by those who have taken upon them to mention the transactions of those times. And from thence the universality of all who were, or were suspected to be, of the king's party, were, according to custom, imprisoned, or otherwise cruelly entreated; and thereupon a new fire kindled amongst themselves: they who had done nothing reproaching them who had brought that storm upon them; and they who had been engaged more loudly and bitterly cursing the other, as deserters of the king, and the cause of the ruin of his cause through their want of courage, or, what was worse, of affection. And so all men's mouths were opened wider to accuse and defame each other, than to defend their own integrity and their lives.

I have thought myself obliged to renew the memory of all these particulars, that the several vicissitudes and stages may be known, by which the jealousies, murmurs, and disaffections in the royal party amongst themselves, and against each other, had mounted to that height which the king found them at when he returned; when in truth very few men of active minds, and upon whom he could depend in any sudden occasion that might probably press him, can be named, who had any confidence in each other. All men were full of bitter reflections upon the actions and behaviour of others, or of excuses and apologies for themselves for what they thought might be charged upon them. The woful vice of drinking, from the uneasiness of their fortune, or the necessity of frequent meetings together, for which taverns were the most secure places, had spread itself very far in that class of men, as well as upon other parts of the nation, in all counties; and had exceedingly weakened the parts, and broken the understandings of many, who had formerly competent judgments, and had been in all respects fit for any trust; and had prevented the growth of parts in many young men, who had good affections, but had been from their entering into the world so corrupted with that excess, and other license of the time, that they only made much noise, and, by their extravagant and scandalous debauches, brought many calumnies and disestimation upon that cause which they pretended to advance. They who had suffered much in their fortunes, and by frequent imprisonments and sequestrations and compositions, expected large recompenses and reparations in honours which they could not support, or offices which they could not discharge, or lands and money which the king had not to give; as all dispassioned men knew the conditions which the king was obliged to perform, and that the act of indemnity discharged all those forfeitures which could have been applied to their benefit: and therefore they who had been without comparison the greatest sufferers in their fortunes, and in all respects had merited most, never made any inconvenient suits to the king, but modestly left the memory and consideration of all they had done or undergone, to his majesty's own gracious reflections. They were observed to be most importunate, who had deserved least, and were least capable to perform any notable service; and none had more esteem of themselves, and believed preferment to be more due to them, than a sort of men, who had most loudly began the king's health in taverns, especially if for any disorders which had accompanied it other pretence of merit, or running any other they had suffered imprisonment, without any hazard.

Though it was very evident, humanly speaking, that the late combination entered into, and the brave attempt and engagement of sir George Booth, how unsuccessful soever in the instant, had contributed very much to the wonderful change that had since ensued, by the discovery of the general affections and disposition of the kingdom, and their aversion from any kind of government that was not founded upon the old principles; and the public or private engagement of very many persons, who had never been before suspected, whereof, though many of the most considerable persons had been, by the treachery heretofore mentioned, committed to several prisons, yet many others of equal interest remained still in liberty, and had a great influence upon the counsels both in the parliament and army: yet, I say, notwithstanding this was notorious, a greater animosity had been kindled in the royal party, and was still pursued and improved amongst them from that combination and engagement, than from all the other accidents and occasions, and gave the king more trouble and perplexity. It had introduced a great number of persons, who had formerly no pretence of merit from the king, rather might have been the objects of his justice, to a just title to the greatest favours the king could confer; and which, from that time, they had continually improved by repeated offices and services, which, being of a later date, might be thought to cloud and eclipse the lustre of those actions, which had before been performed by the more ancient cavaliers, especially of those who had been observed to be remiss in that occasion: and therefore they were the more solicitous in undervaluing the undertaking, and the persons of the undertakers, whom they mentioned under such characters, and to whom they imputed such weakness and levities as they had collected from the several parts of their lives, as might render them much disadvantage; and would by no means admit, "that any of the good that afterwards befell the king, resulted in any degree from that rash enterprise; but that thereby the king's friends were so weakened, and more completely undone, that they were disabled to appear in that conjuncture when the army was divided, and in which they might otherwise have been considerable enough to have given the law to all parties."

Mr. Mordaunt, whom the king had created a viscount before his return into England, and who had been most eminent in the other contrivances, in a time when a general consternation had seized upon the spirits of those who wished best to his majesty; for when he resumed his former resolutions, so soon after his head was raised from the block, and when the blood of his confederates watered so many streets in the city and the suburbs, the most trusted by the king had totally withdrawn their correspondence, and desired, that for some time no account or information might be expected from them; and therefore it must not be denied, that his vivacity, courage, and industry, revived the hearts which were so near broken before Cromwell's death, and afterwards prevailed with many to have more active spirits than they had before appeared to have: this gentleman, I say, most unjustly underwent the heaviest weight of all their censures and reproaches. He was the butt, at which all their arrows of envy, malice, and jealousy, were aimed and shot; he was the object and subject of all their scurrilous jests, and depraving discourses and relations; and they, who agreed in nothing else, were at unity and of one mind, in telling ridiculous stories to the king himself of his vanity and behaviour; and laying those aspersions upon him, as were most like to lessen the king's opinion of him; and to persuade him, that the recompenses he had already received were abundantly more than the services he had performed: which kind of insinuations from several persons, who seemed not to do it by concert, together with some prejudice the noble person did himself by some unseasonable importunities, as if he thought he had deserved very much, did for some time draw a more ungracious countenance from the king towards him, than his own nature disposed him to, or than the other's singular and useful activity, though liable to some levity or vanity, did deserve; and which the same persons, who procured it, made use of against those who were in most trust about the king, as arguments of the little esteem they had of those who had done the king most service, when a man of so eminent merit as Mr. Mordaunt was so totally neglected; and did all they could to infuse the same apprehensions into him. When the truth is, most men were affected, and more grieved and discontented for any honour and preferment which they saw conferred upon another man, than for being disappointed in their own particular expectations; and looked upon every obligation bestowed upon another man, how meritorious soever, as upon a reproach to them, and an upbraiding of their want of merit.

This unhappy temper and constitution of the royal party, with whom he had always intended to have made a firm conjunction against all accidents and occurrences which might happen at home or from abroad, did wonderfully displease and trouble the king; and, with the other perplexities, which are mentioned before, did so break his mind, and had that operation upon his spirits, that finding he could not propose any such method to himself, by which he might extricate himself out of those many difficulties and labyrinths in which he was involved, nor expedite those important matters which depended upon the goodwill and despatch of the parliament, which would proceed by its own rules, and with its accustomed formalities, he grew more disposed to leave all things to their natural course, and God's providence; and by degrees unbent his mind from the knotty and ungrateful part of his business, grew more remiss in his application to it, and indulged to his youth and appetite that license and satisfaction that it desired, and for which he had opportunity enough, and could not be without ministers abundant for any such negotiations; the time itself, and the young people thereof of either sex having been educated in all the liberty of vice, without reprehension or restraint. All relations were confounded by the several sects in religion, which discountenanced all forms of reverence and respect, as relics and marks of superstition. Children asked not blessing of their parents; nor did they concern themselves in the education of their children; but were well content that they should take any course to maintain themselves, that they might be free from that expense. The young women conversed without any circumspection or modesty, and frequently met at taverns and common eatinghouses; and they who were stricter and more severe in their comportment, became the wives of the seditious preachers, or of officers of the army. The daughters of noble and illustrious families bestowed themselves upon the divines of the time, or other low and unequal matches. Parents had no manner of authority over their children, nor children any obedience or submission to their parents; but "every one did that which was good in his own eyes." This unnatural antipathy had its first rise from the beginning of the rebellion, when the fathers and sons engaged themselves in the contrary parties, the one choosing to serve the king, and the other the parliament; which division and contradiction of affections was afterwards improved to mutual animosities and direct malice, by the help of the preachers and the several factions in religion, or by the absence of all religion: so that there were never such examples of impiety between such relations in any age of the world, Christian or heathen, as that wicked time, from the beginning of the rebellion to the king's return; of which the families of Hotham and Vane are sufficient instances; though other more illustrious houses may be named, where the same accursed fruit was too plentifully gathered, and too notorious to the world. The relation between masters and servants had been long since dissolved by the parliament, that their army might be increased by the prentices against their masters' consent, and that they might have intelligence of the secret meetings and transactions in those houses and families which were not devoted to them; from whence issued the foulest treacheries and perfidiousness that were ever practised: and the blood of the master was frequently the price of the servant's villany.

Cromwell had been most strict and severe in the forming the manners of his army, and in chastising all irregularities; insomuch that sure there was never any such body of men so without rapine, swearing, drinking, or any other debauchery, but the wickedness of their hearts: and all persons cherished by him, were of the same leaven, and to common appearance without the practice of any of those vices which were most infamous to the people, and which drew the public hatred upon those who were notoriously guilty of them. But then he was well pleased with the most scandalous lives of those who pretended to be for the king, and wished that all his were such, and took all the pains he could that they might be generally thought to be such; whereas in truth the greatest part of those who were guilty of those disorders were young men, who had never seen the king, and had been born and bred in those corrupt times, "when there was no king in Israel." He was equally delighted with the luxury and voluptuousness of the presbyterians, who, in contempt of the thrift, sordidness, and affected ill-breeding of the independents, thought it became them to live more generously, and were not strict in restraining or mortifying the unruly and inordinate appetite of flesh and blood, but indulged it with too much and too open scandal, from which he reaped no small advantage; and wished all those, who were not his friends, should not only be infected, but given over to the practice of the most odious vices and wickedness.

In a word, the nation was corrupted from that integrity, good nature, and generosity, that had been peculiar to it, and for which it had been signal and celebrated throughout the world; in the room whereof the vilest craft and dissembling had succeeded. The tenderness of the bowels, which is the quintessence of justice and compassion, the very mention of good nature was laughed at and looked upon as the mark and character of a fool; and a roughness of manners, or hardheartedness and cruelty was affected. In the place of generosity, a vile and sordid love of money was entertained as the truest wisdom, and any thing lawful that would contribute towards being rich. There was a total decay, or rather a final expiration of all friendship; and to dissuade a man from any thing he affected, or to reprove him for any thing he had done amiss, or to advise him to do any thing he had no mind to do, was thought an impertinence unworthy a wise man, and received with reproach and contempt. These dilapidations and ruins of the ancient candour and discipline were not taken enough to heart, and repaired with that early care and severity that they might have been; for they were not then incorrigible; but by the remissness of applying remedies to some, and the unweariness in giving a kind of countenance to others, too much of that poison insinuated itself into minds not well fortified against such infection: so that much of the malignity was transplanted, instead of being extinguished, to the corruption of many wholesome bodies, which, being corrupted, spread the diseases more powerfully and more mischievously.

That the king might be the more vacant to those thoughts and diversions which pleased him best, he appointed the chancellor and some others to have frequent consultations with such members of the parliament who were most able and willing to serve him; and to concert all the ways and means by which the transactions in the houses might be carried with the more expedition, and attended with the best success. These daily conferences proved very beneficial to his majesty's service; the members of both houses being very willing to receive advice and direction, and to pursue what they were directed; and all things were done there in good order, and succeeded well. All the courts of justice in Westminster hall were presently filled with grave and learned judges, who had either deserted their practice and profession during all the rebellious times, or had given full evidence of their affection to the king and the established laws, in many weighty instances: and they were then quickly sent in their several circuits, to administer justice to the people according to the old forms of law, which was universally received and submitted to with all possible joy and satisfaction. All commissions of the peace were renewed, and the names of those persons inserted therein, who had been most eminent sufferers for the king, and were known to have entire affections for his majesty and the laws; though it was not possible, but some would get and continue in, who were of more doubtful inclinations, by their not being known to him, whose province it was to depute them. Denied it cannot be, that there appeared, sooner than was thought possible, a general settlement in the civil justice of the kingdom; that no man complained without remedy, and "every man dwelt again "under the shadow of his own vine," without any complaint of injustice and oppression.

The king exposed himself with more condescension than was necessary to persons of all conditions, heard all that they had a mind to say to him, and gave them such answers as for the present seemed full of grace. He was too well pleased to hear both the men and the women of all factions and fancies in religion discourse in their own method, and enlarged himself in debate with them; which made every one believe that they were more favoured by him than they had cause: which kind of liberty, though at first it was accompanied with acclamations, and acknowledgment of his being a prince of rare parts and affability, yet it was attended afterwards with ill consequences, and gave many men opportunity to declare and publish, that the king had said many things to them which he had never said; and made many concessions and promises to them which he had never uttered or thought upon.

The chancellor was generally thought to have most credit with his master, and most power in the counsels, because the king referred all matters of what kind soever to him. And whosoever repaired to him for his direction in any business was sent to the chancellor, not only because he had a great confidence in his integrity, having been with him so many years, and of whose indefatigable industry he and all men had great experience; but because he saw those men, whom he was as willing to trust, and who had at least an equal share in his affections, more inclined to ease and pleasure, and willing that the weight of the work should lie on the chancellor's shoulders, with whom they had an entire friendship, and knew well that they should with more ease be consulted by him in all matters of importance. Nor was it possible for him, at the first coming, to avoid the being engaged in all the counsels, of how distinct a nature soever, because he had been best acquainted with all transactions whilst the king was abroad; and therefore communication with him in all things was thought necessary by those, who were to have any part in them. Besides that, he continued still chancellor of the exchequer, by virtue of the grant formerly made to him by the last king, during whose time he executed that office, but resolved to surrender it into the king's hand as soon as his majesty should resolve on whom to confer it; he proposing nothing to himself, but to be left at liberty to intend only the discharge of his own office, which he thought himself unequal to, and hoped only to improve his talent that way by a most diligent application, well knowing the great abilities of those, who had formerly sat in that office, and that they found it required their full time and all their faculties. And therefore he did most heartily desire to meddle with nothing but that province, which though in itself and the constant perquisites of it is not sufficient to support the dignity of it, yet was then, upon the king's return; and, after it had been so many years without a lawful officer, would unquestionably bring in money enough to be a foundation to a future fortune, competent to his ambition, and enough to provoke the envy of many, who believed they deserved better than he. And that this was the temper and resolution he brought with him into England, and how unwillingly he departed from it, will evidently appear by two or three instances, which shall be given in their proper place. However, he could not expect that freedom till the council should be settled, (into which the king admitted all who had been counsellors to his father, and had not eminently forfeited that promotion by their revolt, and many of those who had been and still were recommended by the general, amongst whom there were some who would not have been received upon any other title,) and until those officers could be settled, who might take particular care of their several provinces.

The king had upon great deliberation whilst he was beyond the seas, after his return appeared in view, firmly resolved to reform those excesses which were known to be in great offices, especially in those of his household, whilst the places were vacant, and to reform all extravagant expenses there; and first himself to gratify those, who had followed and served him, in settling them in such inferior offices and places, as custom had put in the disposal of the great officers, when they should become vacant after their admission. And of this kind he had made many promises, and given many warrants under his sign manual to persons, who to his own knowledge had merited those obligations. But most of those predeterminations, and many other resolutions of that kind, vanished and expired in the jollity of the return, and new inclinations and affections seemed to be more seasonable. The general, who was the sole pillar of the king's confidence, had by the parliament been invested (before the king's return) in all the offices and commands which Cromwell had enjoyed. He was lieutenant of Ireland, and general of all the armies and forces raised, or to be raised, in the three kingdoms; and it was not fit that he should be degraded from either upon his majesty's arrival: therefore all diligence was used in despatching grants of all those commands to him under the great seal of England. And that he might be obliged to be always near his majesty's person, he was presently sworn gentleman of the bedchamber; and might choose what office he liked best in the court, whilst titles of honour were preparing by the attorney, and particulars of lands inquired after by the auditors and receivers, which in all respects might raise him to that height which would most please him. He made choice to be master of the horse, and was immediately gratified with it; and thereby all those poor gentlemen, who had promises and warrants for several places, depending upon that great officer, were disappointed, and offered the king's sign manual to no purpose for their admission. The general in his own nature was an immoderate lover of money, and yet would have gratified some of the pretenders upon his majesty's recommendation, if the vile good housewifery of his wife had not engrossed that province, and preferred him, who offered most money, before all other considerations or motives. And hereby, not only many honest men, who had several ways served the king, and spent the fortunes they had been masters of, were denied the recompenses the king had designed to them; but such men, who had been most notorious in the malice against the crown from the beginning of the rebellion, or had been employed in all the active offices to affront and oppress his party, were for money preferred and admitted into those offices, and became the king's servants very much against his will, and with his manifest regret on the behalf of the honest men, who had been so unworthily rejected. And this occasioned the first murmur and discontent, which appeared after the king's return, amongst those who were not inclined to it, yet found every day fresh occasions to nourish and improve it.

The settling this great officer in the stables made it necessary to appoint a lord steward of the household, who was a necessary officer for the parliament, being by the statute appointed to swear all the members of the house of commons; and to this charge the marquis of Ormond had been long designed, and was then sworn. And they had both their tables erected according to the old models, and all those excesses, which the irregular precedents of former times had introduced, and which the king had so solemnly resolved to reform, before it could be said to trench upon the rights of particular persons. But the good humour the king was in, and the plenty which generally appeared, how much soever without a fund to support it, and especially the natural desire his majesty had to see every body pleased, banished all thoughts of such providence; instead whereof, he resolved forthwith to settle his house according to former rules, or rather without any rule, and to appoint the officers, who impatiently expected their promotion. He directed his own table to be more magnificently furnished than it had ever been in any time of his predecessors; which example was easily followed in all offices.

That he might give a lively instance of his grace to those who had been of the party which had been faulty, according to his declaration from Breda, he made of his own free inclination and choice the earl of Manchester (who was looked upon as one of the principal heads of the presbyterian party) lord chamberlain of his house; who, continuing still to perform all good offices to his old friends, complied very punctually with all the obligations and duties which his place required, never failed being at chapel, and at all the king's devotions with all imaginable decency; and, by his extraordinary civilities and behaviour towards all men, did not only appear the fittest person the king could have chosen for that office in that time, but rendered himself so acceptable to all degrees of men, that none, but such who were implacable towards all who had ever disserved the king, were sorry to see him so promoted. And it must be confessed, that as he had expressed much penitence for what he had done amiss, and was mortally hated and persecuted by Cromwell, even for his life, and had done many acts of merit towards the king; so he was of all men, who had ever borne arms against the king, both in the gentleness and justice of his nature, in the sweetness and evenness of his conversation, and in his real principles for monarchy, the most worthy to be received into the trust and confidence in which he was placed. With his, the two other white staves were disposed of to those, to whom they were designed, when the king was prince of Wales, by his father: and all other inferior officers were made, who were to take care of the expenses of the house, and were a great part of it.

And thus the king's house quickly appeared in its full lustre, the eating and drinking very grateful to all men, and the charge and expense of it much exceeding the precedents of the most luxurious times; and all this before there was any provision of ready money, or any assignation of a future fund to discharge or support it. All men were ready to deliver their goods upon trust, the officers too remiss in computing the disbursements; insomuch as the debts contracted by those excesses in less than the first year broke all the measures in that degree, that they could not suddenly be retrenched for the future; and the debt itself was not discharged in many years.

The king had in his purpose, long before his return, to make the earl of Southampton (who was the most valued and esteemed of all the nobility, and generally thought worthy of any honour or office) lord high treasurer of England; but he desired first to see some revenue settled by the parliament, and that part of the old, which had been sold and dispersed by extravagant grants and sales, reduced into the old channel, and regularly to be received and paid, and the customs to be put in such order, (which were not yet granted, and only continued by orders as illegal as the late times had been accustomed to, and to the authority whereof he had no mind to administer,) before he was willing to receive the staff. And so the office of the treasury was by commission executed by several lords of the council, whereof the chancellor, as well by the dignity of his place, as by his still being chancellor of the exchequer, was one; and so engaged in the putting the customs likewise into commissioners' hands, and settling all the other branches of the revenue in such manner as was thought most reasonable; in all debates whereof his majesty himself was still present, and approved the conclusion. But after a month or two spent in this method, in the crowd of so much business of several natures, the king found so little expedition, that he thought it best to determine that commission, and so gave the staff to the earl of Southampton, and made him treasurer. And the chancellor at the same time surrendering his office of chancellor of the exchequer into the king's hands, his majesty, upon the humble desire of the earl, conferred that office upon sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, who had married his niece, and whose parts well enough qualified him for the discharge thereof; though some other qualities of his, as well known, brought no advantage to his majesty by that promotion. And from this time the chancellor would never intermeddle in the business of the exchequer, nor admit any applications to him in it: however, the friendship was so great between the treasurer and him, and so notorious from an ancient date, and from a joint confidence in each other in the service of the last king, that neither of them concluded any matter of importance without consulting with the other. And so the treasurer, marquis of Ormond, the general, with the two secretaries of state, were of that secret committee with the chancellor; which, under the notion of foreign affairs, were appointed by the king to consult all his affairs before they came to a public debate; and in which there could not be a more united concurrence of judgments and affections.

Yet it was the chancellor's misfortune to be thought to have the greatest credit with the king, for the reasons mentioned before, and which for some time seemed to be without envy, by reason of his many years service of the crown, and constant fidelity to the same, and his long attendance upon the person of his majesty, and the friendship he had with the most eminent persons who had adhered to that interest. Yet he foresaw, and told many of his friends, "that the credit he was thought to have with the king, and which he knew was much less than it was thought to be, and his being obliged by the king to conduct many affairs, which were foreign to those which principally concerned and related to his office, would in a short time raise such a storm of envy and malice against him, that he should not be able to stand the shock." All men's impatience to get, and immodesty in asking, when the king had nothing to give, with his majesty's easiness of access, and that "imbecillitas frontis" which kept him from denying, together with rescuing himself from the most troublesome importunities by sending men to the chancellor, could not but in a short time make him be looked upon as the man that obstructed all their pretences; in which they were confirmed by his own carriage towards them, which, though they could not deny to be full of civility, yet he always dissuaded them from pursuing the suits they had made to the king, as unfit or unjust for his majesty to grant, how inclinable soever he had seemed to them. And so, instead of promising to assist them, he positively denied so much as to endeavour it, when the matter would not bear it; but where he could do courtesies, no man proceeded more cheerfully and more unasked, which very many of all conditions knew to be true; nor did he ever receive recompense or reward for any such offices. Of which temper of his there will be occasion to say more hereafter.

The first matter of general and public importance, and which resulted not from any debate in parliament, was the discovery of a great affection that the duke had for the chancellor's daughter, who was a maid of honour to the king's sister, the princess royal of Orange, and of a contract of marriage between them: with which nobody was so surprised and confounded as the chancellor himself, who being of a nature free from any jealousy, and very confident of an entire affection and obedience from all his children, and particularly from that daughter, whom he had always loved dearly, never had in the least degree suspected any such thing; though he knew afterwards, that the duke's affection and kindness had been much spoken of beyond the seas, but without the least suspicion in any body that it could ever tend to marriage. And therefore it was cherished and promoted in the duke by those, and only by those, who were declared enemies to the chancellor, and who hoped from thence, that some signal disgrace and dishonour would befall the chancellor and his family; in which they were the more reasonably confirmed by the manner of the duke's living towards him, which had never any thing of grace in it, but very much of disfavour, to which the lord Berkley, and most of his other servants to please the lord Berkley, had contributed all they could; and the queen's notorious prejudice to him had made it part of his duty to her majesty, which had been a very great discomfort to the chancellor, in his whole administration beyond the seas. But now, upon this discovery and the consequence thereof, he looked upon himself as a ruined person, and that the king's indignation ought to fall upon him as the contriver of that indignity to the crown, which as himself from his soul abhorred, and would have had the presumption of his daughter to be punished with the utmost severity, so he believed the whole kingdom would be inflamed to the punishment of it, and to prevent the dishonour which might result from it. And the least calamity that he expected upon himself and family, how innocent soever, was an everlasting banishment out of the kingdom, and to end his days in foreign parts in poverty and misery. All which undoubtedly must have come to pass upon that occasion, if the king had either had that indignation which had been just in him; or if he had withdrawn his grace and favour from him, and left him to be sacrificed by the envy and rage of others; though at this time he was not thought to have many enemies, nor indeed any who were friends to any other honest men. But the king's own knowledge of his innocence, and thereupon his gracious condescension and interposition diverting any rough proceeding, and so a contrary effect to what hath been mentioned having been produced from thence; the chancellor's greatness seemed to be thereby confirmed, his family established above the reach of common envy, and his fortune to be in a growing and prosperous condition not like to be shaken. And since after many years possession of this prosperity, an unexpected gust of displeasure took again its rise from this original, and overwhelmed him with variety and succession of misfortunes; it is very reasonable to relate from before this time all the passages and circumstances, which accompanied or attended that lady's first promotion in the service of the princess royal, in which the extreme averseness in her father and mother from embracing that opportunity, and the unusual grace and importunity from them who conferred the honour, being considered, there may appear to many an extraordinary operation of Providence, in giving the first rise to what afterwards succeeded, though of a nature so transcendent as cannot be thought to have any relation to it.

When the king resolved, immediately after the murder of his father, to send the chancellor his ambassador into Spain, the chancellor, being to begin his journey from the Hague, sent for his wife and children to meet him at Antwerp; and had at that time only four children, one daughter and three sons; all of so tender years, that their own discretions could contribute little to their education. These children, under the sole direction of a very discreet mother, he left at Antwerp, competently provided for, for the space of a year or more; hoping in that time to be able to send them some further supply; and having removed them out of England, to prevent any inconvenience that might befall them there, upon any accident that might result from his negotiation in Spain; it being in those times no unusual thing for the parliament, when it had conceived any notable displeasure against a man who was out of their reach, to seize upon his wife and children, and to imprison them in what manner and for what time seemed reasonable to them; and from this hazard he was willing to preserve his. The king was in Scotland when the chancellor returned from his embassy to Antwerp, where his family had still remained; his children being grown as much as usually attends the space of two years, which was the time he had been absent. The fatal success at Worcester about this time had put a period to all his majesty's present designs; and he had no sooner made his wonderful escape into France, than he sent for the chancellor; who left his family, as he had done formerly, and as meanly supplied, and made all haste to Paris, where he found the king; with whom he remained till his majesty was even compelled to remove from thence into Germany; which was above three years.

During that time the princess royal had, out of her own princely nature and inclination, cultivated by the civility and offices of the lady Stanhope, conferred a very seasonable obligation upon him, by assigning a house, that was in her disposal at Breda, to his wife and children; who had thereupon left Antwerp; and, without the payment of any house-rent, were more conveniently, because more frugally, settled in their new mansion at Breda; where he got liberty to visit them for four or five days, whilst the king continued his journey to the Spa, and after another absence of near four years; finding his children grown and improved after that rate. The gracious inclination in the princess royal towards the chancellor's wife and children, (not without some reprehension from Paris,) and the civilities in the lady Stanhope, had proceeded much from the good offices of Daniel O'Neile, of the king's bedchamber; who had for many years lived in very good correspondence with the chancellor, and was very acceptable in the court of the princess royal, and to those persons who had the greatest influence upon her councils and affections.

The princess met the king her brother at the Spa, rather for the mutual comfort they took in each other, than for the use either of them had of the waters; yet the princess engaged herself to that order and diet that the waters required; and after near a month's stay there, they were forced suddenly to remove from thence, by the sickness of some of the princess's women of the smallpox, and resided at Aix-la-Chapelle; where they had been but one whole day, when notice came from the Spa, that Mrs. Killigrew, one of the maids of honour to the princess, was dead of the smallpox.

O'Neile came in the instant to the chancellor with very much kindness, and told him, that if he desired the king to speak to his sister to receive his daughter into the place of Mrs. Killigrew, he was most confident she would do it very willingly, but that she expected the king should speak to her, because the queen had writ to bestow the place that should first fall vacant to another; and when he found him not inclined to move the king in it, saying, he would not be any occasion to increase the jealousies which were already between their majesties, nor to dispose the princess to displease her mother, he frankly offered to move the king without the other's appearing in it. Whereupon the chancellor thought it necessary to deal freely with him, and told him, that his daughter was the only company and comfort that her mother had, and who he knew could not part with her; and that for himself he was resolved, whilst the king's condition continued so low, he would not have his daughter in that gaiety, which was necessary for the court of so young a princess; and therefore he conjured him by all the friendship he had for him, since he saw to what resolution he was fixed, to use all his dexterity and address to divert the princess from the thought of a bounty that would prove so inconvenient to her, and to engage the lady Stanhope in the same office. O'Neile on the contrary used many arguments to him for his compliance with an opportunity that offered itself so much for [his] daughter's advantage, and which would probably, by the generosity of such a mistress, be attended with benefits and advantages which might absolve him from any further charges for her preferment. He remained not to be shaken, and the other desisted from his importunity. Shortly after, the king took notice of the vacant place in his sister's family, which he said he thought might in many respects be convenient for his daughter, and therefore offered to move his sister in it on her behalf. The chancellor, after he had acknowledged his majesty's goodness, with all humility besought him not to interpose his authority with his royal sister; made him a full relation of all that had passed between O'Neile and him, and of his resolution not to separate his daughter from his wife, and that one should not live in lustre, whilst the other must be necessitated to continue in so much security; and thereupon humbly entreated the king to refuse to interpose in that affair. The king told him with a very gracious freedom, that his sister had directly spoken to him to move in it, because of the letter she had received from the queen; that she herself had seen his daughter, and was so well pleased with her nature and her humour, which she had opportunity to observe a week together, that she had taken a resolution within herself, and communicated it to the lady Stanhope, that she would take her into her service when there should be opportunity; and therefore his majesty wished him to consider, whether he would not accept a benefit with all these circumstances; however advised him to wait upon his sister, and acknowledge so much grace, if he did not intend to make use of it. Though the chancellor was exceedingly perplexed with the knowledge of all these particulars, and understood to what misinterpretation and disadvantages this obstinacy might make him liable, yet he changed nothing of his resolution, and waited upon the princess with hope that he might convert her purely upon the inconvenience that might follow upon the conferring a grace, in that conjuncture, upon a family so inconsiderable to her service.

After he had attended the princess, and with all the expressions which his gratitude could suggest to him magnified the many favours he had received from her, and the gracious inclination he was informed she had now for his daughter; and he knew no better way (he told her) to return his most dutiful acknowledgments, than by taking care that she should undergo the least prejudice by her bounty to him, and therefore that he was resolved not to receive the honour she was inclined to bestow upon his daughter: that he had the misfortune to be ill understood by the queen her mother, who would be the more incensed against him, and offended with her highness, if the recommendation she had given on the behalf of another lady should be rejected on his behalf, and that in truth he was not able to maintain his daughter in such a condition as that relation did require; and concluded how inconvenient it would be to separate her from her mother, who would be desolate without her. Her royal highness, who heard him with great patience till he had alleged all the arguments why she should not persist in her gracious disposition, and why he could not receive the obligations, answered, "that she knew well the long and faithful service he had performed towards the king her father, and the confidence his majesty had in him at his death; that he had continued the same fidelity to the king her brother, who was very sensible of it, and that she was the more troubled, that her mother had entertained any prejudice towards him, which she was assured proceeded from some false information, which would shortly appear to be so; that for her own part, she had always paid all duty to her, and would be ready to gratify any worthy person who came recommended by her majesty, but that she would not exclude her own judgment, and be bound to have no servants about her person but such who should be recommended by her mother, who she could not believe could ever be offended with her for taking the daughter of a person who had been of so eminent fidelity to the crown: that for the maintenance of his daughter he should take no further care; she well enough knew his condition, and how it came to be such, and that she took the care of that upon herself: for what related to his wife's unwillingness to part with her daughter, her highness said, she was contented to refer it entirely to her; as soon as she came home she would send for her to Breda, and if her mother would not permit her to come to her, she had done her part, and would acquiesce." There remained nothing for the chancellor to reply, and he remained still confident that his wife (to whom he had written to confirm her in her former resolution of having her daughter still with her) would continue of the mind she had been of; but when she was informed of all that had passed, she concluded that all those unusual circumstances in an affair of that nature were not without some instinct of Providence; and so when the princess royal sent for her daughter, she went herself likewise, and presented her to her highness; to which possibly it was some motive, that there would then remain no objection against her own residence with her husband; and so she presently removed to him to Cologne, where the king then was, and remained for some years. Having now set down (not improperly I think) the true rise and story of his daughter's going into that court, with all the particulars which preceded it, I shall now return to that place from whence this digression led us, of the public discovery of the duke's affection, and shall continue the relation till an end was put to that great affair, by the consent and approbation of the royal family, and, for ought appeared to the contrary, to the general satisfaction of the kingdom.

The chancellor, as soon as the king was at Whitehall, had sent for his daughter, having a design presently to marry her; to which purpose he had an overture from a noble family, on the behalf of a well-bred hopeful young gentleman, who was the heir of it. His daughter quickly arrived at her father's house, to his great joy, having always had a great affection for her; and she being his eldest child, he had more acquaintance with her, than with any of his children; and being now of an age fit for marriage, he was well pleased that he had an opportunity to place her in such a condition, as with God's blessing was like to yield her much content. She had not been long in England, when the duke informed the king "of the affection and engagement that had been long between them; that they had been long contracted, and that she was with child;" and therefore with all imaginable importunity he begged his majesty's leave and permission upon his knees, "that he might publicly marry her, in such a manner as his majesty thought necessary for the consequence thereof." The king was much troubled with it, and more with his brother's passion, which was expressed in a very wonderful manner and with many tears, protesting, "that if his majesty should not give his consent, he would immediately leave the kingdom, and must spend his life in foreign parts." His majesty was very much perplexed to resolve what to do: he knew the chancellor so well, that he concluded that he was not privy to it, nor would ever approve it; and yet that it might draw much prejudice upon him, by the jealousy of those who were not well acquainted with his nature. He presently sent for the marquis of Ormond and the earl of Southampton, who he well knew were his bosom friends, and informed them at large, and of all particulars which had passed from the duke to him, and commanded them presently to see for the chancellor to come to his own chamber at Whitehall, where they would meet him upon a business of great importance, which the king had commended to them for their joint advice. They no sooner met, than the marquis of Ormond told the chancellor, "that he had a matter to inform him of, that he doubted would give him much trouble;" and therefore advised him to compose himself to hear it: and then told him, "that the duke of York had owned a great affection for his daughter to the king, and that he much doubted that she was with child by the duke, and that the king required the advice of them and of him what he was to do."

The manner of the chancellor's receiving this advertisement made it evident enough that he was struck with it to the heart, and had never had the least jealousy or apprehension of it. He broke out into a very immoderate passion against the wickedness of his daughter, and said with all imaginable earnestness, "that as soon as he came home he would turn her out of his house, as a strumpet, to shift for herself, and would never see her again." They told him, "that his passion was too violent to administer good counsel to him, that they thought that the duke was married to his daughter, and that there were other measures to be taken than those which the disorder he was in had suggested to him." Whereupon he fell into new commotions, and said, "if that were true, he was well prepared to advise what was to be done: that he had much rather his daughter should be the duke's whore than his wife: in the former case nobody could blame him for the resolution he had taken, for he was not obliged to keep a whore for the greatest prince alive; and the indignity to himself he would submit to the good pleasure of God. But if there were any reason to suspect the other, he was ready to give a positive judgment, in which he hoped their lordships would concur with him; that the king should immediately cause the woman to be sent to the Tower, and to be cast into a dungeon, under so strict a guard, that no person living should be admitted to come to her; and then that an act of parliament should be immediately passed for the cutting off her head, to which he would not only give his consent, but would very willingly be the first man that should propose it:" and whoever knew the man, will believe that he said all this very heartily.

In this point of time the king entered the room, and sat down at the table; and perceiving by his countenance the agony the chancellor was in, and his swollen eyes from whence a flood of tears were fallen, he asked the other lords, "what they had done, and whether they had resolved on any thing." The earl of Southampton said, "his majesty must consult with soberer men; that he" (pointing to the chancellor) "was mad, and had proposed such extravagant things, that he was no more to be consulted with." Whereupon his majesty, looking upon him with a wonderful benignity, said, "Chancellor, I knew this business would trouble you, and therefore I appointed your two friends to confer first with you upon it, before I would speak with you myself: but you must now lay aside all passion that disturbs you, and consider that this business will not do itself; that it will quickly take air; and therefore it is fit that I first resolve what to do, before other men uncalled presume to give their counsel: tell me therefore what you would have me do, and I will follow your advice." Then his majesty enlarged upon the passion of his brother, and the expressions he had often used, "that he was not capable of having any other wife, and the like." Upon which the chancellor arose, and with a little composedness said, "Sir, I hope I need make no apology to you for myself, and of my own in this matter; upon which I look with so much detestation, that though I could have wished that your brother had not thought it fit to have put this disgrace upon me, I had much rather submit and bear it with all humility, than that it should be repaired by making her his wife; the thought whereof I do so much abominate, that I had much rather see her dead, with all the infamy that is due to her presumption." And then he repeated all that he had before said to the lords, of sending her presently to the Tower, and the rest; and concluded, "Sir, I do upon all my oaths which I have taken to you to give you faithful counsels, and from all the sincere gratitude I stand obliged to you for so many obligations, renew this counsel to you; and do beseech you to pursue it, as the only expedient that can free you from the evils that this business will otherwise bring upon you." And observing by the king's countenance, that he was not pleased with his advice, he continued and said, "I am the dullest creature alive, if, having been with your majesty so many years, I do not know your infirmities better than other men. You are of too easy and gentle a nature to contend with those rough affronts, which the iniquity and license of the late times is like to put upon you, before it be subdued and reformed. The presumption all kind of men have upon your temper is too noto“rious to all men, and lamented by all who wish you well : and, trust me, an example of the highest severity in a case that so nearly concerns you, and that relates to the person who is nearest to you, will be so seasonable, that your reign, during the remaining part of your life, will be the easier to you, and all men will take heed how they impudently offend you.”

He had scarce done speaking, when the duke of York came in ; whereupon the king spake of some other business, and shortly after went out of the room with his brother, whom (as was shortly known) he informed of all that the chancellor had said, who, as soon as he came to his house, sent his wife to command his daughter to keep her chamber, and not to admit any visits ; whereas before she had always been at dinner and supper, and had much company resorting to her : which was all that he thought fit to do upon the first assault, and till he had slept upon it, (which he did very unquietly,) and reflected upon what was like to be the effect of so extravagant a cause. And this was quickly known to the duke, who was exceedingly offended at it, and complained to the king, “as of an indignity offered to him.” And the next morning the king chid the chancellor for proceeding with so much precipitation, and required him “to take off that restraint, and to leave her to the liberty she had been accustomed to.” To which he replied, “that her having not discharged the duty of a daughter ought not to deprive him of the authority of a father ; and therefore he must humbly beg his majesty not to interpose his commands against his doing any thing that his own dignity required : that he only expected what his majesty would do upon the advice he had humbly offered to him, and when he saw that, he would himself proceed as he was sure would become him :” nor did he take off any of the restraint he had imposed. Yet he discovered after, that even in that time the duke had found ways to come to her, and to stay whole nights with her, by the administration of those who were not suspected by him, and who had the excuse, “that they knew that they were married.”

This subject was quickly the matter of all men’s discourse, and did not produce those murmurs and discontented reflections which were expected. The parliament was sitting, and took not the least notice of it ; nor could it be discerned that many were scandalized at it. The chancellor received the same respects from all men which he had been accustomed to : and the duke himself, in the house of peers, frequently sat by him upon the wool sack, that he might the more easily confer with him upon the matters which were debated, and receive his advice how to behave himself ; which made all men believe that there had been a good understanding between them. And yet it is very true, that, in all that time, the duke never spake one word to him of that affair. The king spake every day about it, and told the chancellor, “that he must behave himself wisely, for that the thing was remediless ; and that his majesty knew that they were married, which would quickly appear to all men, who knew that nothing could be done upon it.” In this time the chancellor had conferred with his daughter, without any thing of indulgence, and not only discovered that they were unquestionably married, but by whom, and who were present at it, who would be ready to avow it ; which pleased him not, though it diverted him from using some of that rigour which he intended. And he saw no other remedy could be applied, but that which he had proposed to the king, who thought of nothing like it.

At this time there was news of the princess royal’s embarkation in Holland, which obliged the king and the duke of York to make a journey to Dover to receive her, who came for no other reason, but to congratulate with the king her brother, and to have her share in the public joy. The morning that they began their journey, the king and the duke came to the chancellor’s house ; and the king, after he had spoken to him of some business that was to be done in his absence, going out of the room, the duke stayed behind, and whispered the chancellor in the ear, because there were others at a little distance, “that he knew that he had heard of the business between him and his daughter, and of which he confessed he ought to have spoken with him before ; but that when he returned from Dover, he would give him full satisfaction : in the mean time,” he desired him, “not to be offended with his daughter.” To which the chancellor made no other answer, than “that it was a matter too great for him to speak of.”

When the princess royal came to the town, there grew to be a great silence in that affair. The duke said nothing to the chancellor, nor came nor sent to his daughter, as he had constantly used to do : and it was industriously published about the town, that that business was broken off, and that the duke was resolved never to think more of it. The queen had before written a very sharp letter to the duke, full of indignation, that he should have so low thoughts as to marry such a woman ; to whom he shewed the letter, as not moved by it. And now she sent the king word, “that she was on the way to England, to prevent, with her authority, so great a stain and dishonour to the crown ;” and used many threats and passionate expressions upon the subject. The chancellor sat unconcerned in all the rumours which were spread, “that the queen was coming with a purpose to complain to the parliament against the chancellor, and to apply the highest remedies to prevent so great a mischief.”

In the mean time it was reported abroad, that the duke had discovered some disloyalty in the lady, which he had never suspected, but had now so full evidence of it, that he was resolved never more to see her ; and that he was not married. And all his family, whereof the lord Berkley and his nephew were the chief, who had long hated the chancellor, spake very loudly and scandalously of it. The king carried himself with extraordinary grace towards the chancellor, and was with him more, and spake upon all occasions and before all persons more graciously of him, than ever. He told him with much trouble, “that his brother was abused ; and that there was a wicked conspiracy set on foot by villains, which, in the end, must prove of more dishonour to the duke than to any body else.”

The queen was now ready to embark, inflamed and hastened by this occasion ; and it was fit for the king and the duke to wait on her at the shore. But before his majesty’s going, he resolved of himself to do a grace to the chancellor, that should publish how far he was from being shaken in his favour towards him, and to do it with such circumstances as gave it great lustre. From the time of his coming into England, he had often offered the chancellor to make him a baron, and told him, "that he was assured by many of the lords, that it was most necessary for his service in the parliament. But he had still refused it, and besought his majesty not to think of it; that it would increase the envy against him if he should confer that honour upon him so soon; but that hereafter, when his majesty's affairs should be settled, and he, out of the extraordinary perquisites of his office, should be able to make some addition to his small fortune, he would, with that humility that became him, receive that honour from him." The king, in few days after, coming to him, and being alone with him in his cabinet, at going away gave him a little billet into his hand, that contained a warrant of his own handwriting to sir Stephen Fox, to pay to the chancellor the sum of twenty thousand pounds; which was part of the money which the parliament had presented to the king at the Hague, and for which he had been compelled to take bills of exchange again from Amsterdam upon London; which was only known to the king, the chancellor, and sir Stephen Fox, who was intrusted to receive it, as he had done all the king's monies for many years beyond the seas. This bounty flowing immediately from the king at such a melancholic conjuncture, and of which nobody could have notice, could not but much raise the spirits of the chancellor. Nor did the king's goodness rest here; but the night before he began his journey towards the queen, he sent for the attorney general, whom he knew to be most devoted to the chancellor, and told him, "that he must intrust him in an affair that he must not impart to the chancellor;" and then gave him a warrant signed for the creation of him a baron, which he commanded "to be ready to pass the seal against the hour of his majesty's return, and he would then see it sealed himself; but if the chancellor came first to know it, he would use great importunity to stop it." The attorney said, "it would be impossible to conceal it from him, because, without his privacy and direction, he knew not what title to give him for his barony." The king replied with warmth, "that he should confer with some of his friends of the way; but that he would take it ill of him, if there were any delay in it, and if it were not ready for the seal at the time of his return, which would be in few days." The attorney came to the chancellor and told him, "he would break a trust to do him a service; and therefore he presumed, that he would not be so unjust to let him suffer by it;" and then told him all that had passed between the king and him. And the chancellor confessed, "that the king's manner of proceeding was so obliging, and the conjuncture in which this honour was given," though he had before refused it with obstinacy, "made it now very grateful to him;" and so without hesitation he told him what title he would assume. And all was ready against the king's return, and signed by him, and sealed the same night.

The queen had expressed her indignation to the king and duke, with her natural passion, from the time of their meeting; and the duke had asked her pardon "for having placed his affection so unequally, of which he was sure there was now an end; that he was not married, and had now such evidence of her unworthiness, that he should no more think of her." And it was now avowedly said, that sir Charles Berkley, who was captain of his guard, and in much more credit and favour with the duke than his uncle, (though a young man of a dissolute life, and prone to all wickedness in the judgment of all sober men,) had informed the duke, "that he was bound in conscience to preserve him from taking to wife a woman so wholly unworthy of him; that he himself had lain with her; and that for his sake he would be content to marry her, though he knew well the familiarity the duke had with her." This evidence, with so solemn oaths presented by a person so much loved and trusted by him, made a wonderful impression in the duke; and now confirmed by the commands of his mother, as he had been before prevailed upon by his sister, he resolved to deny that he was married, and never to see the woman again, who had been so false to him. And the queen being satisfied with this resolution, they came all to London, with a full hope that they should prevail to the utter overthrow of the chancellor; the king having, without any reply or debate, heard all they said of the other affair, and his mother's bitterness against him. But when, the very next morning after their arrival at London, they saw the chancellor (who had not seen the king) appear in the parliament in the robes of a peer; they thought it to no purpose to prosecute their design against him, whom his majesty was resolved to protect from any unjust persecution. But the other resolution was pursued with noise and much defamation.

The next day after the queen's arrival, all the privy council in a body waited upon the queen to congratulate her return into England; and the chancellor was obliged to go in the head of them, and was received with the same countenance that the rest were, which was very cheerful, and with many gracious expressions. And from this time he put not himself in her majesty's presence, nor appeared at all concerned at the scandalous discourses against his daughter. The earl of St. Alban's, and all who were near the queen in any trust, and the lord Berkley and his faction about the duke, lived in defiance of the chancellor; and so imprudently, that they did him no harm, but underwent the reproach of most sober men. The king continued his grace towards him without the least diminution, and not only to him, but to many others who were trusted by him; which made it evident that he believed nothing of what sir Charles Berkley avowed, and looked on him as a fellow of great wickedness: which opinion the king was long known to have of him before his coming into England, and after.

In the mean time, the season of his daughter's delivery was at hand. And it was the king's chance to be at his house with the committee of council, when she fell in labour: of which being advertised by her father, the king directed him "to send for the lady marchioness of Ormond, the countess of Sunderland, and other ladies of known honour and fidelity to the crown, to be present with her;" who all came, and were present till she was delivered of a son. The bishop of Winchester, in the interval of her greatest pangs, and sometimes when they were upon her, was present, and asked her such questions as were thought fit for the occasion; "whose the child was of which she was in labour," whom she averred, with all protestations, to be the duke's; "whether she had ever known any other man;" which she renounced with all vehemence, saying, "that she was confident the duke did not think she had;" and being asked "whether she were married to the duke," she answered, "she was, and that there were witnesses enough, who in due time, she was confident, would avow it." In a word, her behaviour was such as abundantly satisfied the ladies who were present, of her innocence from the reproach; and they were not reserved in the declaration of it, even before the persons who were least pleased with their testimony. And the lady marchioness of Ormond took an opportunity to declare it fully to the duke himself, and perceived in him such a kind of tenderness, that persuaded her that he did not believe any thing amiss. And the king enough published his opinion and judgment of the scandal.

The chancellor's own carriage, that is, his doing nothing, nor saying any thing from whence they might take advantage, exceedingly vexed them. Yet they undertook to know, and informed the duke confidently, "that the chancellor had a great party in the parliament;" and that "he was resolved within few days to complain there, and to produce the witnesses, who were present at the marriage, to be examined, that their testimony might remain there; which would be a great affront to him;" with many other particulars, which might incense his highness. Whereupon the duke, who had been observed never to have spoken to him in the house of peers, or any where else, since the time of his going to meet his sister, finding the chancellor one day in the privy lodgings, whispered him in the ear, "that he would be glad to confer with him in his lodging," whither he was then going. The other immediately followed; and being come thither, the duke sent all his servants out of distance; and then told him with much warmth, "what he had been informed of his purpose to complain to the parliament against him, which he did not value or care for: however, if he should prosecute any such course, it should be the worse for him;" implying some threats, "what he would do before he would bear such an affront;" adding then, "that for his daughter, she had behaved herself so foully, (of which he had such evidence as was as convincing as his own eyes, and of which he could make no doubt,) that nobody could blame him for his behaviour towards her;" concluding with some other threats, "that he should repent it, if he pursued his intention of appealing to the parliament."

As soon as the duke discontinued his discourse, the chancellor told him, "that he hoped he would discover the untruth of other reports which had been made to him by the falsehood of this, which had been raised without the least ground or shadow of truth. That though he did not pretend to much wisdom, yet no man took him to be such a fool, as he must be, if he intended to do such an act as he was informed. That if his highness had done any thing towards or against him, which he ought not to have done,

"there was one who is as much above him, as his highness was above him, and who could both censure and punish it. For his own part, he knew too well whose son he was, and whose brother he is, to behave himself towards him with less duty and submission than was due to him, and should be always paid by him." He said, "he was not concerned to vindicate his daughter from any the most improbable scandals and aspersions: she had disobliged and deceived him too much, for him to be over-confident that she might not deceive any other man: and therefore he would leave that likewise to God Almighty, upon whose blessing he would always depend, whilst himself remained innocent, and no longer." The duke replied not, nor from that time mentioned the chancellor with any displeasure; and related to the king, and some other persons, the discourse that had passed, very exactly.

There did not after all this appear, in the discourses of men, any of that humour and indignation which was expected. On the contrary, men of the greatest name and reputation spake of the foulness of the proceeding with great freedom, and with all the detestation imaginable against sir Charles Berkley, whose testimony nobody believed; not without some censure of the chancellor, for not enough appearing and prosecuting the indignity: but he was not to be moved by any instances, which he never afterwards repented. The queen's implacable displeasure continued in the full height, doing all she could to keep the duke firm to his resolution, and to give all countenance to the calumny. As before the discovery of this engagement of the duke's affection, the duke of Gloucester had died of the smallpox, to the extraordinary grief of the king and the whole kingdom; so at this time it pleased God to visit the princess royal with the same disease, and of which she died within few days; having in her last agonies expressed a dislike of the proceedings in that affair, to which she had contributed too much. The duke himself grew melancholic and dispirited, and cared not for company, nor those diversions in which he formerly delighted: which was observed by every body, and which in the end wrought so far upon the conscience of the lewd informer, that he, sir Charles Berkley, came to the duke, and clearly declared to him, "that the general discourse of men, of what inconvenience and mischief, if not absolute ruin, such a marriage would be to his royal highness, had prevailed with him to use all the power he had to dissuade him from it; and when he found he could not prevail with him, he had formed that accusation, which he presumed could not but produce the effect he wished; which he now confessed to be false, and without the least ground; and that he was very confident of her virtue:" and therefore besought his highness "to pardon a fault, that was committed out of pure devotion to him; and that he would not suffer him to be ruined by the power of those, whom he had so unworthily provoked; and of which he had so much shame, that he had not confidence to look upon them." The duke found himself so much relieved in that part that most afflicted him, that he embraced him, and made a solemn promise, "that he should not suffer in the least degree in his own affec"tion, for what had proceeded so absolutely from his good-will to him; and that he would take so much care of him, that in the compounding that affair he should be so comprehended, that he should receive no disadvantage."

And now the duke appeared with another countenance, writ to her whom he had injured, "that he would speedily visit her," and gave her charge "to have a care of his son." He gave the king a full account of all, without concealing his joy; and took most pleasure in conferring with them, who had seemed least of his mind when he had been most transported, and who had always argued against the probability of the testimony which had wrought upon him. The queen was not pleased with this change, though the duke did not yet own to her that he had altered his resolution. She was always very angry at the king's coldness, who had been so far from that aversion which she expected, that he found excuses for the duke, and endeavoured to divert her passions; and now pressed the discovery of the truth by sir Charles Berkley's confession, as a thing that pleased him. They about her, and who had most inflamed and provoked her to the sharpest resentment, appeared more calm in their discourses, and either kept silence, or spake to another tune than they had done formerly, and wished that the business was well composed; all which mightily increased the queen's passion. And having come to know that the duke had made a visit at the place she most abhorred, she brake into great passion, and publicly declared, "that whenever that woman should be brought into Whitehall by one door, her majesty would go out of it by another door, and never come into it again." And for several days her majesty would not suffer the duke to be in her presence; at least, if he came with the king, she forbore to speak to him, or to take any notice of him. Nor could they, who had used to have most credit with her, speak to her with any acceptance; though they were all weary of the distances they had kept, and discerned well enough where the matter must end. And many desired to find some expedient, how the work might be facilitated, by some application and address from the chancellor to the queen: but he absolutely refused to make the least advance towards it, or to contribute to her indignation by putting himself into her majesty's presence. He declared, "that the queen had great reason for the passion she expressed for the indignity that had been done to her, and which he would never endeavour to excuse; and that as far as his low quality was capable of receiving an injury from so great a prince, he had himself to complain of a transgression that exceeded the limits of all justice, divine and human."

The queen had made this journey out of France into England much sooner than she intended, and only, upon this occasion, to prevent a mischief she had great reason to deprecate. And so, upon her arrival, she had declared, "that she would stay a very short time, being obliged to return into France for her health, and to use the waters of Bourbon, which had already done her much good, that the ensuing season would with God's blessing make perfect." And the time was now come, that orders were sent for the ships to attend her embarkation at Portsmouth; and the day was appointed for the beginning her journey from Whitehall: so that the duke's affair, which he now took to heart, was (as every body thought) to be left in the state it was, at least under the renunciation and interdiction of a mother. When on a sudden, of which nobody then knew the reason, her majesty's countenance and discourse was changed; she treated the duke with her usual kindness, and confessed to him, "that the business that had offended her so much, she perceived was proceeded so far, that no remedy could be applied to it; and therefore that she would trouble herself no further in it, but pray to God to bless him, and that he might be happy:" so that the duke had now nothing to wish, but that the queen would be reconciled to his wife, who remained still at her father's, where the king had visited her often; to which the queen was not averse, and spake graciously of the chancellor, and said, "she would be good friends with him." But both these required some formalities; and they who had behaved themselves the most disobligingly, expected to be comprehended in any atonement that should be made. And it was exceedingly laboured, that the chancellor would make the first approach, by visiting the earl of St. Alban's; which he absolutely refused to do: and very well acquainted with the arts of that court, whereof dissimulation was the soul, did not believe that those changes, for which he saw no reasonable motive, could be real, until abbot Mountague (who had so far complied with the faction of that court as not to converse with an enemy) visited him with all openness, and told him, "that this change in the queen had proceeded from a letter she had newly received from the cardinal, in which he had plainly told her, that she would not receive a good welcome in France, if she left her sons in her displeasure, and professed an animosity against those ministers who were most trusted by the king. He extolled the services done by the chancellor, and advised her to comply with what could not be avoided, and to be perfectly reconciled to her children, and to those who were nearly related to them, or were intrusted by them: and that he did this in so powerful a style, and with such powerful reasons, that her majesty's passions were totally subdued. And this," he said, "was the reason of the sudden change that every body had observed; and therefore that he ought to believe the sincerity of it, and to perform that part which might be expected from him, in compliance with the queen's inclinations to have a good intelligence with him."

The chancellor had never looked upon the abbot as his enemy, and gave credit to all he said, though he did little understand from what fountain that good-will of the cardinal had proceeded, who had never been propitious to him. He made all those professions of duty to the queen that became him, and "how happy he should think himself in her protection, which he had need of, and did with all humility implore; and that he would gladly cast himself at her majesty's feet, when she would vouchsafe to admit it." But for the adjusting this, there was to be more formality; for it was necessary that the earl of St. Alban's (between whom and the chancellor there had never been any friendship) should have some part in this composition, and do many good offices towards it, which were to precede the final conclusion. The duke had brought sir Charles Berkley to the duchess, at whose feet he had cast himself, with all the acknowledgment and penitence he could express; and she, according to the command of the duke, accepted his submission, and promised to forget the offence. He came likewise to the chancellor with those professions which he could easily make; and the other was obliged to receive him civilly. And then his uncle, the lord Berkley, waited upon the duchess; and afterwards visited her father, like a man (which he could not avoid) who had done very much towards the bringing so difficult a matter to so good an end, and expected thanks from all; having that talent in some perfection, that after he had crossed and puzzled any business, as much as was in his power, he would be thought the only man who had untied all knots, and made the way smooth, and removed all obstructions.

The satisfaction the king and the duke had in this disposition of the queen was visible to all men. And they both thought the chancellor too reserved in contributing his part towards, or in meeting, the queen's favour, which he could not but discern was approaching towards him; and that he did not entertain any discourses, which had been by many entered upon to him upon that subject, with that cheerfulness and serenity of mind that might justly be expected. And of this the duke made an observation, and a kind of complaint, to the king, who thereupon came one day to the chancellor's house; and being alone with him, his majesty told him many particulars which had passed between him and the queen, and the good humour her majesty was in; "that the next day the earl of St. Alban's would visit him, and offer him his service in accompanying him to the queen; which he conjured him to receive with all civility, and expressions of the joy he took in it; in which," he told him, "he was observed to be too sullen, and that when all other men's minds appeared to be cheerful, his alone appeared to be more cloudy than it had been, when that affair seemed most desperate; which was the more taken notice of, because it was not natural to him."

The chancellor answered, "that he did not know that he had failed in any thing, that in good manners or decency could be required from him: but he confessed, that lately his thoughts were more perplexed and troublesome to himself, than they had ever been before; and therefore it was no wonder, if his looks were not the same they had used to be. That though he had been surprised to amazement, upon the first notice of that business, yet he had been shortly able to recollect himself; and, upon the testimony of his own conscience, to compose his mind and spirits, and without any reluctance to abandon any thought of his daughter, and to leave her to that misery she had deserved and brought upon herself. Nor did the vicissitudes which occurred after in that transaction, or the displeasure and menaces of the duke, make any other impression upon him, than to know how unable he was to enter into any contest in that matter, (which in all respects was too difficult and superior to his understanding and faculties,) and to leave it entirely to the direction and disposal of God Almighty: and in this

"acquiescence he had enjoyed a repose with much tranquillity of mind, being prepared to undergo any misfortune that might befall him from thence. But that now he was awakened by other thoughts and reflections, which he could less range and govern. He saw those difficulties removed, which he had thought insuperable; that his own condition must be thought exalted above what he thought possible; and that he was far less able to bear the envy, that was unavoidable, than the indignation and contempt, that alone had threatened him. That his daughter was now received in the royal family, the wife of the king's only brother, and the heir apparent of the crown, whilst his majesty himself remained unmarried. The great trust his majesty reposed in him, infinitely above and contrary to his desire, was in itself liable to envy; and how insupportable that envy must be, upon this new relation, he could not but foresee; together with the jealousies which artificial men would be able to insinuate into his majesty, even when they seemed to have all possible confidence in the integrity of the chancellor, and when they extolled him most; and that how firm and constant soever his majesty's grace and favour was to him at present, (of which he had lately given such lively testimony,) and how resolved soever he was to continue it, his majesty himself could not know how far some jealousies, cunningly suggested by some men, might by degrees be entertained by him. And therefore that, upon all the revolvings he had with himself, he could not think of any thing that could contribute equally to his majesty's service, and his quiet, and to the happiness and security of himself, as for him to retire from the active station he was in, to an absolute solitude, and visible inactivity in all matters relating to the state: and which he thought could not be so well, under any retirement into the country, or any part of the kingdom, as by his leaving the kingdom, and fixing himself in some place beyond the seas remote from any court." And having said all this, or words to the same effect, he fell on his knees; and with all possible earnestness desired the king, that he would consent to his retirement, as a thing most necessary for his service, and give his pass, to go and reside in any such place beyond the seas as his majesty would make choice of."

The king heard him patiently, yet with evidence enough that he was not pleased with what he said; and when he kneeled, took him up with some passion; "He did not expect this from him, and that he had so little kindness for him, as to leave him in a time, when he could not but know that he was very necessary for his service. That he had reason to be very well assured, that it could never be in any man's power to lessen his kindness towards him, or confidence in him; and if any should presume to attempt it, they would find cause to repent their presumption." He said, "there were many reasons, why he could never have designed or advised his brother to this marriage; yet since it was past, and all things so well reconciled, he would not deny that he was glad of it, and promised himself much benefit from it." He told him, "his daughter was a woman of a great wit and excel"lent parts, and would have a great power with his brother; and that he knew that she had an entire obedience for him, her father, who he knew would always give her good counsel; by which," he said, "he was confident, that naughty people, which had too much credit with his brother, and which had so often misled him, would be no more able to corrupt him; but that she would prevent all ill and unreasonable attempts: and therefore he again confessed that he was glad of it;" and so concluded with many gracious expressions; and conjured the chancellor, never more to think of those unreasonable things, but to attend and prosecute his business with his usual alacrity, since his kindness could never fail him."

The next morning, which was of the last day that the queen was to stay, the earl of St. Alban's visited the chancellor with all those compliments, professions, and protestations, which were natural, and which he did really believe every body else thought to be very sincere; for he had that kindness for himself, that he thought every body did believe him. He expressed "a wonderful joy, that the queen would now leave the court united, and all the king's affairs in a very hopeful condition, in which the queen confessed that the chancellor's counsels had been very prosperous, and that she was resolved to part with great and a sincere kindness towards him; and that he had authority from her to assure him so much, which she would do herself when she saw him:" and so offered "to go with him to her majesty, at such an hour in the afternoon as she should appoint." The other made such returns to all the particulars as were fit, and "that he would be ready to attend the queen at the time she should please to assign:" and in the afternoon the earl of St. Alban's came again to him; and they went together to Whitehall, where they found the queen in her bedchamber, where many ladies were present, who came then to take their leave of her majesty, before she begun her journey.

The duke of York had before presented his wife to his mother, who received her without the least show of regret, or rather with the same grace as if she had liked it from the beginning, and made her sit down by her. When the chancellor came in, the queen rose from her chair, and received him with a countenance very serene. The ladies, and others who were near, withdrawing, her majesty told him, "that he could not wonder, much less take it ill, that she had been much offended with the duke, and had no inclination to give her consent to his marriage; and if she had, in the passion that could not be condemned in her, spake any thing of him that he had taken ill, he ought to impute it to the provocation she had received, though not from him. She was now informed by the king, and well assured, that he had no hand in contriving that friendship, but was offended with that passion that really was worthy of him. That she could not but confess, that his fidelity to the king her husband was very eminent, and that he had served the king her son with equal fidelity and extraordinary success. And therefore, as she had received his daughter as her daughter, and heartily forgave the duke and her, and was resolved ever after to live with all the affection of a mother towards them; so she

"resolved to make a friendship with him, and hereafter to expect all the offices from him, which her kindness should deserve." And when the chancellor had made all those acknowledgments which he ought to do, and commended her wisdom and indignation in a business, "in which she could not shew too much anger and aversion, and had too much forgotten her own honour and dignity, if she had been less offended;" and magnified her mercy and generosity, "in departing so soon from her necessary severity, and pardoning a crime in itself so unpardonable;" he made those professions of duty to her which were due to her, and "that he should always depend upon her protection as his most gracious mistress, and pay all obedience to her commands." The queen appeared well pleased, and said "she should remain very confident of his affection," and so discoursed of some particulars; and then opening a paper that she had in her hand, she recommended the despatch of some things to him, which immediately related to her own service and interest, and then some persons, who had either some suits to the king, or some controversies depending in chancery. And the evening drawing on, and very many ladies and others waiting without to kiss her majesty's hand, he thought it time to take his leave; and after having repeated some short professions of his duty, he kissed her majesty's hand: and from that time there did never appear any want of kindness in the queen towards him, whilst he stood in no need of it, nor until it might have done him good.

Thus an intrigue, that without doubt had been entered into and industriously contrived by those who designed to affront and bring dishonour upon the chancellor and his family, was, by God's good pleasure, turned to their shame and reproach, and to the increase of the chancellor's greatness and prosperity. And so we return to the time from whence this digression led us, and shall take a particular view of all those accidents, which had an influence upon the quiet of the kingdom, or which were the cause of all the chancellor's misfortunes; which, though the effect of them did not appear in many years, were discerned by himself as coming and unavoidable, and foretold by him to his two bosom-friends, the marquis of Ormond and the earl of Southampton, who constantly adhered to him with all the integrity of true friendship.

The greatness and power of the chancellor, by this marriage of his daughter, with all the circumstances which had accompanied and attended it, seemed to all men to have established his fortune, and that of his family; I say, to all men but to himself, who was not in the least degree exalted with it. He knew well upon how slippery ground he stood, and how naturally averse the nation was from approving an exorbitant power in any subject. He saw that the king grew every day more inclined to his pleasures, which involved him in expense, and company that did not desire that he should intend his business, or be conversant with sober men. He knew well that the servants who were about the duke were as much his enemies as ever, and intended their own profit only, by what means soever, without considering his honour; that they formed his household, officers, and equipage, by the model of France, and against all the rules and precedents of England for a brother of the crown; and every day put into his head, "that if he were not supplied for all those expenses, it was the chancellor's fault, who could effect it if he would." Nor was he able to prevent those infusions, nor the effects of them, because they were so artificially administered, as if their end was to raise a confidence in him of the chancellor, not to weaken it; though he knew well that their design was to create by degrees in him a jealousy of his power and credit with the king, as if it eclipsed his. But this was only in their own dark purposes, which had been all blasted, if they had been apparent; for the duke did not only profess a very great affection for the chancellor, but gave all the demonstration of it that was possible, and desired nothing more, than that it should be manifest to all men, that he had an entire trust from the king in all his affairs, and that he would employ all his interest to support that trust: whilst the chancellor himself declined all the occasions, which were offered for the advancement of his fortune, and desired wholly to be left to the discharge of his office, and that all other officers might diligently look to their own provinces, and be accountable for them; and detested nothing more than that title and appellation, which he saw he should not always be able to avoid, of principal minister or favourite, and which was never cast on him by any designation of the king, (who abhorred to be thought to be governed by any single person,) but by his preferring his pleasures before his business, and so sending all men to the chancellor to receive advice. And hereby the secretaries of state, not finding a present access to him, when the occasions pressed, resorted to the chancellor, with whom his majesty spent most time, to be resolved by him; which method exceedingly grieved him, and to which he endeavoured to apply a remedy, by putting all things in their proper channel, and by prevailing with the king, when he should be a little satiated with the diversions he affected, to be vacant to so much of his business, as could not be managed and conducted by any body else.

And here it may be seasonable to insert at large some instances, which I promised before, and by which it will be manifest, how far the chancellor was from an immoderate appetite to be rich, and to raise his fortune, which he proposed only to do by the perquisites of his office, which were considerable at the first, and by such bounty of the king as might hereafter, without noise or scandal, be conferred on him in proper seasons and occurrences; and [that he was] as far from affecting such an unlimited power as he was believed afterwards to be possessed of, (and of which no footsteps could ever be discovered in any of his actions, or in any one particular that was the effect of such power,) or that he did desire any other extent of power than was agreeable to the great office he held, and which had been enjoyed by most of those who had been his predecessors in that trust.

The king had not been many weeks in England, when the marquis of Ormond came to him with his usual friendship, and asked him, "Whether it would not be now time to think of making a fortune, that he might be able to leave to his wife and children, if he should "die?" And when he found that he was less sensible of what he proposed than he expected, and that he only answered, "that he knew not which way to go about it," the marquis told him, "that he thought he could commend a proper suit for him to make to the king; and if his modesty would not permit him to move the king for himself, he would undertake to move it for him, and was confident that the king would willingly grant it:" and thereupon shewed him a paper, which contained the king's just title to ten thousand acres of land in the Great Level of the Fens, which would be of a good yearly value; or they, who were unjustly possessed of it, would be glad to purchase the king's title with a very considerable sum of money. And, in the end, he frankly told him, "that he made this overture to him with the king's approbation, who had been moved in it, and thought at the first sight, out of his own goodness, that it might be fit for him, and wished the marquis to propose it to him."

When the chancellor had extolled the king's generosity, that he could, in so great necessities of his own, think of dispensing so great a bounty upon a poor servant, who was already recompensed beyond what he could be ever able to deserve, he said, "that he knew very well the king's title to that land, of which he was in possession before the rebellion began, which the old and new adventurers now claimed by a new contract, confirmed by an ordinance of parliament, which could not deprive the crown of its right; which all the adventurers (who for the greatest part were worthy men) well knew, and would for their own sakes not dispute, since it would inevitably produce a new inundation, which all their unity and consent in maintaining the banks would and could with difficulty enough but prevent. That he would advise his majesty to give all the countenance he could to the carrying on and perfecting that great work, which was of great benefit as well as honour to the public, at the charge of private gentlemen, who had paid dear for the land they had recovered; but that he would never advise him to begin his reign with the alienation of such a parcel of land from the crown to any one particular subject, who could never bear the envy of it. That his majesty ought to reserve that revenue to himself, which was great, though less than it was generally reputed to be; at least till the value thereof should be clearly understood, (and the detaining it in his own hands for some time would be the best expedient towards the finishing all the banks, when the season should be fit, which else would be neglected by the discord among the adventurers,) and the king knew what he gave. He must remember, that he had two brothers," (for the duke of Gloucester was yet alive,) "who were without any revenue, and towards whom his bounty was to be first extended; and that this land would be a good ingredient towards an appanage for them both. And that till they were reasonably provided for, no private man in his wits would be the object of any extraordinary bounty from the king, which would unavoidably make him the object of an universal envy and hatred. That, for his own part, he held by the king's favour the greatest office of the kingdom in "place; and though it was not near the value it was esteemed to be, and that many other offices were more profitable, yet it was enough for him, and would be a good foundation to improve his fortune: so that," he said, "he had made a resolution to himself, which he thought he should not alter, not to make haste to be rich. That it was the principal part or obligation of his office, to dissuade the king from making any grants of such a nature, (except where the necessity or convenience was very notorious,) and even to stop those which should be made of that kind, and not to suffer them to pass the seal, till he had again waited upon the king, and informed him of the evil consequence of those grants; which discharge of his duty could not but raise him many enemies, who should not have that advantage, to say that he obstructed the king's bounty towards other men, when he made it very profuse towards himself. And therefore, that he would never receive any crown lands from the king's gift, and did not wish to have any other honour or any advantage, but what his office brought him, till seven years should pass; in which all the distractions of the kingdom might be composed, and the necessities thereof so provided for, that the king might be able, without hurting himself, to exercise some liberality towards his servants who had served him well." How he seemed to part from this resolution in some particulars afterwards, and why he did so, may be collected out of what hath been truly set down before.

When the marquis of Ormond had given the king a large account of the conference between him and the chancellor, and "that he absolutely refused to receive that grant;" his majesty said, "he was a fool for his labour, and that he would be much better in being envied than in being pitied." And though the inheritance of those lands was afterwards given to the duke, yet there were such estates granted for years to many particular persons, most whereof had never merited by any service, that half the value thereof never came to his highness.

As soon as the king and duke returned from Portsmouth, where they had seen the queen embarked for France, the king had appointed a chapter, for the electing some knights of the garter into the places vacant. Upon which the duke desired him to "nominate the chancellor," which his majesty said "he would willingly do, but he knew not whether it would be grateful to him; for he had refused so many things, that he knew not what he would take;" and therefore wished him "to take a boat to Worcester house, and propose it to him, and he would not go to the chapter till his highness returned." The duke told the chancellor what had passed between the king and him, and "that he was come only to know his mind, and could not imagine but that such an honour would please him." The chancellor, after a million of humble acknowledgments of the duke's grace and of the king's condescension, said, "that the honour was indeed too great by much for him to sustain; that there were very many worthy men, who well remembered him of their own condition, when he first entered into his father's service, and believed that he was advanced too "much before them." He besought his highness, "that his favours and protection might not expose him to envy, that would break him to pieces." He asked "what knights the king meant to make;" the duke named them, all persons very eminent: the chancellor said, "no man could except against the king's choice; many would justly, if he were added to the number." He desired his highness "to put the king in mind of the earl of Lindsey, lord high chamberlain of England," (with whom he was known to have no friendship; on the contrary, that there had been disgusts between them in the last king's time;) "that his father had lost his life with the garter about his neck, when this gentleman, his son, endeavouring to relieve him, was taken prisoner; that he had served the king to the end of the war with courage and fidelity, being an excellent officer: for all which, the king his father had admitted him a gentleman of his bedchamber, which office he was now without: and not to have the garter now, upon his majesty's return, would in all men's eyes look like a degradation, and an instance of his majesty's disesteem; especially if the chancellor should supply the place, who was not thought his friend;" and, upon the whole matter, entreated the duke "to reserve his favour towards him for some other occasion, and excuse him to the king for the declining this honour, which he could not support." The duke replied, with an offended countenance, "that he saw he would not accept any honour from the king, that proceeded by his mediation;" and so left him in apparent displeasure. However, at that chapter the earl of Lindsey was created knight of the garter, with the rest; and coming afterwards to hear by what chance it was, he ever lived with great civility towards the chancellor to his death.

And when the chancellor afterwards complained to his majesty "of his want of care of him, in his so easily gratifying his brother in a particular that would be of so much prejudice to him," and so enlarged upon the subject, and put his majesty in mind of Solomon's interrogation, "Who can stand against envy?" the king said no more, than "that he did really believe, when he sent his brother, that he would refuse it;" and added, "I tell you, chancellor, that you are too strict and apprehensive in those things; and trust me, it is better to be envied than pitied." The duke did not dissemble his resentment, and told his wife, "that he took it very ill; that he desired that the world might take notice of his friendship to her father, and that, after former unkindness, he was heartily reconciled to him; but that her father cared not to have that believed, nor would have it believed that his interest in the king was not enough, to have no need of good offices from the duke:" which discourse he used likewise to the marquis of Ormond and others, who he thought would inform the chancellor of it. And the duchess was much troubled at it, and took it unkindly of her father, who thought himself obliged to wait upon his royal highness, and to vindicate himself from that folly he was charged with; in which he protested to him, "that he so absolutely and entirely depended upon his protection, that he would never receive any favour

"from the king, but by his mediation and interposition:" to which the duke answered, "that he should see whether he would have that deference to him shortly."

And it was not long before the day for the coronation was appointed, when the king had appointed to make some barons, and to raise some who were barons to higher degrees of honour; most of whom were men not very grateful, because they had been faulty, though they had afterwards redeemed what was past, by having performed very signal services to his majesty, and were able to do him more: upon which the king had resolved to confer those honours upon them, and in truth had promised it to them, or to some of their friends, before he came from beyond the seas. At this time the duke came to the chancellor, and said, "he should now discover whether he would be as good as his word;" and so gave him a paper, which was a warrant under the king's sign manual to the attorney general, to prepare a grant, by which the chancellor should be created an earl. To which, upon the reading, he began to make objections; when the duke said, "My lord, I have thought fit to give you this earnest of my friendship; you may reject it, if you think fit;" and departed. And the chancellor, upon recollection, and conference with his two friends, the treasurer and the marquis of Ormond, found he could not prudently refuse it. And so, the day or two before the coronation, he was with the others created an earl by the king in the banqueting-house; and, in the very minute of his creation, had an earnest of the envy that would ensue, in the murmurs of some, who were ancienter barons, at the precedence given to him before them, of which he was totally ignorant, it being resolved by the king upon the place, and the view of the precedents of all times, when any officers of state were created with others. Yet one of the lords concerned swore in the ears of two or three of his friends, at the same time, "that he would be revenged for that affront;" which related not to the chancellor's precedence, for the other was no baron, but for the precedence given to another, whom he thought his inferior, and imputed the partiality to his power, who had not the least hand in it, nor knew it before it was determined. Yet the other was as good as his word, and took the very first opportunity that was offered for his revenge.

I will add one instance more, sufficient, if the other were away, to convince all men how far he was from being transported with that ambition, of which he was accused, and for which he was condemned. After the firm conjunction in the royal family was notorious, and all the neighbour princes had sent their splendid embassies of congratulation to the king, and desired to renew all treaties with this crown, and the parliament proceeded, how slowly soever, with great duty and reverence towards the king; the marquis of Ormond (whom the king had by this time made duke of Ormond) came one day to him, and, being in private, said, "he came to speak to him of himself, and to let him know, not only his own opinion, but the opinion of his best friends, with whom he had often conferred upon the argument; and that they all wondered, that he so much affected the post he was in, as to continue in the office of chancellor, which took up most of his time, especially all the mornings, in business that many other men could discharge as well as he. Whereas he ought to leave that to such a man as he thought fit for it, and to betake himself to that province, which nobody knew so well how to discharge. That the credit he had with the king was known to all men, and that he did in truth remit that province to him, which he would not own, and could not discharge, by the multiplicity of the business of his office, which was not of that moment. That the king every day took less care of his affairs, and affected those pleasures most, which made him averse from the other. That he spent most of his time with confident young men, who abhorred all discourse that was serious, and, in the liberty they assumed in drollery and raillery, preserved no reverence towards God or man, but laughed at all sober men, and even at religion itself; and that the custom of this license, that did yet only make the king merry for the present, yet by degrees would grow acceptable to him; and that these men would by degrees have the presumption (which yet they had not, nor would he in truth then suffer it) to enter into his business, and by administering to those excesses, to which his nature and constitution most inclined him, would not only powerfully foment those inclinations, but intermeddle and obstruct his most weighty counsels. That, for the prevention of all this mischief, and the preserving the excellent nature and understanding of the king from being corrupted by such lewd instruments, who had only a scurrilous kind of wit to procure laughter, but had no sense of religion, or reverence for the laws; there was no remedy in view, but his giving up his office, and betaking himself wholly to wait upon the person of the king, and to be with him in those seasons, when that loose people would either abstain from coming, or, if they were present, would not have the confidence to say or do those things which they had been accustomed to do before the king. By this means, he would find frequent opportunities to inform the king of the true state of his affairs, and the danger he incurred, by not thoroughly understanding them, and by being thought to be negligent in the duties of religion, and settling the distractions in the church; at least, he would do some good in all these particulars, or keep the license from spreading further, which in time it would do, to the robbing him of the hearts of his people. That the king, from the long knowledge of his fidelity, and the esteem he had of his virtue, received any advertisements and animadversions, and even suffered reprehensions, from him, better than from any other man; therefore he would be able to do much good, and to deserve more than ever he had done from the whole kingdom. And he did verily [believe], that this would be acceptable to the king himself, who knew he could not enough [attend to] the many things, which, being left undone, must much disorder the whole machine of his government, or, being ill done, would in time dissolve it; and that his majesty would assign such a liberal allowance for this service, that he should find himself well rewarded, and "a great gainer by accepting it and putting off his office."

He concluded, "that was the desire and advice of all his friends; and that the duke was so far of the same judgment, that he resolved to be very instant with him upon it, and only wished that he should first break the matter to him, that he might not be surprised when his royal highness entered upon the discourse." And he added, "that this province must inevitably at last be committed to some one man, who probably would be without that affection to the king's person, that experience in affairs, and that knowledge of the laws and constitution of the kingdom, as all men knew to be in the chancellor."

When the marquis had ended, with the warmth of friendship which was superior to any temptation, and in which no man ever excelled him, nor delivered what he had a mind to say more clearly, or with a greater weight of words; the chancellor said, "that he did not much wonder that many of his friends, who had not the opportunity to know him enough, and who might propose to themselves some benefit from his unlimited greatness, might in truth, out of their partiality to him, and by their not knowing the king's nature, believe, that his wariness and integrity, and his knowledge of the constitution of the government and the nature of the people, would conduct the king's counsels in such a way, as would lead best to his power and greatness, and to the good and happiness of the nation, which would be the only secure support of his power and authority. But that he, who knew both the king and him so well, that no man living knew either of them so well, should be of that opinion he had expressed, was matter of admiration and surprisal to him." He appealed to him, "how often he had heard him say to the king in France, Germany, and Flanders, when they two took all the pains they could to fix the king's mind to a lively sense of his condition; that he must not think now to recover his three kingdoms by the dead title of his descent and right, which had been so notoriously baffled and dishonoured, but by the reputation of his virtue, courage, piety, and industry; that all these virtues must centre in himself, for that his fate depended upon his person; and that the English nation would sooner submit to the government of Cromwell, than to any other subject who should be thought to govern the king. That England would not bear a favourite, nor any one man, who should out of his ambition engross to himself the disposal of the public affairs."

He said, "he was more now of the same mind, and was confident that no honest man, of a competent understanding, would undertake that province; and that for his own part, if a gallows were erected, and if he had only the choice to be hanged or to execute that office, he would rather submit to the first than the last. In the one, he should end his life with the reputation of an honest man; in the other, he should die with disgrace and infamy, let his innocence be what it would." He put the marquis in mind, how far the king was from observing the rules he had prescribed to himself, before he came from beyond the seas; and was so totally un-bent from his business, and addicted to pleasures, that the people generally began to take notice of it; that there was little care taken to regulate expenses, even when he was absolutely without supply; that he would on a sudden be overwhelmed with such debts, as would disquiet him, and dishonour his counsels;" of which the lord treasurer was so sensible, that he was already weary of his staff, before it had been in his hands three months. "That the confidence the king had in him, besides the assurance he had of his integrity and industry, proceeded more from his aversion to be troubled with the intricacies of his affairs, than from any violence of affection, which was not so fixed in his nature as to be like to transport him to any one person: and that as he could not, in so short a time, be acquainted with many men, whom in his judgment he could prefer before the chancellor for the managery of his business, who had been so long acquainted with it; so he would, in a short time, be acquainted with many, who would, by finding fault with all that was done, be thought much wiser men; it being one of his majesty's greatest infirmities, that he was apt to think too well of men at the first or second sight."

He said, "whilst he kept the office he had, (which could better bear the envy of the bulk of the affairs, than any other qualification could,) and that it supported him in the execution of it, the king felt not the burden of it; because little of the profit of it proceeded out of his own purse, and, if he were dead to-morrow, the place still must be conferred upon another. Whereas, if he gave over that administration, and had nothing to rely upon for the support of himself and family, but an extraordinary pension out of the exchequer, under no other title or pretence but of being first minister, (a title so newly translated out of French into English, that it was not enough understood to be liked, and every man would detest it for the burden it was attended with,) the king himself, who was not by nature immoderately inclined to give, would be quickly weary of so chargeable an officer, and be very willing to be freed from the reproach of being governed by any, (the very suspicion whereof he doth exceedingly abhor,) at the price and charge of the man, who had been raised by him to that inconvenient height above other men. That whilst he had that seal, he could have admission to his majesty as often as he desired, because it was more ease to receive an account of his business from him, than to be present at the whole debate of it; and he well knew, the chancellor had too much business to desire audiences from his majesty without necessary reason. But if the office were in another hand, and he should haunt his presence with the same importunity as a spy upon his pleasures, and a disturber of the jollities of his meetings; his majesty would quickly be nauseated with his company, which for the present he liked in some seasons; and they, who for the present had submitted to some constraint by the gravity of his countenance, would quickly discover that their talents were more acceptable, and by degrees make him appear grievous to his majesty, and soon after ridiculous. That all his hope was, that the

"king would shortly find some lady fit to be his wife, which all honest men ought to persuade him to, and that being married, he made no doubt he would decline many of those delights to which he was yet exposed, and which exposed him too much; and till that time he could not think that his best servants could enjoy any pleasant lives. That he presumed the parliament would, after they had raised money enough to disband the armies, and to pay off the seamen," (towards both which somewhat was every day done, and both which amounted to an incredible and insupportable charge,) settle such a revenue upon the crown, as the king might conform his expense to; and that it should not be in any body's power to make that revenue be esteemed by him to be greater, than in truth it would be. That when these two things should be brought to pass, he did hope, that the king would take pleasure in making himself master of every part of his business, and not charge any one man with a greater share of it than he can discharge, or than will agree with his own dignity and honour. In the mean time," he besought the marquis, "that he would convert the duke of York and all other persons from that opinion, which could not but appear erroneous to himself, by the reasons he had heard; and that if he could be brought to consent to what had been proposed to him, (and which rather than he would do, he would suffer a thousand deaths,) as it would inevitably prove his own ruin and destruction, so it would bring an irreparable damage to the king." And therefore he conjured him "to invite the king by his own example, and by assuming his own share of the work," which for some time he had declined since the return into England; and by being himself constantly with his majesty, to whom he was acceptable at all hours, he would obstruct the operation of that ill company, which neither knew how to behave themselves, nor could reasonably propose so much benefit to themselves, as by the propagation of their follies and villanies, and by degrees induce his majesty more proportionably to mingle his business with his pleasures, which he could not yet totally abandon."

The marquis could not deny, but that many of the reasons alleged by the chancellor were of that weight as ought to prevail with him; and therefore forbore ever after to press him upon the same particular. And the duke of York shortly undertook a conference with him upon the same argument, upon which the other durst not enlarge with the same freedom as he had done to the marquis; both because his eyes could not bear the prospect of so many things at once, as likewise that he knew he communicated with some persons, who, whatever they pretended, had nothing like good affection for him: so that he rather pacified his royal highness upon that subject, and diverted him from urging it, than satisfied him with his grounds. And others who wished well to him, and better to the public, acquiesced with his peremptory resolution, without believing that he resolved well either for his own particular, or the king's affairs; and did always think that he might have prevented his own fate, if he had at that time submitted to the judgment of his best friends; though himself remained so positive to the contrary, that he often said, "that he would not have redeemed himself by that expedient; and that he could never have borne that fate with that tranquillity of mind, which God enabled him to do, if he had passed to it through that province."

Whilst the general affairs of England, by the long debates in parliament, remained thus unsettled, the king was no less troubled and perplexed how to compose his two other kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland; from both which there were several persons of the best condition of either kingdom sent, with the tender and presentation of their allegiance to his majesty, and expected his immediate direction to free them from the distractions they were in; and by taking the government upon himself, into his own hands, to be freed from those extraordinary commissions, under which they had been both governed with a rod of iron by the late powers; the shifting of which from one faction to another had administered no kind of variety to them, but they had remained still under the same full extent of tyranny.

The whole frame of the ancient government of Scotland had been so entirely confounded by Cromwell, and new modelled by the laws and customs of England, that is, those laws and customs which the commonwealth had established; that he had hardly left footsteps by which the old might be traced out again. The power of the nobility was so totally suppressed and extinguished, that their persons found no more respect or distinction from the common people, than the acceptance they found from Cromwell, and the credit he gave them by some particular trust, drew to them. Their beloved presbytery was become a term of reproach, and ridiculous; the pride and activity of their preachers subdued, and reduced to the lowest contempt; and the standard of their [religion] remitted to the sole order and direction of their commander in chief. All criminal cases (except where the general thought it more expedient to proceed by martial law) were tried and punished before judges sent from England, and by the laws of England; and matters of civil interest before itinerant judges, who went twice a year in circuits through the kingdom, and determined all matters of right by the rules and customs which were observed in England. They had liberty to send a particular number, that was assigned to them, to sit in the parliament of England, and to vote there with all liberty; which they had done. And in recompense thereof, all such monies were levied in Scotland, as were given by the parliament of England, by which such contributions were raised, as were proportionable to the expense, which the army and garrisons which subdued them put the kingdom of England to. Nor was there any other authority to raise money in Scotland, but what was derived from the parliament or general of England.

And all this prodigious mutation and transformation had been submitted to with the same resignation and obedience, as if the same had been transmitted by an uninterrupted succession from king Fergus: and it might well be a question, whether the generality of the nation was not better contented with it, than to return into the old road of subjection. But the king would not build according to Cromwell's models, and had many reasons to continue Scotland within its own limits and bounds, and sole dependance upon himself, rather than unite it to England, with so many hazards and dangers as would inevitably have accompanied it, under any government less tyrannical than that of Cromwell. And the resettling that kingdom was to be done with much less difficulty, than the other of Ireland, by reason that all who appeared concerned in it or for it, as a committee for that kingdom, were united between themselves, and did, or did pretend to desire the same things. They all appeared under the protection and recommendation of the general; and their dependance was the more upon him, because he still commanded those garrisons and forces in Scotland, which kept them to their obedience. And he was the more willing to give them a testimony of their affection to the king, and that without their help he could not have been able to have marched into England against Lambert, that they might speak the more confidently, "that they gave him that assistance, because they were well assured that his intention was to serve the king:" whereas they did indeed give him only what they could not keep from him, nor did they know any of his intentions, or himself at that time intend any thing for the king. But it is very true, they were all either men who had merited best from the king, or had suffered most for him, or at least had acted least against him, and (which they looked upon as the most valuable qualification) they were all, or pretended to be, the most implacable enemies to the marquis of Argyle; which was the "shibboleth" by which the affections of that whole nation were best distinguished.

The chief of the commissioners was the lord Selkirk, a younger son of the marquis of Douglass, who had been known to the king in France, where he had been bred a Roman catholic, which was the religion of his family, but had returned into Scotland after it had been subdued by Cromwell; and being a very handsome young man, was easily converted from the religion of his father, in which he had been bred, to that of his elder brother the earl of Angus, that he might marry the daughter and heir of James duke Hamilton, who from the battle of Worcester, where her uncle duke William was killed, had inherited the title of duchess, with the fair seat of Hamilton, and all the lands which belonged to her father. And her husband now, according to the custom of Scotland, assumed the same title with her, and appeared in the head of the commissioners under the style of duke Hamilton, with the merit of having never disserved the king, and with the advantage of whatsoever his wife could claim by the death of her father, which deserved to wipe out the memory of whatever had been done amiss in his life.

The earl of Glencarne was another of the commissioners, a man very well born and bred, and of very good parts. As he had rendered himself very acceptable to the king, during his being in Scotland, by his very good behaviour towards him, so even after that fatal blow at Worcester he did not dissemble his affection to his majesty; but withdrawing himself into the Highlands, during the time that Cromwell remained in Scotland, he sent over an express to assure the king of his fidelity, and that he would take the first opportunity to serve him. And when upon his desire Middleton was designed to command there, he first retired into the Highlands, and drew a body of men together to receive him. He was a man of honour, and good principles as well with reference to the church as to the state, which few others, even of those which now appeared most devoted to the king, avowed to be; for the presbytery was yet their idol. From the time that he had received a protection and safeguard from general Monk, after there was little hope of doing good by force, he lived quietly at his house, and was more favoured by the general than any of those who spoke most loudly against the king, and was most trusted by him when he was at Berwick upon his march into England; and was now presented by him to the king, as a man worthy of his trust in an eminent post of that kingdom.

With these there were others of less name, but of good affections and abilities, who came together from Scotland as commissioners; but they found others in London as well qualified to do their country service, and whose names were wisely inserted in their commission by those who assumed the authority to send the other. The earl of Lautherdale, who had been very eminent in contriving and carrying on the king's service, when his majesty was crowned in Scotland, and thereby had wrought himself into a very particular esteem with the king, had marched with him into England, and behaved himself well at Worcester, where he was taken prisoner; had, besides that merit, the suffering an imprisonment from that very time with some circumstances of extreme rigour, being a man against whom Cromwell had always professed a more than ordinary animosity. And though the scene of his imprisonment had been altered, according to the alteration of the governments which succeeded, yet he never found himself in complete liberty till the king was proclaimed by the parliament, and then he thought it not necessary to repair into Scotland for authority or recommendation; but sending his advice thither to his friends, he made haste to transport himself with the parliament commissioners to the Hague, where he was very well received by the king, and left nothing undone on his part that might cultivate those old inclinations, being a man of as much address and insinuation, in which that nation excels, as was then amongst them. He applied himself to those who were most trusted by the king with a marvellous importunity, and especially to the chancellor, with whom, as often as they had ever been together, he had a perpetual war. He now magnified his constancy with loud elogiums, as well to his face as behind his back; remembered "many sharp expressions formerly used by the chancellor, which he confessed had then made him mad, though upon recollection afterwards he had found them to be very reasonable." He was very polite in all his discourses; called himself and his nation, "a thousand traitors and rebels;" and in his discourses frequently said, "when I was a traitor," or "when I was in rebellion;" and seemed not equally delighted with any argument, as when he scornfully spake of the covenant, upon which he brake a hundred jests. In sum, all his discourses were such as pleased all the company, who commonly believed all he said, and concurred with him. He renewed his old acquaintance and familiarity with Middleton, by all the protestations of friendship; assured him "of the unanimous desire of Scotland to be under his command;" and declared to the king, "that he could not send any man into Scotland, who would be able to do him so much service in the place of commissioner as Middleton; and that it was in his majesty's power to unite that whole kingdom to his service as one man." All which pleased the king well: so that, by the time that the commissioners appeared at London, upon some old promise in Scotland, or new inclination upon his long sufferings, which he magnified enough, the king gave him the signet, and declared him to be secretary of state of that kingdom; and at the same time declared that Middleton should be his commissioner; the earl of Glenearne his chancellor; the earl of Rothes, who was likewise one of the commissioners, and his person very agreeable to the king, president of the council; and conferred all other inferior offices upon men most notable for their affection to the old government of church and state.

And the first proposition that the commissioners made after their meeting together, and before they entered upon debate of the public, was, "that his majesty would add to the council of Scotland, which should reside near his person, the chancellor and treasurer of England, the general, the marquis of Ormond, and secretary Nicholas, who should be always present when any thing should be debated and resolved concerning that kingdom:" which desire, so different from any that had been in times past, persuaded the king that their intentions were very sincere. Whatever appearance there was of unity amongst them, for there was nothing like contradiction, there was a general dislike by them all of the power Lauderdale had with the king, who they knew pressed many things without communication with them, as he had prevailed that the earl of Crawford Lindsey should continue in the office he formerly had of being high treasurer of that kingdom, though he was known to be a man incorrigible in his zeal for the presbytery, and all the madness of kirk, and not firm to other principles upon which the authority of the crown must be established; so that they could not so much as consult in his presence of many particulars of the highest moment and importance to the public settlement. Yet his having behaved himself well towards the king, whilst he was in that kingdom, and his having undergone great persecution under Cromwell, and professing now all obedience to his majesty, prevailed that he should not be displaced upon his majesty's first entrance upon his government, but that a new occasion should be attended to, which was in view, and when the king resolved, without communicating his purpose to Lauderdale, to confer that office upon Middleton, when he should have proceeded the first stage in his commission; and of this his resolution he was graciously pleased to inform him.

The marquis of Argyle, (without mentioning of whom there can hardly be any mention of Scotland,) though he was not of this fraternity, yet thought he could tell as fair a story for himself as any of the rest, and contribute as much to the king's absolute power in Scotland. And therefore he had no sooner unquestionable notice of the king's being in London, but he made haste thither with as much confidence as the rest. But the commissioners, who were before him, wrought so far with the king, that in the very minute of his arrival he was arrested by a warrant under the king's hand, and carried to the Tower, upon a charge of high treason.

He was a man like Drances in Virgil,

*Largus opum, et lingua melior, sed frigida bello
Dextera, consiliis habitus non futilis auctor, Seditioe potens.*

Without doubt he was a person of extraordinary cunning, well bred; and though, by the ill-placing of his eyes, he did not appear with any great advantage at first sight, yet he reconciled even those who had aversion to him very strangely by a little conversation: insomuch as after so many repeated indignities (to say no worse) which he had put upon the late king, and when he had continued the same affronts to the present king, by hindering the Scots from inviting him, and as long as was possible kept him from being received by them; when there was no remedy, and that he was actually landed, no man paid him so much reverence and outward respect, and gave so good an example to all others, with what veneration their king ought to be treated, as the marquis of Argyle did, and in a very short time made himself agreeable and acceptable to him. His wit was pregnant, and his humour gay and pleasant, except when he liked not the company or the argument. And though he never consented to any one thing of moment, which the king asked of him; and even in those seasons in which he was used with most rudeness by the clergy, and with some barbarity by his son the lord Lorne, whom he had made captain of his majesty's guard, to guard him from his friends, and from all who he desired should have access to him, the marquis still had that address, that he persuaded him all was for the best. When the other faction prevailed, in which there were likewise crafty managers, and that his counsels were commonly rejected, he carried himself so, that they who hated him most were willing to compound with him, and that his majesty should not withdraw his countenance from him. But he continued in all his charges, and had a very great party in that parliament that was most devoted to serve the king; so that his majesty was often put to desire his help to compass what he desired. He did heartily oppose the king's marching with his army into England; the ill success whereof made many men believe afterwards, that he had more reasons for the counsels he gave, than they had who were of another opinion. And the king was so far from thinking him his enemy, that when it was privately proposed to him by those he trusted most, that he might be secured from doing hurt when the king was marched into England, since he was so much against it; his majesty would by no means consent to it, but parted with him very graciously, as with one he expected good service from. All which the commissioners well remembered, and were very unwilling that he should be again admitted into his presence, to make his own excuses for any thing he could be charged with. And his behaviour afterwards, and the good correspondence he had kept with Cromwell, but especially some confident averments of some particular words or actions which related to the murder of his father, prevailed with his majesty not to speak with him; which he laboured by many addresses, in petitions to the king, and letters to some of those who were trusted by him, which were often presented by his wife and his son, and in which he only desired "to speak with the king or with some of those lords," pretending, "that he should inform and communicate somewhat that would highly concern his majesty's service." But the king not vouchsafing to admit him to his presence, the English lords had no mind to have any conference with a man who had so dark a character, or to meddle in an affair that must be examined and judged by the laws of Scotland: and so it was resolved, that the marquis of Argyle should be sent by sea into Scotland, to be tried before the parliament there when the commissioner should arrive, who was despatched thither with the rest of the lords, as soon as the seals and other badges of their several offices could be prepared. And what afterwards became of the marquis is known to all men; as it grew quickly to appear, that what bitterness soever the earl of Lauderdale had expressed towards him in his general discourses, he had in truth a great mind to have preserved him, and so kept such a pillar of presbytery against a good occasion; which was not then suspected by the rest of the commissioners.

The lords of the English council, who were appointed to sit with the Scots, met with them to consult upon the instructions which were to be given to the king's commissioner, who was now created earl of Middleton. The Scots seemed all resolute and impatient to vindicate their country from the infamy of delivering up the last king, (for all things relating to the former rebellion had been put in oblivion by his late majesty's act of indemnity, at his last being in Scotland,) and strictly to examine who of that nation had contributed to his murder, of which they were confident Argyle would be found very guilty. Middleton was very earnest, "that he might, for the humiliation of the preachers, and to prevent any unruly proceeding of theirs in their assembly, begin with rescinding the act of the covenant, and all other acts which had invaded the king's power ecclesiastical, and then proceed to the erecting of bishops in that kingdom, according to the ancient institution;" and with him Glen-carne, Rother, and all the rest (Lauderdale only excepted) concurred; and averred, "that it would be very easily brought to pass, because the tyrannical proceedings of the assemblies and their several presbyteries had so far incensed persons of all degrees, that not only the nobility, gentry, and common people, would be glad to be freed from them, but that the most learned and best part of the ministers desired the same, and to be subject again to the bishops; and that there would be enough found of the Scots clergy, very worthy and very willing to supply those charges."

Lauderdale, with a passion superior to the rest, inveighed against the covenant; called it "a wicked, traitorous combination of rebels against their lawful sovereign, and expressly against the laws of their own country; protested his own

"hearty repentance for the part he had acted in the promotion thereof, and that he was confident that God, who was witness of his repentance, had forgiven him that foul sin: that no man there had a greater reverence for the government by bishops than he himself had; and that he was most confident, that the kingdom of Scotland could never be happy in itself, nor ever be reduced to a perfect submission and obedience to the king, till the episcopal government was again established there. The scruple that only remained with him, and which made him differ with his brethren, was, of the manner how it should be attempted, and of the time when it should be endeavoured to be brought to pass." And then with his usual warmth, when he thought it necessary to be warm, (for at other times he could be as calm as any man, though not so naturally,) he desired, "that the commissioner might have no instruction for the present to make any approach towards either; on the contrary, that he might be restrained from it by his majesty's special direction: for though his own prudence, upon the observation he should quickly make when he came thither, would restrain him from doing any thing which might be inconvenient to his majesty's service; yet without that he would hardly be able to restrain others, who for want of understanding, or out of ill-will to particular men, might be too forward to set such a design on foot."

He desired, "that in the first session of parliament no further attempt might be made, than in pursuance of what had been first mentioned, the vindicating their country from all things which related to the murder of the late king, which would comprehend the delivery up of his person, the asserting the king's royal power, by which all future attempts towards rebellion would be prevented, and the trial of the marquis of Argyle; all which would take up more time than parliaments in that kingdom, till the late ill times, had used to continue together. That after the expiration of the first session, in which a good judgment might be made of the temper of that kingdom, and the commissioner's prudence might have an influence upon many leading men to change their present temper, such further advance might be made for the reformation of the kirk as his majesty should judge best; and then he made no doubt, but all would by degrees be compassed in that particular which could be desired, and which was the more resolutely to be desired, because he still confessed that the king could not be secure, nor the kingdom happy, till the episcopal government could be restored. But he undertook to know so well the nature of that people," (though he had not been in that kingdom since his majesty left it,) "that if it were undertaken presently, or without due circumstances in preparing more men than could in a short time be done, it would not only miscarry, but with it his majesty be disappointed of many of the other particulars, which he would otherwise be sure to obtain."

He named many of the nobility and leading men, who he said "were still so infatuated with the covenant, that they would with equal patience hear of the rejection of the four Evangelists,

"who yet, by conversation, and other information, and application, might in time be wrought upon." He frequently appealed to the king's own memory and observation, when he was in that kingdom, "how superstitious they who were most devoted to do him service, and were at his disposal in all things, were towards the covenant: that all they did for him, which was all that he desired them to do, was looked upon as the effects of those obligations which the covenant had laid upon them." He appealed to the general, ("who," he said, "knew Scotland better than any one man of that nation could pretend to do,) whether he thought this a proper season to attempt so great a change in that kingdom, before other more pressing acts were compassed; and whether he did not know, that the very pressing obligations in the covenant lately in England had not contributed very much to the restoration of the king, which the London ministers confidently urged at present as an argument for his indulgence towards them. And," he said, "though he well knew that his majesty was fully resolved to maintain the government of the church of England in its full lustre, (which he thanked God for, being in his judgment the best government ecclesiastical in the world,) yet he could not but observe, that the king's prudence had yet forborne to make any new bishops, and had upon the matter suspended the English Liturgy by not enjoining it, out of indulgence to dissenters, and to allow them time to consider, and to be well informed and instructed in those forms, which had been for so many years rejected or discontinued, that the people in general and many ministers had never seen or heard it used: so that the presbyterians here remained still in hope of his majesty's favour and condescension, that they should be permitted to continue their own forms, or no forms, in their devotions and public worship of God. In consideration of all which, he thought it very incongruous, and somewhat against his majesty's dignity, suddenly and with precipitation to begin and attempt such an alteration in Scotland, against a government that had more antiquity there, and was more generally submitted to and accepted, than it had been in England, before he himself had declared his own judgment against it in this kingdom; which he presumed he would shortly do, and which would be the best introduction to the same in Scotland, where all the king's actions and determinations would be looked upon with the highest veneration."

He concluded, "that if the other more vigorous course should be resolved upon, the marquis of Argyle would be very glad of it; for though he was generally odious to all degrees of men, yet he was not so much hated as the covenant was beloved and worshipped: and that when they should discern that they must be deprived of that, they would rather desire to preserve both. And therefore," he said, "his advice still was, that he should be first out of the way, who was looked upon as the upholder of the covenant and the chief pillar of the kirk, before any visible attempt should be made against the other, which would assuredly be done by degrees."

Many particulars in this discourse confidently urged, and with more advantage of elocution than the fatness of his tongue, that ever filled his mouth, usually was attended with, seemed reasonable to many, and worthy to be answered; and his frequent appeals to the king, in which there were always some ridiculous instances of the use made of the covenant, with reference to the power of the preachers in the domestic affairs of other men, and the like, (which, though it made it the more odious, was still an argument of the reverence that was generally paid to it, all which instances were well remembered by the king, who commonly added others of the same standard from his own memory,) made his majesty in suspense, or rather inclined that nothing should be attempted that concerned the kirk, till the next session of parliament, when Lautherdale himself confessed it might be securely effected. To this the general seemed to incline, not a little moved by what had been said of Argyle, to whom he was no friend, but much more by the disadvantage which might arise, by a precipitate proceeding in Scotland, to the presbyterian party here, and especially to the preachers, to whom he wished well for his wife's sake, or rather for his own peace with his wife, who was deeply engaged to that people for their seasonable determination of some nice cases of conscience, whereby he had been induced to repair a trespass he had committed, by marrying her; which was an obligation never to be forgotten.

Middleton, and most of the Scots lords, were highly offended by the presumption of Lautherdale, in undertaking to know the spirit and disposition of a kingdom which he had not seen in ten years; and easily discerned that his affected railery and railing against the covenant, and his magnifying episcopal government, were but varnish to cover the rottenness of his intentions, till he might more securely and efficaciously manifest his affection to the one, and his malignity to the other. They contradicted positively all that he had said of the temper and affections of Scotland, and named many of those lords, who had been mentioned by him as the most zealous assertors of the covenant, "who," they undertook, "should, upon the first opportunity, declare their abomination of it to the world; whereof they knew there were some who had written against it, and were resolved to publish it as soon as they might do it with safety." They advised his majesty, "that he would not choose to do his business by halves, when he might with more security do it all together, and the dividing it would make both the more difficult. However," they besought him, "to put no such restraint, as had been so much pressed, upon his commissioner, that though he should find the parliament most inclined to do that now, which every body confessed necessary to be done at some time, he should not accept their good-will, but hinder them from pursuing it, as very ungrateful to the king; which," they said, "would be a greater countenance to, and confirmation of, the covenant, than it had ever yet received, and a greater wound to episcopacy." And that indeed was consented to by all. And thereupon the king resolved to put nothing like restraint upon his commissioner from effecting that he wished might be done to-morrow if it could be, but to leave it entirely to his prudence to judge of the conjuncture, with caution "not to permit it to "be attempted, if he saw it would be attended with any ill consequence or hazard to his service." And so the commissioner, with the other officers for Scotland, were dismissed to their full content; and therewith the king was at present eased, by having separated one very important affair from the crowd of the rest, which remained to perplex him.

That in Ireland was much more intricate, and the intricacy in many respects so involved, that nobody had a mind to meddle with it. The chancellor had made it his humble suit to the king, "that no part of it might ever be referred to him;" and the duke of Ormond (who was most concerned in his own interest that all men's interests in that kingdom might be adjusted, that he might enjoy his, which was the greatest of all the rest) could not see any light in so much darkness, that might lead him to any beginning. The king's interest had been so totally extinguished in that kingdom for many years past, that there was no person of any consideration there, who pretended to wish that it were revived. At Cromwell's death, and at the deposition of Richard, his younger son Harry was invested in the full authority, by being lieutenant of Ireland. The two presidents of the two provinces, were the lord Broghill in that of Munster, and sir Charles Coote in that of Connaught; both equally depending upon the lieutenant: and they more depended upon him and courted his protection, by their not loving one another, and being of several complexions and constitutions, and both of a long aversion to the king by multiplications of guilt. When Richard was thrown out, the supreme power of the militia was vested in Ludlow, and all the civil jurisdiction in persons who had been judges of the king, and possessed ample fortunes, which they could no longer hold than their authority should be maintained. But the two presidents remained in their several provinces with their full power, either because they had not deserved to be suspected, or because they could not easily be removed, being still subject to the commissioners at Dublin. The next change of government removed Ludlow and the rest of that desperate crew, and committed the government to others of more moderate principles, yet far enough from wishing well to the king. In those revolutions sir Charles Coote took an opportunity to send an express to the king, who was then at Brussels, with the tender of his obedience, with great cautions as to the time of appearing; only desired "to have such commissions in his hands as might be applied to his majesty's service in a proper conjuncture;" which were sent to him, and never made use of by him. He expressed great jealousy of Broghill, and an unwillingness that he should know of his engagement. And the alterations succeeded so fast one upon another, that they both chose rather to depend upon general Monk than upon the king, imagining, as they said afterwards, "that he intended nothing but the king's restoration, and best knew how to effect it." And by some private letter, for there was no order sent, to Coote and some other officers there, "that they would adhere to his army for the service of the parliament against Lambert," Coote found assistance to seize upon the castle of Dublin, and the persons of those who were in authority, who were imprisoned by them, and the government settled in that manner as they thought most agreeable to the presbyterian humour, until the general was declared lieutenant of Ireland, who then sent commissioners to the same persons, who, as soon as the king was proclaimed, sent their commissioners to the king, who were called commissioners from the state, and brought a present of money to the king from the same, with all professions of duty which could be expected from the best subjects.

These were the lord Broghill, sir Audley Merwin, sir John Clotworthy, and several other persons of quality, much the greater number whereof had been always notorious for the disservice they had done the king; but upon the advantage of having been discountenanced, and suffered long imprisonment and other damages, under Cromwell, they called themselves the king's party, and brought expectations with them to be looked upon and treated as such. Amongst them was a brother, and other friends, made choice of and more immediately trusted by sir Charles Coote, who remained in the castle of Dublin, and presided in that council that supplied the government, and was thought to have the best interest in the army as well as in his own province. "And these men," he said, "had been privy to the service he meant to have done the king, and expected the performance of several promises he had then made them by virtue of some authority had been sent to him to assure those, who should join with him to do his majesty's service." All these commissioners from the state had instructions, to which they were to conform in desiring nothing from the king, but "the settling his own authority amongst them, the ordering the army, the reviving the execution of the laws, and settling the courts of justice," (all which had been dissolved in the late usurpation,) "and such other particulars as purely related to the public." And their public addresses were to this and no other purpose. But then to their private friends, and such as they desired to make their friends, most of them had many pretences of merit, and many expedients by which the king might reward them, and out of which they would be able liberally to gratify their patrons. And by this means all who served the king were furnished with suits enough to make their fortunes, in which they presently engaged themselves with very troublesome importunity to the king himself, and to all others who they thought had credit or power to advance their desires. Nor was there any other art so much used by the commissioners in their secret conferences, as to deprave one another, and to discover the ill actions they had been guilty of, and how little they deserved to be trusted, or had interest to accomplish. The lord Broghill was the man of the best parts, and had most friends by his great alliance to promise for him. And he appeared very generous, and to be without the least pretence to any advantage for himself, and to be so wholly devoted to the king's interest, and to the establishing of the government of the church, that he quickly got himself believed. And having free access to the king, by mingling apologies for what he had done, with promises of what he would do, and utterly renouncing all those principles as to the church or state, (as he might with a good conscience do,) which made men unfit for trust, he made himself so acceptable to his majesty, that he heard him willingly, because he made all things easy to be done and compassed; and gave such assurances to the bedchamber men, to help them to good fortunes in Ireland, which they had reason to despair of in England, that he wanted not their testimony upon all occasions, nor their defence and vindication, when any thing was reflected upon to his disadvantage or reproach.

2. There were many other deputies of several classes in Ireland, who thought their pretences to be as well grounded, as theirs who came from the state. There were yet some bishops alive of that kingdom, and other grave divines, all stripped of their dignities and estates, which had been disposed of by the usurping power to their creatures. And all they (some whereof had spent time in banishment near the king, and others more miserably in their own country and in England, under the charity of those who for the most part lived by the charity of others) expected, as they well might, to be restored to what in right belonged to them; and besought his majesty "to use all possible expedition to establish the government of that church as it had always been, by supplying the empty sees with new prelates in the place of those who were dead, that all the schisms and wild factions in religion, which were spread over that whole kingdom, might be extirpated and rooted out." All which desires were grateful to the king, and according to his royal intentions, and were not opposed by the commissioners from the state, who all pretended to be well wishers to the old government of the church, and the more by the experience they had of the distractions which were introduced by that which had succeeded it, and by the confusion they were now in without any. Only sir John Clotworthy (who, by the exercise of very ordinary faculties in several employments, whilst the parliament retained the supreme power in their hands, had exceedingly improved himself in understanding and ability of negotiation) dissembled not his old animosity against the bishops, the cross, and the surplice, and wished that all might be abolished; though he knew well that his vote would signify nothing towards it. And that spirit of his had been so long known, that it was now imputed to sincerity and plain-dealing, and that he would not dissemble, (which many others were known to do, who had the same malignity with him,) and was the less ill thought of, because in all other respects he was of a generous and a jovial nature, and complied in all designs which might advance the king's interest or service.

3. There appeared likewise a committee deputed by the adventurers to solicit their right, which was the more numerous by the company of many aldermen and citizens of the best quality, and many honest gentlemen of the country; who all desired "that their right might not be disturbed, which had been settled by an act of parliament ratified by the last king before the troubles; and that if it should be thought just, that any of the lands of which they stood possessed should be taken from them, upon what title soever, they might first be put into the possession of other lands of equal value, before they should be dispossessed of what they had already." All that they made claim to seemed to be confirmed by an act of parliament. The case was this: When the rebellion first brake out in Ireland, the parliament then sitting, and there being so much money to be raised and already raised for the payment of and disbanding two armies, and for the composing or compounding the rebellion of Scotland, where the king was at that time; it had been propounded, "that the war of Ireland might be carried on at the charges of particular men, and so all imposition upon the people might be prevented, if an act of parliament were passed for the satisfaction of all those who would advance monies for the war, out of the lands which should become forfeited."

And this proposition being embraced, an act was prepared to that purpose; in which it was provided, "that the forfeited lands in Leinster, Munster, Connaught, and Ulster, should be valued at such several rates by the acre, and how many acres in either should be assigned for the satisfaction of one hundred pounds, and so proportionally for greater sums. That for all monies which should be subscribed within so many days (beyond which time there should be no more subscriptions) for that service, one moiety thereof should be paid to the treasurer appointed, within few days, for the present preparations; and the other moiety be paid within six months, upon the penalty of losing all benefit from the first payment. That when God should so bless their armies, (which they doubted not of,) that the rebels should be so near reduced, that they should be without any army or visible power to support their rebellion; there should a commission issue out, under the great seal of England, to such persons as should be nominated by the parliament, who should take the best way they could in their discretion think fit, to be informed, whether the rebels were totally subdued, and so the rebellion at an end. And upon their declaration, that the work was fully done and the war finished, other commissions should likewise issue out, in the same manner, for the convicting and attainting all those who were guilty of the treason and rebellion by which their estates were become forfeited; and then other commissions, for the distribution of the forfeited lands to the several adventurers, according to the sums of money advanced by them. The king was to be restrained from making any peace with the Irish rebels, or cessation, or from granting pardon to any of them; but such peace, cessation, or pardon, should be looked upon as void and null."

This act the king had consented to and confirmed in the year 1641, and in the agony of many troubles which that rebellion had brought upon him, thinking it the only means to put a speedy end to that accursed rebellion, the suppression whereof would free him from many difficulties. And upon the security of this act, very many persons, of all qualities and affections, subscribed and brought in the first moiety of their money, and were very properly styled adventurers. Great sums of money were daily brought in, and preparations and provisions and new levies of men were made for Ireland. But the rebellion in England being shortly after fomented by the parliament, they applied very much of that money brought in by the adventurers, and many of the troops which had been raised for that service, immediately against the king: which being notoriously known, and his majesty complaining of it, many honest gentlemen, who had subscribed and paid one moiety, refused to pay in the other moiety at the time, and so were liable to lose the benefit of their adventure; which they preferred before suffering their money to be applied to the carrying on the rebellion against the king, which they abhorred. And by this means Ireland was unsupplied; and the rebellion spread and prospered with little opposition for some time. And the parliament, though the time for subscribing was expired, enlarged it by ordinances of their own to a longer day, and easily prevailed with many of their own party, principally officers and citizens, to subscribe and bring in their money; to which it was no small encouragement, that so many had lost the benefit of their whole adventure by not paying in the second payment, which would make the conditions of the new adventurers the less hazardous.

When the success of the parliament had totally subdued the king's arms, and himself was so inhumanly murdered, neither the forces in Ireland under the king's authority, nor the Irish, who had too late promised to submit to it, could make any long resistance; so that Cromwell quickly dispersed them by his own expedition thither: and by licensing as many as desired it to transport as many from thence, for the service of the two crowns of France and Spain, as they would contract for, quickly made a disappearance of any army in that kingdom to oppose his conquests. And after the defeat of the king at Worcester, he seemed to all men to be in as quiet a possession of Ireland as of England, and to be as much without enemies in the one as the other kingdom; as in a short time he had reduced Scotland to the same exigent.

Shortly after that time, when Cromwell was invested with the office of protector, all those commissions were issued out, and all the formality was used that was prescribed by that act for the adventurers. Not only all the Irish nation (very few excepted) were found guilty of the rebellion, and so to have forfeited all their estates; but the marquis of Ormond, the lord Inchiquin, and all the English catholics, and whosever had served the king, were declared to be under the same guilt; and the lands seized upon for the benefit of the state. There were very vast arrears of pay due to the army, a great [part] of which (now the war was ended) must be disbanded; for the doing whereof no money was to be expected out of England, but they must be satisfied out of the forfeitures of the other kingdoms. The whole kingdom was admeasured; the accounts of the money paid by the adventurers within the time limited, and what was due to the army for their pay, were stated; and such proportions of acres in the several provinces were assigned to the adventurers and officers and soldiers, as were agreeable to the act of parliament, by admeasurement. Where an officer of name had been likewise an adventurer, his adventure and his pay amounted to the more. And sometimes the whole company and regiment contracted for money with their captains or colonels, and assigned their interest in land to them; and possession was accordingly delivered, without any respect to any titles by law to former settlements, or descents of any persons soever, wives or children; except in some very few cases, where the wives had been great heirs, and could not be charged with any crime, such proportions were assigned as were rather agreeable to their own conveniences, than to justice and the right of the claimers.

And that every body might with the more security enjoy that which was assigned to him, they had found a way to have the consent of many to their own undoing. They found the utter extirpation of the nation (which they had intended) to be in itself very difficult, and to carry in it somewhat of horror, that made some impression upon the stone-hardness of their own hearts. After so many millions destroyed by the plague which raged over the kingdom, by fire, sword, and famine; and after so many millions transported into foreign parts, there remained still such a numerous people, that they knew not how to dispose of: and though they were declared to be all forfeited, and so to have no title to any thing, yet they must remain somewhere. They therefore found this expedient, which they called an act of grace. There was a large tract of land, even to the half of the province of Connaught, that was separated from the rest by a long and a large river, and which by the plague and many massacres remained almost desolate. Into this space and circuit of land they required all the Irish to retire by such a day, under the penalty of death; and all who should after that time be found in any other part of the kingdom, man, woman, or child, should be killed by any body who saw or met them. The land within this circuit, the most barren in the kingdom, was out of the grace and mercy of the conquerors assigned to those of the nation who were enclosed, in such proportions as might with great industry preserve their lives. And to those persons, from whom they had taken great quantities of land in other provinces, they assigned the greater proportions within this precinct; so that it fell to some men's lot, especially when they were accommodated with houses, to have a competent livelihood, though never to the fifth part of what had been taken from them in a much better province. And that they might not be exalted with this merciful donative, it was a condition that accompanied this their accommodation, that they should all give releases of their former rights and titles to the land that was taken from them, in consideration of what was now assigned to them; and so they should for ever bar themselves and their heirs from ever laying claim to their old inheritance. What should they do? they could not be permitted to go out of this precinct to shift for themselves elsewhere; and without this assignation they must starve here, as many did die every day of famine. In this deplorable condition, and under this consternation, they found themselves obliged to accept or submit to the hardest conditions of their conquerors, and so signed such conveyances and releases as were prepared for them, that they might enjoy those lands which belonged to other men.

And by this means the plantation (as they called it) of Connaught was finished, and all the Irish nation enclosed within that circuit; the rest of Ireland being left to the English; some to the old lords and just proprietors, who being all protestants, (for no Roman catholic was admitted,) had either never offended them, or had served them, or had made composition for their delinquencies by the benefit of some articles; some to the adventurers and soldiers. And a good and great part (as I remember, the whole province of Tipperary) Cromwell had reserved to himself, as a demesne (as he called it) for the state, and in which no adventurer or soldier should demand his lot to be assigned, and no doubt intended both the state and it for the making great his own family. It cannot be imagined in how easy a method, and with what peaceable formality, this whole great kingdom was taken from the just lords and proprietors, and divided and given amongst those, who had no other right to it but that they had power to keep [it]; no men having so [great] shares as they who had been instruments to murder the king, and were not like willingly to part with it to his successor. Where any great sums of money for arms, ammunition, or any merchandise, had been so long due that they were looked upon as desperate, the creditors subscribed all those sums as lent upon adventure, and had their satisfaction assigned to them as adventurers. Ireland was the great capital, out of which all debts were paid, all services rewarded, and all acts of bounty performed. And which is more wonderful, all this [was] done and settled, within little more than two years, to that degree of perfection, that there were many buildings raised for beauty as well as use, orderly and regular plantations of trees, and raising fences and enclosures throughout the kingdom, purchases made by one from the other at very valuable rates, and jointures made upon marriages, and all other conveyances and settlements executed, as in a kingdom at peace within itself, and where no doubt could be made of the validity of titles. And yet in all this quiet, there were very few persons pleased or contented.

And these deputies for the adventurers, and for those who called themselves adventurers, came not only to ask the king's consent and approbation of what had been done, (which they thought in justice he could not deny, because all had been done upon the warrant of a legal act of parliament,) but to complain, "that justice had not been equally done in the distributions; that this man had received much less than was his due, and others as much more than was their due; that one had had great quantities of bogs and waste land as signed to him as tenantable, and another as much allowed as bogs and waste, which in truth were very tenantable lands." And upon the whole matter, they all desired "a review might [be made], that justice might be done to all;" every man expecting an addition to what he had already, not suspecting that any thing would be taken from him, to be restored to the true owner.

And this agitation raised another party of adventurers, who thought they had at least as good a right as any of the other; and that was, they, or the heirs and executors of them, who upon the first making of the act of parliament, had subscribed several good sums of money, and paid in their first moieties; but the rebellion coming on, and the monies already paid in being notoriously and visibly employed contrary to the act, and against the person of the king himself, they had out of conscience forborne to make the second moiety, lest it might also [be] so employed; whereby, according to the rigour of the law, they lost the benefit of the first payment. And they had hitherto sustained that loss, with many other, without having ever applied themselves for relief.

"But now, when it had pleased God to restore the king, and so many who had not deserved very well desired help from the king upon the equity of that act of parliament, where the letter of the law would do them no [good], they presumed to think, that by the equity of the law they ought to be satisfied for the money they did really pay; and that they should not undergo any damage for not paying the other moiety, which out of conscience and for his majesty's service they had forborne to do." No man will doubt but that the king was very well inclined to gratify this classis of adventurers, when he should find it in his power. But it is time to return to the committee and deputies of the other parties in that distracted kingdom.

4. There was a committee sent from the army that was in present pay in Ireland, "for the arrears due to them," which was for above a year's pay; most of those who had received satisfaction in land for what was then due to them, as well officers as soldiers, being then disbanded, that they might attend their plantations and husbandry, but in truth because they were for the most part of the presbyterian faction, and so suspected by Cromwell not to be enough inclined to him. The army now on foot, and to whom so great arrears were due, consisted for the greatest part of independents, anabaptists, and levellers, who had corresponded with and been directed by the general, when he marched from Scotland against Lambert: and therefore he had advised the king to declare, "that he would pay all arrears due to the army in Ireland, and ratify the satisfaction that had been given to adventurers, officers, and soldiers there;" which his majesty had accordingly signified by his declaration from Breda. And whoever considers the temper and constitution of that army then on foot in that kingdom, and the body of presbyterians that had been disbanded, and remained still there in their habitations, together with the body of adventurers, all presbyterians or anabaptists; and at the same time remembers the disposition and general affection of the army in England, severed from their obedience to the general and the good affection of some few superior officers; will not wonder that the king endeavoured, if it had been possible, rather to please all, than by any unseasonable discovery of a resolution, how just soever, to make any party desperate; there being none so inconsiderable, as not to have been able to do much mischief.

5. The satisfaction that the officers and soldiers had received in land, and the demand of the present army, had caused another committee to be sent and employed by those reformed officers, who had served the king under the command of the marquis of Ormond, from the beginning of the rebellion to the end thereof, with courage and fidelity; and had since shifted beyond the seas, and some of them in his majesty's service, or suffered patiently in that kingdom under the insolence of their oppressors; who, because they had always fought against the Irish, were by articles, upon their laying down their arms when they could no longer hold them in their hands, permitted to remain in their own houses, or such as they could get within that kingdom. These gentlemen thought it a very incongruous thing, "that they who had constantly fought against the king's father and himself, should receive their "pay and reward by his majesty's care, bounty, and assignation; and that they, who had as constantly fought for both, should be left to undergo all want and misery now his majesty was restored to his own." And they believed their suit to be the more reasonable, at least the easier to be granted, by having brought an expedient with them to facilitate their satisfaction. There had been some old order or ordinance, that was looked upon as a law, whereby it was provided, that all houses within cities or corporate towns, which were forfeited, should be reserved to be specially disposed of by the state, or in such a manner as it should direct, to the end that all care might be taken what manner of men should be the inhabitants of such important places: and therefore such houses had not been, nor were to be, promiscuously assigned to adventurers, officers, or soldiers, and so remained hitherto undisposed of. And these reformed officers of the king made it their suit, that those houses might be assigned to them in proportions, according to what might appear to be due to their several conditions and degrees in command. And to this petition, which might seem equitable in itself, the commissioners from the state gave their full approbation and consent, being ready to take all the opportunities to ingratiate themselves towards those whom they had oppressed as long as they were able, and to be reputed to love the king's party.

6. Lastly, there was a committee for, or rather the whole body of, the Irish catholics, who, with less modesty than was suitable to their condition, demanded in justice to be restored to all the lands that had been taken from them: alleging, "that they were all at least as innocent as any of them were, to whom their lands had been assigned." They urged "their early submission to the king, and the peace they had first made with the marquis of Ormond, by which an act of indemnity had been granted for what offences soever had been committed, except such in which none of them were concerned." They urged "the peace they had made with the marquis of Ormond upon this king's first coming to the crown, wherein a grant of indemnity was again renewed to them;" and confidently, though very unskillfully, pressed, "that the benefit of all those articles which were contained in that peace, might still be granted and observed to them, since they had done nothing to infringe or forfeit them, but had been oppressed and broken, as all his majesty's other forces had been." They urged "the service they had done to the king beyond the seas, having been always ready to obey his commands, and stayed [in] or left France or Spain as his majesty had commanded them, and were for the last two years received and listed as his own troops, and in his own actual service, under the duke of York." They pressed "the intolerable tyranny they had suffered under, now almost twenty years; the massacres and servitude they had undergone; such devastation and laying waste their country, such bloody cruelty and executions inflicted on them, as had never been known nor could be paralleled amongst Christians: that their nation almost was become desolated, and their sufferings of all kinds [had been] to such an extent, that they hoped had satiated their most implacable enemies." And therefore they humbly besought his majesty, "that in this general joy for his majesty's blessed restoration, and in which nobody could rejoice more than they, when all his majesty's subjects of his two other kingdoms (whereof many were not more innocent than themselves) had their mouths filled with laughter, and had all their hearts could desire, the poor Irish alone might not be condemned to perpetual weeping and misery by his majesty's own immediate act." Amongst these, with the same confidence, they who had been transplanted into Connaught appeared, related the circumstances of the persecution they had undergone, and "how impossible it had been for them to refuse their submission to that they had no power to resist; and therefore that it would be against all conscience to allege their own consent, and their releases, and other grants, which had they not consented to in that point of time, they, their wives, and children, could not have lived four and twenty hours." All these particulars were great motives to compassion, and disposed his majesty's heart to wish that any expedient might be found, which might consist with justice and necessary policy, that might make them, though not very happy, yet might preserve them from misery, until he should hereafter find some opportunity to repair their condition according to their several degrees and merit.

These several addresses being presented to his majesty together, before any thing was yet settled in England, and every party of them finding some friends, who filled the king's ears with specious discourses on their behalf for whom he spake, and with bitter invectives against all the rest; he was almost confounded how to begin, and in what method to put the examination of all their pretences, that he might be able to take such a view of them, as to be able to apply some remedy, that might keep the disease from increasing and growing worse, until he could find some cure. He had no mind the parliament should interpose and meddle in it, which would have been grateful to no party; and by good fortune they were so full of business that they thought concerned them nearer, that they had no mind to examine or take cognizance of this of Ireland, which they well knew properly depended upon the king's own royal pleasure and commands. But these addresses were all of so contradictory a nature, so inconsistent with each other, and so impossible to be reconciled, that if all Ireland could be sold at its full value, (that is, if kingdoms could be valued at a just rate,) and find a fit chapman or purchaser to disburse the sum, it could not yield half enough to satisfy half their demands; and yet the king was not in a condition positively to deny any one party that which they desired.

The commissioners from the state, in respect of their quality, parts, and interest, and in regard of their mission and authority, seemed the most proper persons to be treated with, and the most like to be prevailed upon not to insist upon any thing that was most profoundly unreasonable. They had all their own just fears, if the king should be severe; and there would have been a general concurrence in all the rest, that he should have taken a full vengeance upon them: but then they who had most cause to fear, thought they might raise their hopes highest from that power that sent them, and which had yet interest enough to do good and hurt; and they thought themselves secure in the king's declaration from Breda, and his offer of indemnity, which comprehended them. Then they were all desirous to merit from the king; and their not loving one another, disposed them the more to do any thing that might be grateful to his majesty. But they were all united and agreed in one unhappy extreme, that made all their other devotion less applicable to the public peace, that is, their implacable malice to the Irish: insomuch as they concurred in their desire, that they might gain nothing by the king's return, but be kept with the same rigour, and under the same incapacity to do hurt, which they were till then. For which instance they were not totally without reason, from their barbarous behaviour in the first beginning of the rebellion, which could not be denied, and from their having been compelled to submit to and undergo the most barbarous servitude, that could not be forgotten. And though eradication was too foul a word to be uttered in the ears of a Christian prince, yet it was little less or better that they proposed in other words, and hoped to obtain: whereas the king thought that miserable people to be as worthy of his favour, as most of the other parties; and that his honour, justice, and policy, as far as they were unrestrained by laws and contracts, obliged him more to preserve them, at least as much as he could. And yet it can hardly be believed, how few men, in all other points very reasonable, and who were far from cruelty in their nature, cherished that inclination in the king; but thought it in him, and more in his brother, to proceed from other reasons than they published: whilst others, who pretended to be only moved by Christian charity and compassion, were more cruel towards them, and made them more miserable, by extorting great engagements from them for their protection and intercession, which being performed would leave them in as forlorn a condition as they were found.

In this intricacy and perplexity, the king thought it necessary to begin with settling his own authority in one person over that kingdom, who should make haste thither, and establish such a council there, and all courts of justice, and other civil officers, as might best contribute towards bringing the rest in order. And to this purpose he made choice of several persons of the robe, who had been known by or recommended to the marquis of Ormond, but of more by the advice and promotion of Daniel O'Neile of his bedchamber, who preferred a friend of his, and an Irishman, to the office of attorney general, (a place in that conjuncture of vast importance to the settlement,) and many other to be judges. And all this list was made and settled without the least communication with the chancellor, who might have been presumed to be easily informed of that rank of men. But to find a person fit to send thither in the supreme authority, was long deliberated by the king, and with difficulty to be resolved. The general continued lord lieutenant of Ireland, which he had no mind to quit, for he had a great estate there, having for some time been general of that army, and received for the arrears of his pay, and by Cromwell's bounty, and by some purchases he made of the soldiers, an estate of at least four thousand pounds per annum, which he thought he could best preserve in the supreme government; though he was willing to have it believed in the city and the army, that he retained it only for the good of the adventurers, and that the soldiers might be justly dealt with for their arrears. Whatsoever his reason was, as profit was the highest reason always with him, whoever was to be deputy must be subordinate to him; which no man of the greatest quality would be, though he was to have his commission from the king, and the same jurisdiction in the absence of the lieutenant. There were some few fit for the employment, who were not willing to undertake it; and many who were willing to undertake it, but were not fit.

Upon the view of those of all sorts, the king most inclined to the lord Roberts, who was a man of more than ordinary parts, well versed in the knowledge of the laws, and esteemed of integrity not to be corrupted by money. But then he was a sullen morose man, intolerably proud, and had some humours as inconvenient as small vices, which made him hard to live with, and which were afterwards more discovered than at that time foreseen. He had been in the beginning of the rebellion a leading man in their councils, and a great officer in their army, wherein he expressed no want of courage. But after the defeat of the earl of Essex's army in Cornwall, which was imputed to his positiveness and undertaking for his county, the friendship between him and that earl was broken. And from that time he did not only quit his command in the army, but declined their councils, and remained for the most part in the country; where he censured their proceedings, and had his conversation most with those who were known to wish well to the king, and who gave him a great testimony, as if he would be glad to serve his majesty upon the first opportunity. The truth is, the wickedness of the succeeding time was so much superior and overshadowed all that had been done before, that they who had only been in rebellion with the earl of Essex, looked upon themselves as innocent, and justified their own allegiance, by loading the memory of Cromwell with all the reproaches and maledictions imaginable. The greatest exception that the king had to the lord Roberts, who was already of the privy council, by the recommendation and instance of the general, was, that he was generally esteemed a presbyterian, which would make him unfit for that trust for many reasons; besides that, he would not cheerfully act the king's part in restoring and advancing the government of the church, which the king was resolved to settle with all the advantages which he could contribute towards it. Nor did the lord Roberts profess to be an enemy to episcopacy.

Before the king would make any public declaration of his purpose, he sent the lord treasurer and the chancellor, who were most acquainted with him, to confer freely with him, and to let him know the good esteem his majesty had of him, and of his abilities to serve him. "That the government of Ireland would require a very steady and a prudent man: that the general did not intend to go into that kingdom, and yet would remain lieutenant thereof; from which office his majesty knew not how, nor thought it seasonable, to remove him, and therefore that the place must be supplied by a deputy; for which office the king thought him the most fit, if it were "not for one objection, which he had given them leave to inform him of particularly, there being but one person more privy to his majesty's purpose, who was the marquis of Ormond; and that he might conclude, that the king was desirous to receive satisfaction to his objection, by the way he took to communicate it to him:" and then they told him, "that he had the reputation of being a presbyterian; and that his majesty would take his own word, whether he was or was not one."

He answered without any kind of ceremony, to which he was not devoted, or so much as acknowledging the king's favour in his inquiry, "that no presbyterian thought him to be a presbyterian, or that he loved their party. He knew them too well. That there could be no reason to suspect him to be such, but that which might rather induce men to believe him to be a good protestant, that he went constantly to church as well in the afternoons as forenoons on the Sundays, and on those days forbore to use those exercises and recreations which he used to do all the week besides." He desired them, "to assure the king, that he was so far from a presbyterian, that he believed episcopacy to be the best government the church could be subject to." They asked him then, "whether he would be willing to receive that government of deputy of Ireland, if the king were willing to confer it upon him." There he let himself to fall to an acknowledgment of the king's goodness, "that he thought him worthy of so great an honour:" but he could not conceal the disdain he had of the general's person, nor how unwilling he was to receive orders from him, or to be an officer under his command. They told him, "that there would be a necessity of a good correspondence between them, both whilst they stayed together in England, and when he should be in Ireland; but beyond that there would be no obligation upon him, for that he was to receive his commission immediately from the king, containing as ample powers as were in the lieutenant's own commission: that he was not the lieutenant's deputy, but the king's; only that his commission ceased when the lieutenant should be upon the place, which he was never like to be." Upon the whole matter, though it appeared that the superiority was a great mortification to him, he said, "that he referred himself wholly to the king, to be disposed of as he thought best for his service, and that he would behave himself with all possible fidelity to him."

Upon this report made to the king, shortly after his majesty in council declared, "that he had made the lord Roberts deputy of Ireland," and then charged him, "that he would prepare as soon as was possible for his journey thither, when those officers, who were designed by him for the civil justice of the kingdom, should be ready to attend upon him; and in the mean time, that he would send the commissioners, and all others who solicited any thing that had reference to Ireland, to wait upon him, to the end that he, being well informed of the nature and consistency of the several pretences, and of the general state of the kingdom, might be the better able to advise his majesty upon the whole matter; and to prescribe, for the entering upon it by parts, such a method, that his majesty

"might with less perplexity give his own determination in those particulars, which must chiefly depend upon himself and his direction." Thus the king gave himself a little ease, by referring the gross to the lord deputy, in whose hands we shall for the present leave it, that we may take a view of the other particulars, that more immediately related to England; though we shall be shortly called back again to Ireland, which enjoyed little repose in the hands in which it was put.

The parliament spent most of the time upon the act of indemnity, in which private passions and animosities prevailed very far; one man contending to preserve this man, who, though amongst the foulest offenders, had done him some courtesy in the time of his power; and another, with as much passion and bitterness, endeavouring to have another condemned, who could not be distinguished from the whole herd by any infamous guilt, and who had disobliged him, or refused to oblige him, when it was in his power to have done it. The king had positively excepted none from pardon, because he was to refer the whole to them; but had clearly enough expressed, that he presumed that they would not suffer any of those who had sat as judges upon his father, and condemned him to be murdered, to remain alive. And the guilty persons themselves made so little doubt of it, that they made what shift they could to make their escape into the parts beyond the seas, and many of them had transported themselves; whilst others lay concealed for other opportunities; and some were apprehended when they endeavoured to fly, and so were imprisoned.

The parliament published a proclamation, "that all who did not render themselves by a day named, should be judged as guilty, and attainted of treason;" which many consented to, conceiving it to amount to no more than a common process at law to bring men to justice. But it was no sooner out, than all they who had concealed themselves in order to be transported, rendered themselves to the speaker of the house of commons, and were by him committed to the Tower. And the house conceived itself engaged to save those men's lives, who had put themselves into their power upon that presumption. The house of peers insisted upon it in many conferences, that the proclamation could bear no such interpretation; but as it condemned all who by flying declined the justice of the kingdom, so it admitted as many as would appear to plead their own innocence, which if they could prove they would be safe. But the guilty, and with them the house of commons, declared, "that they could not but understand, that they who rendered themselves should be in a better condition than they who fled beyond the seas, which they were not in any degree, if they were put upon their trial; for to be tried and to be condemned was the same thing, since the guilt of all was equally notorious and manifest." And this kind of reasoning prevailed upon the judgments and understandings of many, who had [all] manner of detestation for the persons of the men. In the end, the house of peers, after long contests, was obliged to consent, "that all the persons who were fled, and those who had not rendered themselves, should be brought to a trial and attainted according to law, together with those who were or should be taken;" whereby they would forfeit all their estates to the king: "but for those who had rendered themselves upon the faith of the parliament," as they called it, "they should remain in such prisons as his majesty thought fit during their lives, and neither of them be put to death without consent of parliament."

But then as by this means too many of those impious persons remained alive, and some others who were as bad as any were, upon some testimony of the general, and by other interpositions of friends upon the allegation of merit and services, preserved, with the king's consent too easily obtained, so much as from attainder; so to make some kind of amends for this unhappy lenity, they resolved to except a multitude of those they were most angry with from pardon as to their estates, and to fine others in great sums of money; when worse men, at least as bad, of either classis were exempted, as included, by the power of their friends who were present in the debate. And this contradiction and faction brought such a spirit into the house, as disturbed all other counsels; whilst men, who wished well enough to the matter proposed, opposed the passing it, to cross other men who had refused to agree with them in the pardoning or not pardoning of persons: which dissension divided the house into great animosities. And without doubt, the king's credit and authority was at that time so great in the house of commons, that he could have taken full vengeance upon many of those with whom he had reason to be offended, by causing them to be exempted from pardon, or exposed to some damage of estate. And there wanted not many, who used all the credit they had, to inflame the king to that retaliation and revenge.

And it was then and more afterwards imputed to the chancellor, that there were no more exceptions in the act of indemnity, and that he laboured more for expedition of passing it, and for excluding any extraordinary exceptions; which reproach he neither then nor ever after was solicitous to throw off. But his authority and credit, though he at that time was generally esteemed, could not have prevailed in that particular, (wherein there were few men without some temptation to anger and indignation, and none more than he, who had undergone injuries and indignities from many men then alive,) but that it was very evident to the king himself, and to all dispassioned men, that no person was so much concerned, though all were enough, that there should be no longer delay in passing the act of indemnity, as the king himself was; there being no progress made in any other business, by the disorder and ill humour that grew out of that. There was no attempt to be made towards disbanding the army, until the act of indemnity should be first passed; nor could they begin to pay off the navy, till they were ready to pay off the arrears of the army. This was the "remora" in all the counsels; whilst there wanted not those, who infused [jealousies] into the minds of the soldiers, and into the city, "that the king had no purpose ever to consent to the act of indemnity," which was looked upon as the only universal security for the peace of the nation: and till that was done, no man could say that he dwelt at home, nor the king think himself in any good posture of security. And therefore no man was more impatient, and more instant in council and parliament, to remove all causes which obstructed that work, [than the chancellor.] And he put the king in mind, "how much he had opposed some clauses and expressions which were in the declaration and letters from Breda," which notwithstanding were inserted, as most agreeable to the general's advice; and that he then said to his majesty, in the presence of those who were consulted with, "that it would come to his turn to insist upon the performance of those concessions, which he was against the making of, when many others would oppose them, which may be at that present would advise much larger:" which his majesty acknowledged to be true, and confessed upon many occasions. And the chancellor did in truth conceive, that the king's taking advantage of the good inclinations of the house to him, and to dispose them to fall upon many persons, who were men of another classis to those he desired might be excepted, (and of which prospect there could be no end, every man having cause to fear his own security by what he saw his neighbour suffer, who was as innocent,) was directly contrary to the sense and integrity of his declaration, and therefore to be avoided; and that all things were to be done by him that might facilitate and advance the disbanding, that so the peace of the kingdom might again depend upon the civil justice and magistrates thereof. And all men who understood in how ticklish a condition it then stood, concurred in that advice.

And this was the reason that the king used his authority, and they who were trusted by him their credit and interest, for the suppressing those animosities, which had irreconciled many persons between themselves who were of public affections, by the nomination of particular persons whose estates should be made liable to penalties, the imposing of which must again depend upon the parliament; which, besides the consumption of time, which was very precious, would renew and continue the same spirit of division, which already had done too much mischief, and would inevitably have done much more. But by this temper and composition the act of indemnity was finished, passed the house of peers, and received the royal assent, to the wonderful joy of the people. And present orders were given for the disbanding the army and payment of the navy, as fast as money came in, for which several acts of parliament were formerly passed. And by the former delays, the intolerable burden both of army and navy lay upon the kingdom near six months after the king's return, and amounted not to so little as one hundred thousand pounds by the month; which raised a vast debt, that was called the king's, who had incessantly desired to have it prevented from the first hour of his arrival.

After the bill of indemnity was passed, with some other as important acts for the public peace, (as the preserving those proceedings, which had been in courts of justice for near twenty years, from being ravelled into again as void or invalid, because they had been before judges not legally qualified, which would have brought an intolerable burden upon the subject; and some other acts,) the parliament was willing to adjourn for some time; that their members, who were appointed to attend the disbanding the army in several places, and the payment of the navy, might be absent with less inconvenience: and the king was as willing to have some ease. And so it was adjourned for a month or six weeks; in which time, and even in the middle of the disbanding, there happened a very strange accident, that was evidence enough of the temper or distemper of the time.

The trial of those infamous persons who were in prison for the murder of the king (and who were appointed by the act of indemnity to be proceeded against with rigour, and who could not be tried till that vote was passed) was no sooner over, and the persons executed, with some of the same crew, who being in Holland and Flanders were, by the permission and connivance of those magistrates, taken by the king's ministers there, and brought into England, and put to death with their companions; but the people of that classis who were called Fanatics, discovered a wonderful malignity in their discourses, and vows of revenge for their innocent friends. They caused the speeches they had made at their deaths to be printed, in which there was nothing of repentance or sorrow for their wickedness, but a justification of what they [had] done for the cause of God; and had several meetings to consult of the best way to attempt their revenge, and of bringing themselves into the same posture of authority and power which they formerly had. The disbanding the army seemed a good expedient to contribute to their ends: and they doubted not, but as fast as they disbanded they would repair to them, which they could not so well do till then, because of the many new officers who had been lately put over them; and to that purpose they had their agents in several regiments to appoint rendezvouses. They had conference of assassinating the general, "who," they said, "had betrayed them, and was the only person who kept the army together."

Matters being in this state, and some of their companions every day taken and imprisoned upon discovery of their purposes, the king being gone to Portsmouth, and the parliament adjourned, they appointed a rendezvous in several places of London at twelve of the clock in the night; the same being assigned to their friends in the country. They had not patience to make use of the silence of the night, till they could draw their several bodies together. But their several rendezvouses no sooner met, than they fell into noise and exclamations, "that all men should take arms to assist the Lord Jesus Christ;" and when the watch came towards them, they resolutely defended themselves, and killed many of those who came to assault them: so that the alarm was in a short time spread over the city, and from thence was carried to Whitehall, where the duke of York was and the general, with a regiment of guards and some horse, which were quickly drawn together.

Sir Richard Browne was then lord mayor of London, a very stout and vigilant magistrate, who was equally feared and hated by all the seditious party, for his extraordinary zeal and resolution in the king's service. Nor was there any man in England, who did raze out the memory of what he had formerly done amiss, with a more signal acknowledgment, or a more frank and generous engagement against all manner of factions, which opposed or obstructed his majesty's service; which made him terrible and odious to all; and to none more than to the presbyterians, who had formerly seduced him. Upon the alarm, which of itself had scattered many of the conspirators as they were going to or were upon the places to which they were assigned, he was quickly upon his horse, accompanied with as many soldiers, officers, and friends, as he could speedily draw together; and with those marched towards that place where the most noise was made; and in his way met many who ran from the fury of those, "who," they said, "were in arms;" and reported "their numbers to be very great; and that they killed all who opposed them." And true it was they had killed some, and charged a body of the trainbands with so much courage, that it retired with disorder. Yet when the mayor came, he found the number so small, not above thirty men, that he commanded them to lay down their arms; which when they refused to do, he charged them briskly. And they defended themselves with that courage and despair, that they killed and wounded many of his men; and very few of them yielded or would receive quarter, till they were overborne with numbers or fainted with wounds, and so were taken and laid hands on.

Their captain, who was to command the whole party in London, and had for his device in his ensign these words, THE LORD GOD AND GIDEON, was a wine-cooper, of a competent estate, a very strong man, who defended himself with his sword, and killed some of those who assaulted him, till he fell with his wounds, as some others about him did; all whom he had persuaded, that they should be able to do as much upon their enemies, as Jonathan and his armour-bearer did upon the Philistines, or any others in the Old Testament had upon those whom the Lord delivered into their hands. Nor could they find, upon all his examinations, that there was any other formed design, than what must probably attend the declaration of the army, of which he was assured. He and the other hurt men were committed to the gaol, and to the special charge of the surgeons, that they might be preserved for a trial.

The next morning the council met early, and having received an account of all that had passed, they could not but conclude, that this so extravagant attempt could not be founded upon the rashness of one man, who had been always looked upon as a man of sense and reason. And thereupon they thought it necessary to suspend the disbanding the general's regiment of foot, which had the guard of Whitehall, and was by the order of parliament to have been disbanded the next day; and writ to the king "to approve of what they had done, and to appoint it to be continued till further order;" which his majesty consented to. And this was the true ground and occasion of the continuing and increasing the guard for his majesty's person; which no man at that time thought to be more than was necessary. Order was given for the speedy trial of Venner and his accomplices; many whereof, with himself, would have died of their wounds, if their trial had been deferred for many days: but the surgeons' skill preserved [them] till then; where they made no other defence for themselves than what is before mentioned; nor did then, or at their deaths (there being ten or a dozen executed) make the least show of sorrow for what they had attempted.

There is no occasion of mentioning more of the particular proceedings of this parliament; which though it met afterwards at the time appointed, and proceeded with all duty to the king, in raising great sums of money for the army and the navy, and for the payment of other great debts, which they thought themselves concerned to discharge, and which had never been incurred by the king; and likewise passed many good acts for the settling a future revenue for the crown, and a vote that they would raise that revenue to twelve hundred thousand pounds yearly: yet they gave not any thing to the king himself (all the rest was received and paid by those who were deputed by them to that purpose) but seventy thousand pounds towards the discharge of his coronation, which he had appointed to be in the beginning of May following. And this seventy thousand pounds was all the money the king received, or could dispose of, in a full year after his coming to London; so that there could not but be a very great debt contracted in that time; for the payment whereof he must afterwards provide as well as he could. I say, I shall not mention more of the particulars of that parliament, because it was foreseen by all, that though their meeting had produced all those good effects, in the restoring the king, disbanding the army, and many other things, which could be wished; yet that the lasting validity of all they had done would depend upon another parliament, to be legally summoned by the king, with all those formalities which this wanted; and the confirmation of that parliament would be necessary for the people's security, that they should enjoy all that this had granted: so that when I shall speak again of the proceedings of parliament, it will be of that parliament which will be called by his majesty's writ.

Only before we dissolve this, and because there hath been so little said of the license and distemper in religion, which his majesty exceedingly apprehended would have received some countenance from the parliament, we shall remember, that the king having by his declaration from Breda referred the composing and settling all that related to the government of the church to the parliament, so that he could do nothing towards it himself: but by his gracious reception of the old bishops who were still alive, and his own practice in his devotions and the government of his royal chapel, [he] declared sufficiently what should be done in other places. The party of the presbyterians was very numerous in the house of commons; and had before the king's return made a committee to devise such a government for the church, as might either totally exclude bishops, or make them little superior to the rest of the clergy. But the spirit of the time had of itself elected many members, notwithstanding the injunctions sent out with the writs, and expressly contrary to such [injunctions], of a very different alloy; who, together with such as were chosen after his majesty's return, were numerous enough to obstruct and check any prevalence of that party, though not of power enough to compel them to consent to sober counsels. And so the business was kept still at the committee, now and then getting ground, and then cast back again, as the sober members attended; so that no report was brought to the house from thence, which might have given the king some trouble. And by degrees the heads of that party grew weary of the warmth of their prosecution, which they saw not like to produce any notable fruit that they cared for. The king desired no more, than that they should do nothing; being sure that in a little time he should himself do the work best. And so in September, when he adjourned them, he took notice, "that they had offered him no advice towards the composing the dissensions in religion; and therefore he would try, in that short adjournment of the parliament, what he could do towards it himself."

And thereupon he was himself present many days, and for many hours each day, at a conference between many of the London ministers, who were the heads of the presbyterian party, with an equal number of the orthodox clergy, who had been for so many years deprived of all that they had: which conference was held at Worcester house in the chancellor's lodgings, to consider what ceremonies should be retained in the church, and what alterations should be made in the liturgy that had been formerly used; and the substance of this conference was afterwards published in print. The king upon this published a declaration concerning ecclesiastical affairs, wherein he took notice "of the conference that had been in his own presence, and that he had commanded the clergy of both sides to meet together at the Savoy, in the master's lodgings, and, if it were possible, to agree upon such an act of uniformity, that might be confirmed in parliament." And in the mean time he signified his pleasure, "that nobody should be punished for not using The Book of Common Prayer which had been formerly established, or for discontinuing the surplice, and the sign of the cross; and that all who desired to conform to the old practice in the using them all, should be at the same liberty:" which declaration was read to, and put into the hands of the divines of both sides for some days; and then they were again heard before his majesty at Worcester [house]. And though it cannot be denied, that either party did desire that somewhat might be put in, and somewhat left out, in neither of which they were gratified; yet it is most true, they were both well content with it, or seemed so. And the declaration was published in his majesty's name before the return of the parliament.

Here I cannot but instance two acts of the presbyterians, by which, if their humour and spirit were not enough discovered and known, their want of ingenuity and integrity would be manifest; and how impossible it is for men who would not be deceived to depend on either. When the declaration had been delivered to the ministers, there was a clause in it, in which the king declared "his own constant practice of The Common Prayer; and that he would take it well from those who used it in their churches, that the common people might be again acquainted with the piety, gravity, and devotion of it; and which he thought would facilitate their living in a good neighbourhood together;" or words to that effect. When they had considered the whole some days, Mr. Calamy and some other ministers, deputed by the rest, came to the chancellor to redeliver it to his hands. They acknowledged "the king had been very gracious to them in his concessions; though he had [not] granted all that some of their brethren wished, yet they were

"contented:" only desired him, "that he would prevail with the king, that the clause mentioned before might be left out; which," they protested, "was moved by them for the king's own end, and that they might shew their obedience to him, and resolution to do him service. For they were resolved themselves to do what the king wished; and first to reconcile the people, who for near twenty years had not been acquainted with that form, by informing them that it contained much piety and devotion, and might be lawfully used; and then that they would begin to use it themselves, and by degrees accustom the people to it: which," they said, "would have a better effect, than if the clause were in the declaration; for they should be thought in their persuasions to comply only with the king's recommendation, and to merit from his majesty, and not to be moved from the conscience of the duty; and so they should [take] that occasion to manifest their zeal to please the king. And they feared there would be other ill consequences from it, by the wardness of the common people, who were to be treated with skill, and would not be prevailed upon all at once." The king was to be present the next morning, to hear the declaration read the last time before both parties; and then the chancellor told him, in the presence of all the rest, what the ministers had desired; which they again enlarged upon with the same protestations of their resolutions, in such a manner, that his majesty believed they meant honestly; and the clause was left out. But the declaration was no sooner published, than, observing that the people were generally satisfied with it, they sent their emissaries abroad: and many of their letters were intercepted; and particularly a letter from Mr. Calamy to a leading minister in Somersetshire; whereby he advised and entreated him, "that he and his friends would continue and persist in the use of 'The Directory; and by no means admit The Common Prayer in their churches; for that he made no question but that they should prevail further with the king, than he had yet consented to in his declaration."

The other instance was, that as soon as the declaration was printed, the king received a petition in the name of the ministers of London, and many others of the same opinion with them, who had subscribed that petition; amongst whom none of those who had attended the king in those conferences had their names. They gave his majesty humble thanks "for the grace he had vouchsafed to shew in his declaration, which they received as an earnest of his future goodness and condescension in granting all those other concessions, which were absolutely necessary for the liberty of their conscience;" and desired, with much importunity and ill manners, "that the wearing the surplice, and the using the cross in baptism, might be absolutely abolished out of the church, as being scandalous to all men of tender consciences." From those two instances, all men may conclude, that nothing but a severe execution of the law can ever prevail upon that class of men to conform to government.

When the parliament came together again after their adjournment, they gave the king public thanks for his declaration, and never proceeded further in the matter of religion; of which the king was very glad: only some of the leaders brought a bill into the house "for the making that declaration a law;" which was suitable to their other acts of ingenuity, to keep the church for ever under the same indulgence, and without any settlement; which being quickly perceived, there was no further progress in it. And the king, upon the nine and twentieth of December, after having given them an ample testimony of their kindness towards him, which he magnified with many gracious expressions, and his royal thanks for the settling his revenue, and payment of the public debts, promised "to send out writs for the calling another parliament, which he doubted not would confirm all that they had done; and in which he hoped many of them would be elected again to serve:" and so dissolved the present parliament with as general an applause as hath been known; though it was quickly known, that the revenue they had settled was not in value equal to what they had computed. Nor did the monies they granted in any degree arise to enough to pay either the arrears to the army or the debts to the navy; both which must be the work of the ensuing parliament; which was directed to meet upon the eighth of May following: before which time, the king made choice of worthy and learned men to supply the vacant sees of bishops, which had been void so many years, and who were consecrated accordingly before the parliament met. And before we come to that time, some particular occurrences of moment must be first inserted.

When the king arrived in England, monsieur Bordeaux was there ambassador from the king of France, and had resided ambassador there about three years in Cromwell's time, and lived in marvellous lustre, very acceptable and dear to Cromwell, having treated all the secret alliance between the cardinal and him; and was even trusted by the protector in many of his counsels, especially to discover any conspiracy against him; for he lived jovially, made great entertainments to lords and ladies without distinction, and amongst them would frequently let [fall] some expressions of compassion and respect towards the king. After Cromwell's death, his credentials were quickly renewed to Richard his successor, with whom all the former treaties were again established. And when he was put down, he was not long without fresh credit to the commonwealth that succeeded: and so upon all vicissitudes was supplied with authority to endear his master's affection to the present powers, and to let them know, "how well the cardinal was disposed to join the power of France to their interest." And his dexterity had been such towards all, that the cardinal thought fit to send him new credentials against the time of the king's coming to London. And within few days after, when he had provided a new equipage to appear in more glory than he had ever yet done, he sent to desire an audience from the king.

The earl of St. Alban's was newly come from France; and to him Bordeaux had applied himself, who was always very ready to promote any thing that might be grateful to that crown. But the king would not resolve any thing in the point, till he had conferred upon it with the council: where it being debated, there was an unanimous consent, (the earl of St. Alban's only excepted, who exceedingly laboured the contrary,) "that it "could not stand with his majesty's honour to receive him as ambassador, who had transacted so many things to his disadvantage, and shifted his face so often, always in conjunction with his greatest enemies; and that it was a great disrespect in the crown of France towards his majesty in sending such a person, who they could not believe (without great undervaluing the king) could be acceptable to him." The king himself was of that opinion; and instead of assigning him a day for his audience, as was desired, he sent him an express command to depart the kingdom. And when he afterwards, with much importunity, desired only to be admitted as a stranger to see his majesty, and to speak to him, his majesty as positively refused to admit him to his presence. All which was imputed principally to the chancellor, who had with some warmth opposed his being received as ambassador; and when he sent by a person well enough esteemed by the chancellor, "that he would receive a visit from him," he expressly refused to see him. Whoever gave the advice, the king had great honour by it in France itself, which declared no kind of resentment of it; and gave poor Bordeaux such a reception, after having served them five years with notable success, and spent his whole estate in the service, that in a short time he died heart-broken in misery, and uninquired after. And forthwith that king sent the count of Soissons, the most illustrious person in France, very nobly accompanied and bravely attended, as his ambassador, to congratulate his majesty's happy restoration, with all the compliments of friendship and esteem that can be imagined.

There was another ambassador at the same time in London, who might be thought to stand in the same predicament with Bordeaux, though in truth their cases were very different, and who received a very different treatment. That was the ambassador of Portugal, who had been sent by that crown to finish a treaty that had been begun by another ambassador with Cromwell, who had been so ill used, that they had put his brother publicly to death for a rash action in which a gentleman had been killed; upon which he had got leave from his master to quit the kingdom. And this other ambassador had been sent in his [room]; and was forced to consent and submit to very hard conditions, as a ransom for that king's generosity in assisting the king in his lowest condition, by receiving prince Rupert with his majesty's fleet in Lisbon, and so preserving them from a fleet much superior in number and goodness of the ships, that pursued him by commission from Cromwell: who took that action so to heart, that he made war upon that kingdom, took their ships, obstructed their trade, and blocked up all their ports; whilst the Spanish army invaded them at land, and took their towns in the very heart of the kingdom. And to redeem that poor king from that terrible persecution, that treaty had been submitted to; in which, besides the yearly payment of a great sum of money from Portugal, which was to continue for many years, other great advantages in trade had been granted to England. The king made no scruple of receiving this ambassador with a very good countenance; and as soon as he got his credentials, gave him a public audience, with all the formality and ceremony that in those cases are usual and necessary.

And because in some time after a negotiation was set on foot of the highest importance, and [had] its effect in the king's marriage with the queen; and because, how acceptable soever both that treaty and conclusion of it was then to the whole kingdom, that affair was afterwards imputed to the chancellor, and in the opinion of many proved to be the cause and ground of all his misfortunes; I shall here set down all the particulars that introduced and attended that negotiation and treaty, with all the circumstances, some whereof may appear too light, and yet are not without weight, to make it appear to all the world, how far the chancellor was from being the author of that counsel, (and if he had been, there was no reason to be ashamed of it,) and that he did nothing before, in, or after that treaty, but what was necessary for a man in his condition, and what very well became a person of that trust and confidence he was in with his master.

It hath been remembered before, that upon the publication of the duke's marriage, and the reconciliation upon that affair, the chancellor was very solicitous that the king himself would marry; that he desired the marquis of Ormond very earnestly to advise him to it: and himself often put his majesty in mind of what he had said to him in France, when the duke was persuaded to treat about a marriage with mademoiselle de Longueville, "that his majesty was by no means to consent, that his heir apparent should marry before himself were married," for which he had given some reasons; for which at that time he underwent great displeasures. And this discourse he had held often with the king; and sure no man in England more impatiently desired to see him married than he did. Indeed it was no easy matter to find a person in all respects so fit, that a man would take upon him to propose in particular; nor did he think himself in many respects, and with reference to the accidents which might probably or possibly fall out, fit, if he could have thought of one, to be the author of the proposition.

One day the king came to the chancellor's house in the afternoon; and being alone with him, his majesty told him, "that he was come to confer with him upon an argument that he would well like, which was about his own marriage;" he said, "the lord chamberlain" (who was then earl of Manchester) "had held a discourse with him some days past, that seemed to have somewhat in it that was worth the thinking of. That he had told him, the Portugal ambassador had made him a visit, and having some conference with him concerning the king, towards whose person he professed a profound respect, he said it was time for his majesty to think of marriage; which nothing could keep him from, but the difficulty of finding a fit consort for him. That there was in Portugal a princess, in her beauty, person, and age, very fit for him, and who would have a portion suitable to her birth and quality. That it is true she was a catholic, and would never depart from her religion; but was totally without that meddling and activity in her nature, which many times made those of that religion troublesome and restless, when they came into a country where another religion was practised. That she had been bred under a wise mother, who was still regent in that kingdom, who had

"carefully infused another spirit into her, and kept her from affecting to have any hand in business, and which she had never been acquainted with; so that she would look only to enjoy her own religion, and not at all concern herself in what others professed. That he had authority to make the proposition to the king, with such particularities as included many advantages above any, he thought, which could accompany any overture of that kind from another prince. To which the chamberlain had added, that there could be no question, but that a protestant queen would in all respects be looked upon as the greatest blessing to the kingdom: but if such a one could not be found, he did really believe, that a princess of this temper and spirit would be the best of all catholics. That the trade of Portugal was great here, and that England had a more beneficial commerce with that crown than with any other: which had induced Cromwell to make that peace, when he had upon the matter forsworn it; and the making it had been the most popular action he had ever performed."

His majesty said, "that he had only answered the chamberlain, that he would think of it. But that the very morning of this day, the ambassador of Portugal had been with him, and without any formality had entered into the same discourse, and said all that the lord chamberlain had mentioned: to which he added, that he had authority to offer to his majesty five hundred thousand pounds sterling in ready money, as a portion with the infanta; and likewise to assign over, and for ever to annex to the crown of England, the possession of Tangier upon the African shore in the Mediterranean sea, a place of that strength and importance, as would be of infinite benefit and security to the trade of England; and likewise to grant to the English nation a free trade in Brasil and in the East Indies, which they had hitherto denied to all nations but themselves. And for their security to enjoy that privilege, they would put into his majesty's hands and possession, and for ever annex to the crown of England, the island of Bombayne, (with the towns and castles therein, which are within a very little distance from Brasil;) which hath within itself a very good and spacious harbour, and would be a vast improvement to the East India trade. And those two places," he said, "of Tangier and Bombayne, might reasonably be valued above the portion in money." The king mentioned all the discourse as a matter that pleased him, and might prove of notable advantage to the kingdom; and said, "that he had wished the ambassador to confer with him (the chancellor) upon it;" and then asked him "what he thought of it;" to which he answered, "that he had not heard of it enough to think of it," (for he had never heard or thought of it before that moment;) and therefore he should not be able to do more when the ambassador came to him, than to hear what he said, and report it to his majesty. For the present he only asked, whether his majesty had given over all thoughts of a protestant wife:" to which he answered, "he could find none such, except amongst his own subjects; and amongst them he had seen none that pleased him enough to that end." And observing the chancellor to look fixedly upon him, he said, "that he would never think more of the princess of Orange's daughter, her mother having used him so ill when he proposed it; and if he should now think of it, he knew his mother would never consent to it, and that it would break his sister's heart: therefore he had resolved never to entertain that thought again. And that he saw no objection against this overture from Portugal, that would not occur [in] any other, where the advantages would not be so many or so great."

What could the chancellor say? What objection could he make, why this overture should not be hearkened to? And what would the king have thought, or what might he not have thought, if he had advised him to reject this motion? He gave him no other answer for the present, than "that he desired nothing more in this world, than to see his majesty well married; and he was very confident that all his good subjects were of the same mind: and therefore there must be some very visible inconvenience in [it], when he should dissuade him not to embrace such an opportunity. That he would be ready to confer with the Portugal ambassador when he came, and then he should entertain his majesty further upon that subject." The ambassador came to him, repeated what he said and proposed to the king, with little other enlargement, than concerning the benefit England would receive by the two places of Tangier and Bombayne, and the description of their situation and strength; of all which the chancellor gave his majesty a faithful account, without presuming to mingle with it a word of his own advice. The king appeared abundantly pleased, and willing to proceed further; and asked "what was next [to be] done:" to which he answered, "that it was a matter of too great importance for him to deliver any opinion upon; indeed too great for his majesty himself to resolve, upon the private advice of any one man, how agreeable soever it should be to his own inclination and judgment." And therefore he desired him "that he would call to him four or five persons, whom he thought to be the most competent considerers of such an affair, and consult it very maturely with them, before he entertained any more conference with the ambassador. For whatsoever he should [resolve] upon it, it ought yet to be kept in all possible secrecy: if it should be thought fit to be rejected, it ought to be without the least noise, and the least reflection upon the overture, which had been made with all the possible demonstration of esteem: if it should appear worthy of entertainment and acceptance, it would still require the same secrecy; till the value and consequence of all the particulars proposed by the ambassador might be fully examined and weighed, and a more particular and substantial assurance given for the accomplishment, than the bare word of the ambassador."

The king appointed that the lord treasurer, the marquis of Ormond, the lord chamberlain, and secretary Nicholas, should be together at the chancellor's house, where his majesty would likewise be and propose the business to them. And accordingly he did relate to them the whole series of what had passed, and required them "with all possible freedom to deliver [their] opinions, and to consider whether there was any other "princess or lady in their view, with whom he might marry more advantageously." He added, "that he had spoken both with the earl of Sandwich and sir John Lawson occasionally and merely as loose discourse, what place Tangier was, which he pointed to in the map, and whether it was well known to them: and they both said, they knew it well from sea. But that sir John Lawson had been in it, and said, it was a place of that importance, that if it were in the hands of the Hollanders, they would quickly make a mole, which they might easily do; that now ships could not ride there in such a wind," which his majesty named; "but if there were a mole, they would ride securely in all weather; and they would keep the place against all the world, and give the law to all the trade of the Mediterranean:" with which discourse his majesty seemed very much affected. After many questions and much debate, and some of the lords wishing that it were possible to get a queen that was a protestant, and one of them naming the daughter of Harry prince of Orange, of whom they had heard some mention when his majesty was beyond the seas, and of whose elder sister (then married to the elector of Brandenburg) there had been some discourse in the life of the late king; (but his majesty quickly declared, "that he had very unanswerable reasons why he could not entertain that alliance:") all the lords unanimously agreed, "that there was no catholic princess in Europe, whom his majesty could with so much reason and advantage marry, as the infanta of Portugal. That the portion proposed in money, setting aside the places, was much greater, almost double to what any king had ever received in money by any marriage. And the places seemed to be situated very usefully for trade, the increase whereof his majesty was to endeavour with all possible solicitude; which could only make this nation flourish, and recover the interest they had lost, especially in the Indies and in the Mediterranean, by the late troubles and distractions, and the advantage the Dutch had thereby gotten over the English in those trades, as well as in other." The king approved all that had been said, and thereupon appointed all those lords with the same secrecy to enter into a treaty with the ambassador; which was begun between them accordingly.

The treaty neither was nor could be a secret; nor was there any thing more generally desired, than that a treaty of alliance and commerce should be made with Portugal, that the trade might continue with security: and it was very grateful to every body to know, that there was a committee appointed to that purpose. But the proposition towards a marriage was still a secret, not communicated to any, nor so much as suspected by the Spanish ambassador, who did all he could to obstruct the very treaty of alliance; of whose proceedings there will be occasion to make mention anon by itself. The ambassador offered "to renew the treaty (if that of the marriage was consented to 'in terminis,') that had been made [with] Cromwell, without being so much as exempted from that yearly payment, which had been imposed upon them for assisting prince Rupert," and had been assigned to the merchants to satisfy the damages they had sustained by prince Rupert; and the release whereof must have obliged the king to pay it himself: and therefore that offer was looked upon as a generous thing. And the whole treaty, which they had not yet perused, was generally looked upon and believed to be the most advantageous to England, that had been ever entered into with any crown.

It had been foreseen from the first motion towards this marriage, that it would be a very hard [matter] with such alliance, to avoid such a conjunction with Portugal, as would produce a war with Spain; which the king had no mind to be engaged in. For besides that he had received some civilities from that king, after a world of disobligations, his resident at Madrid, sir Harry Bennet, had consented in his majesty's name, that the old treaty which had been made between the two crowns in the year 1630, should be again observed; of which more anon. But his majesty's firm resolution at that time was, wholly to intend the composing or subduing the distempers and ill humours in his three kingdoms and all his other dominions; and till that should be fully done, he would have no difference with any of his neighbours, nor be engaged in any war which he could avoid: a resolution very prudently made; and if it had been adhered to, much evil which succeeded the departure from it, might have been prevented.

But the lords found, upon perusal of the treaty, one article (which was indeed the only article that made any show of benefit and advantage to Portugal) by which Cromwell was obliged to assist Portugal when they should require it, with six thousand foot, to be levied in England at their charge. And now the ambassador urged, "that in consideration of the marriage, the portion, the delivery of those places, and his majesty's own interest by that marriage in Portugal, which upon the death of the king and his brother must devolve to his majesty; he would take upon him the protection of that kingdom, and denounce war with Spain:" to which his majesty warmly and positively answered, "that he would admit no such engagement; that he was not in a condition to make a war, till he could not avoid it. He would do what was lawful for him to do; he could choose a wife for himself, and he could help a brother and ally with a levy of men at their charge, without entering into a war with any other prince. And if Spain should, either upon his marriage or such supply, declare a war against him, he would defend himself as well as he could, and do as much damage as he could to Spain; and then that he would apply such assistance to Portugal, as should be most advantageous to it: and that he should not be willing to see it reduced under the obedience of Spain for many reasons. That in the mean time he would assist them with the same number as Cromwell had promised, and transport them at his own charge thither; provided that as soon as they were landed, they should be received in the king of Portugal's pay:" which offer the king made upon a reason not then communicated, and which will be mentioned hereafter; besides that he had such a body of men ready for such a service, and which could with much more security and little more charge be transported to Portugal, than be disbanded in the place where they were.

When the ambassador found that the king would not be persuaded to enter directly into a war with Spain, though he offered "to put Barcelona into his hands, of which don Joseph Margarita," (a person who had conducted the revolt of that city, and all the rebellion which had been lately in Catalonia,) "then in Paris, should come over and give unquestionable assurance," (all which, with many other propositions of the same nature, his majesty totally rejected;) he concluded, that the alliance and marriage would give a present reputation to Portugal, and make impression upon the spirits of Spain, and that a war would hereafter fall out unavoidably: and so accepted what the king had offered. And then there remained nothing to be done, but to give unquestionable security to the king, for the performance of all the particulars which had been promised; and for which there appeared yet no other warrant, than letters and instructions to the ambassador from the queen regent. And for further satisfaction therein, the ambassador offered "presently to pass into Portugal, and doubted not, in as short a time as could be expected, to return with such power and authority, and such a full concession of what had been proposed, as should be very satisfactory:" which his majesty well liked; and writ himself to the queen regent and to the king such letters, as signified "his full resolution for the marriage, if all the particulars promised by the ambassador in writing should be made good;" and writ likewise a letter with his own hand to the infanta, as to a lady whom he looked upon as his wife; and assigned two ships to attend the ambassador, who immediately, and with some appearance or pretence of discontent or dissatisfaction, (that the secret might be the less discovered,) embarked with all his family for the river of Lisbon. And to this time the chancellor had never mentioned any particular advice of his own to the king, more than his concurrence with the rest of the lords; nor in truth had any of them shewed more inclination towards it, than the king himself had done, who seemed marvellously pleased, and had spoken much more in private with the ambassador upon it, than any of the lords had done, and of some particulars which they were never acquainted with.

That I may not break off the thread of this discourse till I bring it to a conclusion, nor leave out any important particular that related to that subject, I shall in this place make mention of a little cloud or eclipse, raised by the activity and restlessness of the earl of Bristol, that seemed to interpose and darken the splendour of this treaty, and to threaten the life thereof, by extinguishing it in the bud: upon which occasion the chancellor thought himself obliged to appear more for it, than he had hitherto done; and which afterwards (how unjustly soever) was turned to his reproach. This earl, (who throughout the whole course of his life frequently administered variety of discourse, that could not be applied to any other man,) upon the defeat of sir George Booth, when all the king's hopes in England seemed desperate, had not the patience to expect another change that presently succeeded; but presently changed his religion, and declared himself a Roman catholic, that he might with undoubted success apply himself to the service of Spain, to which the present good acceptance he had with don Juan was the greater encouragement. He gave account by a particular letter to the pope of this his conversion, which was delivered by the general of the Jesuits; in return of which he received a customary brief from his sanctity, with the old piece of scripture never left out in those occasions, "Tu conversus converte fratres tuos."

The noise and scandal of this defection and apostasy in a sworn counsellor of the king, and one of his secretaries of state, made it necessary for the king to remove him from both those trusts, which he had made himself incapable to execute by the laws of England, and which he proposed to himself to enjoy with the more advantage by his change; and believed that the king, who seemed to have no other hopes towards his restoration than in catholic princes, would not think this a season in ordinary policy to disgrace a servant of his eminency and relation, for no other reason than his becoming catholic, by which he should have so many opportunities to serve his master. And this he had the confidence to urge to the king, before he was obliged to deliver the signet, and to forbear the being present any more in council. And this displacing and remove he imputed entirely to his old friend the chancellor, (with whom till that minute he had for many years held a very firm friendship,) and the more, because he received from his majesty the same countenance he had before, without any reprehension for what he had done; the king not being at all surprised with his declaration, because he had long known that he was very indifferent in all matters of religion, and looked upon the outward profession of any, as depending wholly upon the convenience or discommodity that might be enjoyed by it. And with such discourses he had too much entertained the king, who never would speak seriously with him upon that subject. And truly his own relation of the manner of his conversion, with all the circumstances, and the discourse of an ignorant old Jesuit, whom he perfectly contemned, and of a simple good woman, the abbess of a convent, which contributed to it, was so ridiculous, and administered such occasion of mirth, that his majesty thought laughing at him to be the best reproof. And the earl bore that so well and gratefully from the king, and from his other familiar friends too, (for he dissembled his taking any thing ill of the chancellor,) and contributed so much himself to the mirth, that he was never better company than upon that argument: and any man would have believed, that he had not a worse opinion of the religion he had forsaken, or of any other, by his becoming Roman catholic.

When the king made his journey to Fuentarabia, to the treaty between the two crowns, the earl of Bristol's irresistible importunity prevailed with him to permit him to go likewise, though his majesty had received advertisement from sir Harry Bennet, that don Lewis de Haro desired that he might not come with his majesty thither. The least part of the mischief he did in that journey was, that he prevailed with the king to make so many diversions and delays in it, that the treaty was concluded before he came thither, and he was very near being disappointed of all the fruit he had proposed to himself to receive from it. However it was finished so much the better, that he left the earl behind him; who, in the short time of his stay there, had so far insinuated himself into the grace and good opinion of don

Lewis de Haro, who came with all the prejudice and detestation imaginable towards him, (as he had to his extraordinary parts a marvellous faculty of getting himself believed,) that he was well content that he should go with him to Madrid, where the king, upon the memory of his father, (who had deserved well from that crown, or rather had suffered much for not having deserved ill,) received him graciously. And there he resided in the resident's house, who had been his servant, in such a repose as was agreeable to his fancy, that he might project his own fortune; which was the only thing his heart was set upon, and of which he despaired in his own country.

The news of the king's miraculous restoration quickly arrived at Madrid, and put an end to the earl's further designs, believing he could not do better abroad than he might do in his own country; and so he undertook his journey through France, laden with many obligations from that court, and arrived at London about the time that the ambassador was embarked for Portugal. The king of Spain had, soon after the king's arrival in England, sent the prince of Lygnes with a very splendid ambassage to congratulate with his majesty, about the time that the count of Soissons came from France on the same errand. And after his return, the baron of Batteville was sent from Spain as ordinary ambassador, a man born in Burgundy in the Spanish quarters, and bred a soldier; in which profession he was an officer of note, and at that time was governor of St. Sebastian's and of that province. He seemed a rough man, and to have more of the camp, but in truth knew the intrigues of a court better than most Spaniards; and, except when his passion surprised him, wary and cunning in his negotiation. He lived with less reservation and more jollity than the ministers of that crown used to do; and drew such of the court to his table and conversation, who he observed were loud talkers, and confident enough in the king's presence.

In the first private audience he had, he delivered a memorial to his majesty; in which he required "the delivery of the island of Jamaica to his master, it having been taken by his rebel subjects contrary to the treaty of peace between the two crowns; and likewise that his majesty would cause Dunkirk and Mardike to be restored to his catholic majesty, they having not only been taken contrary to that treaty, but when his majesty was entertained in that king's dominions with all courtesy and respect." And he likewise required, in the king his master's name, "that the king would not give any assistance, nor enter into any treaty of alliance with Portugal: for that, the same as the rest, was directly contrary to the last treaty, which was now again revived and stood in force by the declaration of his majesty's resident at Madrid;" which was the first notice any of his majesty's ministers had of any such declaration. But when he had delivered those memorials to the king, he never called for an answer, nor willingly entered upon the discourse of either of the subjects; but put it off merely as a thing he was to do of form once, that his master's just title might be remembered, but not to be pressed till a fitter conjuncture. For he easily discovered what answer he should receive: and so took the advantage of the license of the court, where no rules or formalities were yet established, (and to which the king himself was not enough inclined,) but all doors open to all persons. Which the ambassador finding, he made himself a domestic, came to the king at all hours, and spake to him when and as long as he would, without any ceremony, or desiring an audience according to the old custom; but came into the bedchamber whilst the king was dressing himself, and mingled in all discourses with the same freedom he would use in his own. And from this never heard of license, introduced by the French and the Spaniard at this time without any dislike in the king, though not permitted in any other court in Christendom, many inconveniences and mischiefs broke in, which could never after be shut out.

As soon as the earl of Bristol came to the court, he was very willing to be looked upon as wholly devoted to the Spanish interest; and so made a particular friendship with the Spanish ambassador, with whom he had a former acquaintance whilst the king had been at Fuentarabia, that he might give a testimony of his gratitude for the favours he had received so lately at Madrid. The king received him with his accustomed good countenance; and he had an excellent talent in spreading that leaf-gold very thin, that it might look much more than it was: and took pains by being always in his presence, and often whispering in his ear, and talking upon some subjects with a liberty not ingrateful, to have it believed that he was more than ordinarily acceptable to his majesty. And the king, not wary enough against those invasions, did communicate more to him of the treaty with Portugal, than he had done to any other person, except those [who] were immediately trusted in it.

The earl had always promised himself (though he knew he could not be of the council, nor in any ministry of state, by reason of his religion) that he was in so good esteem with his majesty and with most of those who were trusted by him, that he should have a great share in all foreign affairs, and should be consulted with in all matters of that kind, in regard of the long experience he had in foreign parts; which indeed amounted to no more, than a great exactness in the languages of those parts. And therefore he was surprised with the notice of this affair, and presently expressed his dislike of it, and told his majesty, "that he would be exceedingly deceived in it; that Portugal was poor, and not able to pay the portion they had promised. That now it was forsaken by France, Spain would overrun and reduce it in one year;" enlarging upon the great preparations which were made for that expedition, "of which don Lewis de Haro himself would be general, and was sure of a great party in Portugal itself, that was weary of that government: so that that miserable family had no hope, but by transporting themselves and their poor party in their ships to Brasil, and their other large territories in the East Indies, which were possessed only by Portugesees, who might possibly be willing to be subject to them. And that this was so much in the view of all men, that it was all the care Spain had to prevent it." The king did not inform him, that he had concluded any thing, and that the ambassador was gone for more ample powers to satisfy his majesty, that all that was promised should be performed.

The earl, who valued himself upon his great faculty in obstructing and puzzling any thing that was agreed upon, and in contriving whereof he had no hand, repaired to the Spanish ambassador, and informed him, under obligation of secrecy, of what treaty the king was entered upon with Portugal by the advice of the chancellor; which he hoped "that they two should find some means to break." But the ambassador's breast was not large enough to contain that secret that burned his entrance. He talked of it in all places with great passion, and then took it up as from common report, and spake to the king of it, and said, "the Portugal ambassador had in his vanity bragged of it to some catholics, and promised them great things upon it; none of which he was confident could be true, and that his majesty could never be prevailed with to consent to such a treaty, which would prove ruinous to himself and his kingdom; for the king of Spain could not but resent it to such a degree, as would bring great inconvenience to his affairs." And his majesty forbearing to give him any answer, at least not such a one as pleased him, his rage transported him to undervalue the person of the infanta. He said, "she was deformed, and had many diseases; and that it was very well known in Portugal and in Spain, that she was incapable to bear children;" and many particulars of that nature.

When he had said the same things several days to the king, the earl of Bristol took his turn again, and told the king other things which the ambassador had communicated to him in trust, and which he durst not presume to say to his majesty, and which in truth he had said himself, being concerning the person of the infanta, and her incapacity to have children; upon which he enlarged very pathetically, and said, "he would speak freely with the chancellor of it, upon whom the ill consequences of this counsel would fall." He told him, "there were many beautiful ladies in Italy, of the greatest houses; and that his majesty might take his choice of them, and the king of Spain would give a portion with her, as if she were a daughter of Spain; and the king should marry her as such." And the ambassador shortly after proposed the same thing, and enlarged much upon it. And both the earl and the ambassador conferred with the chancellor (concealing the propositions they had made concerning the Italian ladies) "as of a matter the town talked of and exceedingly disliked, the more because it was generally known, that that princess could not have any children." The king himself had informed the chancellor of all that passed from the ambassador, and of his rudeness towards the infanta, and his declaring that she could have no children; and told him, "that the earl of Bristol resolved to confer with him, and doubted not to convert him;" without seeming himself to have been moved with any thing that the ambassador or the earl had said to him: so that when they both came afterwards to him, not together but severally, and he perceived that his majesty had not to either of them imparted how far he had proceeded, (but had heard them talk as of somewhat they had taken up from public rumour, and had himself discoursed of it as sprung from such a fountain,) the chancellor did not take himself to be at liberty to enter into a serious debate of the matter with them; but permitted them to enjoy the pleasure of their own opinion, and to believe that either there had been no inclination to such a treaty, or that the weight of their reasons would quickly enervate it.

Whether the king grew less inclined to marry, and liked the liberty he enjoyed too well to be willing to be restrained; or whether what had been said to him of the infanta's person, and her unaptness for children, had made some impression in him; or whether the earl of Bristol's describing the persons of the Italian ladies, and magnifying their conversations (in which arguments he had naturally a very luxurious style, unlimited by any rules of truth or modesty;) it is not to be denied, that his majesty appeared much colder, and less delighted to speak of Portugal, than he had been, and would sometimes [wish] "that the ambassador had not gone, and that he would quickly return without commission to give his majesty satisfaction." He seemed to reflect upon a war with Spain, "which," he said, "could not possibly be avoided in that alliance," with more apprehension than he had formerly done, when that contingency had been debated. All which discourses troubled the lords who had been trusted, very much, not conceiving that the ambassador's frantic discourse could have any weight in it, or that the earl of Bristol (whose levity and vanity was enough known to the king) could make that impression in him. However, it appeared, that the earl was much more in private with him than he had used to be, many hours shut up together; and when the king came from him, that he seemed to be perplexed and full of thoughts.

One morning the earl came to the chancellor, and after some compliments and many protestations of his inviolable friendship, he told him, "he was come to take his leave of him for some months, being to begin a long journey as soon as he should part with him; for he had already kissed the king's hand: and his friendship would not permit him to be reserved towards him, and to keep a secret of that vast importance from his knowledge." He said, "that the king had heard such unanswerable reasons against this marriage with Portugal, that he was firmly resolved never more to entertain a thought of it; that the Spanish ambassador had recommended two princesses to him, whereof he might take his choice, of incomparable beauty and all excellent parts of mind, who should be endowed as a daughter of Spain by that king, to whom they were allied;" and so named the ladies. He said, "this discourse had prevailed very far upon the king, as a thing that could raise no jealousies in France, with whom he desired so to live, that he might be sure to have peace in his own dominions. There was only one thing in which he desired to be better satisfied, which was the persons, beauties, and good humours of the princesses; and that he had so good an opinion of his judgment, that he was confident if he saw them, he would easily know whether either of them were like to please his majesty; and would so far trust him, that if he did believe, knowing his majesty so well as he did, that one of them would be grateful, he should carry power with him to propound and conclude a treaty; which," he said, "he carried with him, and likewise other letters, upon which he should first find such access and admission, as would enable him to judge of their nature and humour as well as of their beauty." He seemed much transported with the great trust reposed in him, and with the assurance that he should make the king and kingdom happy. And he said, "one reason, besides his friendship, that had made him impart this great secret, was a presumption, that now he knew how far his majesty was disposed and in truth engaged in this particular, he would not do any thing to cross or interrupt the design." The chancellor, enough amazed, by some questions found he was utterly uninformed, how far the king stood engaged in Portugal; and knowing the incredible power the earl had over himself, to make him believe any thing he had a mind should be true, he used little more discourse with him than "to wish him a good journey."

Upon the first opportunity he told the king all that the earl had said to him; with which his majesty seemed not pleased, as expecting that the secret should have been kept better. He did not dissemble his not wishing that the treaty with Portugal might succeed; and confessed "that he had sent the earl of Bristol to see some ladies in Italy, who were highly extolled by the Spanish ambassador," but denied that he had given him such powers as he bragged of. The chancellor thereupon asked him, "whether he well remembered his engagement, which he had voluntarily made, and without any body's persuasion, to the king and queen regent;" and desired him "to impart his new resolution to the lords who were formerly trusted by him. That probably he might find good reason and just arguments to break off the treaty with Portugal; which ought to be first done, before he embarked himself in another: otherwise that he would so far expose his honour to reproach, that all princes would be afraid of entering into any treaty with him." This was every word of persuasion, that he then or ever after used to him upon this affair; nor did it at that time seem to make any impression in him. However, he sent for the lord treasurer, and conferred at large with him and the lord marquis of Ormond. And finding them exceedingly surprised with what he had done, and that they gave the same and other stronger arguments against it than the other had done, his majesty seemed to recollect himself, and to think, that whatever resolution he should think fit to take in the end, that he had not chosen the best way and method of proceeding towards it; and resolved to call the earl back, "which," he said, "he could infallibly do by sir Kenelm Digby, who knew how to send a letter to him, before he had proceeded further in his journey, it having been before agreed, that he should make a halt in such and such places, to the end that he might be advertised of any new occurrences." And his majesty did write the same night to him "to return, because it was necessary to have some more conference with him." And the letter was sent by sir Kenelm Digby, and probably received by the earl in time. But he continued his journey into Italy; and after his return pretended not to have received that letter, or any other order to return, till it was too late, being at that time entered upon the borders or confines of Italy; in which he had not the good fortune to be believed.

The ambassador of Portugal despatched his voyage with more expedition than could have been expected, and returned, as he believed, with at least as full satisfaction to all particulars as could be expected; but found his reception with such a coldness, that struck the poor gentleman (who was naturally hypochondriac) to the heart; nor could he be informed from whence this distemper proceeded. And therefore he forbore to deliver his letters, which he thought might more expose the honour of his master and mistress to contempt, and remained quietly in his house, without demanding a second audience; until he could by some way or other be informed what had fallen out since his departure, that could raise those clouds which appeared in every man's looks. He saw the Spanish ambassador exceedingly exalted with the pride of having put an insolent affront upon the ambassador from France, which cost his master dear, and heard that he had bragged loudly of his having broken the treaty of Portugal. And it is very true, that he did every day somewhat either vainly or insolently, that gave the king [offence], or lessened the opinion he had of his discretion, and made him withdraw much of that countenance from him, which he had formerly given him. This, and the return of the Portuguese ambassador with a new title of marquis de Sande, (an evidence according to the custom of that court, that he had well served his master in his employment,) put him into new fury; so that he came to the king with new expostulations, and gave him a memorial, in which he said, "that he had order from his master to let his majesty know, that if his majesty should proceed towards a marriage with the daughter of the duke of Braganza, his master's rebel, he had order to take his leave presently, and to declare war against him." The king returned some sharp answer presently to him, and told him "he might be gone as soon as he would, and that he would not receive orders from the catholic king, how to dispose himself in marriage." Upon which the ambassador seemed to think he had gone too far; and the next day desired another audience, wherein he said, "he had received new orders: and that his catholic majesty had so great an affection for his majesty and the good of his affairs, that having understood that, in respect of the present distempers in religion, nothing could be more mischievous to him than to marry a catholic; therefore," he declared, "that if there were any protestant lady, who would be acceptable to his majesty," (and named the daughter of the princess dowager of Orange,) "the king of Spain would give a portion with her, as with a daughter of Spain; by which his majesty's affairs and occasions would be supplied."

The multiplying these and many other extravagancies made the king reflect upon all the ambassador's proceedings and behaviour, and revolve the discourses he had held with him; and to reconsider, whether they had not made greater impressions upon him, than the weight of them would bear. He had himself spoken with some who had seen the infanta, and described her to be a person very different from what the ambassador had delivered. He had seen a picture that was reported to be very like her; and upon the view of it his majesty said, "that person could not be unhandsome." And by degrees considering the many things alleged by the ambassador, which could not be known by him, and could result from nothing but his own malice, his majesty returned to his old resolution; and spake at large with the [Portugal] ambassador with his usual freedom, and received both the letters and information he brought with him, and declared "that he was fully satisfied in all the particulars."

Nor did the carriage of the Spanish ambassador contribute a little towards his majesty's resolution: for he, without any other ground than from his own fancy, (for the king had not declared his purpose to any, nor was the thing spoken of abroad,) and from what he collected from his majesty's sharp replies to his insolent expressions, took upon him to do an act of the highest extravagancy, that hath been done in Europe by the minister of any state in this age. He caused to be printed in English the copies of the memorials which he had presented to the king, and of the discourses he had made against the match with Portugal, with the offers the king of Spain had made to prevent so great a mischief to the kingdom, and other seditious papers to the same purpose; and caused those papers to be spread abroad in the army and amongst [the populace]; some whereof were cast out of his own windows amongst the soldiers, as they passed to and from the guard. Upon which unheard of misdemeanour, the king was so much incensed, that he sent the secretary of state "to require him forthwith to depart the kingdom, without seeing his majesty's face," which he would not admit him to do; and to let him know, "that he would send a complaint of his misbehaviour to the king his master, from whom he would expect that justice should be done upon him." The ambassador received this message with exceeding trouble and grief, even to tears, and desired, "to be admitted to see the king, and to make his humble submission, and to beg his pardon; which he was ready to do;" but that being denied, within few days he departed the kingdom, carrying with him the character of a very bold rash man.

There was an accident about this time, that it is probable did confirm the king in his resolution concerning Portugal. At this time cardinal Mazarine was dead, and had never been observed to be merry and to enjoy his natural pleasant humour, from the time of the king's restoration, which had deceived all his calculations, and broken all his measures. Upon his death the ministry was committed to three persons, (the king himself being still present at all their consultations,) monsieur de Tellier and monsieur de Lionne, the two secretaries of state, and monsieur Fouquet, surintendant of the finances and procureur général du roy, who was a man of extraordinary parts, and being not forty years of age, enjoyed his full vigour of body and mind, and in respect of his sole power over the finances was looked upon as the premier ministre. This man, as soon as he was in the business, sent an express into England with a letter to the chancellor. The messenger was La Basteede, who, having been secretary during the time of his being in England to Bordeaux whilst he was ambassador, spake English very well. He, as soon as he arrived, went to the chancellor's house, and desired one of his servants to let his lord know, "that he was newly come from France, and that he desired to be admitted to a private audience with him, where nobody else might be present;" and so he was brought into a back room, whither the chancellor came to him; to whom he presented a letter directed to him from monsieur Fouquet. The letter after general compliments took notice "of the great trust he had with his master; and that he being now admitted to a part of his master's most secret affairs, and knowing well the affection that was between the two kings, much desired to hold a close and secret correspondence together, which he presumed would be for the benefit of both their masters." The rest contained only a credential, "that he should give credit to all that the bearer should say, who was a person entirely trusted by him." And then he entered upon his discourse, consisting of these parts:

1. "That the king of France was troubled to hear, that there was some obstruction fallen out in the treaty with Portugal; and that it would be a very generous thing in his majesty to undertake the protection of that crown, which if it should fall into the possession of Spain, would be a great damage and a great shame to all the kings in Europe. That himself had heretofore thought of marrying the infanta of that kingdom, who is a lady of great beauty and admirable endowments; but that his mother and his then minister, and indeed all other princes, so much desired the peace between the crowns, that he was diverted from that design. And that for the perfecting that peace and his marriage with Spain, he had been compelled to desert Portugal for the present; and was obliged to send no kind of assistance thither, nor to receive any ambassador from thence, nor to have any there: all which he could not but observe for some time. But that Portugal was well assured of the continuance of his affection, and that he would find some opportunity by one way or other to preserve it. That he foresaw that his majesty might not be provided so soon after his return, in regard of his other great expenses, to disburse such a sum of money, as the sending a vigorous assistance, which was necessary, would require. But for that he would take care; and for the present cause to be paid to his majesty three hundred thousand pistoles, which would defray the charge of that summer's expedition; and for the future, provision should be made proportionable to the charge;" and concluded, "that he believed the king could not bestow himself better in marriage, than with the infanta of Portugal."

2. A second part was, "that there were now in France ambassadors from the States of the United Provinces, and the like in England, to renew the alliance with both crowns; which they hoped to do upon the disadvantageous terms they had used to obtain it. That those people were grown too proud and insolent towards all their neighbours, and treated all kings as if they were at least their equals: that France had been ill used by them, and was sensible of it; and that the king had not been much beholden to them." And therefore he proposed, "that both kings upon this occasion would so communicate their counsels, that they might reduce that people to live like good neighbours, "and with more good manners; and that they "would treat solely and advance together, and "that the one should promise not to conclude "any thing without communicating it to the "other: so that both treaties might be concluded together."

3. "That those particulars, and whatsoever "passed between M. Fouquet and the chancellor, "might be retained with wonderful secrecy; "which it would not be, if it were communicated "to the queen or the earl of St. Alban's," (who were at that time in France:) "and therefore his "Christian majesty desired, that neither of them "should know of this correspondence, or any "particular that passed by it."

When the gentleman had finished his discourse, the chancellor told him, "that he knew M. Fouquet to be so wise a man, that he would not "invite or enter into such a correspondence, "without the privacy and approbation of his master: and he presumed that he had likewise "so good an opinion of him, as to believe, that he "would first inform his majesty of all that he "received from him, before he would return any "answer himself. That he would take the first "opportunity to acquaint the king his master; "and if he would come the next day at the same "hour" (which was about four in the afternoon) "to the same place, he would return his answer."

The king came the next day before the hour assigned to the chancellor's house. And when he heard the gentleman was come, his majesty vouchsafed himself to go into that back room; and (the chancellor telling the other, "that he should be "witness to his majesty's approbation of his correspondence") took notice of the letter he had brought, and asked many kind questions concerning M. Fouquet, who was known to him, and told him, "that he was very well pleased with the "correspondence proposed; and that the chancellor should perform his part very punctually, "and with the secrecy that was desired; and that "he would give his own word, that the queen nor "the earl of St. Alban's should know nothing that "should pass in this correspondence:" which, the chancellor observing with the fidelity he ought to do, coming after to be known kindled a new jealousy and displeasure in the queen, that was never afterwards extinguished. The king told him, "he would upon the encouragement and "promise of the French king, of the performance "whereof he could make no doubt, proceed in "the treaty with Portugal; and give that kingdom the best assistance he could, without beginning a war with Spain. That for the treaty "with Holland, which was but newly begun," (for the States who had made choice of and nominated their ambassadors before the king left the Hague, did not send them in near six months after; which his majesty looked upon as a great disrespect,) "he would comply with what the king "desired; and that his Christian majesty should "from time to time receive an account how it "should advance, and that he would not conclude "any thing without his privacy." How ill both these engagements which related to Portugal and Holland were afterwards observed by France, is fit for another discourse by itself. The gentleman, much satisfied with what the king had said, proposed "that he would make a cipher against "the next day to be left in the chancellor's hand;

"because M. Fouquet desired, for preservation of "the secret, that the chancellor would always "write with his own hand in English, directed in "such a manner as he should propose; which "would always bring the letters safe to the hands "of him, La Basteede, who was appointed by the "king to keep that cipher, and to maintain that "correspondence."

There was another circumstance that attended this private negotiation, that may not be unfitly inserted here, and is a sufficient manifestation of the integrity of the chancellor, and how far he was from [being] that corrupt person, which his most corrupt enemies would have him thought to be. The next morning after he had seen the king, La Basteede came again, and desired an audience with the chancellor. He said, "he had somewhat else "in his instructions to say, which he had not yet "thought fit to offer." And from thence he entered in a confused manner to enlarge "upon "the great power, credit, and generosity of M. "Fouquet, the extent of his power and office, that "he could disburse and issue great sums of money "without any account so much as to the king "himself; without which liberty, the king knew "many secret services of the highest importance "could not be performed." He said, "he knew "the straits and necessities, in which the chancellor and others about the king had lived for "many years: and though he was now returned "with much honour, and in great trust with his "master, yet he did suppose he might be some "time without those furnitures of householdstuff "and plate, which the grandeur of his office and "place required. And therefore that he had sent "him a present, which in itself was but small, "and was only the earnest of as much every year, "which should be constantly paid, and more, if "he had occasion to use it; for M. Fouquet did "not look upon it as of moment to himself. But "he knew well the faction in all courts, and that "he must have many enemies; and if he did not "make himself friends by acts of generosity and "bounty, he must be oppressed; and that he had "designed this supply only to that purpose." He shewed him then bills of exchange and credit for the sum of ten thousand pounds sterling, to be paid at sight: and said, "that he had been "with the merchant, who would be ready to pay "it that afternoon; so that whoever he would "please to appoint should receive it." The chancellor had heard him with much indignation, and answered him warmly, "that if this correspondence must expose him to such a reproach, he "should unwillingly enter into it; and wished "him to tell M. Fouquet, that he would only receive wages from his own master." The gentleman so little looked for a refusal, that he would not understand it; but persisted to know "who "should receive the money, which," he said, "should be paid in such a manner, that the person who paid it should never know to whom it "was paid; and that it should always remain a "secret;" still pressing it with importunity, till the other went with manifest anger out of the room.

That afternoon the king and duke (who was likewise informed of the correspondence) came to the chancellor, and found him out of humour. He told him, "that Fouquet could not be an "honest man, and that he had no mind to hold

"that correspondence with him;" and thereupon repeated what had passed in the morning, with much choler: which made them both laugh at him, saying, "the French did all their business that way:" and the king told him "he was a fool," implying, "that he should take his money." Whereupon the chancellor besought him "not to appear to his servants so unconcerned in matters of that nature, which might produce ill effects;" and desired him to consider, "what the consequence of his receiving that money, with what secrecy soever, must be. That the French king must either believe that he had received it without his majesty's privity, and so look upon him as a knave fit to be depended upon in any treachery against his master; or that it was with his majesty's approbation, which must needs lessen his esteem of him, that he should permit his servants of the nearest trust to grow rich at the charge of another prince, who might the next day become his enemy." To which the king smiling made no other reply, "than that few men were so scrupulous;" and commanded him "to return a civil answer to M. Fouquet's letter, and to cherish that correspondence, which," he said, "might be useful to him, and could produce no inconvenience." And so, when La Basteede (who could not forbear to use new importunity with him to receive the money, till he found he was much offended) brought him the cipher, he delivered him his letter for M. Fouquet. And the next week after his return, the king of France writ to him in his own hand, "that the correspondence M. Fouquet had invited him to was with his majesty's privity; and that he was well pleased with it." And so the correspondence continued till that great man's fall: and then the king sent all the letters which had passed, and the cipher, to the chancellor; and writ to him, "from that time to communicate with all freedom with his ambassador;" which he was before restrained from.

After the king had himself conferred at large with the Portugal ambassador, he referred him again to give the lords, with whom he had formerly treated, an account how all particulars were adjusted in Portugal; "which were," he said, "in this manner. For the portion, the queen regent, having resolved not to dispose of any of the money that was provided for the war, had sold her own jewels, and much of her own plate, and had borrowed both plate and jewels from the churches and monasteries: by which means she had the whole portion ready, which was all sealed up in bags, and deposited where nobody could take it to apply to any other use. For the delivery of Tangier, that the old governor, (who had lived there long, and was humorous,) on whom the queen could not confidently depend, was removed; and another sent, before he left Lisbon, to take that charge, who was a creature of the queen's, who could not deceive her, and was so far trusted, that he knew for what end he was sent thither, and cheerfully undertook to perform it: and that the fleet which should be sent for the queen should first go to Tangier, and take possession thereof; and till that should be delivered into his majesty's hands, the queen should not embark upon the fleet, nor till all the money should be put on board. That for the delivery of Bombayne, it was resolved likewise, that the vice-king and governor of Brasil, under whom that island likewise is, should be forthwith recalled; and that another, (whom he named,) "of whom the queen had all assurance, should be sent to that high charge, and should be transported thither in the fleet which the king would send to receive the island, and would deliver the same to the person designed to receive it." He added, "that there would be another security given, greater than any of the rest, and such a one as had never been given before in such a case. That the queen should be delivered on board the fleet, and transported into England, before she was married: which was such a trust that had never been reposed in any prince, who, if he would break his word, might put an everlasting reproach upon their nation."

The cause of this extraordinary circumstance was truly this. The power of Spain was so great in the court of Rome, notwithstanding the interposition and threatening mediation of France, (whose ambassador declared that Portugal should choose a patriarch, and have no longer dependence upon the pope,) that neither Urban, in whose reign that kingdom severed itself from Spain, nor Innocent, nor Alexander, would acknowledge the duke of Braganza for king, nor receive an ambassador or other minister from him: so that they now foresaw, that if they should, in what manner soever, demand a dispensation at Rome, (without which the marriage could not be celebrated in Portugal,) the interest of Spain would cause it to be denied, or granted in such a manner as should be worse for them; for the queen would have been mentioned only as the daughter and sister of the duke of Braganza. And before they would receive that affront, the most jealous and most apprehensive nation in the world chose rather to send the daughter of the kingdom to be married in England, and not to be married till she came thither.

Upon the whole matter, the king thought not fit to make any further exceptions, but resolved to assemble his whole privy-council, and to communicate the matter to them; for it did remain a secret yet, no man knowing or speaking of it. The council was so full, that there was only one counsellor that was absent. The king informed them of all that had passed in that affair, "how it was first proposed to him, and the objections which occurred to him against it; for the better clearing whereof the ambassador had made a voyage into Portugal, and was returned with such satisfaction to all particulars, that he thought it now time to communicate the whole to them, that he might receive their advice." He commanded then the particular propositions, which were offered by the ambassador, to be reported. And thereupon he commanded and conjured all the lords severally to give him their advice; for he said, "he had not yet so firmly resolved, but that he might change his mind, if he heard reasons to move him: and therefore they would not deal faithfully with him, if they did not with all freedom declare their judgment to him." In short, every man delivered his opinion, and every one agreed in the opinion, "that it was very fit for his majesty to embrace the propositions, which were of great advantage "to himself and the kingdom;" and that their advice was, "that he should speedily and without more delay conclude the treaty." And thereupon his majesty said, "that he looked upon so unanimous a concurrence as a good omen, and that he would follow their advice."

All this was done between the dissolution of the parliament in December, and the assembling the other in May following; and upon the first day of its coming together, which was upon the eighth of May, the very day twelvemonth that his majesty had been proclaimed the year before, and he told them "that he had deferred it a week, that they might meet upon that day, for the memory of the former day." The king, after some gracious expressions of his confidence in them, told them "that they would find what method he thought best for their proceeding, by two bills which he had caused to be provided for them, which were for confirmation of all that had been enacted in the last meeting;" and repeated what he had said to them when he was last there: "that next to the miraculous blessing of God Almighty, and indeed as an immediate effect of that blessing, he did impute the good disposition and security they were all in, to the happy act of indemnity and oblivion: that," his majesty said, "was the principal corner-stone that supported that excellent building, that created kindness in them to each other; and confidence was their joint and common security." He told them, "he was still of the same opinion, and more, if it were possible, of that opinion than he had been, by the experience he had of the benefit of it, and from the unreasonableness of what some men said against it." He desired them "to provide full remedies for future mischiefs; to be as severe as they would against new offenders, especially if they were so upon old principles; and that they would pull up those principles by the roots. But," his majesty said, "he should never think him a wise man, that would endeavour to undermine and shake that foundation of the public peace, by infringing that act in the least degree; or that he could be his friend, or wish him well, who would persuade him ever to consent to the breach of a promise he had so solemnly made when he was abroad, and had performed with that solemnity after, and because he had promised it: and that he could not suspect any attempts of that kind by any men of merit and virtue."

And this warmth of his majesty upon this subject was not then more than needed: for the armies being now disbanded, there were great combinations entered into, not to confirm the act of oblivion; which they knew without confirmation would signify nothing. Men were well enough contented, that the king should grant indemnity to all men that had rebelled against him; that he should grant their lives and fortunes to them, who had forfeited them to him: but they thought it very unreasonable and unjust, that the king should release those debts which were immediately due to them, and forgive those trespasses which had been committed to their particular damage. They could not endure to meet the same men in the king's highway, now it was the king's highway again, who had heretofore affronted them in those ways, because they were not the king's, and only because they knew they could obtain no justice against them. They could not with any patience see those men, who not only during the war had oppressed them, plundered their houses, and had their own adorned with the furniture they had robbed them of, ride upon the same horses which they had then taken from them upon no other pretence, but because they were better than their own; but after the war was ended, had committed many insolent trespasses upon them wantonly, and to shew their power of justice of peace, or committee men, and had from the lowest beggary raised great estates, out of which they [were] well able to satisfy, at least in some degree, the damages the other had sustained. And those and other passions of this kind, which must have invalidated the whole act of indemnity, could not have been extinguished without the king's influence, and indeed his immediate interposition and industry.

When his majesty had spoken all he thought fit upon that subject, he told them, "he could not conclude without telling them some news, news that he thought would be very acceptable to them; and therefore he should think himself unkind and ill-natured, if he should not impart it to them. That he had been often put in mind by his friends, that it was high time to marry; and he had thought so himself, ever since he came into England: but there appeared difficulties enough in the choice, though many overtures had been made to him. And if he should never marry till he could make such a choice, against which there could be no foresight of any inconvenience that might ensue, they would live to see him an old bachelor, which he thought they did not desire to do." He said, "he could now tell them, not only that he was resolved to marry, but whom he resolved to marry, if it pleased God. That towards his resolution, he had used that deliberation, and taken that advice, that he ought to do in a case of that importance, and with a full consideration of the good of his subjects in general, as of himself. It was with the daughter of Portugal. That when he had, as well as he could, weighed all that occurred to himself, the first resolution he took, was to state the whole overtures which had been made to him, and in truth all that had been said against it, to his privy council; without hearing whose advice, he never did nor ever would resolve any thing of public importance. And," he said, "he told them with great satisfaction and comfort to himself, that after many hours debate in a full council, (for he thought there was not above one absent,) and he believed upon weighing all that could be said upon that subject, for or against it; the lords, without one dissenting voice, advised him with all imaginable cheerfulness to this marriage: which he looked upon as very wonderful, and even as some instance of the approbation of God himself. That he had thereupon taken his own resolution, and concluded with the ambassador of Portugal, who was departing with the whole treaty signed, which they would find to contain many great advantages to the kingdom; and that he would make all the haste he could, to fetch them a queen hither, who he doubted not would bring great blessings with her, to him and them."

The next day the two houses of parliament, after they had expressed all the joy imaginable amongst them, sent to the king, "that he would appoint a time when he would admit them to his presence." Which when he had done, both houses of parliament, in a body, presented by the speaker of the house of peers their humble thanks to his majesty, "for that he had vouchsafed to acquaint them with his resolution to marry, which had exceedingly rejoiced their hearts, and would, they doubted not, draw down God's blessing upon his majesty and the kingdom." Shortly after, the fleet was made ready, and the earl of Sandwich, admiral thereof, was likewise made ambassador to Portugal, and appointed to receive the queen, and to conduct her into England.

This was the whole proceeding, from the beginning to the end of that treaty about the marriage of the king; by the whole circumstances whereof it is apparent enough, that no particular corruption in any single person could have brought it to pass in that manner, and that the chancellor never proposed it, nor heard of it but from the king himself, nor advanced it afterwards more than every one of the other lords did; and if he had done less, he could neither have been thought a prudent or an honest man: to which no more shall be added, that neither before, or in the treaty, or after the marriage, he never received the least reward, or the least present from Portugal.

During the interval of parliament, the king had made choice of many very eminent and learned men, who were consecrated to some of the sees of bishops which were void; that the preservation of the succession might not depend upon the lives of the few bishops who remained, and who were all very aged; which could not have been done sooner, nor till the other parliament, to whom the settlement of the church had been referred, was dissolved. Nor could he yet give any remedy to the license in the practice of religion, which in all places was full of scandal and disorder, because the liturgy was not yet finished; till when, the indulgence by his declaration was not to be restrained. But at the same time that he issued out his writs for convening the parliament, he had likewise sent summons to the bishops, for the meeting of the clergy in convocation, which is the legal synod in England; against the coming together whereof the liturgy would be finished, which his majesty intended to send thither to be examined, debated, and confirmed. And then he hoped to provide, with the assistance of the parliament, such a settlement in religion, as would prevent any disorder in the state upon those pretences. And it was very necessary to lose no time in the prosecution of that cure; for the malignity against the church appeared to increase, and to be greater than it was upon the coming in of the king.

The old bishops who remained alive, and such deans and chapters as were numerous enough for the corporation, who had been long kept fasting, had now appetites proportionable. Most of them were very poor, and had undergone great extremities; some of the bishops having supported themselves and their family by teaching schools, and submitting to the like low condescensions. And others saw, that if they died before they were enabled to make some provision for them, their wives and children must unavoidably starve: and therefore they made haste to enter upon their own. And now an ordinance of parliament had not strength enough to batter an act of parliament. They called their old tenants to account for rent, and to renew their estates if they had a mind to it; for most old leases were expired in the long continuance of the war, and the old tenants had been compelled either to purchase a new right and title from the state, (when the ordinance was passed for taking away all bishops, deans, and chapters, and for selling all the lands which belonged to them,) or to sell their present estates to those, who had purchased the reversion and the inheritance thereof: so that both the one and the other, the old tenants and the new purchasers, repaired to the true owners as soon as the king was restored; the former expecting to be restored again to the possession of what they had sold, under an unreasonable pretence of a tenant right, (as they called it,) because there remained yet (as in many cases there did) a year or some other term of their old leases unexpired, and because they had out of conscience forborne to buy the inheritance of the church, which was first offered to them. And for the refusal thereof, and such a reasonable fine as was usual, they hoped to have a new lease, and to be readmitted to be tenants to the church. The other, the purchasers, (amongst which there were some very infamous persons,) appeared as confident, and did not think, that according to the clemency that was practised towards all sorts of men, it could be thought justice, that they should lose the entire sum they had disbursed upon the faith of that government, which the whole kingdom submitted to; but that they should, instead of the inheritance they had an ill title to, have a good lease for lives or years granted to them by them who had now the right; at least, that upon the old rent and moderate fines they should be continued tenants to the church, without any regard to those who had sold both their possession, and with that all the right or title that they might pretend to, for a valuable consideration. And they had the more hope of this, because the king had granted a commission, under the great seal of England, to some lords of the council and to other eminent persons, to interpose and mediate with the bishops and clergy in such cases, as ought not to be prosecuted with rigour.

But the bishops and clergy concerned had not the good fortune to please their old or their new tenants. They had been very barbarously used themselves; and that had too much quenched all tenderness towards others. They did not enough distinguish between persons: nor did the suffering any man had undergone for fidelity to the king, or his affection to the church eminently expressed, often prevail for the mitigation of his fine; or if it did sometimes, three or four stories of the contrary, and in which there had been some unreasonable hardness used, made a greater noise and spread further, than their examples of charity and moderation. And as honest men did [not] usually fare the better for any merit, so the purchasers who offered most money, did not fare the worse for all the villainies they had committed. And two or three unhappy instances of this kind brought scandal upon the whole church, as if they had been all guilty of the same excesses, which they were far from. And by this means the new bishops, who did not all follow the precedents made by the old, underwent the same reproaches: and many of them who had most adhered to their order, and for so doing had undergone for twenty years together sundry persecutions and oppressions, were not in their present passion so much pleased with the renewing it, as they expected to have been. Yet upon a very strict examination of the true grounds of all those misprisions, (except some few instances which cannot be defended,) there will be found more passion than justice in them; and that there was even a necessity to raise as much money as could be justly done, for the repairing the cathedrals, which were all miserably ruined or defaced, and for the entirely building up many houses of the prebends, which had been pulled down or let fall to the ground. And those ways much more of those monies which were raised by fines were issued and expended, than what went into the private purses of them, who had a right to them, and had need enough of them. But the time began to be froward again, and all degrees of men were hard to be pleased; especially when they saw one classis of men restored to more than they had ever lost, and preferred to a plenty they had never been acquainted with, whilst themselves remained remediless after so many sufferings, and without any other testimony of their courage and fidelity, than in the ruin of their fortunes, and the sale of their inheritance.

Another great work was performed, between the dissolution of the last and the beginning of the next parliament, which was the ceremony of the king's coronation; and was done with the greatest solemnity and glory, that ever any had been seen in that kingdom. That the novelties and new inventions, with which the kingdom had been so much intoxicated for so many years together, might be discountenanced and discredited in the eyes of the people, for the folly and want of state thereof; his majesty had directed the records and old formularies should be examined, and thereupon all things should be prepared, and all forms accustomed to be used, that might add lustre and splendour to the solemnity. A court of claims was erected, where before the lords commissioners for that service, all persons made claim to those privileges and precedency, which they conceived to be due to their persons, or the offices of which they were possessed, in the ceremony of the coronation; which were allowed or rejected as their right appeared.

The king went early in the morning to the Tower of London in his coach, most of the lords being there before. And about ten of the clock they set forward towards Whitehall, ranged in that order as the heralds had appointed; those of the long robe, the king's council at law, the masters of the chancery, and judges, going first, and so the lords in their order, very splendidly habited, on rich foot-clothes; the number of their footmen being limited, to the dukes ten, to the earls eight, and to the viscounts six, and the barons four, all richly clad, as their other servants were. The whole show was the most glorious in the order and expense, that had been ever seen in England; they who rode first being in Fleet-street when the king issued out of the Tower, as was known by the discharge of the ordnance: and it was near three of the clock in the afternoon, when the king alighted at Whitehall. The next morning the king rode in the same state in his robes and with his crown on his head, and all the lords in their robes, to Westminster-hall; where all the ensigns for the coronation were delivered to those who were appointed to carry them, the earl of Northumberland being made high constable, and the earl of Suffolk earl marshal, for the day. And then all the lords in their order, and the king himself, walked on foot upon blue cloth from Westminster-hall to the abbey church, where, after a sermon preached by Dr. Morley, (then bishop of Worcester,) in Henry the Seventh's chapel, the king was sworn, crowned, and anointed, by Dr. Juxon, archbishop of Canterbury, with all the solemnity that in those cases had been used. All which being done, the king returned in the same manner on foot to Westminster-hall, which was adorned with rich hangings and statues; and there the king dined, and the lords on either side at tables provided for them: and all other ceremonies were performed with great order and magnificence.

I should not have enlarged thus much upon the ceremony of the coronation, it may be not mentioned it, (a perfect narration having been then made and published of it, with all the grandeur and magnificence of the city of London,) but that there were two accidents in it, the one absolutely new, the other that produced some inconveniences which were not then discerned. The first was, that it being the custom in those great ceremonies or triumphs of state, that the master of the king's horse (who is always a great man, and was now the duke of Albemarle, the general) rides next after the king with a led horse in his hand: in this occasion the duke of York privately prevailed with the king, who had not enough reverence for old customs, without any consultation, that his master of his horse, (so he was called,) Mr. Jermyn, a younger brother of a very private gentleman's family, should ride as near his person, as the general did to his majesty, and lead a horse likewise in his hand; a thing never heard of before. Neither in truth hath the younger brother of the king such an officer as master of his horse, which [is] a term restrained within the family of the king, queen, and prince of Wales; and the two masters of the horse to the queen and prince are subordinate to the king's master of his horse, who hath the jurisdiction over the other. The lords were exceedingly surprised and troubled at this, of which they heard nothing till they saw it; and they liked it the worse, because they discerned that it issued from a fountain, from whence many bitter waters were like to flow, the customs of the court of France, whereof the king and the duke had too much the image in their heads, and than which there could not be a copy more universally ingrateful and odious to the English nation.

The other was: In the morning of the coronation, whilst they sat at the table in Westminster-hall, to see the many ensigns of the coronation delivered to those lords who were appointed to carry them, the earl of Northumberland, who was that day high constable, came to the king and told him, "that amongst the young noblemen who were appointed to carry the several parts of the king's mantle, the lord Ossory, who was the eldest son to the duke of Ormond, challenged the place before the lord Percy, who was

"his eldest son; whereas," he said, "the duke of Ormond had no place in the ceremony of that day, as duke, but only as earl of Brecknock, and so the eldest sons of all ancient earls ought to take place of his eldest son;" which was so known a rule, and of so general a concernment, that the king could not choose but declare it, and send a message to the lord Ossory by the lord chamberlain, "that he should desist from his pretence." This, and the public manner of asking and determining it, produced two ill effects. The first, a jealousy and ill understanding between the two great families: the one naturally undervaluing and contemning his equals, without paying much regard to his superiors; and the other not being used to be contemned by any, and well knowing that all the advantages the earl had in England, either in antiquity or fortune, he had the same in Ireland, and that he had merited and received an increase of title, when the other had deserved to lose that which he was born to. The other, was a jealousy and prejudice that it raised in the nobility of England, as if the duke of Ormond (who in truth knew nothing of it) had entered upon that contest, in hope that by his interest in the king, he should be able to put this eternal affront upon the peers of England, to bring them upon the same level with those of Ireland, who had no such esteem. And it did not a little add to their envy, that he had behaved himself so worthily throughout the ill times, that he was the object of an universal reverence at home and abroad; which was a reproach to most of them, whose actions would not bear the light. But as the duke was not in the least degree privy to the particular contest, nor raised the value of himself from any merit in his services, nor undervalued others upon the advantage of their having done amiss; so he was abundantly satisfied in the testimony of his own conscience, and in his unquestionable innocence, and from thence too much despised the prejudice and the envy the others had towards him, and the marks whereof he was compelled afterwards to bear, which he did with the same magnanimity.

Before we proceed further in the relation of what was afterwards done, it will not be unreasonable in this place to give an account of somewhat that was not done, and which was generally expected to have been done, and as generally censured because it was not; the reason whereof is known to very few. The king had resolved before his coming into England, that as soon as he should be settled in any condition of security, and no just apprehension of future troubles, he would take up and remove the body of his father, the last king, from Windsor, and inter it with all solemnity at Westminster; and that the court should continue in mourning till the coronation. And many good people thought this so necessary, that they were much troubled that it was not done, and liked not the reasons which were given, which made it appear that it had been considered. The reasons which were given in public discourses from hand to hand, were two. The first; that now ten years were past since that woful tragedy, and the joy and the triumph for the king's return had composed the minds of the people, it would not be prudent to renew the memory of that parricide, by the spectacle of a solemn funeral; lest it might cause such commotions of the vulgar in all places, as might produce great disorders and insurrections amongst those who had formerly served the kingdom, as if it were a good season and a new provocation to take revenge upon their neighbours, who had formerly tyrannized over them; which might likewise have caused the soldiers, who were newly disbanded, to draw themselves together for their own security: and so the peace would be at least disturbed. The other was; that to perform this interment in any private manner, would be liable to very just censure, when all things relating to the king himself had shewed so magnificently; and if it were done with the usual pomp of a solemn interment of a king, the expense would be so vast, that there would be neither money found nor credit for the charge thereof.

These were the reasons alleged and spread abroad; nor was either of them in itself without weight to thinking men. But the true reason was: at the time of that horrid murder, Windsor was a garrison under the command of a citizen, who was an anabaptist, with all his officers and soldiers. The men had broken down all the wainscot, rails, and partitions, which divided the church, defaced all the monuments and other marks, and reduced the whole into the form of a stable or barn, and scarce fit for any other use; when Cromwell had declared that the royal body should be privately interred in the church of the castle at Windsor, and the marquis of Hertford, the duke of Richmond, the earls of Southampton and Lindsey, had obtained leave to be present (only to be present, for they had no power to prepare or do anything in it) at their master's burial. Those great men were not suffered to have above three servants each, to enter into the castle with them; and it may easily be concluded, that their own noble hearts were too full of sorrow, to send their eyes abroad to take notice of the places by which they passed. They found the church so wild a place, they knew not where they were; and as the royal body was put into the ground, they were conducted out of the castle to their lodging in the town, and the next morning returned to their several houses. Shortly after the king returned from beyond the seas, he settled the dean and chapter of Windsor, with direction to put his royal chapel there into the order it used to be, and to repair the ruins thereof, which was a long and a difficult work. His majesty commanded the dean carefully to inform himself of the place, in which the king's body had been interred, and to give him notice of it. Upon inquiry he could not find one person in the castle or in the town who had been present at the burial. When the parliament first seized upon the castle and put a garrison into it, shortly after, they had not only ejected all the prebends and singingmen of the royal chapel, but had turned out all the officers and servants who had any relation to the king or to the church, except only those who were notorious for their infidelity towards the king or the church: and of those, or of the officers or soldiers of the garrison, there could not now one man be found, who was in the church when the king was buried. The duke of Richmond and the marquis of Hertford were both dead: and the king sent (after he had received that account from the dean) the two surviving lords, the earl of Southampton and of Lindsey, to Windsor; who taking with them as many of those three servants who had been admitted to attend them, as were now living, they could not recollect their memories, nor find any one mark by which they could make any judgment, near what place the king's body lay. They made some guess, by the information of the workmen who had been now employed in the new pavement of the church, and upon their observation that the earth had seemed to lie lighter, that it might be in or near that place: but when they had caused it to be digged, and searched [in] and about it, they found nothing. And upon their return, the king gave [over] all further thought of inquiry: and those other reasons were cast abroad upon any occasional inquiry or discourse of that subject.

That which gave the king most trouble, and deprived him of that ease and quiet which he had promised to himself during the vacation between the two parliaments, was the business of Ireland; which we shall now take up again, and continue the relation without interruption, as long as we shall think fit to make any mention of that affair. We left it in the hands of the lord Roberts, whom the king had declared deputy of Ireland, presuming that he would upon conference with the several parties, who were all appointed to attend him, so shape and model the whole bulk, that it might be more capable of some further debate before his majesty in council: but that hand did not hold it many days.

That noble lord, though of a good understanding, was of so morose a nature, that it was no easy matter to treat with him. He had some pedantic parts of learning, which made his other parts of judgment the worse, for he had some parts of good knowledge in the law, and in antiquity, in the precedents of former times; all which were rendered the less useful, by the other pedantry contracted out of some books, and out of the ill conversation he had had with some clergymen and people in quality much below him, by whose weak faculties he raised the value of his own, which were very capable of being improved in better company. He was naturally proud and imperious; which humour was increased by an ill education; for excepting some years spent in the inns of court amongst the books of the law, he might be very justly said to have been born and bred in Cornwall. There were many days passed after the king's declaration of him to be deputy, before he could be persuaded to visit the general, who he knew was to continue lieutenant; and when he did visit him, it was with so ill a grace, that the other received no satisfaction in it, and the less, because he plainly discerned that it proceeded from pride, which he bore the more uneasily, because as he was now the greater man, so he knew himself to be of a much better family. He made so many doubts and criticisms upon the draught of his patent, that the attorney general was weary of attending him; and when all things were agreed on at night, the next morning produced new dilemmas. But that which was worse than all this, he received those of the Irish nation of the best quality, and who were of the privy council and chief command in that kingdom, so superciliously; received their information so negligently, and gave his answers so scornfully; that after they had waited upon him four or five days, they besought the king that they might not be obliged to attend him any more. And it was evident, that his carriage towards them was not to be submitted to by persons of his own quality, or of any liberal education: nor did he make any advance towards the business.

This gave the king very great trouble, and them as much pleasure who had never liked the designation. He knew not what to do with his deputy, nor what to do for Ireland. The lord Roberts was not a man that was to be disgraced and thrown off, without much inconvenience and hazard. He had parts which in council and parliament (which were the two scenes where all the king's business lay) were very troublesome; for of all men alive who had so few friends, he had the most followers. They who conversed most with him, knew him to have many humours which were very intolerable; they who were but a little acquainted with him, took him to be a man of much knowledge, and called his morosity gravity, and thought the severity of his manners made him less grateful to the courtiers. He had no such advantageous faculties in his delivery, as could impose upon his auditors; but he was never tedious, and his words made impression. In a word, he was such a man as the king thought worthy to be compounded with. And therefore his majesty appointed the lord chancellor and the lord treasurer to confer with him, and to dispose him to accept the office of privy seal, which gave him a great precedence that would gratify that passion which was strongest in him; for in his nature he preferred place before money, which his fortune stood more in need of. And the king thought, it would be no ill argument to incline him to give over the thought of Ireland, that it was impossible for the king to supply him for the present with near any such sum of money as he had very reasonably demanded, for the satisfaction of the army there, (which was upon the matter to be new modelled, and some part of it disbanded,) with the reduction of many officers, and for his own equipage.

They began their approach to him, by asking him "when he would be ready for his journey to Ireland;" to which he answered with some quickness, "that he was confident there was no purpose to send him thither, for that he saw there was no preparation of those things, without which the king knew well that it was not possible for him to go; nor had his majesty lately spoken to him of it. Besides, he had observed, that the chancellor had for many days past called him at the council, and in all other places where they met, by the name of lord Roberts; whereas, for some months before, he had upon all occasions and in all places treated him with the style of lord deputy: which gave him first cause to believe, that there was some alteration in the purpose of sending him thither." They both assured him, "that the king had no other person in his view but himself for that service, if he were disposed to undertake it vigorously; but that the king had forbore lately to speak with him of it, because he found it impossible for him to provide the money he proposed; and it could not be denied, that he had proposed it very reasonably in all respects. However, it being impossible to procure it, and that he could not go without it, for which he could not be blamed, his majesty must find “some other expedient to send his authority thither, the government there being yet so loose, that he could not but every day expect to receive news of some great disorder there, the ill consequence whereof would be imputed to his majesty’s want of care and providence. That his majesty had yet forborne to think of that expedient, till he might do it with his consent and advice, and until he could resolve upon another post, where he might serve his majesty with equal honour, and by which the world might see the esteem he had of him. And therefore since it would be both unreasonable and unjust, to press him to go for Ireland without those supplies, and it was equally impossible to prepare and send those supplies;” they said, “the king had commanded them to propose to him, that he would make him lord privy seal, an office he well understood. And if he accepted that and were possessed of it, (as he should immediately be,) his majesty would enter upon new considerations how to settle the tottering condition of Ireland.” The lord’s dark countenance presently cleared up, having no doubt expected to be deprived of his title to Ireland, without being assigned any other any where else: and now being offered the third place of precedence in the nobility, the privy seal going next to the treasurer, upon a very short recollection, he declared “that he received it as a great honour, that the king would make [use] of his service in any place, and that he submitted wholly to his good pleasure, and would serve him with great fidelity.” The next day the king gave him the privy seal at the council-board, where he was sworn and took his place; and to shew his extraordinary talent, found a way more to obstruct and puzzle business, at least the despatch of it, than any man in that office had ever done before: insomuch as the king found himself compelled, in a short time after, to give order that most grants and patents, which required haste, should pass by immediate warrant to the great seal, without visiting the privy seal; which preterition was not usual, and brought some inconvenience and prejudice to the chancellor.

Though the king had within himself a prospect of the expedient, that would be fittest for him to make use of for the present, towards the settlement of Ireland; yet it was absolutely necessary for him, even before he could make use of that expedient, to put the several claims and petitions of right which were depending before him, and which were attended with such an unruly number of suitors, into some such method of examining and determining, that they might not be left in the confusion they were then in. And this could not be done, without his imposing upon himself the trouble of hearing once at large, all that every party of the pretenders could allege for the support of their several pretences: and this he did with incredible patience for very many days together. We shall first mention those interests, which gave the king least trouble, because they admitted least debate.

It was looked upon as very scandalous, that the marquis of Ormond should remain so long without the possession of any part of his estate; which had been taken from him upon no other pretence, but his adhering to the king. And therefore there was an act of parliament passed with the consent of all parties, that he should be presently restored to all his estate; which was done with the more ease, because the greatest part of it (for his wife’s land had been before assigned to her in Cromwell’s time, or rather in his son Harry’s) lay within that province, which Cromwell out of his husbandry had reserved for himself, exempt from all title or pretence of adventurer or soldier: what other part of his estate either the one or the other were possessed of, in their own judgments [it] was so impossible for them to enjoy, that they very willingly yielded it up to the marquis, in hope of having recompense made to them out of other lands. There could as little be said against the restoration of the earl of Inchiquin to his estate, which had been taken from him and distributed amongst the adventurers and soldiers, for no other cause but his serving the king. There were likewise some others of the same classis, who had nothing objected to them but their loyalty, who were put into the possession of their own estates. And all this gave no occasion of murmur; every man of what interest soever believing, or pretending to believe, that the king was obliged in honour, justice, and conscience, to cause that right to be done to those who served him faithfully.

There could be as little doubt, and there was as little opposition visible, in the claim of the church: so that the king made choice of many grave divines, to whom he assigned bishoprics in Ireland, and sent them thither, to be consecrated by the bishops who remained alive there according to the laws of that kingdom; and conferred the other dignities and church-preferments upon worthy men, who were all authorized to enter upon those lands, which belonged to their several churches. And in this general zeal for the church, some new grants were made of lands and impropriations, which were not enough deliberated, and gave afterwards great interruption to the settlement of the kingdom, and brought envy upon the church and churchmen, when the restoration to what was their own was generally well approved.

The pretences of the adventurers and soldiers were very much involved and perplexed: yet they gave the king little other trouble, than the general care and solicitude, that by an unseasonable disturbance of their possessions there, the soldiers who had been disbanded and those of the standing army (who for the most part had the same ill affections) might not unite together, and seize upon some places of defence, before his affairs in that kingdom should be put in such an order as to oppose them. And next that apprehension, his majesty had no mind that any of those soldiers, either who had been disbanded, and put into possession of lands for the arrears of their pay, and upon which they now lived; or of the other, the standing army, many whereof were likewise in possession of lands assigned to them; I say, the king was not without apprehension, that the resort of either of these into England might find too many of their old friends and associates, ready to concur with them in any desperate [measures,] and for controlling of which he was [not] enough provided even in this kingdom. But for their private and particular interest, the king cared not much how it was compounded, nor considered the danger if it were not compounded. For besides the factions, divisions, and animosities, which were between themselves, and very great; they could have no cause of complaint against the king, who would take nothing from them to which they had the least pretence of law or right. And for their other demands, he would leave them to litigate between themselves; it being evident to all men, that there must be some judicatory erected by act of parliament, that only could examine and put an end to all those pretences: and the perusal and examination of which act of parliament, when the same should be prepared, his majesty resolved that all parties should have, and that he would hear their particular exceptions to it, before he would transmit it into Ireland to be passed.

That which gave the king the only trouble and solicitude, was the miserable condition of the Irish nation, that was so near an extirpation; the thought whereof his majesty's heart abhorred. Nor can it be denied, that either from the indignation he had against those, in whose favour the other poor people were miserably destroyed, or from his own natural compassion and tenderness, and the just regard of the merit of many of them who had served him with fidelity, he had a very strong and princely inclination to do the best he could, without doing apparent injustice, to preserve them in a tolerable condition of subjects. This made him give them, who were most concerned and solicitous on their behalf, liberty to resort to his presence; and hear all they could allege for themselves, in private or in public. And this indulgence proved to their disadvantage, and exalted them so much, that when they were heard in public at the board, they behaved themselves with less modesty towards their adversaries, who stood upon the advantage-ground, and with less reverence in the presence of the king, than the truth of their condition and any ordinary discretion would have required. And their disadvantage was the greater, because they who spake publicly on their behalf, and were very well qualified to speak, and left nothing for the matter unsaid that was for their purpose, were men, who from the beginning to the end of the rebellion, had behaved themselves eminently ill towards the king. And they of their adversaries who spake against them, had great knowledge and experience of all that had passed on either side, and knew how to press it home when it was seasonable.

They of the Irish, who were all united under the name of the confederate catholics of Ireland, made their first approach wisely for compassion; and urged "their great and long sufferings; the loss of their estates for five or six and twenty years; the wasting and spending of the whole nation in battles, and transportation of vast multitudes of men into the parts beyond the seas, whereof many had the honour to testify their fidelity to the king by real services, and many of them returned into England with him, and were still in his service; the great numbers of men, women, and children, that had been massacred and executed in cold blood, after the king's government had been driven from thence; the multitudes that had been destroyed by famine and the plague, those two heavy judgments having raged over the kingdom for two or three years; and at last, as a persecution unheard of, the transplanting the small remainder of the nation into one corner of the province of Connaught, where yet much of the lands was "taken from them, which had been assigned with all those formalities of law, which were in use, and practised under that government."

2. They demanded "the benefit of two treaties of peace, the one in the late king's time and confirmed by him, the other confirmed by his majesty who was present; by both which," they said, "they stood indemnified for all acts done by them in the rebellion; and insisted upon their innocence since that time, and that they had paid so entire an obedience to his majesty's commands whilst he was beyond the seas, that they betook themselves to, and withdrew themselves from, the service of France or Spain, in such manner as his majesty signified his pleasure what they should do." And if they had ended here, they would have done wisely. But whether it was the observation they made, that what they had said made impression upon his majesty and many of the lords; or whether it was their evil genius that naturally transported them to actions of strange sottishness and indiscretion; they urged and enforced, with more liberty than became them in that conjuncture, "the unworthiness and incapacity of those, who for so many years had possessed themselves of their estates, and sought now a confirmation of their rebellious title from his majesty."

3. "That their rebellion had been more infamous and of a greater magnitude than that of the Irish, who had risen in arms to free themselves from the rigour and severity that was exercised upon them by some of the king's ministers, and for the liberty of their conscience and practice of their religion, without having the least intention or thought of withdrawing themselves from his majesty's obedience, or declining his government: whereas the others had carried on an odious rebellion against the king's sacred person, whom they had horribly murdered in the sight of the sun, with all imaginable circumstances of contempt and defiance, and as much as in them lay had rooted out monarchy itself, and overturned and destroyed the whole government of church and state: and therefore that whatever punishment the poor Irish had deserved for their former transgressions, which they had so long repented of, and departed from the rebellion when they had armies and strong towns in their hands, which they, together with themselves, had put again under his majesty's protection; whereas this part of the English, who were possessed of their estates, had broken all their obligations to God and the king, and so could not merit to be gratified with their ruin and total destruction. That it was too evident and notorious to the world, that his majesty's three kingdoms had been very faulty to him, and withdrawn themselves from his government; by which he had been compelled to live in exile so many years: and yet, that upon their return to their duty and obedience, he had been graciously pleased to grant a free and general pardon and act of indemnity in which many were comprehended, who in truth had been the contrivers and fomenters of all the misery and desolation, which had involved the three nations for so many years. And therefore that they hoped, that when all his majesty's other subjects (as criminal at least as they were) were, by his ma"jesty's clemency, restored to their own estates which they had forfeited, and were in full peace, mirth, and joy; the poor Irish alone should not be totally exempt from all his majesty's grace, and left in tears and mourning and lamentation, and be sacrificed without redemption to the avarice and cruelty of those, who had not only spoiled and oppressed them, but had done all that was in their power, and with all the insolence imaginable, to destroy the king himself and his posterity, and who now returned to their obedience, and had submitted to his government, when they were no longer able to oppose it. Nor did they yet return to it with that alacrity and joy and resignation as the Irish did, but insisted obstinately upon demands unreasonable, and which they hoped could not consist with his majesty's honour to grant:" and so concluded with those pathological applications and appeals to the king, as men well versed in discourses of that nature are accustomed to.

This discourse, carried on and urged with more passion, vehemence, and indiscretion, than was suitable to the condition they were in, and in which, by the excesses of their rhetoric, they had let fall many expressions very indecent and unwarrantable, and in some of them confidently excused if not justified their first entrance into rebellion, (the most barbarous certainly and inexcusable, that any Christians have been engaged in in any age,) irreconciled many to them who had compassion enough for them, and made it impossible for the king to restrain their adversaries, who were prepared to answer all they had said, from using the same license. They enlarged upon all the odious circumstances of the first year's rebellion, the murdering of above a hundred thousand persons in cold blood, and with all the barbarity imaginable; which murders and barbarities had been always excepted from pardon." And they told them, "that if there were not some amongst themselves who then appeared before his majesty, they were sure there would be found many amongst those for whom they appeared, who would be found guilty of those odious crimes, which were excluded from any benefit by those treaties." They took notice, "how confidently they had extolled their own innocence from the time that those two acts of pacification had passed, and their great affection for his majesty's service." And thereupon they declared, "that whatsoever legal title the adventurers had to the lands of which they were possessed, many of whom had constantly served the king; yet they would be contented, that all those, who in truth had preserved their integrity towards his majesty from the time of either if not of both the pacifications, and not swerved afterwards from their allegiance, should partake of his royal bounty, in such a manner and to such a degree, as his majesty thought fit to exercise towards them. But," they said, "they would make it appear, that their pretences to that grace and favour were not founded upon any reasonable title; that they had never consented to any one act of pacification, to which the promise of indemnity had been annexed, which they had not violated and broken within ten days after, and then returned to all the acts of disloyalty and rebellion.

"That after the first act of pacification ratified by the last king, in very few days after, they treated the herald, his majesty's officer, who came to proclaim that peace, with all manner of indignity, tearing his coat of arms (the king's arms) from his back; and beat and wounded him so, that he was hardly rescued from the loss of his life. That about the same time they endeavoured to surprise and murder the lord lieutenant, and pursued him to Dublin, which they forthwith besieged with their army, under the command of that general who had signed the peace. They imprisoned their commissioners who were authorized by them, for consenting to those articles which themselves had confirmed, and so prosecuted the war with as much asperity as ever; and refused to give that aid and assistance they were obliged to, for the recovery and restoration of his late majesty; the promise and expectation of which supply and assistance, was the sole ground and consideration of that treaty, and of the concessions therein made to them. That they thereupon more formally renounced their obedience to the king, and put themselves under the protection and disposal of Rinuccini, the pope's nuncio, whom they made their generalissimo of all their armies, their admiral at sea, and to preside in all their councils. After their divisions amongst themselves, and the burden of the tyranny they suffered under, had disposed them to petition his majesty that now is, who was then in France, to receive them into his protection, and to send the marquis of Ormond over again into Ireland to command them, and his majesty was so far prevailed with, as that he sent the marquis of Ormond into Munster, with such a supply of arms and ammunition as he could get; where the lord Inchiquin, lord president of that province, received him with the protestant army and joined with him: and shortly after, the confederate Irish made that second treaty of pacification, of which they now demanded the benefit. But that it was notoriously known, that they no sooner made that treaty than they brake it, in not bringing in those supplies of men and money, which they ought and were obliged to do; and the want whereof exposed the lord lieutenant to many difficulties, and was in truth the cause of the misfortune before Dublin: which he had no sooner undergone, than they withdrew from taking any further care of the kingdom, [and] raised scandals upon and jealousies of the whole body of the English, who, being so provoked, could no longer venture themselves in any action or conjunction with the Irish, without more apprehension of them than of the common enemy.

"Instead of endeavouring to compose these jealousies and ill humours, they caused an assembly or convention of their clergy to meet without the lord lieutenant's authority, and put the government of all things into their hands: who, in a short time, improved the jealousies in the mind of the people towards the few protestants who yet remained in the army, and who had served the king with all imaginable courage and fidelity from the very first hour of the rebellion, to that degree, that the marquis was even compelled to discharge his own troop of guards of “horse, consisting of such officers and gentlemen as are mentioned before, and to trust himself and all the remaining towns and garrisons to the fidelity of the Irish; they protesting with much solemnity, that upon such a confidence, the whole nation would be united as one man to his majesty’s service, under his command. But they had no sooner received satisfaction in that particular, (which was not in the marquis’s power to refuse to give them,) but they raised several calumnies against his person, declaimed against his religion, and inhibited the people, upon pain of excommunication, to submit to this and that order that was issued out by the marquis, without obeying whereof the army could not stay together; and upon the matter forbade the people to pay any obedience to him. Instead of raising new forces according to their last promise and engagement, those that were raised ran from their colours and dispersed themselves; they who were trusted with the keeping of towns and forts, either gave them up by treachery to Cromwell, or lost them through cowardice to him upon very feeble attacks: and their general, Owen O’Neile, made a formal contract and stipulation with the parliament. And in the end, when they had divested the lord lieutenant of all power to oppose the enemy, and given him great cause to believe that his person was in danger to be betrayed, and delivered up to the enemy, they vouchsafed to petition him that he would depart out of the kingdom, (to the necessity whereof they had even already compelled him,) and that he would leave his majesty’s authority in the hands of one of his catholic subjects, to whom they promised to submit with the most punctual obedience.

“Hereupon the marquis, when he found that he could not unite them in any one action worthy the duty of good subjects, or of prudent men, towards their own preservation; and so, that his residence amongst them longer could in no degree contribute to his majesty’s service or honour; and that they would make it to be believed, that if he would have committed the command into the hands of a Roman catholic, they would have been able to preserve those towns which still remained in their possession, which were Limerick and Galway, and some other places of importance enough, though of less than those cities; and that they would likewise by degrees recover from the enemy what had been lost, which indeed was very possible for them to have done, since they had great bodies of men to perform any enterprise, and some good officers to lead them, if they would have been obedient to any command: hereupon the marquis resolved to gratify them, and to place the command in the hands of such a person, whose zeal for the catholic religion was unquestionable, and whose fidelity to the king [was] unblemished. And so he made choice of the marquis of Clanrickard, a gentleman, though originally of English extraction, whose family had for so many hundred years resided in that kingdom, that he was looked upon as being of the best family of the Irish; and whose family had, in all former rebellions, as well as in this last, preserved its loyalty to the crown not only unspotted, but eminently conspicuous.

“The Roman catholics of all kinds pretended at least a wonderful satisfaction and joy in this election; acknowledged it as a great obligation upon them and their posterity to the lord lieutenant, for making so worthy a choice; and applied themselves to the marquis of Clanrickard with all the protestations of duty and submission, to induce him to accept the charge and command over them; who indeed knew them too well to be willing to trust them, or to have any thing to do with them. Yet upon the marquis of Ormond’s earnest and solemn entreaty, as the last and only remedy to keep and retain some remainder of hope, from whence future hopes might grow; whereas all other thoughts were desperate, and the kingdom would presently fall into the hands and possession of the English, who would extirpate the whole nation: this importunity, and his great zeal for the service of the crown, and to support the government there until his majesty should procure other supplies, which the marquis of Ormond promised to solicit in France, or till his majesty should send better orders to preserve his authority in that kingdom, (the hope of which seemed the less desperate, because they had notice at the same time of his majesty’s march into England, with an army from Scotland,) prevailed with him so, that he was contented to receive such commissions from the lord lieutenant, as were necessary for the execution of the present command. Upon which the lord lieutenant embarked himself, with some few friends and servants, upon a little rotten pink that was bound for France, and very ill accommodated for such a voyage; being not to be persuaded to send to the commander in chief of the English for a pass, though he was assured that it would very readily have been granted: but it pleased God that he arrived safely in France, a little before or about the time that the king transported himself thither, after his miraculous escape from Worcester.

“The marquis of Ormond was no sooner gone out of Ireland, but the lord marquis of Clanrickard, then lord deputy, found himself no better treated than the lord of Ormond had been. That part of the clergy, which had continually opposed the lord lieutenant for being a protestant, were now as little satisfied with the deputy’s religion, and as violently contradicted all his commands and desires, and violated all their own promises, and quickly made it evident, that his affection and loyalty to the king was that which they disliked, and a crime that could not be balanced by the undoubted sincerity of his religion. They entered into secret correspondence with the enemy, and conspiracies between themselves: and though there were some persons of honour and quality with the deputy, who were very faithful to him and to the king; yet there were so many of another alloy, that all his counsels, resolutions, and designs, were discovered to the enemy soon enough to be prevented. And though some of the letters were intercepted, and the persons discovered who gave the intelligence, he had not power to bring them to justice; but being commonly friars and clergymen, the privilege of the church was insisted upon, and so they were rescued from the secular prosecution till their escape was con"trived. That perfidious and treacherous party had so great an interest in all the towns, forts, and garrisons, which yet pretended to be subject to the deputy, that all his orders were still contradicted or neglected: and the enemy no sooner appeared before any place, but some faction in the town caused it to be given up and rendered.

"Nor could this fatal sottishness be reformed, even by the severity and rigour which the English exercised upon them, who, by the wonderful judgment of God Almighty, always put those men to death, who put themselves and those towns into their hands; finding still that they had some barbarous part in the foul murders, which had been committed in the beginning of the rebellion, and who had been, by all the acts of grace granted by the several powers, still reserved for justice. And of this kind there would be so many instances in and about Limerick and Galway, that they deserve to be collected and mentioned in a discourse by itself, to observe and magnify the wonderful providence of God Almighty in bringing heinous crimes to light and punishment in this world, by means unapprehended by the guilty; inasmuch as it can hardly be believed, how many of the clergy and the laity, who had a signal hand in the contriving and fomenting the first rebellion, and in the perpetration of those horrible murders; and who had obstructed all overtures toward peace, and principally caused any peace that was made to be presently broken; who had with most passion adhered to the nuncio, and endeavoured most maliciously to exclude the king and his posterity from the dominion of Ireland; I say, it can hardly be believed, how many of these most notorious transgressors did by some act of treachery endeavour to merit from the English rebels, and so put themselves into their hands, and were by them publicly and reproachfully executed and put to death.

"This being the sad condition the deputy was in, and the Irish having, without his leave and against his express command, taken upon them to send messengers into Flanders, to desire the duke of Lorrain to take them into his protection, and offered to deliver several important places and sea-towns into his possession, and to become his subjects, (upon which the duke sent over an ambassador, and a good sum of money for their present relief,) the deputy was in a short time reduced to those straits, that he durst not remain in any town, nor even in his own house three days together, but was forced for his safety to shift from place to place, and sometimes to lodge in the woods and fields in cold and wet nights; by which he contracted those infirmities and diseases, which shortly after brought him to his grave. And in the end, he was compelled to accept a pass from the English, who had a reverence for his person and his unspotted reputation, to transport himself into England, where his wife and family were; and where he died before he could procure means to carry himself to the king, which he always intended to do."

When the commissioners had enlarged with some commotion in this narration and discourse, they again provoked the Irish commissioners to nominate "one person amongst themselves, or of

"those for whom they appeared, who they believed could in justice demand his majesty's favour; and if they did not make it evidently appear, that he had forfeited all his title to pardon after the treaties, and that he had been again as faulty to the king as before, they were very willing he should be restored to his estate." And then applying themselves to his majesty with great duty and submission, they concluded, "that if any persons had, by their subsequent [loyalty] or service, or by their attendance upon his majesty beyond the seas, rendered themselves grateful to him, and worthy of his royal favour, they were very willing that his majesty should restore all or any of them to their honours or estates, in such manner as his majesty thought fit, and against all impediments whatsoever." And upon this frank offer of theirs, which his majesty took very well, several acts of parliament were presently passed, for the indemnity and the restoring many persons of honour and interest to their estates; who could either in justice require it, as having been faithful always to the king, and suffered with him or for him; or who had so far manifested their affection and duty for his majesty, that he thought fit, in that consideration, to wipe out the memory of whatsoever had been formerly done amiss. And by this means, many were put into a full possession of their estates, to which they could make any good pretence at the time when the rebellion began.

This consideration and debate upon the settlement of this unhappy kingdom took up many days, the king being always present, in which there arose every day new difficulties. And it appeared plainly enough, that the guilt was so general, that if the letter of the act of parliament of the seventeenth year of the late king were strictly pursued, as possibly it might have been, if the reduction had fallen out likewise during the whole reign of that king, even an utter extirpation of the nation would have followed.

There were three particulars, which, upon the first mention and view of them, seemed in most men's eyes worthy of his majesty's extraordinary compassion and interposition; and yet upon a stricter examination were found as remediless as any of the rest. One was; "the condition of that miserable people, which was likewise very numerous, that was transplanted into Connaught; who had been removed from their own possessions in other provinces, with such circumstances of tyranny and cruelty, that their own consents obtained afterwards with that force could not reasonably be thought any confirmation of their unjust title, who were in possession of their lands."

To this it was answered, "that though it was acted in an irregular manner, and without lawful authority, it being in a time of usurpation; yet that the act itself was very prudent and necessary, and an act of mercy, without which an utter extirpation of the nation must have followed, if the kingdom were to be preserved in peace. That it cannot be denied to be an act of mercy, since there was not one man transplanted, who had not by the law forfeited all the estate he had; and his life might have been as legally taken from him: so that both his life, and whatever estate he had granted to him in Connaught, was from the pure bounty of the "state, which might and did by the act of parliament seize upon the same. That, beside the unsteady humour of that people, and their natural inclination to rebel, it was notorious, that whilst they were dispersed over the kingdom, though all their forces had been so totally subdued, that there was not throughout the whole kingdom a visible number of twenty men together, who pretended to be in arms; yet there were daily such disorders committed by thefts and robberies and murders, that they could not be said to be in peace. Nor could the English, man, woman, or child, go one mile from their habitations upon their necessary employment, but they were found murdered and stripped by the Irish, who lay in wait for those purposes; so that the people were very hardly restrained from committing a massacre upon them wherever they were met: so that there appeared no other way to prevent an utter extirpation of them, but to confine and restrain them within such limits and bounds, that might keep them from doing mischief, and thereby make them safe. That thereupon this expedient was laid hold of. And whereas they had nothing to enable them to live upon in the places where they were dispersed, they had now by this transplantation into Connaught lands given them, sufficient with their industry to live well upon; of which there was good evidence, by their having lived well there since that time, and many of them much better than they had ever done before. And the state, which had done this grace for them, had great reason, when it gave them good titles to the land assigned to them, which they might plead in any court of justice, to require from them releases of what they had forfeited; which, though to the public of no use or validity, were of benefit and behoofeful to many particular persons, for the quieting their possessions against frivolous suits and claims which might start up. That this transplantation had been acted, finished, and submitted to by all parties, who had enjoyed the benefit thereof, quietly and without disturbance, many years before the king's return: and the soldiers and adventurers had been likewise so many years in the possession of their lots, in pursuance of the act of parliament, and had laid out so much money in building and planting, that the consequence of such an alteration as was now proposed would be the highest confusion imaginable."

And it cannot be denied, that if the king could have thought it safe and seasonable to have reviewed all that had been done, and taken those advantages upon former miscarriages and misapplications, as according to the strictness of that very law he might have done; the whole foundation, upon which all the hopes rested of preserving that kingdom within the obedience to the crown of England, must have been shaken and even dissolved; with no small influence and impression upon the peace and quiet of England itself. For the memory of the beginning of the rebellion in Ireland (how many other rebellions soever had followed as bad, or worse in respect of the consequences that attended them) was as fresh and as odious to the whole people of England, as it had been the first year. And though no man durst avow so unchristian a wish, as an extirpation of them, (which they would have been very well contented with;) yet no man dissembled his opinion, that it was the only security the English could have in that kingdom, that the Irish should be kept so low, that they should have no power to hurt them.

Another particular, that seemed more against the foundation of justice, was; "that the soldiers and adventurers expected and promised themselves, that in this new settlement that was under debate, all entails and settlements at law should be destroyed, whether upon consideration of marriage, or any other contracts which had been made before the rebellion. Nor had there been in the whole former proceedings in the time of the usurpation, any consideration taken of mortgages or debts due by statute or recognizance, or upon any other security; so that all such debts must be either lost to the proprietors, or remain still with the interest upon the land, whoever had enjoyed the benefit or profits thereof." All which seemed to his majesty very unreasonable and unjust; and that such estates should remain forfeited by the treason of the father, who had been only tenant for life, against all descents and legal titles of innocent children; and of which, in all legal attainders, the crown never had or could receive any benefit.

Yet, how unreasonable soever these pretences seemed to be, it was no easy matter to give rules and directions for the remedy of the mischief, without introducing another mischief equally unjust and unreasonable. For the commissioners declared, "that if such titles, as are mentioned, were preserved and allowed to be good, there would not in that universal guilt, which upon the matter comprehended and covered the whole Irish nation, be one estate forfeited by treason, but such conveyances and settlements would be produced to secure and defend the same; and though they would be forged, there would not be witnesses wanting to prove and justify whatsoever the evidence could be applied to. And if those trials were to be by the known rules and customs of the law in cases of the like nature, there was too much reason to suspect and fear that there would be little justice done: since a jury of Irish would infallibly find against the English, let the evidence be what it could be; and there was too much reason to apprehend that the English, whose animosity was not less, would be as unjust in bringing in their verdict against the Irish, right or wrong." And there was experience afterwards, in the prosecution of this affair, of such forgeries and perjuries, as have not been heard of amongst Christians; and in which, to our shame, the English were not behindhand with the Irish. The king however, thought it not reasonable or just for him, upon what probable suggestions soever, to countenance such a barefaced violation of the law, by any declaration of his; but commanded his council at law to make such alterations in the expressions as might be fit for him to consent to.

The third particular, and which much affected the king, was; "that in this universal joy for his restoration without blood, and with the indemnity of so many hundred thousands who had deserved to suffer the utmost punishments, the poor Irish, after so long sufferings in the "greatest extremity of misery, should be the only persons who should find no benefit or ease by his majesty's restoration, but remain robbed and spoiled of all they had, and be as it were again sacrificed to the avarice and cruelty of them, who had not deserved better of his majesty than the other poor people had done."

To which there can be no other answer made, which is very sufficient in point of justice, but that, "as their rebellion and other crimes had been long before his majesty's time, so full vengeance had been executed upon them; and they had paid the penalties of their crimes and transgressions before his majesty's return: so that he could not restore that which they called their own, without taking it from them, who were become the just owners by an act of parliament; which his majesty could not violate without injustice, and breach of the faith he had given."

And that which was their greatest misery and reproach, and which distinguished them from the subjects of the other two kingdoms, who were otherwise bad enough, was; that both the other nations had made many noble attempts for redeeming their liberty, and for the restoration of his majesty, (for Scotland itself had done much towards it;) and his present restoration was, with God's blessing, and only with his blessing, by the sole effects of the courage and affection of his own subjects: so that England and Scotland had in a great degree redeemed, and even undone what had been before done amiss by them; and his majesty had improved and secured those affections to him by those promises and concessions, which he was in justice obliged to perform. But the miserable Irish alone had no part in contributing to his majesty's happiness; nor had God suffered them to be the least instruments in bringing his good pleasure to pass, or to give any testimony of their repentance for the wickedness they had wrought, or of their resolution to be better subjects for the future: so that they seemed as a people left out by Providence, and exempted from any benefit from that blessed conjuncture in his majesty's restitution.

And this disadvantage was improved towards them, by their frequent manifestation of an inveterate animosity against the English nation and English government; which again was returned to them in an irreconcilable jealousy of all the English towards them. And to this their present behaviour and imprudence contributed very much: for it appeared evidently, that they expected the same concessions (which the necessity of that time had made fit to be granted to them) in respect of their religion should be now likewise confirmed. And this temper made it very necessary for the king to be very wary in dispensing extraordinary favours (which his natural merciful inclination prompted him to) to the Irish; and to prefer the general interest of his three kingdoms, before the particular interest of a company of unhappy men, who had foolishly forfeited their own; though he pitied them, and hoped in the conclusion to be able, without exposing the public peace to manifest hazard, in some degree to improve their condition.

Upon the whole matter, the king found, that if he deferred to settle the government of Ireland till a perfect settlement of all particular interests could be made, it would be very long. He saw it could not be done at once; and that there must be some examinations taken there, and some matters more clearly stated and adjusted, before his majesty could make his determination upon those particulars, which purely depended upon his own judgment; and that some difficulties would be removed or lessened by time: and so he passed that which is called the first act of settlement; and was persuaded to commit the execution thereof to a great number of commissioners, recommended to his majesty by those who were most conversant in the affairs of Ireland; none or very few of which were known to his majesty, or to any of those who had been so many years from their country, in their constant attendance upon his majesty's person beyond the seas.

And for the better countenance of this commission, and likewise to restrain the commissioners from any excess, if their very large jurisdiction should prove a temptation to them, the king thought fit to commit the sword to three justices, which he had resolved when the sending the lord Roberts was declined. Those three were, sir Morrice Eustace, whom he newly made lord chancellor of Ireland, the lord Broghill, whom he now made earl of Orrery, and sir Charles Coote, whom he likewise made earl of Montrath. The first had been his sergeant at law long in that kingdom, and had been eminent in the profession of the law, and the more esteemed for being always a protestant, though an Irishman, and of approved fidelity to the king during this whole rebellion. But he was now old, and made so little show of any parts extraordinary, that, but for the testimony that was given of him, it might have been doubted whether he ever had any. The other two had been both eminently against the king, but upon this turn, when all other powers were down, eminently for him; the one, very able and generous; the other, proud, dull, and very avaricious. But the king had not then power to choose any, against whom some as material objections might not be made, and who had been able to do as much good. With them, there were too many others upon whom honours were conferred; upon some, that they might do no harm, who were thereby enabled to do the more; and upon others, that they might not murmur, who murmured the more for having nothing given them but honour: and so they were all despatched for Ireland; by which the king had some ease, his service little advancement.

After a year was spent in the execution of this commission, (for I shall, without discontinuing the relation, say all that I intend upon this subject of Ireland,) there was very little done towards the settling the kingdom, or towards preparing any thing that might settle it; but on the contrary, the breaches were made wider, and so much passion and injustice shewed, that complaints were brought to his majesty from all parts of the kingdom, and from all persons in authority there. The number of the commissioners was so great, and their interests so different, that they made no despatch. Very many of them were in possession of those lands, which others sued for before them; and they themselves bought broken titles and pretences of other men, for inconsiderable sums of money, which they supported and made good by their own authority. Such of the commissioners, who had their own particular interest and concernment depending, attended the service very diligently: the few who were more equal and just, because they had no interest of their own at stake, were weary of their attendance and expense, (there being no allowance for their pains;) and, offended at the partiality and injustice which they saw practised, withdrew themselves, and would be no longer present at those transactions which they could not regulate or reform.

All interests were equally offended and incensed; and the soldiers and adventurers complained no less of the corruption and injustice than the Irish did: so that the lords justices and council thought it necessary to transmit another bill to his majesty, which, as I remember, they called an explanatory bill of the former; and in that they provided, "that no person who lived in Ireland, or had any pretence to an estate there, should be employed as a commissioner; but that his majesty should be desired to send over a competent number of well qualified persons out of England to attend that service, upon whom a fit salary should be settled by the bill; and such rules set down as might direct and govern the manner of their proceeding; and that an oath might be prescribed by the bill, which the commissioners should take, for the impartial administration of justice, and for the prosecution and execution of this bill," which was transmitted as an act by the king. His majesty made choice of seven gentlemen of very clear reputations; one of them being an eminent sergeant at law, whom he made a judge upon his return from thence; two others, lawyers of very much esteem; and the other four, gentlemen of very good extractions, excellent understandings, and above all suspicion for their integrity, and generally reputed to be superior to any base temptation.

But this second bill, before it could be transmitted, took up as much time as the former. The same numerous retinue of all interests from Ireland attended the king; and all that had been said in the former debates was again repeated, and almost with the same passion and impertinence. The Irish made large observations upon the proceedings of the late commissioners, to justify those fears and apprehensions which they had formerly urged: and there appeared too much reason to believe, that their greatest design now was, rather to keep off any settlement, than that they hoped to procure such a one as they desired; relying more to find their account from a general dissatisfaction, and the distraction and confusion that was like to attend it, than from any determination that was like to be in their favour. Yet they had friends in the court, who made them great promises; which they could not be without, since they made as great promises to those who were to protect them. There were indeed many particular men both of the soldiers and adventurers, who in respect of their many notorious and opprobrious actions against the crown throughout their whole employment, (and who even since his majesty's return had enough expressed how little they were satisfied with the revolution,) were so universally odious both in England and Ireland, that if their particular cases could have been severed from the rest, without violation of the rule of justice that secured all the rest, any thing that could have been done to their detriment would have been grateful enough to every body.

After many very tedious debates, in which his majesty endeavoured by all the ways he could think of to find some expedient, that would enable him to preserve the miserable Irish from the extremity of misery; he found it necessary at last to acquiesce with a very positive assurance from the earl of Orrery and others, who were believed to understand Ireland very exactly, and who, upon the surveys that had been taken with great punctuality, undertook, "that there was land enough to satisfy all the soldiers and adventurers, and that there would be a very great proportion left for the accommodation of the Irish very liberally." And for the better improvement of that proportion, the king prescribed some rules and limitations to the immoderate pretences and demands of the soldiers and adventurers upon the doubling ordinance and imperfect admeasurement, and some other irregularities, with which his majesty was not in honour or justice obliged to comply with them: and so he transmitted this second bill.

Whilst this second bill was under deliberation, there fell out an accident in Ireland, which produced great alterations with reference to the affairs of that kingdom. The differences which had every day arisen between the three justices, and their different humours and affections, had little advanced the settling that government; so that there would have been a necessity of making some mutation in it: so that the death of the earl of Monrath, which happened at this time, fell out conveniently enough to the king; for by it the government was again loose. For the earl of Orrery was in England; and the power resided not in less than two: so that the chancellor, who remained single there, was without any authority to act. And they who took the most dispassioned survey of all that had been done, and of what remained to be done, did conclude that nothing could reasonably produce a settlement there, but the deputation one single person to exercise that government. And the duke of Albemarle himself, who had a great estate in that kingdom, which made him the more long for a settlement, and who had before the king's return and ever since dissuaded the king from thinking of employing the duke of Ormond there, who had himself aversion enough from that command, of which he had sufficient experience; I say, the general had now so totally changed his mind, that he plainly told the king, "that there was no way to explicate that kingdom out of those intricacies in which it was involved, but by sending over a lord lieutenant thither. That he thought it not fit for his majesty's service, that himself, who had that commission of lord lieutenant, should be absent from his person; and therefore that he was very ready and desirous to give up his commission: and that in his judgment nobody would be able to settle and compose the several factions in that kingdom, but the duke of Ormond, who he believed would be grateful to all sorts of people." And therefore he advised his majesty very positively, "that he would immediately give him the commission, and as soon as should be possible send him away into Ireland." And both the king and the general spake with the duke of Ormond, and prevailed with him to accept it, before either of them communicated it to the chancellor, who the king well knew would for many reasons, and out of his great friendship to the duke, dissuade him from undertaking it; which was very true.

And the king and the duke of Ormond came one day to the chancellor, to advise what was to be done for Ireland; and (concealing the resolution) the king told him what the general's advice was, and asked him "what he thought of sending the duke of Ormond his lieutenant into Ireland." To which the chancellor answered presently, "that the king would do very ill in sending him, and that the duke would do much worse, if he desired to go." Upon which they both smiled, and told him, "that the general had prevailed with the king, and the king with the duke; so that the matter was resolved, and there remained nothing to be done but preparing the instructions, which he must think upon."

The chancellor could not refrain from saying very warmly, "that he was sorry for it; and that it would be good for neither of them, that the duke should be from the king, or that he should be in Ireland, where he would be able to do no good. Besides that he had given himself so much to his ease and pleasure since he came into England, that he would never be able to take the pains, which that most laborious province would require." He said, "if this counsel had been taken when the king came first over, it might have had good success, when the duke was full of reputation, and of unquestionable interest in his majesty, and the king himself was more feared and revered than presumed upon: so that the duke would have had full authority to have restrained the exorbitant desires and expectations of all the several parties, who had all guilt enough upon their hearts to fear some rigour from the king, or to receive moderate grace with infinite submission and acknowledgment. But now the duke, besides his withdrawing himself from all business as much as he could, had let himself fall to familiarities with all degrees of men; and upon their averments had undertaken to protect, or at least to solicit men's interests, which it may be might not appear upon examination to be founded upon justice. And the king himself had been exposed to all manner of importunities, received all men's addresses, and heard all they would say; made many promises without deliberation, and appeared so desirous to satisfy all men, that he was irresolute in all things. And therefore till he had taken some firm and fixed resolutions himself, from which neither prejudice towards one man, nor pity and compassion on the behalf of another, should remove him; the lieutenant of Ireland would be able to do him little service, and would be himself continually exposed to scorn and affronts."

And afterwards the chancellor expostulated warmly with the duke of Ormond, (who well knew that all his commotion proceeded from the integrity of his unquestionable friendship,) and told him, "that he would repent this rash resolution; and that he would have been able to have contributed more to the settlement of Ireland, by being near the person of the king, than by being at Dublin, from whence in a short time

"there would be as many aspersions and reproaches sent hither, as had been against other men; and that he had no reason to be confident, that they would not make as deep impression by the arts and industry of his enemies, of which he had store, and would have more by being absent, for the court naturally had little regard for any man who was absent. And that he carried with him the same infirmity into Ireland with that of the king, which kept it from being settled here; which was, an unwillingness to deny any man what he could not but see was impossible to grant, and a desire to please every body, which whosoever affected should please nobody."

The duke, who never took any thing ill he said to him, told him, "that nobody knew better than he the aversion he had to that command, when it may be he might have undertaken it with more advantage." He confessed, "he saw many dangers with reference to himself, which he knew not how to avoid, and many difficulties with reference to the public, which he had little hope to overcome; yet Ireland must not be given over: yet since there seemed to be a general opinion, with which the king concurred, that he could be able to contribute to the composing the distempers, and the settling the government; he would not suspect himself, but believe that he might be able to do somewhat towards it." And he gave his word to him, that nothing should be defective on his part in point of industry; for he was resolved to take indefatigable pains for a year or two, in which he hoped the settlement would be completed, that he might have ease and recreation for the other part of his life." And he confessed, "that he did the more willingly enter upon that province, that he might have the opportunity to settle his own fortune, which, how great soever in extent of lands, did not yet, by reason of the general unsettlement, yield him a quarter of the revenue it ought to do. That for what concerned himself, and the disadvantages he might undergo by his absence, he referred it to Providence and the king's good nature; who," he said, "knew him better than any of his enemies did; and therefore, he hoped, he would believe himself before them." However, the truth is, he was the more disposed to that journey, by the dislike he had of the court, and the necessary exercises which men there were to excel in, for which he was superannuated: and if he did not already discern any lessening of the king's grace towards him, he saw enough to make him believe, that the contrary ought not to be depended upon. And within few years after, he had cause to remember what the chancellor had foretold him of both their fortunes. The duke (with the seven commissioners who were appointed for that act of settlement, and all other persons who attended that interest) entered upon his journey from London about the end of July, in the year one thousand six hundred sixty and four, full four years and more after the king's happy return into England.

It was some months after the commissioners' arrival in Ireland, before they could settle those orders and rules for their proceedings, which were necessary to be done, before the people should be appointed to attend. And it was as necessary that they should in the order of their judicatory first proceed upon the demands and pretences of the Irish; both because there could be no settlement of soldiers or adventurers in possession of any lands, before the titles of the Irish to those lands were determined; and because there was a clause in the last act of parliament, that all the Irish should put in their claims by a day appointed, and that they should be determined before another day, which was likewise assigned; which days might be prolonged for once by the lord lieutenant, upon such reasons as satisfied him: so that the delay for so many months before the commissioners sat, gave great argument of complaint to the Irish, though it could not be avoided, in regard that the commissioners themselves had not been nominated by the king above twenty days before they began their journey into Ireland; so that they could never so much as read over the acts of parliament together, before they came to Dublin. And then they found so many difficult clauses in both acts of parliament, and so contrary to each other, that it was no easy matter to determine how to govern themselves in point of right, and to reduce themselves to any method in their proceedings.

But after they had adjusted all things as well as they could, they published their orders in what method they meant to proceed, and appointed the Irish to put in their claims by such a day, and to attend the prosecution of them accordingly. And they had no sooner entered upon their work, but the English thought they had began it soon enough. For they heard every day many of the Irish, who had been known to have been the most forward in the first beginning of the rebellion, and the most malicious in the carrying it on, declared innocent; and deeds of settlement and entails which had been never heard of before, and which would have been produced (as might reasonably be believed) before the former commissioners, if they had had them to produce, now declared to be good and valid; by which the Irish were immediately put into the possession of a very great quantity of land taken from the English: so that in a short time the commissioners had rendered themselves as generally odious as the Irish, and were looked upon as persons corrupted for that interest, which had every day success almost in whatsoever they pretended. And their determinations happened to have the more of prejudice upon them, because the commissioners were always divided in their judgments. And it is no wonder, that they who seemed most to adhere to the English interest were most esteemed by them.

The parliament in Ireland was then sitting: and the house of commons, consisting of many members who were either soldiers or adventurers, or had the like interest, was very much offended at the proceedings of the commissioners, made many votes against them, and threatened them with their authority and jurisdiction. But the commissioners, who knew their own power, and that there was no appeal against their judgments, proceeded still in their own method, and continued to receive the claims of the Irish, beyond the time that the act of parliament or the act of state limited to them, as was generally understood. And during the last eight or ten days sitting upon those claims, they passed more judgments and determinations than in near a year before, indeed with very wonderful expedition; when the English, who were dispossessed by those judgments, had not their witnesses ready, upon a presumption, that in point of time it was not possible for those causes to come to be heard. By these sentences and decrees, many hundred thousands of acres were adjudged to the Irish, which had been looked upon as unquestionably forfeited, and of which the English had been long in possession accordingly.

This raised so great a clamour, that the English refused to yield possession upon the decrees of the commissioners, who, by an omission in the act of parliament, were not qualified with power enough to provide for the execution of their own sentences. The courts of law established in that kingdom would not, nor indeed could, give any assistance to the commissioners. And the lord lieutenant and council, who had in the beginning, by their authority, put many into the possession of the lands which had been decreed to them by the commissioners, were now more tender and reserved in that multitude of decrees that had lately passed: so that the Irish were using their utmost endeavours, by force to recover the possession of those lands which the commissioners had decreed to them; whilst the English were likewise resolved by force to defend what they had been so long possessed of, notwithstanding the commissioners' determination. And the commissioners were so far troubled and dissatisfied with these proceedings, and with some intricate clauses in the act of parliament concerning the future proceedings; that, though they had not yet made any entrance upon the decision of the claims of the English or of the Irish protestants, they declared, "that they would proceed no further in the execution of their commission, until "they could receive his majesty's further pleasure." And that they might the more effectually receive it, they desired leave from the king that they might attend his royal person; and there being at the same time several complaints made against them to his majesty, and appeals to him from their decrees, he gave the commissioners leave to return. And at the same time all the other interests sent their deputies to solicit their rights; in the prosecution whereof, after much time spent, the king thought fit likewise to receive the advice and assistance of his lieutenant: and so the duke of Ormond returned again to the court. And the settlement of Ireland was the third time brought before the king and council; there being then likewise transmitted a third bill, as additional and supplemental to the other two, and to reverse many of the decrees made by the commissioners, they bearing the reproach of all that had been done or had succeeded amiss, and from all persons who were grieved in what kind soever.

The king was very tender of the reputation of his commissioners, who had been always esteemed men of great probity and unquestionable reputation: and though he could not refuse to receive complaints, yet he gave those who complained no further countenance, than to give the others opportunity to vindicate themselves. Nor did there appear the least evidence to question the sincerity of their proceeding, or to make them liable to any reasonable suspicion of corruption: and the complaints were still prosecuted by those, who had that taken from them which they desired to keep for themselves.

The truth is, there is reason enough to believe, that upon the first arrival of the commissioners in Ireland, and some conversation they had, and the observation they made of the great bitterness and animosities from the English, both soldiers and adventurers, towards the whole Irish nation of what kind soever; the scandalous proceeding of the late commissioners upon the first act, when they had not been guided by any rules of justice, but rejected all evidence, which might operate to the taking away any thing from them which they resolved to keep, the judges themselves being both parties and witnesses in all the causes brought before them; together with the very ill reputation very many of the soldiers and adventurers had for extraordinary malice to the crown and to the royal family; and the notable barbarity they had exercised towards the Irish, who without doubt for many years had undergone the most cruel oppressions of all kind that can be imagined, many thousands of them having been forced, without being covered under any house, to perish in the open fields for hunger; the infamous purchases which had been made by many persons, who had compelled the Irish to sell their remainders and lawful pretences for very inconsiderable sums of money; I say, these and many other particulars of this kind, together with some attempt that had been made upon their first arrival, to corrupt them against all pretences which should be made by the Irish, might probably dispose the commissioners themselves to such a prejudice against many of the English, and to such a compassion towards the Irish, that they might be much inclined to favour their pretences and claims; and to believe that the peace of the kingdom and his majesty's government might be better provided for, by their being settled in the lands of which they had been formerly possessed, than by supporting the ill-gotten titles of those, who had manifested all imaginable infidelity and malice against his majesty whilst they had any power to oppose him, and had not given any testimony of their conversion, or of their resolution to yield him for the future a perfect and entire obedience after they could oppose him no longer; as if they desired only to retain those lands which they had gotten by rebellion, together with the principles by which they had gotten them, until they should have an opportunity to justify both by some new power, or a concurrence amongst themselves. Whencesoever it proceeded, it was plain enough the Irish had received more favour than was expected or imagined.

And in the very entrance into the work, to avoid the partiality which was too apparent in the English towards each other, and their animosity against the Irish as evident, very strict rules had been set down by the commissioners, what kind of evidence they would admit to be good, and receive accordingly. And it was provided, "that the evidence of no soldier or adventurer should be received in any case, to which himself was never so much a stranger;" as, if his own lot had fallen in Munster, and he had no pretence to any thing out of that province, his evidence should not be received, as to any thing that he had seen done in Leinster or Connaught or Ulster, wherein he was not at all concerned: which was generally thought to be a very unjust rule, after so many years expired, and so many persons dead, who had likewise been present at those actions. And by this means many men were declared not to have been in rebellion, when there might have been full evidence, that they had been present in such and such a battle, and in such and such a siege, if the witnesses might have been received who were then present at those actions, and ready to give testimony of it, and of such circumstances as could not have been feigned, if their evidence might have been received.

That which raised the greatest umbrage against the commissioners was, that a great number of the most infamous persons of the Irish nation, who were looked upon by those of their own country with the greatest detestation, as men who had been the most violent fomenters and prosecutors of the rebellion, and the greatest opposers of all moderate counsels, and of all expedients which might have contributed towards a peace in the late king's time, (whereby the nation might have been redeemed,) and who had not had the confidence so much as to offer any claim before the late commissioners, were now adjudged and declared innocent, and so restored to their estates: and that many others, who in truth had never been in rebellion, but notoriously served the king against the rebels both in England and Ireland, and had never been put out of their estates, now upon some slight evidence, by the interception of letters, or confession of messengers that they had had correspondence with the rebels, (though it was evident that even that correspondence had been perfunctory, and only to secure them that they might pursue his majesty's service,) were condemned, and had their estates taken from them, by the judgment of the commissioners.

And of this I cannot forbear to give an instance, and the rather, that it may appear how much a personal prejudice, upon what account soever, weighs and prevails against justice itself, even with men who are not in their natures friends to injustice. It was the case of the earl of Tyrconnell, and it was this. He was the younger son of the lord Fitzwilliams, a catholic lord in Ireland, but of ancient English extraction, of a fair estate, and never suspected to be inclined to the rebels; as very few of the English were. Oliver Fitzwilliams (who was the person we are now speaking of, and the younger son of that lord Fitzwilliams) had been sent by his father into France, to be there educated, many years before the rebellion. He was a proper and a handsome man, and by his courage had gotten a very good reputation in the French army; where, after he had spent some years in the campagna, he obtained the command of a regiment in which he had been first a captain, and was looked upon generally as an excellent officer.

When the army was sent into winter quarters, he went to Paris, to kiss the hands of the queen of England, who was come thither the summer before, it being in the year 1644. Having often waited upon her majesty, he made many professions of duty and obedience to the king, and much condemned the rebellion of the Irish, and said, "he knew many of them were cozened and deceived by tales and lies, and had no purpose to withdraw themselves from his majesty's obedience." He made offer of his service to the queen, "and that, if she thought he might be able to do the king any service, he would immedi"ately go into England, and with his majesty's " approbation into Ireland, where, if he could do " no other service, he was confident he could " draw off many of the Irish from the service of " the rebels." The queen, upon the good reputation he had there, accepted his offer, and writ a letter by him to the king, with a very good character of his person, and as very fit to be trusted in Ireland.

It was his fortune to come to the king very few days before the battle of Naseby, where, as a volunteer in the troop of prince Rupert, he behaved himself with very signal courage in the view of the king himself; who shortly after gave him a letter full of recommendation and testimony to the marquis of Ormond, his lieutenant of Ireland, who received him kindly, and having conferred with him at large, and understood all he intended to do, gave him leave to go into the Irish quarters, and to return again, as he thought fit. And in a short time after, both his father and his elder brother died; whereby both the title and the estate devolved to him, and he was possessed accordingly.

The man was before and in his nature elate and proud enough, had a greater value of himself than other men had, and a less of other men than they deserved, whereby he got not himself beloved by many; but nobody who loved him worst ever suspected him to incline to the rebels, though they knew that he was often in their quarters, and had often conferences with them: and a good part of his estate lay in their quarters. He attended upon the lord lieutenant in all his expeditions: and when the Irish so infamously broke the first peace, and besieged the lieutenant in Dublin, (upon which he was compelled to deliver it into the hands of the parliament with the king's consent,) the lord Fitzwilliams returned with him or about the same time into England, and from thence again into France; where he married the daughter of the widow countess of Clare, and sister to that earl, a lady of a religion the most opposite to the Roman catholic, which he suffered her to enjoy without any contradiction. When the war was at an end in England, and the king a prisoner, he with his wife and family transported himself into England, and after some time into Ireland; where Cromwell had a jealous eye upon him, but not being able to discover any thing against him, could not hinder him from possessing the estate that had descended to him from his father and his elder brother. And the war being there ended, and the settlement made by the act of parliament upon the statute, as hath been mentioned before, there was not the least trouble given to him; but he quietly enjoyed the possession of his whole estate till the king's return, when he came into England to kiss his majesty's hand, and was by him made earl of Tyrconnell.

When the commissioners sat upon the first act, who observed no rules of justice, law, or equity, when they contradicted any interest or appetite of their own, he received no disturbance; but when these new commissioners came over, all men, as well protestants as others, whose estates had never been questioned, thought it safest for them to put in their claims before the commissioners, to prevent any trouble that might arise hereafter. This gentleman followed that advice and example, put in his claim, and pressed the commissioners for a short day to be heard. The day was appointed. Neither adventurer, soldier, or any other person, made any title to the land: but some envious person, unqualified for any prosecution, offered a letter to the commissioners which had many years before, and before his coming into Ireland, been written by colonel Fitzwilliams in Paris to a Jesuit, one Hartogan, then in Ireland; in which he gave him notice "of his purpose of coming " into Ireland, where he hoped to do their friends " some service."

This letter was writ when the queen first designed to send him to the king, that the Irish, who were the most jealous people of the world, might know of his purpose to come thither, before they should hear of his being in Dublin; and now being produced before the commissioners, without considering how long since it was writ, or the reason of writing it, that he had served the king, and never in the least degree against him, upon one of their rules, "that a correspondence "with the rebels was a good evidence," they without any pause declared him nocent, and presently assigned his estate to some persons to whom reprisals were to be made: whilst they who thought the judgment very unjust, laughed at the ill luck of a man whom they did not love; and all men were well enough pleased with the sentence, who were displeased with the person. And this party pursued him so severely into England, that the king's interposition to redeem him from so unjust a decree was looked upon as over-favouring the Irish; when none were so glad of the decree as the Irish, who universally hated him. Nor was he at last restored to the possession of his estate, without making some composition with those to whom the commissioners had assigned it.

Many, who had formerly made their claims without insisting upon any deeds of settlement or other conveyances in law, now produced former settlements in consideration of marriage, or other like good considerations in law, made before the beginning of the rebellion: which being now proved by witnesses enough, decrees were every day obtained for the restitution of great quantities of land upon those deeds and conveyances; though the forgeries of those deeds and perjury of those witnesses were very notorious. And some instances were given of the manifestation and direct proof that was made of the forgery of deeds, upon which decrees had been made, to the satisfaction of the commissioners themselves, within a very short time after the pronouncing those decrees: and yet no reparation was given, but the decrees proceeded and were executed with all rigour, as if no such thing had appeared.

The commissioners answered, "that they had "made no decrees but according to their consciences, and such as they were obliged to make "by the course and rule of justice. That they "did doubt and in truth believe, that there had "been evil practices used both in the forging "of deeds and corrupting of witnesses, and that "the same was equally practised by the English "as the Irish: and therefore that they had been "obliged to make that order, which had been so "much excepted against, not to admit the testimony of any English adventurer or soldier in "the case of another adventurer or soldier; for "that it was very notorious, they looked upon "the whole as one joint interest, and so gratified each other in their testimonies." And of this they gave many sad instances, by which it was too evident that the perjuries were mutual, and too much practised by the one and the other side.

"That they had used all the providence and vigilance they could, by the careful examination of witnesses, (which were produced apart, and never in the presence of each other,) and by asking them all such material questions as occurred to their understandings, and which they could not expect to be asked, to discover the truth, and to prevent and manifest all perjuries. That they had likewise used their utmost diligence and care to prevent their being imposed upon with false and forged deeds and conveyances, by taking a precise and strict view themselves of all deeds produced; and interrogated the witnesses with all the cunning they could, upon the matter and consideration upon which such deeds had been entered into, and upon the matter and circumstances in the execution thereof: which was all the providence they could use. And though they met with many reasons oftentimes to doubt the integrity of the proceedings, and in their own private consciences to apprehend there might be great corruption; yet that they were obliged judicially to determine according to the testimony of the witnesses, and the evidence of those deeds in law against which no proofs were made. That they had constantly heard all that the adverse party had thought fit to object, both against the credit of any witnesses, and the truth and validity of any conveyances which were produced; upon which they had rejected many witnesses, and disallowed some conveyances: but when the objections were only founded upon presumptions and probabilities, as most usually they were, they could not weigh down the full and categorical evidence that was given.

"That if they had yielded to the importunities of the persons concerned, who often pressed to have further time given to them to prove such a perjury, or to disprove such a conveyance; it must have made their work endless, and stopped all manner of proceedings, for which it appeared they were straitened too much in time; and that indeed would have but opened the door wider for perjuries and other corruptions; since it was very plain to them, that either side could bring as many witnesses as they pleased, to prove what they pleased, and that they would bring as many as they believed necessary to the work in hand. And therefore the commissioners having before prescribed a method and rule to themselves for their proceedings, and that no man could have a cause, in which he was concerned, brought to hearing without his knowing when it was to be heard, and so it was to be presumed, that he was well provided to support his own title; they had thought fit, upon mature deliberation amongst themselves, to adhere to the order they had prescribed to themselves and others, and to conclude, that they would not be able to prove that another day, which they were not able to prove at the time when they ought to have been ready.

"For the discovery of any forgery after the decrees had been passed, and upon which they "had given no reparation," they confessed, "that some few such discoveries had been made to them, by which the forgery appeared very clearly: but as they had no power by the act of parliament to punish either forgery or perjury, but must leave the examination and punishment thereof to the law, and to the judges of the law; so, that they had only authority to make decrees upon such grounds as satisfied their consciences, but had not any authority to reverse those decrees, after they were once made and published, upon any evidence whatsoever." They concluded with their humble desire to the king, "that the most strict examinations might be made of their corruptions, in which," they said, "they were sure to be found very innocent, against all the malice that was discovered against them: that they had proceeded in all things according to the integrity of their hearts, and the best of their understandings; and if through the defect of that they had erred in any part of their determinations and judgments, they hoped their want of wisdom should not be imputed to them as a crime."

Many, who had a very good opinion of the persons and abilities of the commissioners, were not yet satisfied with their defence; nor did they believe, that they were so strictly bound to judge upon the testimony of suspected witnesses; but that they were therefore trusted with an arbitrary power, because it was foreseen that juries were not like to be entire: so that they were, upon weighing all circumstances, to declare what in their consciences they believed to be true and just. That if they had bound themselves up by too strict and unreasonable rules, they should rather in time have reformed those rules, than think to support what was done amiss, by the observation of what they had prescribed to themselves. And it was believed, that the entire exclusion of the English from being witnesses for the proving of what could not in nature be otherwise proved, was not just or reasonable. That their want of power to reverse or alter their own decrees, upon any emergent reasons which could afterwards occur, was a just ground for their more serious deliberation in and before they passed any such decrees. And their excuse for not granting longer time when it was pressed for, [was founded upon] reasons which were visibly not to be justified; it not being possible for any man to defend himself against the claims of the Irish, without knowing what deeds or witnesses they could produce for making good their suggestions; and therefore it was as impossible for them to have all their evidence upon the place. Besides that it was very evident, that in the last ten days of their sitting (which was likewise thought to be when their power as to those particulars was determined, and in which they had made more decrees than in all the time before) they had made so many in a day, contrary to their former rule and method, that men were plainly surprised, and could not produce those proofs which in a short time they might have been supplied with; and the refusing to allow them that time, was upon the matter to determine their interest, and to take away their estates without being once heard, and upon the bare allegations of their adversaries. And in these last decrees many instances were given of that nature, wherein the evidence appeared to be very full, if time had been given to produce it.

There was one very notable case decreed by the commissioners extremely complained of, and cried out against by all parties, as well Irish as English; and for which the commissioners themselves made no other excuse or defence, but the receipt of a letter from the king, which was not thought a good plea for sworn judges, as the commissioners were. It was the case of the marquis of Antrim. Which case having been so much upon the stage, and so much enlarged upon to the reproach of the king, and even to the traducing of the memory of his blessed father; and those men, who artificially contrived the doing of all that was done amiss, having done all they could to wound the reputation of the chancellor, and to get it to be believed, "that he had by some sinister information misled the king to oblige the marquis;" it is a debt due to truth, and to the honour of both their majesties, to set down a very particular narration of that whole affair; by which it will appear, how far the king was from so much as wishing that any thing should be done for the benefit of the marquis, which should be contrary to the rules of justice.

Whilst his majesty was in foreign parts, he received frequent advertisements from England and from Ireland, "that the marquis of Antrim behaved himself very undutifully towards him; and that he had made himself very grateful to the rebels, by calumniating the late king: and that he had given it under his hand to Ireton, or some other principal person employed under Cromwell, that his late majesty had sent him into Ireland to join with the rebels, and that his majesty was not offended with the Irish for entering into that rebellion:" which was a calumny so false and so odious, and reflected so much upon the honour of his majesty, that the king was resolved, as soon as God should put it into his power, to cause the strictest examination to be made concerning it; the report having gained much credit with his majesty, by the notoriety that the marquis had procured great recommendations from those who governed in Ireland to those who governed in England; and that upon the presumption of that he had come into England, and as far as St. Alban's towards London, from whence he had been forced suddenly to return into Ireland by the activity of his many creditors, who upon the news of his coming had provided for his reception, and would unavoidably have east him into prison. And no recommendation could have inclined those who were in authority, to do anything extraordinary for the protection of a person, who from the beginning of the Irish rebellion lay under so ill a character with them, and had so ill a name throughout the kingdom.

The king had been very few days in London, after his arrival from the parts beyond the seas, when he was informed that the marquis of Antrim was upon his way from Ireland towards the court: and the commissioners from Ireland, who have been mentioned before, were the first who gave his majesty that information, and at the same time told him all that his majesty had heard before concerning the marquis, and of the bold calumnies with which he had traduced his royal father, with many other particulars; "all which," they affirmed, "would be proved by unquestionable evidence, and by letters and certificates under his own hand." Upon this full information, (of the truth whereof his majesty entertained no doubt,) as soon as the marquis came to the town, he was by the king's special order committed to the Tower; nor could any petition from him, or entreaty of his friends, of which he had some very powerful, prevail with his majesty to admit him into his presence. But by the first opportunity he was sent prisoner to Dublin, where he was committed to the castle; the king having given direction, that he should be proceeded against with all strictness according to law: and to that purpose, the lords justices were required to give all orders and directions necessary. The marquis still professed and avowed his innocence, and used all the means he could to procure that he might be speedily brought to his trial; which the king likewise expected. But after a year's detention in prison, and nothing brought against him, he was set at liberty, and had a pass given him from the council there to go into England. He then applied himself to his majesty, demanding nothing of favour, but said, "he expected justice; and that after so many years being deprived of his estate, he might at last be restored to it, if nothing could be objected against him wherein he had deserved his majesty."

He was a gentleman who had been bred up in the court of England, and having married the duchess of Buckingham, (though against the king's will,) he had been afterwards very well received by both their majesties, and was frequently in their presence. He had spent a very vast estate in the court, without having ever received the least benefit from it. He had retired into Ireland, and lived upon his own estate in that country, some years before the rebellion broke out; in the beginning whereof he had undergone some suspicion, having held some correspondence with the rebels, and possibly made some undertakings to them: but he went speedily to Dublin, was well received by the justices there, and from thence transported himself with their license to Oxford, where the king was; to whom he gave so good an account of all that had passed, that his majesty made no doubt of his affection to his service, though he had very little confidence in his judgment and understanding, which were never remarkable. Besides that it was well known, that he had a very unreasonable envy towards the marquis of Ormond, and would fain have it believed that his interest in Ireland was so great, that he could reclaim that whole nation to his majesty's obedience; but that vanity and presumption never gained the least credit with his majesty: yet it may reasonably be believed that he thought so himself, and that it was the source from which all the bitter waters of his own misfortune issued.

Upon the Scots second entering into England with their army upon the obligation of the covenant, and all his majesty's endeavours to prevent it being disappointed, the marquis of Mountrose had proposed to the king, "to make a journey privately into Scotland, and to get into the Highlands, where, with his majesty's authority, he hoped he should be able to draw together such a body of men, as might give his countrymen cause to call for their own army out of England, to secure themselves." And with this overture, or upon debate thereof, he wished "that the earl of Antrim" (for he was then no more) "might be likewise sent into Ulster, where his interest lay, and from whence he would be able to transport a body of men into the High-lands, where he had likewise the clan of Mac-donnells, who acknowledged him to be their chief, and would be consequently at his devotion; by which means the marquis of Mount-rose would be enabled the more powerfully to proceed in his undertaking." The earl of Antrim entered upon this undertaking with great alacrity, and undertook to the king to perform great matters in Scotland; to which his own interest and animosity enough disposed him, having an old and a sharp controversy and contestation with the marquis of Argyle, who had dispossessed him of a large territory there. All things being adjusted for this undertaking, and his majesty being well pleased with the earl's alacrity, he created him at that time a marquis, gave him letters to the marquis of Ormond his lieutenant there, as well to satisfy him of the good opinion he had of the marquis of Antrim, and of the trust he had reposed in him, as to wish him to give him all the assistance he could with convenience, for the carrying on the expedition for Scotland.

And for the better preventing of any inconvenience that might fall out by the rashness and inadvertency of the marquis of Antrim towards the lord lieutenant, his majesty sent Daniel O'Neile of his bedchamber into Ireland with him, who had great power over him, and very much credit with the marquis of Ormond; and was a man of that dexterity and address, that no man could so well prevent the inconveniences and prejudice, which the natural levity and indiscretion of the other might tempt him to, or more dispose and incline the lord lieutenant to take little notice of those vanities and indiscretions. And the king, who had no desire that the marquis should stay long in Dublin, upon his promise that he would use all possible expedition in transporting himself into Scotland, gave him leave to hold that correspondence with the Irish rebels (who had the command of all the northern parts, and without whose connivance at least he could very hardly be able to make his levies and transport his men) as was necessary to his purposes: within the limits of which, it is probable enough that he did not contain himself; for the education and conversation he had in the world, had not extirpated that natural craft in which that nation excels, and by which they only deceive themselves; and might say many things, which he had not authority or warrant to say.

Upon his coming to Dublin, the lord lieutenant gave him all the countenance he could wish, and assisted him in all the ways he could propose, to prosecute his design; but the men were to be raised in or near the rebels' quarters. And it cannot be denied, but that the levies he made, and sent over into Scotland under the command of Calkito, were the foundation of all those wonderful acts, which were performed afterwards by the marquis of Mountrose, (they were fifteen hundred men, very good, and with very good officers; all so hardy, that neither the ill fare nor the ill lodging in the Highlands gave them any discouragement,) and gave the first opportunity to the marquis of Mountrose of being in the head of an army; under which he drew together such of the Highlanders and others of his friends, who were willing to repair to him. But upon any military action, and defeat given to the enemy, which happened as often as they encountered the Scots, the Highlanders went always home with their booty, and the Irish only stayed together with their general. And from this beginning the marquis of Mountrose grew to that power, that after many battles won by him with notable slaughter of the enemy, he marched victoriously with his army till he made himself master of Edinburgh, and redeemed out of the prison there the earl of [Crawford], lord Ogilby, and many other noble persons, who had been taken and sent thither, with resolution that they should all lose their heads. And the marquis of Mountrose did always acknowledge, that the rise and beginning of his good success was due and to be imputed to that body of Irish, which had in the beginning been sent over by the marquis of Antrim; to whom the king had acknowledged the service by several letters, all of his own handwriting; in which were very gracious expressions of the sense his majesty had of his great services, and his resolution to reward him.

It is true, that the marquis of Antrim had not gone over himself with his men, as he had promised to do, but stayed in Ulster under pretence of raising a greater body of men, with which he would adventure his own person; but either out of jealousy or displeasure against the marquis of Mountrose, or having in truth no mind to that service of Scotland, he prosecuted not that purpose, but remained still in Ulster, where all his own estate lay, and so was in the rebels' quarters, and no doubt was often in their councils; by which he gave great advantages against himself, and might in strictness of law have been as severely punished by the king, as the worst of the rebels. At last, in his moving from place to place, (for he was not in any expedition with the rebels,) he was taken prisoner by the Scots, who intended to have put him to death for having sent men into Scotland; but he made his escape out of their hands, and transported himself into Flanders, and from thence, having assurance that the prince (his majesty that now is) was then in the west, he came with two good frigates into the port of Falmouth, and offered his service to his royal highness; and having in his frigates a quantity of arms and some ammunition, which he had procured in Flanders for the service of Ireland, most of the arms and ammunition were employed, with his consent, for the supply of the troops and garrisons in Cornwall: and the prince made use of one of the frigates to transport his person to Scilly, and from thence to Jersey; without which convenience, his highness had been exposed to great difficulties, and could hardly have escaped the hands of his enemies. After all which, when Dublin was given up to the parliament, and the king's authority was withdrawn out of that kingdom, he again (not having wherewithal to live any where else) transported himself into Ireland, made himself gracious with the Irish, and was by them sent into France, to desire the queen mother and the prince of Wales "to send the marquis of Ormond to reassume his majesty's government in that kingdom;" which was done accordingly, in the manner that is mentioned elsewhere.

The marquis of Antrim alleged all these particulars, and produced many original letters from the late king, (besides those which are mentioned,) the queen mother, and the prince, in all which his services had been acknowledged, and many promises made to him; and concluded with a full protestation, "that he desired no pardon for any thing that he had ever done against the king; and if there were the least proof that he had failed in his fidelity to him, or had not according to the best of his understanding advanced his service, he looked for no favour. But if his being in the Irish quarters and consulting with them, without which he could not have made his levies for Scotland, nor transported them if he had levied them, and if his living amongst them afterwards, when his majesty's [authority] was drawn from thence, and when he could live no where else, do by the strict letter of the law expose him to ruin without his majesty's grace and favour, he did hope his majesty would redeem him from that misery, and that the forfeiture of his estate should not be taken, as if he were a traitor and a rebel to the king." And it appeared that if he were restored to all he could pretend to, or of which he had ever been possessed, his debts were so great, and his creditors had those legal incumbrances upon his estate, that his condition at best would not be liable to much envy.

Though the king had been never taken notice of to have any great inclinations to the marquis, who was very little known to him; yet this representation and clear view of what he had done and what he had suffered, raised great compassion towards him in the royal breast of his majesty. And he thought it would in some degree reflect upon his own honour and justice, and upon the memory of his blessed father, if in a time when he passed by so many transgressions very heinous, he should leave the marquis exposed to the fury of his enemies, (who were only his enemies because they were possessed of his estate, and because he desired to have his own from them,) for no other crime upon the matter, than for not having that prudence and that providence in his endeavours to serve the king, as he ought to have had; that is, he ought to have been wiser. And the rigour exercised towards him upon his first arrival, in sending him to the Tower and afterwards into Ireland, by those who enough wished his destruction, and that they had not been able to make the least proof against him, improved his majesty's good disposition towards him. Yet he refused positively to write a letter to the commissioners on his behalf; which the marquis most importunately desired, as the only thing that could do him good. But his majesty directed a letter to be prepared to the lord lieutenant, in which all his allegations and suggestions should be set down, and the truth thereof examined by him; and that if he should be found to have committed no greater faults against the king, than those which he confessed, then that letter should be sent to the commissioners, that they might see both their majesty's testimonies in such particulars as were known to themselves. And this letter was very warily drawn, and being approved by his majesty, was sent accordingly to the lord lieutenant. And shortly after a copy of it signed by the king (who conceived it only to be a duplicate, lest the other should miscarry) was, contrary to his majesty's resolution, and contrary to the advice of the chancellor and without his knowledge, likewise sent to the commissioners; who had thereupon made such a decree as is before mentioned, and declared, "that they had made it only upon that ground;" which gave his majesty some trouble, and obliged him to insert a clause in the next bill concerning that affair.

And this was the whole proceeding that related to the marquis of Antrim: and it is yet very hard to comprehend, wherein there was more favour shewed towards him by his majesty, than he might in truth very reasonably pretend to, what noise soever was raised, and what glosses soever made; which proceeded only from the general dislike of the man, who had much more weakness than wickedness in him, and was an object rather of pity than of malice or envy.

When his majesty entered upon the debate of the third bill, which was transmitted to him for a supplement and addition to the other two, he quickly found the settlement proposed, and which was the end of the three bills, was now grown more difficult than ever. All the measures, which had formerly been taken from the great proportion of land which would remain to be disposed of, were no more to be relied upon, but appeared to have been a wrong foundation from the beginning; which was now made more desperate, by the vast proportions which had been assigned to the Irish by the commissioners' decrees: and somewhat had intervened by some acts of bounty from his majesty, which had not been carefully enough watched and represented to him.

The king had, upon passing the former bills, and upon discerning how much the Irish were like to suffer, resolved to retain all that should by forfeiture or otherwise come to his majesty in his own power; to the end, that when the settlement should be made, he might be able to gratify those of the Irish nation, who had any thing [of merit] towards him, or had been least faulty. And if he had observed that resolution, very much of the trouble he underwent afterwards had been prevented: for he would then, besides that which Cromwell had reserved to himself, (which was a vast tract of ground,) have had all those forfeitures which the regicides had been possessed of, and other criminal persons; which amounted to a huge quantity of the best land. And though the king had before designed all those forfeited lands to his brother the duke, yet his highness was so pleased with the resolution his majesty had taken, to retain them to that purpose, that he forbore to prosecute that grant, till he heard of great quantities of land every day granted away by his majesty to his servants and others; whereby he saw the main end would be disappointed. And then he resolved to be no longer a loser for the benefit of those, who had no pretence to what they got; and so proceeded in getting that grant from the king to himself of those lands designed to him.

The king had swerved from that rule, before it was scarce discerned: and the error of it may be very justly imputed to the earl of [Ortery], and to none but him; who believing that he could never be well enough at court, except he had courtiers of all sorts obliged to him, and would therefore speak well of him in all places and companies, (and those arts of his put the king to much trouble and loss both in England and Ireland,) he commended to many of such friends (though he had advised the king to the former resolution) many suits of that kind, and sent certificates to them, oftentimes under his own hand, of the value those suits might be to them if obtained, and of the little importance the granting of them would be to his majesty; which, having been shewed to the king, disposed him to those concessions, which otherwise he would not so easily have made. Then he directed them a way (being then one of the lords justices) for the more immediate passing those grants they could obtain, without meeting those obstructions which they had been subject to; for when any of those grants had been brought to the great seal of England, the chancellor always stopped them, and put his majesty in mind of his former resolution: but this new way (in itself lawful enough) kept him from knowing any of those transactions, which were made by letters from the king to the lords justices; and thereupon the grants were prepared there, and passed under the great seal of Ireland.

There was then likewise a new clause introduced into those grants, of a very new nature; for being grounded always upon letters out of England, and passed under the seal of Ireland, the letters were prepared and formed there, and transmitted hither only for his majesty's sign manual: so that [neither] the king's learned council at law, nor any other his ministers, (the secretaries only excepted,) had any notice or the perusal of any of those grants. The clause was, "that if any of those lands so granted by his majesty should be otherwise decreed, his majesty's grantee should be reprimed with other lands:" so that in many cases, the greatest inducement to his majesty's bounty being the uncertainty of his own right, which the person to whom it was granted was obliged to vindicate at his own charge, the king was now bound to make it good, if his grant was not valid. And so that which was but a contingent bounty, which commonly was the sole argument for the passing it, was now turned into a real and substantial benefit, as a debt; which created another difficulty in the settlement: which was yet the more hard, because there were many claims of the Irish themselves yet unheard, all the false admeasurements to be examined, and many other uncertainties to be determined by the commissioners; which left those who were in quiet possession, as well as those who were out of it, in the highest insecurity and apprehension.

This intricacy and even despair, which possessed all kind of people, of any settlement, made all of them willing to contribute to any that could be proposed. They found his majesty very unwilling to consent to the repeal of the decrees made by the commissioners; which must have taken away the confidence and assurance of whatsoever was to be done hereafter, by making men see, that what was settled by one act of parliament might immediately be unsettled by another: so that there was no hope by that expedient to increase the number of acres, which being left might in any degree comply with the several pretences. The Irish found, that they might only be able to obstruct any settlement, but should never be able to get such a one as would turn to their own satisfaction. The soldiers and adventurers agreed less amongst themselves: and the clamour was as great against those, who by false admeasurements had gotten more than they should have, as from those who had received less than was their due; and they who least feared any new examination could not yet have any secure title, before all the rest were settled. In a word, all men found that any settlement would be better than none; and that more profit would arise from a smaller proportion of land quietly possessed and husbanded accordingly, than [from] a much greater proportion under a doubtful title and an uncertainty, which must dishearten any industry and improvement.

Upon these considerations and motives, they met amongst themselves, and debated together by what expedient they might draw light out of this darkness. There appeared only one way which administered any reasonable hope; which was, by increasing the stock for reprisals to such a degree, that all men's pretences might in some measure be provided for: and there was no other way to arrive to this, but by every man's parting with somewhat which he thought to be his own. And to this they had one encouragement, that was of the highest prevalence with them, which was, that this way an end would be put to the illimited jurisdiction of the commissioners, (which was very terrible to all of them,) who from henceforth could have little other power, than to execute what should here be agreed upon.

In conclusion, they brought a proposition to the king, raised and digested between themselves, "that all persons, who were to receive any benefit by this act, should abate and give a fourth part of what they had, towards the stock for reprisals; all which the commissioners should distribute amongst those Irish, who should appear most fit for his majesty's bounty." And this agreement was so unanimous, that though it met with some obstinate opposition after it was brought before the king, yet the number of the opposers was so small in respect of the others who agreed to it, that they grew weary and ashamed of further contention. And thereupon that third act of settlement, as supplemental to the other two, was consented to by the king; who, to publish to the world that nothing stuck with him which seemed to reflect upon the commissioners, resolved to make no change: and so though two of them, who had offices here to discharge, prevailed with his majesty that they might not return again into Ireland; the other five were continued, to execute what was more to be done by this act, and so to perfect the settlement. And no doubt it will be here said, that this expedient might have been sooner found, and so prevented many of those disorders and inconveniences which intervened. But they who knew that time, and the perverseness and obstinacy that possessed all pretenders, must confess that the season was never ripe before: nor could their consent and agreement, upon which this act was founded, ever be obtained before.

These were all the transactions which passed with reference to Ireland, whilst the chancellor remained at that board; in which he acted no more than any other of the lords who were present did: except when any difficulties occurred in their private meetings and debates, they sometimes resorted to him for advice, which he was ready to give; being always willing to take any pains, which might make that very difficult work more easy to be brought to a good end. But as he never thought he deserved any reward for so doing, so he never expected the benefit of one shilling in money or in money's worth, for any thing he ever did in that affair; and was so far from entertaining any overture to that purpose, that it is notoriously known to many persons of honour, who, I presume, will be ready to testify the same, that when, upon his majesty's first return into England, some propositions were made to him of receiving the grant of some forfeited lands, and for the buying other lands there upon the desire of the owners thereof, and at so low a price that the very profit of the land would in a short time have paid for the purchase, and other overtures of immediate benefit in money, (which others did and lawfully might accept;) he rejected all propositions of that kind or relating to it, and declared publicly and privately, "that he would neither have lands in Ireland nor the least benefit from thence, till all differences and pretences in that kingdom should be so fully settled and agreed, that there could be no more appeal to the king, or repairing to the king's council for justice; in which," he said, "he should never be thought so competent an adviser, if he had any title of his own in that kingdom to bias his inclinations." And he was often heard to say, "that he never took a firmer resolution in any particular in his life, than to adhere to that conclusion." Yet because it was notorious afterwards, that he did receive some money out of Ireland, and had a lawful title to receive more, (with which he was reproached when he could not answer for himself;) it may not be amiss in this place, for his vindication, to set down particularly how that came to pass, and to mention all the circumstances which preceded, accompanied, or attended that affair.

In the bills which were first transmitted from Ireland after his majesty's happy return, there was an imposition of a certain sum of money upon some specified lands in several provinces, "which was to be paid to his majesty within a limited time, and to be disposed of by his majesty to such persons who had served him faithfully, and suffered in so doing," or words to that effect; for he often protested that he never saw the act of parliament, and was most confident that he never heard of it at the time when it passed, he being often absent from the council, by reason of the gout or other accidents, when such matters were transacted. But two years after the king's return, or thereabout, he received a letter from the earl of Orrery, "that there would be in his hands, and in the earl of Anglesea's and the lord Massaren's," (who it seems were appointed treasurers to receive the money to be raised by that act of parliament,) "a good sum of money for him; which he gave him notice of, to the end that he might give direction for the disposal thereof, whether he would have it returned into England, or laid out in land in Ireland;" and he wished "that he would speedily send his direction, because he was confident that the money would be paid in, at least by the time that his letter could arrive there." No man can be more surprised, than the chancellor was at the receipt of this letter, believing that there was some mistake in it, and that his name might have been used in trust by somebody who had given him no notice of it. And without returning any answer to the earl of Orrery, he writ by that post to the lord lieutenant, to inform him of what the earl of Orrery had writ to him, and desired him to "inform him by his own inquiry, what the meaning of it was."

Before he had an answer from the lord lieutenant, or indeed before his letter could come to the lord lieutenant's hands, he received a second letter from the earl of Orrery; in which he informed him, "that there was now paid in to his use the sum of twelve thousand six hundred and odd pounds, and that there would be the like sum again received for him at the end of six months;" and sent him a particular direction, "to what person and in what form he was to send his order for the payment of the money." The chancellor still forbore to answer this letter, till he had received an answer to what he had written to the lord lieutenant, who then informed him at large, what title he had to that money, and how he came to have it: "that shortly after the passing that act of parliament, which had given his majesty the disposal of the money before mentioned, the earl of Orrery had come to him, the lord lieutenant, and putting him in mind, how the chancellor had rejected all overtures which had been made to him of benefit out of that kingdom," (which refusal, and many others that shew how unsollicitous he had always been in the ways of getting, is not more known to any man living than to the lord lieutenant,) "wished that he would move the king to confer some part of that money upon the chancellor; which the lord lieutenant very willingly did, and his majesty as cheerfully granted: that a letter was accordingly prepared, and his majesty's royal signature procured by Mr. Secretary Nicholas, who was at the same time commanded by the king not to let him know of it; to which purpose there was likewise a clause in the letter, whereby it was provided that he should have no notice of it; which," the lord lieutenant said, "was by his majesty's direction, or with his approbation, because it was said, that if he had notice of it, he would be so foolish as to obstruct it himself. And there was a clause likewise in the said letter, which directed the payment of the said monies to his heirs, executors, or assigns, if he should die before the receipt thereof."

The chancellor being so fully advertised of all this by the lord lieutenant, and of which till that time he had not the least notice or imagination, he desired secretary Nicholas to give him a copy of that letter, (which had been since passed as a grant to him under the great seal of Ireland, according to the form then used;) which the secretary gave him, with a large account of many gracious circumstances in the king's granting it, and the obligation laid upon him of secrecy, and the great caution that was used that he might have no notice of it. After he was informed of all this, he did not think that there was any thing left for him to do, but to make his humble acknowledgment to his majesty for his royal bounty, and to take care for the receiving and transmitting the money; and doubted not but that he might receive it very honestly. He did therefore wait upon his majesty with that duty that became him: and his majesty was graciously pleased to enlarge his bounty with those expressions of favour, and of the satisfaction he had vouchsafed to take himself in conferring his donative, that his joy was much greater from that grace, than in the greatness of the gift.

At the very same time, and the very day that the chancellor received the letter from the lord lieutenant, the earl of Portland came to him, and informed him of a difference that was fallen out between the lord Lovelace and sir Bulstrode Whitlock, upon a defect in the title to certain lands purchased heretofore by sir Bulstrode Whitlock from the lord Lovelace, and enjoyed by him ever since; but being by the necessity of that time, the delinquency of Lovelace and the power of Whitlock, bought and sold at an undervalue, and the time being now more equal, Lovelace resolved to have more money, or not to perform a covenant he had entered into; the not-performance whereof would leave the other's title very defective. The earl desired to reconcile those two, which could not be done without sale of the land: and so he proposed to the chancellor the buying this land, which lay next to some land he had in Wiltshire. This proposition [was] made upon the very day, as is said before, that he had received the letter from the lord lieutenant of Ireland; by which it appeared that there was near as much money already received for him, as would pay for that purchase, besides what was more to be received within six months after. The land was well known to the chancellor; so that upon a short conference with the parties, they all agreed upon the purchase: and he was easily prevailed with to undertake the payment of the greatest part of the money upon sealing the writings, not making the least doubt, but that he should by that time receive the money from Ireland; which was the sole ground and motive to his making that purchase.

But the next letters he received from Ireland informed him, "that the necessities of that kingdom had been such, that they could only return six thousand pounds of that money; and that they had been compelled to make use of the reat for the public, which would take care to repay it to him in a short time:" and so he found himself engaged in a purchase which he could not retract, upon presumption of money which he could not receive. And he did not only never after receive one penny of what was due upon the second payment, (which he so little suspected could fail, there being an act of parliament for the security, that he assigned it upon the marriage of his second son to him, as the best part of his portion;) but the remainder of the first sum, which was so borrowed or taken from him, or any part of it, was never after paid to him or to his use: by which, and the inconveniences and damages which ensued to him from thence, he might reasonably say that he was a loser, and involved in a great debt, by that signal bounty of his majesty; and which was afterwards made matter of reproach to him, and as an argument of his corruption. But this is a very true account of that business, and of all the money that he ever received from Ireland, with all the circumstances thereof; which, in the judgment of all impartial men, cannot reflect to the prejudice of his integrity and honour.

And so we shall no further pursue or again resume any mention of the affairs of Ireland, though they will afford a large field of matter; but shall return to the beginning of the parliament, from whence we departed.

It cannot be expressed, hardly imagined, with what alacrity the parliament entered upon all particular affairs which might refer to the king's honour, safety, or profit. They pulled up all those principles of sedition and rebellion by the roots, which in their own observation had been the ground of or contributed to the odious and infamous rebellion in the long parliament. They declared, "that sottish distinction between the king's person and his office to be treason; that his negative voice could not be taken from him, and was so essential to the making a law, that no order or ordinance of either house could be binding to the subject without it; that the militia was inseparably vested in his majesty, and that it was high treason to raise or levy soldiers without the king's commission." And because the license of speaking seditiously, and of laying scandalous imputations and aspersions upon the person of the king, as saying "that he was a papist," and such like terms, to alienate the affections of the people from his majesty, had been the prologue and principal ingredient to that rebellion, and corrupted the hearts of his loving subjects; they declared, "that the raising any calumnies of that kind upon the king, as saying, 'that he is a papist, or popishly affected,' or the like, should be felony." In a word, they vindicated all his regalities and royal prerogatives, and provided for the safety of his person in as loving and ample a manner as he could wish: and towards raising and settling a revenue proportionable to his dignity and necessary expense, over and above the confirmation of all that had been done or granted in the last convention, they entered upon all the expedients which could occur to them, and were willing to receive propositions or advice from any body that might contribute thereunto. In all these public matters, no man could wish a more active spirit to be in them, than they were in truth possessed with.

But in that which the king had principally recommended to them, the confirmation of the act of oblivion and indemnity, they proceeded very slowly, coldly, and unwillingly, notwithstanding the king's frequent messages to them "to despatch it, though with the delay of those other things which they thought did more immediately concern him." They had many agents and solicitors in the court, who thought that all that was released by that act might lawfully be distributed amongst them; and since the king had referred that whole affair to the parliament, he might well leave it to their judgments, without his own interposition. But his majesty looked upon himself as under another obligation both of honour and conscience, and upon the thing itself as more for the public peace and security, than any thing the parliament could provide instead thereof; and therefore was very much troubled and offended at the apparent unwillingness to pass it. And thereupon he went himself to the house of peers, and sent for the commons, and told them, "that it was absolutely necessary to despatch that bill, which he himself had sent to them near two months before:" for it was now the eighth of July. His majesty told them, "that it was to put himself in mind as well as them, that he so often, as often as he came to them,

"mentioned to them his declaration from Breda." And he said, "he should put them in mind of another declaration, published by themselves about that time, and which he was persuaded made his the more effectual, an honest, generous, and Christian declaration, signed by the most eminent persons, who had been the most eminent sufferers; in which they renounced all former animosities, all memory of former unkindness, vowed all imaginable good-will and all confidence in each other." All which being pressed with so much instance by his majesty prevailed with them: and they then forthwith despatched that bill; and the king as soon confirmed it, and would not stay a few days, till other important bills should be likewise ready to be presented to him.

And there cannot be a greater instance of their desire to please his majesty from thenceforth, than that before that session was concluded, notwithstanding the prejudice the clergy had brought upon themselves (as I said before) upon their too much good husbandry in granting leases, and though the presbyterian party was not without an interest in both houses of parliament, they passed a bill for the repeal of that act of parliament, by which the bishops were excluded from sitting there. It was first proposed in the house of commons by a gentleman, who had been always taken to be of a presbyterian family: and in that house it found less opposition than was looked for; all men knowing, that besides the justice of it, and the prudence to wipe out the memory of so infamous an act, as the exclusion of them with all the circumstances was known to be, it would be grateful to the king.

But when it came into the house of peers, where all men expected it would find a general concurrence, it met with some obstruction; which made a discovery of an intrigue, that had not been suspected. For though there were many lords present, who had industriously laboured the passing the former bill for the exclusion, yet they had likewise been guilty of so many other ill things, of which they were ashamed, that it was believed that they would not willingly revive the memory of the whole, by persevering in such an odious particular. Nor in truth did they. But when they saw that it would unavoidably pass, (for the number of that party was not considerable,) they either gave their consents, as many of them did, or gave their negative without noise. The obstruction came not from thence. The catholics less owned the contradiction, nor were guilty of it, though they suffered in it. But the truth is, it proceeded from the mercurial brain of the earl of Bristol, who much affected to be looked upon as the head of the catholics; which they did so little desire that he should be thought, that they very rarely concurred with him. He well knew that the king desired (which his majesty never dissembled) to give the Roman catholics ease from all the sanguinary laws; and that he did not desire that they should be liable to the other penalties which the law had made them subject to, whilst they should in all other respects behave themselves like good subjects. Nor had they since his majesty's return sustained the least prejudice by their religion, but enjoyed as much liberty at court and in the country, as any other men; and with which the wisest of them were abundantly satisfied, and did abhor the activity of those of their own party, which they did believe more like to deprive them of the liberty they enjoyed, than to enlarge it to them.

When the earl of Bristol saw this bill brought into the house for restoring the bishops to their seats, he went to the king, and informed his majesty, "that if this bill should speedily pass, it would absolutely deprive the catholics of all those graces and indulgence which he intended to them; for that the bishops, when they should sit in the house, whatever their own opinions or inclinations were, would find themselves obliged, that they might preserve their reputation with the people, to contradict and oppose whatsoever should look like favour or connivance towards the catholics: and therefore, if his majesty continued his former gracious inclination towards the Roman catholics, he must put some stop (even for the bishops' own sakes) to the passing that bill, till the other should be more advanced, which he supposed might shortly be done;" there having been already some overtures made to that purpose, and a committee appointed in the house of lords to take a view of all the sanguinary laws in matters of religion, and to present them to the house, that it might consider further of it. The king, surprised with the discourse from a man who had often told him the necessity of the restoring the bishops, and that it could not be a perfect parliament without their presence, thought his reason for the delay to have weight in it, and that the delay for a few days could be attended with no prejudice to the matter itself; and thereupon was willing the bill should not be called upon, and that when it should be under commitment, it should be detained there for some time; and that he might, the better to produce this delay, tell some of his friends, "that the king would be well pleased, that there should not be overmuch haste in the presenting that bill for his royal assent."

This grew quickly to be taken notice of in the house, that after the first reading of that bill, it had been put off for a second reading longer than was usual, when the house was at so much leisure; and that now it was under commitment, it was obstructed there, notwithstanding all the endeavours some lords of the committee could use for the despatch; the bill containing very few words, being only for the repeal of a former act, and the expressions admitting, that is, giving little cause for any debate. The chancellor desired to know how this came to pass; and was informed by one of the lords of the committee, "that they were assured that the king would have a stop put to it, till another bill should be provided, which his majesty looked for." Hereupon the chancellor spake with his majesty, who told him all the conference which the earl of Bristol had held with him, and what he had consented should be done. To which the other replied, "that he was sorry that his majesty had been prevailed with to give any obstruction to a bill, which every body knew his majesty's heart was so much set upon for despatch; and that if the reason were known, it would quickly put an end to all the pretences of the catholics; to which his majesty knew he was no enemy." The king presently concluded that the reason was not sufficient, and wished, that the bill might be despatched as soon as was "possible, that he might pass it that session;" which he had appointed to make an end of within few days: and so the next day the report was called for and made, and the bill ordered to be engrossed against the next morning; the earl not being at that time in the house. But the next morning, when the chancellor had the bill engrossed in his hand to present to the house to be read the third time, the earl came to him to the woollack, and with great displeasure and wrath in his countenance told him, "that if that bill were read that day, he would speak against it;" to which the chancellor gave him an answer that did not please him: and the bill was passed that day. And from that time the earl of Bristol was a more avowed and declared enemy to him, than he had before professed to be; though the friendship that had been between them had been discontinued or broken, from the time the earl had changed his religion.

The king within few days came to the parliament, to give his royal assent to those bills which were prepared for him; and then told them, "that he did thank them with all his heart, indeed as much as he could for any thing, for the repeal of that act which excluded the bishops from sitting in parliament." He said, "it was an unhappy act in an unhappy time, passed with many unhappy circumstances, and attended with miserable events; and therefore he did again thank them for repealing it: and that they had thereby restored parliaments to their primitive institutions." This was upon the thirtieth of July 1661, when the parliament was adjourned to the twentieth of November following.

Because we have mentioned the gracious purposes the king had to his Roman catholic subjects, of which afterwards much use was made to his disservice, to which the vanity and presumption of many of that profession contributed very much; it may not be unseasonable in this place to mention the ground of that his majesty's goodness, and the reasons why that purpose of his was not prosecuted to the purpose it was intended, after so fair a rise towards it, by the appointment of that committee in the house of peers, which is remembered above.

It is not to be wondered at, that the king, at the age he was of when the troubles began in England, and when he came out of England, knew very little of the laws which had been long since made and were still in force against Roman catholics, and less of the grounds and motives which had introduced those laws. And from the time that he was first beyond the seas, he could not be without hearing very much spoken against the protestant religion, and more for extolling and magnifying the religion of the church of Rome; neither of which discourses made any impression upon him. After the defeat at Worcester, and his escape from thence into France, the queen his mother (who had very punctually complied with the king her husband's injunctions, in not suffering any body to endeavour to pervert the prince her son in his religion, and when he came afterwards into France after he was king, her majesty continued the same reservation) used much more sharpness in her discourse against the protestants, than she had been accustomed to. The liberty that his majesty formerly had in the Louvre, to have a place set aside for the exercise of his religion, was taken away: and continual discourses were made by the queen in his presence, "that he had now no hope ever to be restored to his dominions, but by the help of the catholics; and therefore that he must apply himself to them in such a way, as might induce them to help him."

About this time there was a short collection and abridgment made of all the penal laws, which had been made and which were still in force in England against the Roman catholics; "that all priests for saying mass were to be put to death;" the great penalties which they were to undergo, who entertained or harboured a priest in their house, or were present at mass, and the like; with all other envious clauses, which were in any acts of parliament, that had been enacted upon several treasons and conspiracies of the Roman catholics, in the reigns of queen Elizabeth and king James. And this collection they caused to be translated into French and into Latin, and scattered it abroad in all places, after they had caused copies of it to be presented to the queen mother of France, and to the cardinal: so that the king came into no place where those papers were not shewed to him, and where he was not seriously asked, "whether it was a true collection of the laws of England," and "whether it was possible that any Christian kingdom could exercise so much tyranny against the Catholic religion." The king, who had never heard of these particulars, did really believe that the paper was forged, and answered, "he did not believe that there were such laws:" and when he came to his lodgings, he gave the chancellor the paper, and bade him read it, and tell him, "whether such laws were in force in England." He had heard before of the scattering of those papers, and knew well who had made the collection; who had been a lawyer, and was a protestant, but had too good an opinion of the Roman catholics, and desired too much to be grateful to them.

The chancellor found an opportunity the next day to enlarge upon the paper to his majesty, and informed him of "the seasons in which, and the occasions and provocations upon which, those laws had been made; of the frequent treasons and conspiracies which had been entered into by some Roman catholics, always with the privacy and approbation of their priests and confessors, against the person and life of queen Elizabeth; and after her death, of the infamous and detestable gunpowder treason to have destroyed king James and his posterity, with the whole nobility of the kingdom: so that in those times, the pope having excommunicated the whole kingdom, and absolved the subjects from all their oaths of fidelity, there seemed no expedient to preserve the crown, but the using these severities against those who were professed enemies to it. But that since those times, that the Roman catholics had lived quietly, that rigour had not been used: and that the king his father's clemency towards those of that profession (which clemency extended no further than the dispensing with the utmost rigour of the laws) was the ground of the scandal of his being popishly affected, that contributed as much to his ruin, as any particular malice in the worst of his enemies."

The king hearkened attentively to all that was said, and then answered, "that he could not doubt

"but there was some very extraordinary reason for the making such strange laws: but whatever the reason then was, that it was at present and for many years past very evident, that there was no such malignity in the Roman catholics, that should continue that heavy yoke upon their necks. That he knew well enough, that if he were in England, he had not in himself the power to repeal any act of parliament, without the consent of parliament: but that he knew no reason why he might not profess, that he did not like those laws which caused men to be put to death for their religion; and that he would do his best, if ever God restored him to his kingdom, that those bloody laws might be repealed. And that if there were no other reason of state than he could yet comprehend, against the taking away the other penalties, he should be glad that all those distinctions between his subjects might be removed; and that whilst they were all equally good subjects, they might equally enjoy his protection." And his majesty did frequently, when he was in the courts of catholic princes, and when he was sure to hear the sharpness of the laws in England inveighed against, enlarge upon the same discourse: and it had been a very unreasonable presumption in any man, who would have endeavoured to have dissuaded him from entertaining that candour in his heart.

With this gracious disposition his majesty returned into England; and received his catholic subjects with the same grace and frankness, that he did his other: and they took all opportunities to extol their own sufferings, which they would have understood to have been for him. And some very noble persons there were, who had served his father very worthily in the war, and suffered as largely afterwards for having done so: but the number of those was not great, but much greater than of those who shewed any affection to him or for him, during the time of his absence, and the government of the usurper. Yet some few there were, even of those who had suffered most for his father, who did send him supply when he was abroad, though they were hardly able to provide necessities for themselves: and in his escape from Worcester, he received extraordinary benefit, by the fidelity of many poor people of that religion; which his majesty was never reserved in the remembrance of. And this gracious disposition in him did not then appear ingrateful to any. And then, upon an address made to the house of peers in the name of the Roman catholics, for some relaxation of those laws which were still in force against them, the house of peers appointed that committee which is mentioned before, to examine and report all those penal statutes, which reached to the taking away the life of any Roman catholic, priest, or layman, for his religion; there not appearing one lord in the house, who seemed to be unwilling that those laws should be repealed. And after that committee was appointed, the Roman catholic lords and their friends for some days diligently attended it, and made their observations upon several acts of parliament, in which they desired ease. But on a sudden this committee was discontinued, and never after revived; the Roman catholics never afterwards being solicitous for it.

The argument was now to be debated amongst themselves, that they might agree what would please them: and then there quickly appeared that discord and animosity between them, that never was nor ever will be extinguished; and of which the state might make much other use than it hath done. The lords and men of estates were not satisfied, in that they observed the good nature of the house did not appear to extend further, than the abolishing those laws which concerned the lives of the priests, which did not much affect them: for besides that those spectacles were no longer grateful to the people, they were confident that they should not be without men to discharge those functions; and the number of such was more grievous to them than the scarcity. That which they desired was, the removal of those laws, which being let loose would deprive them of so much of their estates, that the remainder would not preserve them from poverty. This indulgence would indeed be grateful to them; for the other they cared not. Nor were the ecclesiastics at all pleased with what was proposed for their advantage, but looked upon themselves as deprived of the honour of martyrdom by this remission, and that they might undergo restraints, which would be more grievous than death itself: and they were very apprehensive, that there would remain some order of them excluded, as there was even a most universal prejudice against the Jesuits; or that there would be some limitation of their numbers, which they well knew the catholics in general would be very glad of, though they could not appear to desire [it].

There was a committee chosen amongst them of the superiors of all orders, and of the secular clergy, that sat at Arundel house, and consulted together with some of the principal lords and others of the prime quality of that religion, what they should say or do in such and such cases which probably might fall out. They all concluded, at least apprehended, that they should never be dispensed with in respect of the oaths, which were enjoined to be taken by all men, without their submitting to take some other oath, that might be an equal security of and for their fidelity to the king, and the preservation of the peace of the kingdom. And there had been lately scattered abroad some printed papers, written by some regular and secular clergy, with sober propositions to that purpose, and even the form of an oath and subscription to be taken or made by all catholics; in which there was an absolute renunciation or declaration against the temporal authority of the pope, which, in all common discourses amongst the protestants, all Roman catholics made no scruple to renounce and disclaim: but it coming now to be the subject matter of the debate in this committee, the Jesuits declared with much warmth, "that they ought not, nor could they with a good conscience as catholics, deprive the pope of his temporal authority, which he hath in all kingdoms granted to him by God himself," with very much to that purpose; with which most of the temporal lords, and very many of the seculars and regulars, were so much scandalized, that the committee being broken up for that time, they never attended it again; the wiser and the more conscientious men discerning, that there was a spirit in the rest that was raised and governed by a passion, of which they could not comprehend the ground. And the truth is, the Jesuits, and they who adhered to them, had entertained great hopes from the king's too much grace to them, and from the great liberty they enjoyed; and promised themselves and their friends another kind of indulgence, than they saw was intended to them by the house of peers. And this was the reason that that committee was no more looked after, nor any public address was any further prosecuted.

And from this time there every day appeared so much insolence and indiscretion amongst the imprudent catholics, that they brought so many scandals upon his majesty, and kindled so much jealousy in the parliament, that there grew a general aversion towards them. And the king's party remembered, with what wariness and disregard the Roman catholics had lived towards them in the whole time of the usurpation; and how little sorrow they made show of upon the horrid murder of the king, (which was then exceedingly taken notice of:) and they who had been abroad with the king remembered, that his majesty had received less regard and respect from his catholic subjects, wherever he found them abroad, than from any other foreign catholics; who always received him with all imaginable duty, whilst his own looked as if they had no dependence upon him. And so we return to the parliament after its adjournment.

The parliament, that had been adjourned upon the thirtieth of July, met again upon the twentieth of November, with the same zeal and affection to advance the king's service. And the king himself came to them upon the same day they met, and told them, "that he knew that visit was not of course; yet if there were no more in it, it would not be strange, that he came to see what he and they had so long desired to see, the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons of England, met together to consult for the peace and safety of the church and state, by which parliaments were restored to their primitive lustre and integrity:" his majesty said, "he did heartily congratulate with them for that day." But he told them withal, "that he came thither upon another occasion; which was to say somewhat to them on his own behalf, to ask somewhat of them for himself, which was more than he had done of them, or of those who met before them, since his coming into England. Nor did he think, that what he had to say to them did alone, or did most concern himself: if the uneasy condition he was in, if the straits and necessities he was to struggle with, did not manifestly relate to the public peace and safety, more than to his own particular, otherwise than as he was concerned in the public, he would not give them that trouble that day; he could bear his necessities which merely related to himself, with patience enough."

He told them, "that he did not importune them to make more haste in the settling the constant revenue of the crown, than was agreeable to the method they had proposed to themselves, nor to consider the insupportable weight that lay upon it, the obligations it lay under to provide for the interest, honour, and security of the nation, in another proportion than in any former times it had been obliged to: his majesty well knew, that they had very affectionately and worthily taken all that into their thoughts, and would proceed in it with expedition: but that he came to put them in mind of the crying

"debts which did every day call upon him, of some necessary provisions, which were to be made without delay for the very safety of the kingdom, of the great sum of money that should be ready to discharge the several fleets when they came home, and for the necessary preparations that were to be made for the setting out new fleets to sea against the next spring. These were the pressing occasions which he was forced to recommend to them with all possible earnestness, and he did conjure them to provide for as speedily as was possible, and in such a manner as might give them security at home, and some reputation abroad." His majesty said, "that he made this discourse to them with some confidence, because he was very willing and desirous that they should thoroughly examine, whether those necessities which he mentioned were real or imaginary, or whether they were fallen upon him by his own fault, his own ill managery, or excesses, and provide for them accordingly. He was very willing that they should make a full inspection into his revenue, as well the disbursements as receipts; and if they should find that it had been ill managed by any corruptions in the officers he trusted, or by his own unthriftiness, he should take the advice and information they should give him very kindly."

He told them, "that he was very sorry that the general temper and affections of the nation were not so well composed, as he hoped they would have been, after so signal blessings from God Almighty upon them all, and after so great indulgence and condescensions from him towards all interests. But that there were many wicked instruments still as active as ever, who laboured night and day to disturb the public peace, and to make all people jealous of each other: it would be worthy their care and vigilance to provide proper remedies for the diseases of that kind; and if they should find new diseases, they must study new remedies. For those difficulties which concerned matters in religion," his majesty confessed to them, "that they were too hard for him; and therefore he did recommend them to their care and discretion, which could best provide for them."

The two houses were abundantly pleased with all that his majesty had said to them, and immediately betook them to the consideration of those particulars, which he had principally recommended to them. And though for the present they looked upon that clause of his majesty's speech, wherein he referred to them to make an inspection into his revenue and his expenses, but as a generous and princely condescension, which would not become them to make use of, (nor indeed had they at that time the least prejudice to or jealousy of any, who were of the nearest trust about his majesty;) yet four years after, when the expenses had grown to be much greater, and it may be all disbursements not so warrantable, and when the factions in court and parliament were at a great height, and men made use of public pretences to satisfy their private animosities and malice, they made use of that frank offer of his majesty, to entitle themselves to make inquisition into public and private receipts and disbursements, in a very extraordinary manner never practised before.

Let no man wonder, that within so little time

as a year and a half, or very little more, after the king's return, that is, from May to November in the next year, and after so great sums of money raised by acts of parliament upon the people, his majesty's debts could be so crying and importunate, as to disturb him to that degree as he expressed. It was never enough understood, that in all that time he never received from the parliament more than the seventy thousand pounds towards his coronation; nor were the debts which were now so grievous to him contracted by himself, (though it cannot be supposed but that he had contracted debts himself in that time :) all the money that had been given and raised had been applied to the payment of the land and sea forces, and had done neither. Parliaments do seldom make their computations right, but reckon what they give to be much more than is ever received, and what they are to pay to be as much less than in truth they owe; so that when all the money that was collected was paid, there remained still very much due to the soldiers, and much more to the seamen: and the clamour from both reached the king's ears, as if they had been levied by his warrant and for his service. And his majesty understood too well, by the experience of the ill husbandry of the last year, when both the army and the ships were so long continued in pay, for want of money to disband and pay them off, what the trouble and charge would be, if the several fleets should return before money was provided to discharge the seamen; and for that the clamour would be only upon him.

But there was an expense that he had been engaged in from the time of his return, and by which he had contracted a great debt, of which very few men could take notice; nor could the king think fit to discover it, till he had first provided against the mischief which might have attended the discovery. It will hardly be believed, that in so warlike an age, and when the armies and fleets of England had made more noise in the world for twenty years, had fought more battles at land and sea, than all the world had done besides, or any one people had done in any age before; and when at his majesty's return there remained a hundred ships at sea, and an army of near threescore thousand men at land; there should not be in the Tower of London, and in all the stores belonging to the crown, fire-arms enough, nor indeed of any other kind, to arm three thousand men; nor powder and naval provisions enough to set out five ships of war.

From the death of Cromwell, no care had been taken for supplies of any of the stores. And the changes which ensued in the government, and putting out and in new officers; the expeditions of Lambert against sir George Booth, and afterwards into the north; and other preparations for those factions and parties which succeeded each other; and the continual opportunities which the officers had for embezzlement; and lastly, the setting out that fleet which was sent to attend upon the king for his return; had so totally drained the stores of all kinds, that the magazines were no better replenished than is mentioned before: which as soon as his majesty knew, as he could not be long ignorant of it, the first care he took was to conceal it, that it might not be known abroad or at home, in how ill a posture he was to defend himself against an enemy. And then he committed the care of that province to a noble person, whom he knew he could not trust too much, and made sir William Compton master of the ordnance, and made all the shifts he could devise for monies, that the work might be begun. And hereby insensibly he had contracted a great debt: and these were part of the crying debts, and the necessary provisions which were to be made without delay for the very safety of the kingdom, which he told the parliament. And in this he had laboured so effectually, that at the time when the first Dutch war was entered into, all the stores were more completely supplied and provided for, and the ships and all naval provisions in greater strength and plenty, than they had ever been in the reign of any former king, or in the time of the usurper himself.

That part of the king's speech, of the distempers in the nation by the differences in religion, which he confessed were too hard for him, and recommended the composing them to their care and deliberation, gives me a seasonable opportunity to enter upon the relation, how that affair stood at that time, and how far the distractions of those several factions were from being reconciled, though episcopacy seemed to be fully restored, and the bishops to their votes in parliament; which had been looked upon as the most sovereign remedy, to cure, reform, or extinguish all those maladies. The bishops had spent the vacation in making such alterations in the Book of Common Prayer, as they thought would make it more grateful to the dissenting brethren, for so the schismatical party called themselves; and such additions, as in their judgments the temper of the present time and the past miscarriages required. It was necessarily to be presented to the convocation, which is the national synod of the church; and that did not sit during the recess of the parliament, and so came not together till the end of November: where the consideration of it took up much time; all men offering such alterations and additions, as were suitable to their own fancies, and the observations which they had made in the time of confusion.

The bishops were not all of one mind. Some of them, who had greatest experience, and were in truth wise men, thought it best "to restore and confirm the old Book of Common Prayer, without any alterations and additions; and that it would be the best vindication the Liturgy and government of the church could receive, that after so many scandals and reproaches cast upon both, and after a bloody rebellion and wars of twenty years, raised, as was pretended, principally against both, and which had prevailed and triumphed in the total suppression and destruction of both, they should now be restored to be in all respects the same they had been before. Whereas any alterations and additions (besides the advantage it might give to the common adversary, the papist, who would be apt to say that we had reformed and changed our religion again) would raise new scruples in the factious and schismatical party, that was ashamed of all the old arguments, which had so often been answered, and stood at present exploded in the judgment of all sober men; but would recover new spirits to make new objections, and complain that the alterations and additions are more grievous and burdensome to the liberty of "their conscience, than those of which they had formerly complained."

Others, equally grave, of great learning and unblemished reputation, pressed earnestly both for the alterations and additions; said, "that it was a common reproach upon the government of the church, that it would not depart from the least unnecessary expression or word, nor explain the most insignificant ceremony; which would quiet or remove the doubts and jealousies of many conscientious men, that they did in truth signify somewhat that was not intended: and therefore, since some powerful men of that troublesome party had made it their earnest request, that some such alterations and additions might [be made], and professed that it would give great satisfaction to many very good men; it would be great pity, now there was a fit opportunity for it, which had not been in former times of clamour, not to gratify them in those small particulars, which did not make any important difference from what was before." It may be there were some, who believed that the victory and triumph of the church would be with the more lustre, if somewhat were inserted, that might be understood to reflect upon the rude and rebellious behaviour of the late times, which had been regulated and conducted by that clergy: and so both additions and alterations were made.

But the truth is, what show of reason soever and appearance of charity the latter opinion seemed to carry with it, the former advice was the more prudent, and would have prevented many inconveniences which ensued. Whatever had been pretended or desired, the alterations which were made to please them did not reduce one of them to the obedience of the church; and the additions raised the clamour higher than it had been. And when it was evident that they should not be left longer without a Liturgy, they cried aloud for the same they had before, though they had inveighed against it for near a hundred years together.

It is an unhappy policy, and always unhappily applied, to imagine that that class of men can be recovered and reconciled by partial concessions, or granting less than they demand. And if all were granted, they would have more to ask, somewhat as a security for the enjoyment of what is granted, that shall preserve their power, and shake the whole frame of the government. Their faction is their religion: nor are those combinations ever entered into upon real and substantial motives of conscience, how erroneous soever, but consist of many glutinous materials, of will, and humour, and folly, and knavery, and ambition, and malice, which makes men cling inseparably together, till they have satisfaction in all their pretences, or till they are absolutely broken and subdued, which may always be more easily done than the other. And if some few, how signal soever, (which often deceives us,) are separated and divided from the herd upon reasonable overtures, and secret rewards which make the overtures look the more reasonable; they are but so many single men, and have no more credit and authority (whatever they have had) with their companions, than if they had never known them, rather less; being less mad than they were makes them thought to be less fit to be believed. And they, whom you think you have recovered, carry always a chagrin about them, which makes them good for nothing, but for instances to divert you from any more of that kind of traffick.†

And it is very strange, that the clergy did not at this time remember what had so lately befallen the poor church of Scotland, upon the transmission of their Liturgy, which had been composed with this very prospect that now dazzled their eyes. "To receive a Liturgy from England was below the dignity of that nation, which were governed by their own laws, [without] dependence upon any other. Besides there were many errors in that Liturgy that they could never submit to, and some defects which ought to be supplied; and if such a one should be compiled, in which all those exceptions, which were well enough known, might be provided for, they would gladly receive it." All this was carefully performed; and what reception it had afterwards is too well known, and will ever be remembered by the scars which still remain from those wounds. And then the great objection that was most impudently urged was, "that it differed from the Liturgy of the church of England, which they were ready to have received, and would have declared to the world, that the two nations had but one religion; whereas the book sent to them would have manifested the contrary, and was the product of a few particular men, to whose spirit and humour they would not sacrifice their native liberty of conscience."

They of the same fraternity in England at this present governed themselves by the same method, though, God be thanked, not yet with the same success. And there is great reason to believe, that the very men, who laboured so much for the alterations which were made, and professed to receive so much satisfaction in them, did it for no other end, but to procure more opportunity to continue and enlarge the contentions; and to gain excuse and credit to the ill things they had done, by the redress and reparation that was given them in the amendment of many particulars, against which they had always complained. There was not one of them who had used that importunity and made that profession, who afterwards was conformable to the government of the church, or frequented those churches where or when the Liturgy was used.

Whilst the clergy was busy and solicitous to prepare this remedy for the present distempers, the people of all the several factions in religion assumed more license than ever they had done. The presbyterians in all their pulpits inveighed against the Book of Common Prayer that they expected, and took the same liberty to inveigh against the government of the church, as they had been accustomed to before the return of the king; with reflections upon the persons of the bishops, as if they assumed a jurisdiction that was yet at least suspended. And the other factions in religion, as if by concert, took the same liberty in their several congregations. The anabaptists and the quakers made more noise than ever, and assembled together in greater numbers, and talked what reformations they expected in all particulars. These insolences offended the parliament very much: and the house of commons expressed much impatience, that the Liturgy was so long in preparation, that the act of uniformity might without delay be passed and published; not without some insinuations and reflections, that his majesty's candour, and admission of all persons to resort to his presence, and his condescension to confer with them, had raised their spirits to an insolence insupportable; and that nothing could reduce them to the temper of good subjects, but the highest severity.

It is very true, from the time of his majesty's coming into England, he had not been reserved in the admission of those who had been his greatest enemies, to his presence. The presbyterian ministers he received with grace; and did believe that he should work upon them by persuasions, having been well acquainted with their common arguments by the conversation he had had in Scotland, and was very able to confute them. The independents had as free access, both that he might hinder any conjunction between the other factions, and because they seemed wholly to depend upon his majesty's will and pleasure, without resorting to the parliament, in which they had no confidence; and had rather that episcopacy should flourish again, than that the presbyterians should govern. The king had always admitted the quakers for his divertisement and mirth, because he thought, that of all the factions they were the most innocent, and had least of malice in their natures against his person and his government: and it was now too late, though he had a worse opinion of them all, to restrain them from coming to him, till there should be some law made to punish them; and therefore he still called upon the bishops, to cause the Liturgy to be expedited in the convocation. And finding that those distempers had that influence upon the house of commons, that the displeasure and jealousy which they conceived from thence did retard their counsels, and made them less solicitous to advance his service in the settling his revenue, they having sat near three months after their coming together again upon their adjournment, without making any considerable progress in it; he sent for the speaker and the house of commons to attend him at Whitehall, where he spake unto them, though very graciously, in a style that seemed to have more of expostulation and reprehension than they had been accustomed to.

He said, "he spake his heart to them when he told them, that he did believe, that from the first institution of parliaments to that hour, there had never been a house of commons fuller of affection and duty to their king, than they were to him; never any that was more desirous and solicitous to gratify their king, than they were to oblige him; never a house of commons, in which there were fewer persons without a full measure of zeal for the honour and welfare of the king and country, than there are in this: in a word," he said, "he knew most of their persons and names, and could never hope to find better men in their places. Yet after all this, he could not but lament, and even complain, that he and they and the kingdom were yet without that present fruit and advantage, which they might reasonably promise themselves from such a harmony of affections, and unity in resolutions to advance the public service, and to provide for the peace and security of the kingdom; that they did not expedite those good counsels, which were most necessary for both. He knew not how it came to pass, but for many weeks past, even since their last adjournment, "private and particular business had almost thrust the consideration of the public out of doors; and he did not know that they were nearer the settling his revenue, than they had been at Christmas. He was sure he had communicated his condition to them without reserve; what he had coming in, and what his necessary disbursements were. And," he said, "he was exceedingly deceived, if whatever they gave him were any otherwise given to him, than to be issued out for their own use and benefit; and if they considered it well, they would find that they were the richer by what they gave, since it was all to be laid out that they might enjoy the rest in peace and security."

He said, "he need not put them in mind of the miserable effects, that had attended the wants and necessities of the crown; that he needed not to tell them, that there was a republican party still in the kingdom, which had the courage still to promise themselves another revolution: and he thought he had as little need to tell them, that the only way, with God's blessing, to disappoint their hopes, and indeed to reduce them from those extravagant hopes and desires, was, to let them see that they had so provided for the crown, that it had wherewithal to support itself, and to secure his people; which he was sure was all he desired, and desired only for their preservation. Therefore he conjured them, by all the professions of affection which they had made to him, by all the kindness which he knew they had for him, that they would, after all their deliberations, betake themselves to some speedy resolutions, and settle such a real and substantial revenue upon him, as might hold some proportion with the necessary expenses he was at for the peace and benefit and honour of the kingdom; that they who looked for troubles at home might despair of their wishes; and that our neighbours abroad, by seeing that all is well at home, might have that esteem and value of his majesty, as might secure the honour and interest of the nation, and make the happiness of the kingdom and of that city once more the admiration and envy of the world."

He told them, "that he heard that they were very zealous for the church, and very solicitous and even jealous that there was not expedition enough used in that affair: he thanked them for it, since he presumed that it proceeded from a good root of piety and devotion. But," he said, "that he must tell them, that he had the worst luck in the world, if after all the reproaches of being a papist while he was abroad, he was suspected to be a presbyterian now he was come home. He knew they would not take it unkindly, if he told them, that he was as zealous for the church of England as any of them could be, and was enough acquainted with the enemies of it on all sides; that he was as much in love with the Book of Common Prayer as they could wish, and had prejudice enough to those who did not love it, who he hoped in time would be better informed, and so change their minds; and they might be confident, he did as much desire to have a uniformity settled, as any man amongst them. He prayed them to trust him in that affair, and promised them to hasten the despatch of it with all convenient speed; they might rely upon him in it." He said, "he had transmitted the Book of Common Prayer, with those alterations and additions which had been presented to him by the convocation, to the house of peers with his approbation, that the act of uniformity might relate to it; so that he presumed that it would shortly be despatched there: and that when they had done all they could," he said, "the well settling that affair would require great prudence and discretion, and the absence of all passion and precipitation."

His majesty concluded with assuring them, that he did promise himself great fruits from that conversation he had with them, and that they would justify the confidence he had in their affections, by letting the world see, that they took his concerns to heart, and were ready to do whatsoever he desired for the peace and welfare of the kingdom."

When the Book of Common Prayer was, by the king's command, presented to the house of lords by the two archbishops (for it had been approved as well by the convocation of the province of York, as well as of that of Canterbury) confirmed by his majesty under the great seal of England; the book itself took up no debate: only the earl of Northumberland proposed, "that the old Book of Common Prayer might be confirmed without any alteration or addition, and then the same act of uniformity, that had been in the time of queen Elizabeth, would be likewise applied to it; whereas a new act of uniformity might take up much time and raise much debate, all which would be avoided by adhering to the old."

Whatever that lord's opinion was, he was known to be of the presbyterian party. And it was answered, "that if that proposition had been heartily made when the king came into England, it would have met with a general approbation, and prevented much sharpness and animosity, which had since risen by those who opposed that excellent form. But after the clergy had so bitterly inveighed against many parts thereof, and prevailed with his majesty to suspend the use of it till it might be revised, as by his declaration of the five and twentieth of October he had done, and thereupon had granted his commission under the great seal of England to several bishops and other divines, to review the Book of Common Prayer, and to prepare such alterations and additions as they thought fit to offer; and that afterwards his majesty had been pleased to authorize the convocations of both the provinces of Canterbury and York, called and assembled by his majesty's authority, to review the said Book of Prayer, and the Book of the Form and Manner of the making and consecrating of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons; and that now after the bishops and clergy of both provinces had, upon great deliberation and upon reviewing those books, prepared and consented to some alterations, and to the addition of several prayers to be used upon emergent occasions, all which his majesty had already ratified and confirmed; it could not but be understood matter of great levity and offence, to reject this book, that was now with all this ceremony and solemnity presented, for no other reason but because they liked better the old book, which had been for twenty years discontinued and rejected." And therefore it was moved, "that there might not be

"such an affront put upon the convocation, and upon the king himself." And so with little more public contest the book itself was consented and submitted to.

But then the act of uniformity depended long, and took up much debate in both houses. In the house of peers, where the act first began, there were many things inserted, which had not been contained in the former act of uniformity, and so seemed to carry somewhat of novelty in it. It admitted "no person to have any cure of souls or any ecclesiastical dignity in the church of England, but such who had been or should be ordained priest or deacon by some bishop, that is, who had not episcopal ordination; excepting only the ministers or pastors of the French and Dutch churches in London and other places, allowed by the king, who should enjoy the privileges they had."

This was new; for there had been many, and at present there were some, who possessed benefices with cure of souls, and other ecclesiastical promotions, who had never received orders but in France or in Holland; and these men must now receive new ordination, which had been always held unlawful in the church, or by this act of parliament must be deprived of their livelihood, which they enjoyed in the most flourishing and peaceable time of the church. And therefore it was said, "that this had not been the opinion of the church of England; and that it would lay a great reproach upon all other protestant churches who had no bishops, as if they had no ministers, and consequently were no churches: for that it was well known the church of England did not allow reordination, as the ancient church never admitted it; insomuch as if any priest of the church of Rome renounces the communion thereof, his ordination is not questioned, but he is as capable of any preferment in this church, as if he had been ordained in it. And therefore the not admitting the ministers of other protestants to have the same privilege, can proceed from no other ground, than that they looked not upon them as ministers, having no ordination; which is a judgment the church of England had not ever owned: and that it would be very imprudent to do it now."

To this it was answered, "that the church of England judged none but her own children, nor did not determine that other protestant churches were without ordination. It is a thing without their cognizance: and most of the learned men of those churches had made necessity the chief pillar to support that ordination of theirs. That necessity cannot be pleaded here, where ordination is given according to the unquestionable practice of the church of Christ: if they who pretend foreign ordination are his majesty's subjects, they have no excuse of necessity, for they might in all times have received episcopal ordination, and so they did upon the matter renounce their own church; if they are strangers, and pretend to preferment in this church, they ought to conform and to be subject to the laws of the kingdom, which concern only those who desire to live under the protection [thereof]. For the argument of reordination, there is no such thing required. Rebaptization is not allowed in or by any church: yet in all churches where it is doubted, as it may be often with very good "reason, whether the person hath been baptized or no, or if it hath been baptized by a midwife or lay person; without determining the validity or invalidity of such baptism, there is an hypothetical form, 'If thou hast not been already baptized, I do baptize,' &c. So in this case of ordination, the form may be the same, 'If thou hast not been already ordained, then I do ordain,' &c. If his former ordination were good, this is void; if the other was invalid or defective, he hath reason to be glad that it be thus supplied." After much debate, that clause remained still in the act: and very many, who had received presbyterian orders in the late times, came very willingly to be ordained in the manner aforesaid by a bishop; and very few chose to quit or lose a parsonage or vicarage of any value upon that scruple.

There was another clause in the bill, that made very much more noise afterwards, though for the present it took not up so much time, and in truth was little taken notice of: that is, a form of subscription that every man was to make, who received, or before he received, any benefice or preferment in the church; which comprehended all the governors, superiors, and fellows, in all the colleges and halls of either university, and all schoolmasters and the like, who are subservient towards learning. Every such person was to declare "his unfeigned assent and consent to all and every thing, contained and prescribed in and by the book entitled The Book of Common Prayer," &c. The subscription was generally thought so reasonable, that it scarce met with any opposition in either house. But when it came abroad, and was to be submitted to, all the dissenting brethren cried out, "that it was a snare to catch them, to say that which could not consist with their conscience." They took great pains to distinguish and to make great difference between assent and consent: "they could be content to read the book in the manner they were obliged to do, which shewed their consent; but declaring their unfeigned assent to every thing contained and prescribed therein would imply, that they were so fully convinced in their judgments, as to think that it was so perfect, that nothing therein could be amended, which for their part they thought there might. That there were many expressions in the rubric, which they were not bound to read; yet by this assent they declared their approbation thereof." But after many tedious discourses of this tyrannical imposition, they grew by degrees ashamed of it; and were persuaded to think, that assent and consent had so near the same signification, that they could hardly consent to do what they did not assent to: [so] that the chiefest amongst them, to avoid a very little inconvenience, subscribed the same.

But there was shortly after another clause added, that gave them trouble indeed. When the bill had passed the lords' house, it was sent of course to the commons; where though all the factions in religion had too many friends, for the most contrary and opposite one to another always were united and reconciled against the church, yet they who were zealous for the government, and who hated all the other factions at least enough, were very much superior in number and in reputation. And the bill was no sooner read there, than every man according to his passion thought of adding somewhat to it, that might make it more grievous to somebody whom he did not love; which made the discourses tedious and vehement and full of animosity. And at last they agreed upon a clause, which contained another subscription and declaration, which every [man] was to make before he can be admitted into any benefice [or] ecclesiastical promotion, or to be a governor or fellow in either of the universities. He must first declare, "that it is not lawful, upon any pretence whatsoever, to take arms against the king; and that he doth abhor that traitorous position of taking arms by his authority against his person, or against those that are commissioned by him; and that he will conform to the Liturgy of the church of England, as it is now by law established." And he doth declare, "that he doth hold that there lies no obligation upon him, or on any other person, from the oath commonly called The solemn League and Covenant, to endeavour any change or alteration of government, either in church or state; and that the same was in itself an unlawful oath, and imposed upon the subjects of this realm against the known laws and liberties of the kingdom;" with some other clauses, which need not be mentioned, because they were afterwards left out. And with this addition, and some other alterations, they returned the bill again to the lords for their approbation.

The framing and forming this clause had taken up very much time, and raised no less passion in the house of commons; and now it came among the lords, it was not less troublesome. It added to the displeasure and jealousy against the bishops, by whom it was thought to be prepared, and commended to their party in the lower house. Many lords, who had taken the covenant, were not so much concerned that the clergy (for whom only this act was prepared) should be obliged to make this declaration; but apprehended more, that when such a clause should be once passed in one act of parliament, it could not after be disputed, and so would be inserted into all other acts which related to the function of any other offices, and so would in a short time be required of themselves. And therefore they opposed it warmly, "as a thing unnecessary, and which would widen the breach, instead of closing up the wounds that had been made; which the king had made it his business to do, and the parliament had hitherto concurred with his majesty in that endeavour. That many men would believe or fear, (which in such a case is the same,) that this clause might prove a breach of the act of indemnity, which had not only provided against indictments and suits at law and penalties, but against reproaches for what was past, which this clause would be understood to give new life to. For what concerned the conformity to the Liturgy of the church as it is now established, it is provided for as fully in the former subscription in this act, and therefore is impertinent in this place. That the covenant contained many good things in it, as defending the king's person, and maintaining the protestant religion: and therefore to say that their lies no obligation upon it, would neither be for the service of the king or the interest of the church; especially since it was well known, that it had wrought upon the conscience of many to serve the king in the late revolution, from which his majesty "had received great advantage. However it was now dead, all men were absolved from taking it, nor could it be imposed or offered to any man without punishment; and they, who had in the ill times been forced to take it, did now inviolably and cheerfully perform all the duties of allegiance and fidelity to his majesty. If it had at any time produced any good, that was an excuse for the irregularity of it: it could do no mischief for the future; and therefore that it was time to bury it in oblivion."

Many men believed, that though they insisted principally on that part which related to the covenant, that they were in truth more afflicted with the first part; in which it was declared, "that it was not lawful, upon any pretence whatsoever, to take arms against the king; and that he doth abhor that traitorous proposition of taking arms by his authority against his person:" which conclusions had been the principles which supported their rebellion, and by which they had imposed upon the people, and got their concurrence. They durst not oppose this, because the parliament had already by a former act declared the law to be so in those particulars: yet this went much nearer to them, that by their own particular declaration (for they looked upon it as that which in a short time must be their own) they should upon the matter confess themselves to have been traitors, which they had not yet been declared to have been; and no man could now justify the calling them so.

They who were most solicitous that the house should concur with the commons in this addition, had fieldroom enough to expatiate upon the gross iniquity of the covenant. They made themselves very merry with the allegation, "that the king's safety and the interest of the church were provided for by the covenant, when it had been therefore entered into, to fight against the king and to destroy the church. That there was no one lawful or honest clause in the covenant, that was not destroyed or made of no signification by the next that succeeded; and if it were not, the same obligation was better provided for by some other oaths, which the same men had or ought to have taken, and which ought to have restrained them from taking the covenant: and therefore it may justly be pronounced, that there is no obligation upon any man from thence. That there was no breach of the act of indemnity, nor any reproach upon any man for having taken it, except what would result from his own conscience. But that it was most absolutely necessary, for the safety of the king's person, and the peace of the kingdom, that they who had taken it should declare, that they do not believe themselves to be bound by it: otherwise they may still think, that they may fight against the king, and must conspire the destruction of the church. And they cannot take too much care, or use too much diligence, to discover who are of that opinion; that they may be strictly looked unto, and restrained from doing that which they take themselves obliged to do. That the covenant is not dead, as was alleged, but still retains great vigour; was still the idol to which the presbyterians sacrificed: and that there must and would always be a general jealousy of all those who had taken it, until they had declared that it did not bind them; especially of the clergy, who had so often enlarged in their pulpits, how absolutely and indispensably all men are obliged to prosecute the ends of it, which is to destroy the church, whatever danger it brings the king's person to. And therefore they of all men ought to be glad of this opportunity that was offered, to vindicate their loyalty and obedience; and if they were not ready to do so, they were not fit to be trusted with the charge and care of the souls of the king's subjects."

And in truth there were not any more importunate for the enjoining this declaration, than many who had taken the covenant. Many who had never taken it, and had always detested it, and paid soundly for being known to do so, were yet very sorry that it was inserted at this time and in this place; for they foresaw it would make divisions, and keep up the several factions, which would have been much weakened, and in a short time brought to nothing, if the presbyterians had been separated from the rest, who did perfectly hate and were as perfectly hated by all the rest. But since it was brought upon the stage, and it had been the subject of so much debate, they believed the house of lords could not now refuse to concur with the commons, without undergoing some reproach and scandal of [not] having an ill opinion enough of the covenant; of which as they were in no degree guilty, so they thought it to be of mischievous consequence to be suspected to be so. And therefore, after they had expunged some other parts of that subscription which had been annexed to it, and mended some other expressions in other places, which might rather irritate than compose those humours which already boiled too much, they returned the bill to the house of commons; which submitted to all that they had done: and so it was presented to the king, who could not well refuse his royal assent, nor did in his own judgment or inclination dislike what was offered to him.

By this act of uniformity there was an end put to all the liberty and license, which had been practised in all churches from the time of his majesty's return, and by his declaration that he had emitted afterwards. The Common Prayer must now be constantly read in all churches, and no other form admitted: and what clergyman soever did not fully conform to whatsoever was contained in that book, or enjoined by the act of uniformity, by or before St. Bartholomew-day, which was about three months after the act was published; he was ipso facto deprived of his benefice, or any other spiritual promotion of which he stood possessed, and the patron was to present another in his place, as if he were dead: so that it was not in the king's power to give any dispensation to any man, that could preserve him against the penalty in the act of uniformity.

This act was no sooner published, (for I am willing to continue this relation to the execution of it, because there were some intervening accidents that were not understood,) than all the presbyterian ministers expressed their disapprobation of it with all the passion imaginable. They complained, "that the king had violated his promise made to them in his declaration from Breda," which was urged with great uningenuity, and without any shadow of right; for his majesty had thereby referred the whole settlement of all things relating to religion, to the wisdom of parliament; and declared, "in the mean time, that nobody should be punished or questioned, for continuing the exercise of his religion in the way he had been accustomed to in the late confusions." And his majesty had continued this indulgence by his declaration after his return, and thereby fully complied with his promise from Breda; which he should indeed have violated, if he had now refused to concur in the settlement the parliament had agreed upon, being in truth no less obliged to concur with the parliament in the settlement that the parliament should propose to him, than he was not to cause any man to be punished for not obeying the former laws, till a new settlement should be made. But how evident soever this truth is, they would not acknowledge it; but armed their proselytes with confident assertions, and unnatural interpretations of the words in the king's declaration, as if the king were bound to grant liberty of conscience, whatever the parliament should or should not desire, that is, to leave all men to live according to their own humours and appetites, let what laws soever be made to the contrary. They declared, "that they could not with a good conscience either subscribe the one or the other declaration: they could not say that they did assent or consent in the first, nor declare in the second that there remained no obligation from the covenant; and therefore that they were all resolved to quit their livings, and to depend upon Providence for their subsistence."

There cannot be a better evidence of the general affection of the kingdom, than that this act of parliament had so concurrent an approbation of the two houses of parliament, after a suppression of that form of devotion for near twenty years, and the highest discountenance and oppression of all those who were known to be devoted or affected to it. And from the time of the king's return, when it was lawful to use it, though it was not enjoined, persons of all conditions flocked to those churches where it was used. And it was by very many sober men believed, that if the presbyterians and the other factions in religion had been only permitted to exercise their own ways, [without] any countenance from the court, the heart of all the factions against the church would have been broken, before the parliament did so fully declare itself.

And there cannot be a greater manifestation of the distemper and license of the time, than the presumption of those presbyterian ministers, in the opposing and contradicting an act of parliament; when there was scarce a man in that number, who had not been so great a promoter of the rebellion, or contributed so much to it, that they had no other title to their lives but by the king's mercy; and that there were very few amongst them, who had not come into the possession of the churches they now held, by the expulsion of the orthodox ministers who were lawfully possessed of them, and who being by their imprisonment, poverty, and other kinds of oppression and contempt during so many years, departed this life, the usurpers remained undisturbed in their livings, and thought it now the highest tyranny to be removed from them, though for offending the law, and disobedience to the government. That those men should give themselves an act of oblivion of all their transgressions and wickedness, and take upon them again to pretend a liberty of conscience against the government, which they had once overthrown upon their pretences; was such an impudence, as could not have fallen into the hearts even of those men from the stock of their own malice, without some great defect in the government, and encouragement or countenance from the highest powers. The king's too gracious disposition and easiness of access, as hath been said before, had from the beginning raised their hopes and dispelled their fears; whilst his majesty promised himself a great harvest in their conversion, by his gentleness and affability. And they insinuated themselves by a profession, "that it was more the regard of his service, than any obstinacy in themselves, which kept them from conformity to what the law had enjoined; that they might still preserve their credit with their parishioners, and by degrees bring them to a perfect obedience:" whereas indeed all the corruption was in the clergy; and where a prudent and orthodox man was in the pulpit, the people very willingly heard the Common Prayer.

Nor did this confidence leave them, after the passing and publishing this act of uniformity: but the London ministers, who had the government of those in the country, prevailed with the general (who without any violent inclinations of his own was always ready for his wife's sake) to bring them to the king, who always received them with too much clemency, and dismissed them with too much hope. They lamented "the sadness of their condition, which (after having done so much service to his majesty, and been so graciously promised by him his protection) must now be exposed to all misery and famine." They told him "what a vast number of churches" (five times more than was true) "would become void by this act, which would not prove for his service; and that they much feared, the people would not continue as quiet and peaceable as they had been under their oversight." They used all the arguments they thought might work upon him; and he seemed to be the more moved, because he knew that it was not in his power to help them. He told them, "he had great compassion for them; and was heartily sorry that the parliament had been so severe towards them, which he would remit, if it were in his power; and therefore that they should advise with their friends, and that if they found that it would be in his power to give them any ease, they should find him inclined to gratify them in whatsoever they desired:" which gracious expressions raised their spirits as high as ever; and they reported to their friends much more than in truth the king had said to them, (which was no new artifice with them,) and advised their friends in all parts "to be firm to their principles," and assured them, "that the rigour of the act of parliament should not be pressed against them."

It cannot be denied, that the king was too irresolute, and apt to be shaken in those counsels which with the greatest [deliberation] he had concluded, by too easily permitting, or at least not restraining, any men who waited upon him, or were present with him in his recesses, to examine and censure what was resolved; an infirmity that brought him many troubles, and exposed his ministers to ruin: though in his nature, judgment, and inclinations, he did detest the presbyterians; and by the experience he had of their faculties, pride, and insolence in Scotland, had brought from thence such an abhorrence of them, that for their sakes he thought better of any of the other factions. Nor had he any kindness for any person whom he suspected to adhere to them: for the lord Lautherdale took all pains to be thought no presbyterian; and pleased himself better with no humour, than laughing at that people, and telling ridiculous stories of their folly and foul corruptions. Yet the king, from the opinion he had of their great power to do him good or harm, which was often times unskillfully insinuated to him by men who he knew were not of their party, but were really deceived themselves by a wrong computation and estimate of their interest, was not willing to be thought an enemy to them. And there were too many bold speakers about the court, too often admitted into his presence, who being without any sense of religion, thought all rather ought to be permitted, than to undergo any trouble and disturbance on the behalf of any one.

The continued address and importunity of these ministers, as St. Bartholomew's day approached nearer, more disquieted the king. They enlarged with many words "on the great joy that they and all their friends had received, from the compassion his majesty so graciously had expressed on their behalf, which they would never forget, or forfeit by any undutiful carriage." They confessed "that they found, upon conference with their friends who wished them well, and upon perusal of the act of parliament, that it was not in his majesty's power to give them so much protection against the penalty of the act of parliament, as they had hoped, and as his great goodness was inclined to give them. But that it would be an unspeakable comfort to them, if his majesty's grace towards them were so manifested, that the people might discern that this extreme rigour was not grateful to him, but that he could be well content if it were for some time suspended; and therefore they were humble suitors to him, that he would by his letters to the bishops, or by a proclamation, or an act of council, or any other way his majesty should think fit, publish his desire that the execution of the act of uniformity, as to all but the reading of the Liturgy, which they would conform to, might be suspended for three months; and that he would take it well from the bishops or any of the patrons, who would so far comply with his desire, as not to take any advantage of those clauses in the statute, which gave them authority to present as in a vacancy. They doubted not there would be many, who would willingly submit to his majesty's pleasure: but whatever the effect should be, they would pay the same humble acknowledgments to his majesty, as if it had produced all that they desired."

Whether his majesty thought it would do them no good, and therefore that it was no matter if he granted it; or that he thought it no prejudice to the church, if the act were suspended for three months; or that he was willing to redeem himself from the present importunity, (an infirmity he was too often guilty of;) true it is, he did make them a positive promise, "that he would do what they "desired;" with which they were abundantly satisfied, and renewed their encouragement to their friends "to persevere to the end." And this promise was solemnly given to them in the presence of the general, who was to solicit the king's despatch, that his pleasure might be known in due time. It was now the long vacation, and few of the council were then in town, or of the bishops, with whom his majesty too late thought it necessary to confer, that such an instrument might be prepared as was fit for the affair. Hereupon the king told the chancellor (who was not thought friend enough to the presbyterians to be sooner communicated with) all that had passed, what the ministers had desired, and what he had promised; and bade him "to think of the best way of doing it."

The chancellor was one of those, who would have been glad that the act had not been clogged with many of those clauses, which he foresaw might produce some inconveniences; but when it was passed, he thought it absolutely necessary to see obedience paid to it without any connivance: and therefore, as he had always dissuaded the king from giving so much countenance to those applications, which he always knew published more to be said than in truth was ever spoken, and was the more troubled for this progress they had made with the king; he told his majesty, "that it was not in his power to preserve those men, who did not submit to do all that was to be done by the act, from deprivation." He gave many reasons which occurred, why "such a declaration as was desired would prove ineffectual to the end for which it was desired, and what inconveniences would result from attempting it." His majesty alleged many reasons for the doing it, which he had received from those who desired it, and seemed sorry that they were no better; however concluded, "that he had engaged his word, and that he would perform what he had promised;" and required him not to oppose it. The chancellor had always been very tender of his honour; and advised him "to be very wary in making any promise, but when he had made it, to perform it, though to his disadvantage:" and it was no new thing to him, to be reproached for opposing the resolving to do such or such a thing, and then to be reproached again for pursuing the resolution.

The king was at Hampton-court, and sent for the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishops of London and of Winchester, to attend him, with the chief justice Bridgman, and the attorney general: there were likewise the chancellor, the general, the duke of Ormond, and the secretaries. His majesty acquainted them with "the importunities used by the London ministers, and the reasons they had offered why a further time should be given to them to consider of what was so new to them; and what answer he had given to them; and how they had renewed their importunity with a desire of such a declaration from him as is mentioned before, in which he thought there was no inconvenience, and therefore had promised to do it, and called them now together to advise of the best way of doing it." The bishops were very much troubled, that those fellows should still presume to give his majesty so much vexation, and that they should have such access to him. They gave such arguments against the doing what was desired, as could not be answered; and for themselves, they desired "to be excused for not conniving in any degree at the breach of the act of parliament, either by not presenting a clerk where themselves were patrons, or deferring to give institution upon the presentation [of others]: and that his majesty's giving such a declaration or recommendation would be the greatest wound to the church, and to the government thereof, that it could receive."

The chancellor, who did really believe that the king and his service would suffer more by the breach of his word and promise, than either could do from doing the thing desired, confessed "that he believed it would do them little good, which would not be imputed to his majesty, when he had done all he could do; and that it would be a greater conformity, if the ministers generally performed what they offered to do, in reading all the service of the church, than had been these many years; and that once having done what was known to be so contrary to their inclinations, would be an engagement upon them in a short time to comply with the rest of their obligations: and therefore," he said, "he should not dissuade his majesty from doing what he had promised;" which indeed he had good reason to think he was resolved to do, whatever he was advised to the contrary. The king demanded the judgment of the lawyers, "whether he could legally dispense with the observation of the act for three months;" who answered, "that notwithstanding any thing he could do in their favour, the patrons might present their clerk as if the incumbents were dead, upon their not-performance of what they were enjoined." Upon the whole matter the king was converted; and with great bitterness against that people in general, and against the particular persons whom he had always received too graciously, concluded that he would not do what was desired, and that the connivance should not be given to any of them.

The bishops departed full of satisfaction with the king's resolution, and as unsatisfied with their friend the chancellor's inclination to gratify that people, not knowing the engagement that was upon him. And this jealousy produced a greater coldness from some of them towards him, and a greater resentment from him, who thought he had deserved better from their function and their persons, than was in a long time, if ever, perfectly reconciled. Yet he never declined in the least degree his zeal for the government of the church, or the interest of those persons; nor thought they could be blamed for their severity against those ministers, who were surely the proudest malefactors, and the most incapable of being gently treated, of any men living. For if any of the bishops used them kindly, and endeavoured to persuade them to conformity, they reported "that they had been caressed and flattered by the bishops, and offered great preferments, which they had bravely refused to accept for the preservation of a good conscience:" and in reports of this kind, few of them ever observed any rules of ingenuity or sincerity.

When they saw that they were to expect and undergo the worst, they agreed upon a method to be observed by them in the leaving and parting with their pulpits: and the last Sunday they were to preach, they endeavoured to infuse murmur, jealousy, and sedition, into the hearts of their several auditories; and to prepare them "to expect and bear with patience and courage all the persecutions which were like to follow, now the light of the gospel was so near being extinguished." And all those sermons they called their farewell sermons, and caused to be printed together, with every one of the preachers' pictures before their sermons; which in truth contained all the vanity and ostentation with reference to themselves, and all the insinuations to mutiny and rebellion, that could be warily couched in words which could not be brought within penalty of law, though their meaning was well understood.

When the time was expired, better men were put into their churches, though with much murmuring of some of their parishes for a time, increased by their loud clamour, "that they had been betrayed by the king's promise that they should have three months longer time:" which drew the like clamour upon them by those, who had hearkened to their advice in continuing their obstinacy in confidence of a dispensation; whereas otherwise they would have conformed, as very many of their party did. And many of the other who were cozened by them, and so lost the livings they had, made all the haste they could to make themselves capable of getting others, by as full subscriptions and conformity as the act of uniformity required. And the greatest of them, after some time, and after they found that the private bounty and donatives, which at first flowed in upon them in compassion of their sufferings and to keep up their courages, every day begun to slacken, and would in the end expire, subscribed to those very declarations, which they had urged as the greatest motives to their nonconformity. And the number was very small, and of very weak and inconsiderable men, that continued refractory, and received no charge in the church: though it may without breach of charity be believed, that many who did subscribe had the same malignity to the church, and to the government of it; and it may be did more harm, than if they had continued in their inconformity.

The long time spent in both houses upon the act of uniformity had made the progress of all other public business much the slower; or rather, the multitude of private bills which depended there, (and with which former parliaments had been very rarely troubled,) and the bitterness and animosities which arose from thence, exceedingly disquieted and discomposed the house; every man being so much concerned for the interest of his friends or allies, that he was more solicitous for the despatch of those, than of any which related to the king and the public, which he knew would by a general concurrence be all passed before the session should be made; whereas if the other should be deferred, the session would quickly follow, (which the king by frequent messages desired to hasten, having received news already of the queen's having been at sea many days,) and the benefit of those pretences would be lost, and with greater difficulty be recovered in a succeeding session. Then as those private bills were for the particular benefit and advantage of some persons, which engaged all their friends to be very solicitous for their despatch; so for the most part they were to the loss and damage of other persons, who likewise called in aid of all their friends to prevent the houses' consent : and by this means so many factions were kindled in both houses, between those who drove on the interest of their own or of their relations, who mutually looked upon one another as enemies, and against those who for justice and the dignity of parliament would have rejected all or most of the addresses of that kind; that in most debates which related to neither, the custom of contradiction, and the aversion to persons, very much disturbed and prolonged all despatch.

It cannot be denied, that after a civil war of so many years, prosecuted with that height of malice and revenge; so many houses plundered and so many burned, in which the evidences of many estates were totally destroyed, and as many by the unskilful providence of others, who in order to preserve them had buried their writings so unwarily under ground, that they were taken up so defaced or rotted, that they could not be pleaded in any court of justice; many who had followed the king in the war, and so made themselves liable to those penalties which the parliament had prepared for them and subjected them to, had made many feigned conveyances, with such limitations and so absolutely, (that no trust might be discovered by those who had power to avoid it,) that they were indeed too absolute to be avoided by themselves, and their estates become so much out of their own disposal, that they could neither apply them to the payment of their just debts, or to the provision for their children; I say, there were many such cases, which could be no other way provided for but by an act of parliament, and to which an act of parliament, without too much severity and rigour, could not be denied. And against any of those there appeared none or very little opposition to be made.

But the example and precedent of such drew with them a world of unreasonable pretences; and they, who were not in a condition to receive relief in any court of justice, thought they had a ground to appeal to parliament. They who had been compelled, for raising the money they were forced to pay for their delinquency, to sell land, and could not sell it but at a very low value, (for it was one species of the oppression of that time, that when a powerful man had an aspect upon the land of any man who was to compound, and so in view like to sell it, no other man would offer any money for it, so that he was sure at last to have it upon his own price;) now all that monstrous power was vanished, they who had made those unthrifty bargains and sales, though with all the formalities of law, by fines and recoveries and the like, (which is all the security that can be given upon a purchase,) especially if the purchaser was of an ill name, came with all imaginable confidence to the parliament, to have their land restored to [them]. Every man had raised an equity in his own imagination, that he thought ought to prevail against any descent, testament, or act of law; and that whatever any man had been brought to do, which common reason would make manifest that he would never have done if he could have chosen, was argument sufficient of such a force, and ought to find relief in parliament, from the unbounded equity they were masters of and could dispense, whatever formalities of law had preceded or accompanied the transaction. And whoever opposed those extravagant notions, which sometimes deprived men of the benefit of the act of oblivion, was thought to be without justice, or which to them was worse, to be without any kindness to the king's party. And without question, upon those motives, or others as unreasonable, many acts were passed of very ill example, and which many men were scandalized at in the present, and posterity will more censure hereafter, when infants who were then unborn shall find themselves disinherited of those estates, which their ancestors had carefully provided should descend to them; upon which irregularities the king made reflection when he made the session.

But notwithstanding all these incongruities and the indispositions which attended them, they performed all those respects towards the king, which he did or could expect from them; there being scarce a man, who opposed the granting any thing that was proposed for the benefit of his majesty, or the greatness of the crown: and though some of the particulars mentioned before did sometimes intervene, to hinder and defer the present resolutions and conclusions in those counsels, the resolutions and conclusions in a short time after succeeded according to the king's wish. The militia and many other regalities were declared and settled according to the original sense of the law, and the authority of the crown vindicated to the height it had been at upon the heads of the greatest kings who had ever reigned in the nation. Monies were raised by several bills, sufficient as they conceived to have paid all the debts the king or the kingdom owed; for in their computations they comprehended the debts that were owing before his majesty's return, and for which the public faith had been engaged: and if as much had been paid as they conceived they had given, probably it might have been enough to have discharged all those. They settled a constant revenue upon the crown, which according to the estimate they made would amount to the yearly revenue of twelve hundred thousand pounds, a proportion double to what it was in the reign of queen Elizabeth, and it may be of any king preceding; and declared, "that if it did not amount to that full value, they would supply it at another meeting." And though it hath not in truth amounted to that sum in his majesty's receipts, the parliament hath imputed it rather to ill managery, and letting farms at too easy rates, than to an error in their computation. For the present, it was looked upon by the king and by his ministers as answerable to his expectation. And so, upon notice of the queen's being upon the coast, and afterwards of her arrival at Portsmouth, the king appointed the houses to present all their bills to him upon the nineteenth of May for his royal assent, it being few days above a year from the time of their being first convened.

When the king came to the parliament, and they had presented the great number of bills which they had prepared, and after he had given his royal assent to most of them, his majesty told them, "that he thought there had been very few sessions of parliament, in which there had been so many bills, as he had passed that day: he was confident, never so many private bills, which he hoped they would not draw into example. It was true," he said, "the late ill times had driven men into great straits, and "might have obliged them to make conveyances colourably, to avoid inconveniences, and yet not afterwards to be avoided; and men had gotten estates by new and greater frauds than had been heretofore practised; and therefore in this conjuncture extraordinary remedies might be necessary; which had induced him to comply with their advice in passing those bills: but he prayed them that this should be rarely done hereafter: that the good old rules of the law are the best security; and he wished that men might not have too much cause to fear, that the settlements which they make of their estates shall be too easily unsettled when they are dead by the power of parliament."

He said, "they had too much obliged him, not only in the matter of those bills which concerned his revenue, but in the manner of passing them, with so great affection and kindness, that he knew not how to thank them enough. He did assure them, and prayed them to assure their friends in the country, that he would apply all that they had given to him, to the utmost improvement of the peace and happiness of the kingdom; and that he would, with the best advice and good husbandry he could, bring his own expenses within a narrower compass." And he said, "now he was speaking to them of his own good husbandry, he must tell them, that would not be enough; he could not but observe, that the whole nation seemed to him a little corrupted in their excess of living. All men spend much more in their clothes, in their diet, in all their expenses, than they had used to do. He hoped it had only been the excess of joy after so long sufferings, that had transported him and them to those other excesses; but," he desired them, "that they might all take heed that the continuance of them did not indeed corrupt their natures. He did believe that he had been that way very faulty himself: he promised that he would reform, and that if they would join with him in their several capacities, they would by their examples do more good, both in city and country, than any new laws would do." He said many other good things that pleased them, and no doubt he intended all he said; but the ways and expedients towards good husbandry were no where pursued.

The chancellor, by the king's command, enlarged upon "the general murmurs upon the expense, and that it should so much exceed all former times." He put them in mind, "how the crown had been used since those times, how the king had found it at his blessed return: that as soon as he came hither, besides the infinite sums that he forgave, he gave more money to the people than he had since received from them," (he meant, I suppose, the release of all the rents, debts, and receipts which were due to him;) "that at least two parts of three that they had since given him had issued for the disbanding of armies never raised by him, and for payment of fleets never sent out by him, and of debts never incurred by him." He put them in mind "of the vast disparity between the former times and these in which they now lived, and consequently [of] the disproportion in the expense the crown was now at, for the protection and benefit of the subject, to what it formerly underwent. How great a difference there was "in the present greatness and power of the two crowns, and what they had been then possessed of, was evident to all men; and if the greatness and power of the crown of England should not be in some proportion improved too, it might be liable to inconveniences it would not undergo alone. How our neighbours and our rivals, who court one and the same mistress, trade and commerce, with all the world, are advanced in shipping, power, and an immoderate desire to engross the whole traffick of the universe, was notorious enough; and that this unruly appetite would not be restrained or disappointed, nor the trade of the nation be supported and maintained, with the same fleets and forces which had been maintained in the happy times of queen Elizabeth. He needed not speak of the naval power of the Turks, who, instead of sculking abroad in poor single ships as they were wont to do, domineer now on the ocean in strong fleets, make naval fights, and had brought some Christians to a better correspondence, and another kind of commerce and traffick with them, than was expected," (for at that time the Dutch had made a low and dishonourable peace with the pirates of Algiers and Tunis:) "inso-much as they apprehend no enemy upon the sea, but what they find in the king of England's ships, which had indeed brought no small damage upon them, with no small charge to the king, but a great reputation to the nation.

"He did assure them, that the charge the crown was then at, by sea and land, for the peace and security and wealth and honour of the nation, amounted to no less than eight hundred thousand pounds in the year; all which did not cost the crown before the late troubles fourscore thousand pounds the year: and therefore that nobody could blame them for any supply they had given, or addition they had made to the revenue of the crown." He told them, "that the new acquisitions of Dunkirk, Mardike, Tangier, Jamaica, and Bombayne, ought to be looked upon as jewels of an immense magnitude in the royal diadem; and though they were of present expense, they were like in a short time, with God's blessing, to bring vast advantages to the trade, navigation, wealth, and honour of the king and kingdom. His majesty had enough expressed his desire to live in a perfect peace and amity with all his neighbours; nor was it an ill ingredient towards the firmness and stability of that peace and amity which his royal ancestors had held with them, that he hath some advantages in case of a war, which they were without." The same day the parliament was prorogued to the eighteenth day of February following.

It was about the end of May, when the queen came to Hampton-court. The earl of Sandwich, after he had reduced those of Algiers and Tunis to good conditions, went to Tangier, which was to be delivered to him before he was to go to Lisbon for the reception of the queen: and delivered to him it was, though by an accident that might have caused it to be delivered into another hand. There was never the least doubt, but that the queen regent did resolve religiously to perform all the conditions on the part of Portugal; and the government was yet in her hands. But the king growing towards his majority, and of a nature not like to comply long with his mother's advice; factions began likewise to grow in that court. The delivery of Tangier, and into the hands of heretics, was much murmured at; as like more to irritate the pope, who did already carry himself towards them very unlike a common father, not withstanding the powerful interposition of France, which, upon the peace lately made between the two crowns, was already ceased: so that they now apprehended, that this new provocation would give some excuse to the court of Rome, to comply more severely with the importunities from Spain, which likewise upon this occasion they were sure would be renewed with all possible instance. And though the queen had lately sent a governor to Tangier, whom she therefore made choice of, as a man devoted to her, and who would obey her commands in the delivery of this place; yet it is certain, he went thither with a contrary resolution.

Very few days before the earl of Sandwich came thither, the governor marched out with all the horse and above half the foot of the garrison into the country, and fell into an ambush of the Moors, who being much more numerous cut off the whole party: and so the governor with so many of the chief officers and soldiers being killed, the town was left so weak, that if the Moors had pursued their advantage with such numbers as they might, and did intend within few days to bring with them, they would have been able to have made little resistance. And the earl of Sandwich coming happily thither in that conjuncture, [it] was delivered into his hands, who conveyed the remainder of the garrison into Portugal, where they were like to be stoned by the people; and then, having put a good garrison of horse and foot which were sent from England into it, he delivered it up to the earl of Peterborough, who had a commission from the king to be governor thereof; and himself with the fleet sailed to Lisbon, where he had been long expected, and found his house and equipage ready, he being then to appear in the quality of extraordinary ambassador to demand the queen.

His arrival there happened likewise in a very happy conjuncture; for the Spanish army, stronger than it had been before, was upon its march to besiege a seaport town, which lay so near Lisbon, that being in the enemy's hands would very much have infested their whole trade, and was not strong enough long to have resisted so powerful an enemy. But upon the fame of the English fleet's arrival, the Spaniard gave over that design, and retired: since as it was impossible that they should be able to take that place, which the fleet was so ready to relieve; so they knew not but that the English might make a descent into their own quarters, which kept them from engaging before any other town. But the alarm the march of that army had given had so much disturbed Portugal, which never keep their whole forces on foot, but draw them together upon such emergent occasions; that they were compelled to make use of most of that money, which they said had been laid up and should be kept for the payment of the queen's portion, which was to be transported with her into England.

Whereupon, after the ambassador had been received with all possible demonstration of respect and public joy, and had his solemn audience from the king and from the queen regent and the queen his mistress; and some English gentlemen of quality, who were sent by the king, were admitted to those places of attendance about the queen, to which his majesty had assigned them: the queen mother, with infinite apologies, told the ambassador, "that the straits and poverty of the kingdom were so great upon the late advance of the Spanish army, that there could at this present be only paid one half of the queen's portion, and that the other half should infallibly be paid within a year, with which she hoped the king her brother would be satisfied; and that for the better doing it, she resolved to send back the same ambassador, who had brought so good a work with God's blessing to so good an end, with her daughter to the king."

The earl of Sandwich was much perplexed, nor did easily resolve what he was to do. His instructions were to receive the whole portion, which he knew the king expected, and which they were not able to pay. He had already received Tangier, and left a strong garrison in it, and had neither authority to restore it, nor wherewithal to carry back the men. And at last, after he had used all the means to have the whole paid, and was so fully informed, that he did in truth believe that they could do no more, he resolved that he would receive the queen aboard the fleet. That which they were ready to deliver for half the portion was not in money, but to be made up by jewels, sugar, and other commodities, which should not be overvalued. The ambassador was contented to give his receipt for the several species of the money they would deliver, leaving the value to be computed in England; but expressly refused to accept the jewels, sugar, and merchandises at any rates or prices; but was contented to receive them on board the ships, and to deliver them in specie at London to any person who should be appointed by them to receive them, who should be obliged to pay the money they were valued [at], and to make up the whole sum that should be paid to the king for the moiety. In conclusion, all things were delivered on board the ships; and Diego Silvas, a Jew of great wealth and full credit at Amsterdam, was sent with it, and obliged to make even the account with the king's ministers at London, and to pay what should remain due. And a new obligation was entered into by the crown of Portugal, for the payment of the other moiety within the space of a year. And the queen with all her court and retinue were embarked on board the fleet; and without any ill accidents her majesty arrived safely at Portsmouth: and having rested only three or four days there, to recover the indisposition contracted in so long a voyage at sea, her majesty, together with the king, came to Hampton-court at the time mentioned before, the twenty-ninth of May, the king's birth-day, full two years after his majesty's return and entering London.

However the public joy of the kingdom was very manifest upon this conjunction, yet in a short time there appeared not that serenity in the court that was expected. They who had formerly endeavoured to prevent it, used ever after all the ill arts they could to make it disagreeable, and to alienate the king's affection from the queen to such a degree, that it might never be in her power to prevail with him to their disadvantage; an effect they had reason to expect from any notable interest she might gain in his affections, since she could not be uninformed by the ambassador of the disservice they had formerly endeavoured to do her.

There was a lady of youth and beauty, with whom the king had lived in great and notorious familiarity from the time of his coming into England, and who, at the time of the queen's coming, or a little before, had been delivered of a son whom the king owned. And as that amour had been generally taken notice of, to the lessening of the good reputation the king had with the people; so it underwent the less reproach from the king's being young, vigorous, and in his full strength; and upon a full presumption that when he should be married, he would contain himself within the strict bounds of virtue and conscience. And that his majesty himself had that firm resolution, there want not many arguments, as well from the excellent temper and justice of his own nature, as from the professions he had made with some solemnity to persons who were believed to have much credit, and who had not failed to do their duty, in putting him in mind "of the infinite obligations he had to God Almighty, and that he expected another kind of return from him, in the purity of mind and integrity of life:" of which his majesty was piously sensible, albeit there was all possible pains taken by that company which were admitted to his hours of pleasure, to divert and corrupt all those impressions and principles, which his own conscience and reverent esteem of Providence did suggest to him; turning all discourse and mention of religion into ridicule, as if it were only an invention of divines to impose upon men of parts, and to restrain them from the liberty and use of those faculties which God and nature had given them, that they might be subject to their reproofs and determinations; which kind of license was not grateful to the king, and therefore warily and accidentally used by those who had pleasant wit, and in whose company he took too much delight.

The queen had beauty and wit enough to make herself very agreeable to him; and it is very certain, that at their first meeting, and for some time after, the king had very good satisfaction in her, and without doubt made very good resolutions within himself, and promised himself a happy and an innocent life in her company, without any such uxoriousness, as might draw the reputation upon him of being governed by his wife, of which he had observed or been too largely informed of some inconvenient effects in the fortune of some of his nearest friends, and had long protested against such a resignation; though they who knew him well, did not think him so much superior to such a condescension, but that if the queen had had that craft and address and dexterity that some former queens had, she might have prevailed as far by degrees as they had done. But the truth is, though she was of years enough to have had more experience of the world, and of as much wit as could be wished, and of a humour very agreeable at some seasons; yet she had been bred, according to the mode and discipline of her country, in a monastery, where she had only seen the women who attended her, and conversed with the religious who resided there, and without doubt in her inclinations was enough disposed to have been one of that number. And from this restraint she was called out to be a great queen, and to a free conversation in a court that was to be upon the matter new formed, and reduced from the manners of a licentious age to the old rules and limits which had been observed in better times; and to which regular and decent conformity the present disposition of men or women was not enough inclined to submit, nor the king enough disposed to exact.

There was a numerous family of men and women that were sent from Portugal, the most improper to promote that conformity in the queen that was necessary for her condition and future happiness, that could be chosen: the women for the most part old and ugly and proud, incapable of any conversation with persons of quality and a liberal education. And they desired and indeed had conspired so far to possess the queen themselves, that she should neither learn the English language, nor use their habit, nor depart from the manners and fashions of her own country in any particulars; "which resolution," they told her, "would be for the dignity of Portugal, and would quickly induce the English ladies to conform to her majesty's practice:" and this imagination had made that impression, that the tailor who had been sent into Portugal to make her clothes, could never be admitted to see her or receive any employment. Nor when she came to Portsmouth, and found there several ladies of honour and prime quality to attend her in the places to which they were assigned by the king, did she receive any of them, till the king himself came; nor then with any grace, or the liberty that belonged to their places and offices. She could not be persuaded to be dressed out of the wardrobe that the king had sent to her, but would wear the clothes which she had brought, until she found that the king was displeased, and would be obeyed: whereupon she conformed against the advice of her women, who continued their opiniatrety, without any one of them receding from their own mode, which exposed them the more to reproach.

When the queen came to Hampton-court, she brought with her a formed resolution, that she would never suffer the lady who was so much spoken of to be in her presence: and afterwards to those she would trust she said, "her mother had enjoined her so to do." On the other hand, the king thought that he had so well prepared her to give her a civil reception, that within a day or two after her majesty's being there, himself led her into her chamber, and presented her to the queen, who received her with the same grace as she had done the rest; there being many lords and other ladies at the same time there. But whether her majesty in the instant knew who she was, or upon recollection found it afterwards, she was no sooner sat in her chair, but her colour changed, and tears gushed out of her eyes, and her nose bled, and she fainted; so that she was forthwith removed into another room, and all the company retired out of that where she was before. And this falling out so notoriously when so many persons were present, the king looked upon it with wonderful indignation, and as an earnest of defiance for the decision of the supremacy and who should govern, upon which point he was the most jealous and the most resolute of any man; and the answer he received from the queen, which kept up the obstinacy, displeased him more. Now the breach of the conditions grew matter of reproach; the payment of but half the portion was objected to the ambassador, who would have been very glad that the quarrel had been upon no other point. He knew not what to say or do; the king being offended with him for having said so much in Portugal to provoke the queen, and not instructing her enough to make her unconcerned in what had been before her time, and in which she could not reasonably be concerned; and the queen with more indignation reproaching him with the character he had given of the king, of his virtue and good-nature: whilst the poor man, not able to endure the tempest of so much injustice from both, thought it best to satisfy both by dying; and from the extreme affliction of mind which he underwent, he sustained such a fever as brought him to the brink of his grave, till some grace from both their majesties contributed much to the recovery of his spirits.

In the mean time the king forbore her majesty's company, and sought ease and refreshment in that jolly company, to which in the evenings he grew every day more indulgent, and in which there were some, who desired rather to inflame than pacify his discontent. And they found an expedient to vindicate his royal jurisdiction, and to make it manifest to the world, that he would not be governed; which could never without much artifice have got entrance into his princely breast, which always entertained the most tender affections; nor was ever any man's nature more remote from thoughts of roughness or hardheartedness. They magnified the temper and constitution of his grandfather, who indeed to all other purposes was a glorious example: "that when he was enamoured, and found a return answerable to his merit, he did not dissemble his passion, nor suffered it to be matter of reproach to the persons whom he loved; but made all others pay them that respect which he thought them worthy of: brought them to the court, and obliged his own wife the queen to treat them with grace and favour; gave them the highest titles of honour, to draw reverence and application to them from all the court and all the kingdom; raised the children he had by them to the reputation, state, and degree of princes of the blood, and conferred fortunes and offices upon them accordingly. That his majesty, who inherited the same passions, was without the gratitude and noble inclination to make returns proportionable to the obligations he received. That he had, by the charms of his person and of his professions, prevailed upon the affections and heart of a young and beautiful lady of a noble extraction, whose father had lost his life in the service of the crown. That she had provoked the jealousy and rage of her husband to that degree, that he had separated himself from her: and now the queen's indignation had made the matter so notorious to the world, that the disconsolate lady had no place of retreat left, but must be made an object of infamy and contempt to all her sex, and to the whole world."

Those discourses, together with a little book newly printed at Paris, according to the license of that nation, of the amours of Henry IV. which was by them presented to him, and too concernedly read by him, made that impression upon his mind, that he resolved to raise the quality and degree of that lady, who was married to a private gentleman of a competent fortune, that had not the ambition to be a better man than he was born. And that he might do so, he made her husband an earl of Ireland, who knew too well the consideration that he paid for it, and abhorred the brand of such a nobility, and did not in a long time assume the title. The lady thus qualified was now made fit for higher preferment: and the king resolved, for the vindication of her honour and innocence, that she should be admitted of the bedchamber of the queen, as the only means to convince the world, that all aspersions upon her had been without ground. The king used all the ways he could, by treating the queen with all caresses, to dispose her to gratify him in this particular, as a matter in which his honour was concerned and engaged; and protested unto her, which at that time he did intend to observe, "that he had not had the least familiarity with her since her majesty's arrival, nor would ever after be guilty of it again, but would live always with her majesty in all fidelity for conscience sake." The queen, who was naturally more transported with choler than her countenance declared her to be, had not the temper to entertain him with those discourses, which the vivacity of her wit could very plentifully have suggested to her; but brake out into a torrent of rage, which increased the former prejudice, confirmed the king in the resolution he had taken, gave ill people more credit to mention her disrespectfully, and more increased his aversion from her company, and, which was worse, his delight in those, [who meant] that he should neither love his wife or his business, or any thing but their conversation.

These domestic indispositions and distempers, and the impressions they made of several kinds upon the king's spirit and his humour, exceedingly discomposed the minds of the gravest and most serious men; gave the people generally occasion of speaking loudly, and with a license that the magistrates knew not how to punish, for the publication of the scandal: and the wisest men despaired of finding remedies to apply to the dissoluteness and debauchery of the time, which visibly increased. No man appeared to suffer or likely to suffer more than the chancellor, against whom though no particular person owned a malignity, the congregation of the witty men for the evening conversation were enough united against his interest; and thought his influence upon the king's actions and counsels would be too much augmented, if the queen came to have any power, who had a very good opinion of him: and it is very probable, that even that apprehension increased the combination against her majesty.

The lady had reason to hate him mortally, well knowing that there had been an inviolable friendship between her father and him to his death, which had been notorious to all men; and that he was an implacable enemy to the power and interest she had with the king, and had used all the endeavours he could to destroy it. Yet neither she nor any of the other adventured to speak ill of him to the king, who at that time would not have borne it; except for wit's sake they sometimes reflected upon somewhat he had said, or acted some of his postures and manner of speaking, (the skill in mimicry being the best faculty in wit many of them had;) which license they practised often towards the king himself, and therefore his majesty thought it to be the more free from malice. But by these liberties, which at first only raised laughter, they by degrees got the hardness to censure both the persons, counsels, and actions of those who were nearest his majesty's trust, with the highest malice and presumption; and too often suspended or totally disappointed some resolutions, which had been taken upon very mature deliberation, and which ought to have been pursued. But (as hath been said before) this presumption had not yet come to this length.

The king imparted the trouble and unquietness of his mind to nobody with equal freedom, as he did to the chancellor: to him he complained of all the queen's perverseness and ill humours, and informed him of all that passed between them, and obliged him to confer and advise the queen, who, he knew, looked upon him as a man devoted to her service, and that he would speak very confidently to her whatsoever he thought; and therefore gave him leave to take notice to her of any thing he had told him. It was too delicate a province for so plain-dealing a man as he was to undertake: and yet he knew not how to refuse it, nor indeed did despair totally of being able to do some good, since the queen was not yet more acquainted with any man than with him, nor spake so much with any man as with him; and he believed, that he might hereby have opportunity to speak sometimes to the king of some particulars with more freedom, than otherwise he could well do, at least more effectually.

He had never heard before of the honour the king had done that lady, nor of the purpose he had to make her of his wife's bedchamber. He spake with great boldness to him upon both; and did not believe that the first was proceeded in beyond revocation, because it had not come to the great seal, and gave him many arguments against it, which he thought of weight. But upon the other point he took more liberty, and spake "of the hardheartedness and cruelty in laying such a command upon the queen, which flesh and blood could not comply with." He put him in mind of what he heard his majesty himself say, upon the like excess which a neighbour king had lately used, in making his mistress to live in the court, and in the presence of the queen: that his majesty had then said, "that it was such a piece of ill-nature, that he could never be guilty of; and if ever he should be guilty of having a mistress after he had a wife, which he hoped he should never be, she should never come where his wife was; he would never add that to the vexation, of which she would have enough without it." And yet he told him, "that such friendships were not new in that other court, nor scandalous in that kingdom; whereas in this it was so unheard of and so odious, that a woman who prostituted herself to the king was equally infamous to all women of honour, and must expect the same contempt from them, as if she were common to mankind: and that no enemy he had could advise him a more sure way to lose the hearts and affections of the people, of which he was now so abundantly possessed, than the indulging to himself that liberty, now it had pleased God to "give him a wife worthy of him. That the excess he had already used in that and other ways had lost him some ground; but that the continuance in them would break the hearts of all his friends, and be only grateful to those who wished the destruction of monarchy;" and concluded with "asking his pardon for speaking so plainly," and besought his majesty to remember "the wonderful things which God had done for him, and for which he expected other returns than he had yet received."

The king heard him with patience enough, yet with those little interruptions which were natural to him, especially to that part where he had levelled the mistresses of kings and princes with other lewd women, at which he expressed some indignation, being an argument often debated before him by those, who would have them looked upon above any other [men's] wives. He did not appear displeased with the liberty he had taken, but said, "he knew it proceeded from the affection he had for him;" and then proceeded upon the several parts of what he had said, more volubly than he used to do, as upon points in which he was conversant, and had heard well debated.

To the first, he began with the story of an accident that had fallen out the day before; he said, "the lady had then told him, that she did hope that the chancellor was not so much her enemy, as he was generally reported to be, for she was sure he was not guilty of one discourtesy of which he had been accused to her, and therefore might be as innocent in others; and then told his majesty, that the day before, the earl of Bristol" (who was never without some reason to engage himself in such intrigues, and had been a principal promoter of all those late resolutions) "came to her, and asked her whether the patent was not yet passed. She answered, "No. He asked if she knew the reason; which she seeming not to do, he told her that he came in confidence to tell her, and that if she did not quickly curb and overrule such presumption, she would often meet it to her prejudice; then told her a long relation, how the patent had been carried to the chancellor prepared for the seal, and that he according to his custom had superciliously said, that he would first speak with the king of it, and that in the mean time it should not pass; and that if she did not make the king very sensible of this insolence, his majesty should never be judge of his own bounty. And then the lady laughed, and made sharp reflections upon the principles of the earl of Bristol," (who had throughout his life the rare good fortune of being exceedingly beloved and exceedingly hated by the same persons, in the space of one month; and now finding that there was a stop of the patent, made a very natural guess where it must be, and gratified his own appetite in the conclusion,) "and pulled the warrant out of her pocket, where she said it had remained ever since it was signed, and she believed the chancellor had never heard of it: she was sure there was no patent prepared, and therefore he could not stop it at the seal."

The truth is: though according to the custom she had assumed the title as soon as she had the warrant, that the other pretence might be prosecuted, she made not haste to pass the patent, lest her husband might stop it; and after long deliberation was not so confident of the chancellor, as to transmit it to the seal that was in his custody, but, the honour being Irish, sent it into that kingdom to pass the great seal there, where she was sure it could meet no interruption.

When the king had made this relation, and added some sharp remarks upon the earl of Bristol, as a man very particularly known and understood by him; he said, "that he had undone this lady, and ruined her reputation, which had been fair and untainted till her friendship for him; and that he was obliged in conscience and honour to repair her to the utmost of his power. That he would always avow to have a great friendship for her, which he owed as well to the memory of her father as to her own person; and that he would look upon it as the highest disrespect to him, in any body who should treat her otherwise than was due to her own birth, and the dignity to which he had raised her. That he liked her company and conversation, from which he would not be restrained, because he knew there was and should be all innocence in it: and that his wife should never have cause to complain that he brake his vows to her, if she would live towards him as a good wife ought to do, in rendering herself grateful and acceptable to him, which it was in her power to do; but if she would continue uneasy to him, he could not answer for himself, that he should not endeavour to seek content in other company. That he had proceeded so far in the business that concerned the lady, and was so deeply engaged in it, that she would not only be exposed to all imaginable contempt, if it succeeded not; but his own honour would suffer so much, that he should become ridiculous to the world, and be thought too in pupilage under a governor; and therefore he would expect and exact a conformity from his wife herein, and which should be the only hard thing he would ever require from her, and which she herself might make very easy, for the lady would behave herself with all possible duty and humility unto her, which if she should fail to do in the least degree, she should never see the king's face again: and that he would never be engaged to put any other servant about her, without first consulting with her, and receiving her consent and approbation. Upon the whole," he said, "he would never recede from any part of the resolution he had taken and expressed to him: and therefore he required him to use all those arguments to the queen, which were necessary to induce her to a full compliance with what the king desired."

The chancellor addressed himself to the queen with as full liberty and plainness as he had presumed to use to his majesty, but could not proceed so far at a time, nor hold so long conferences at once. When he first lamented the misintelligence he observed to be between their majesties, and she perceived the king had told him some particulars, she protested her own innocence, but with so much passion and such a torrent of tears, that there was nothing left for him to do, but to retire, and tell her, "that he would wait upon her in a fitter season, and when she should be more capable of receiving humble advice from "her servants, who wished her well;" and so departed.

The next day he waited upon her again at the hour assigned by her, and found her much better composed than he had left her. She vouchsafed to excuse the passion she had been in, and confessed "she looked upon him as one of the few friends she had, and from whom she would most willingly at all times receive counsel: but that she hoped he would not wonder or blame her, if having greater misfortunes upon her, and being to struggle with more difficulties, than any woman had ever been put to of her condition, she sometimes gave vent to that passion that was ready to break her heart." He told her, "he was desirous indeed to serve her, of which he would not make great or many protestations, since she could not but believe it, except she thought him to be a fool, or mad, since nothing could contribute so much to his happiness, as an eminent sympathy between the king and her in all things: and he could not give her a greater evidence of his devotion, than in always saying that to her which was fit for her to hear, though it did not please her; and he would observe no other rule towards her, though it should render him ungracious to her."

She seemed well satisfied with what he said, and told him "he should never be more welcome to her, than when he told her of her faults:" to which he replied, "that it was the province he was accused of usurping with reference to all his friends." He told her, "that he doubted she was little beholden to her education, that had given her no better information of the follies and iniquities of mankind, of which he presumed the climate from whence she came could have given more instances, than this cold region would afford;" though at that time it was indeed very hot. He said, "if her majesty had been fairly dealt with in that particular, she could never have thought herself so miserable, and her condition so insupportable as she seemed to think it to be; the ground of which heavy complaint he could not comprehend." Whereupon with some blushing and confusion and some tears [she said], "she did not think that she should have found the king engaged in his affection to another lady;" and then was able to say no more: which gave the chancellor opportunity to say, "that he knew well, that she had been very little acquainted with or informed of the world; yet he could not believe that she was so utterly ignorant, as to expect that the king her husband, in the full strength and vigour of his [youth], was of so innocent a constitution, as to be reserved for her whom he had never seen, and to have had no acquaintance or familiarity with the sex;" and [asked], "whether she believed, when it should please God to send a queen to Portugal, she should find that court so full of chaste affections." Upon which her majesty smiled, and spake pleasantly enough, but as if she thought it did not concern her case, and as if the king's affection had not wandered, but remained fixed.

Upon which the chancellor replied with some warmth, "that he came to her with a message from the king, which if she received as she ought to do, and as he hoped she would, she would be the happiest queen in the world."

"That whatever correspondences the king had entertained with any other ladies, before he saw her majesty, concerned not her; nor ought she to inquire more into them or after them, than into what other [excesses] he had used in his youth in France, Holland, or Germany. That he had authority to assure her, that all former appetites were expired, and that he dedicated himself entirely and without reserve to her; and that if she met his affection with that warmth and spirit and good humour, which she well knew how to express, she would live a life of the greatest delight imaginable. That her good fortune, and all the joy she could have in this world, was in her own power, and that she only [strove] to drive it from her." She heard all this with apparent pleasure, and infinite expressions of her acknowledgments of the king's bounty; thanked the chancellor more than enough, and desired him "to help in returning her thanks to his majesty, and in obtaining his pardon for any passion or peevishness she might have been guilty of, and in assuring him of all future obedience and duty."

Upon this good temper he approached to the other part of his message, "how necessary it would be that her majesty should gratify this good resolution and justice and tenderness in the king, by meeting it with a proportionable submission and resignation on her part to whatsoever his majesty should desire of her;" and then insinuated what would be acceptable with reference to the lady. But this was no sooner mentioned, than it raised all the rage and fury of yesterday, with fewer tears, the fire appearing in her eyes, where the water was. She said, "that the king's insisting upon that particular could proceed from no other ground but his hatred of her person, and to expose her to the contempt of the world, who would think her worthy of such an affront, if she submitted to it; which before she would do, she would put herself on board any little vessel, and so be transported to Lisbon;" with many other extravagant expressions, which her passion suggested in spite of her understanding; and which he interrupted with a very ill countenance, and told her, "that she had not the disposal of her own person, nor could go out of the house where she was without the king's leave;" and therefore advised her "not to speak any more of Portugal, where there were enough who would wish her to be." He told her, "that he would find some fitter time to speak with her, and till then only desired that she would make show of no such passion to the king; and that whatever she thought fit to deny that the king proposed to her, she should deny in such a manner, as should look rather like a deferring than an utter refusal, that his majesty might not be provoked to enter into the same passion, which would be superior to hers."

The chancellor made the more haste to inform the king of all that had passed, that he might prevail with him to suspend for some little time the prosecuting that argument further with the queen. He gave him an account of all the good and kind things she had said with reference to his majesty, of the professions she had made of all duty and obedience to him throughout the whole course of her life; "that her unwillingness to obey him in this one particular proceeded only from the great

"passion of love which she had for him, that transported her beyond the limits of her reason." He confessed, "he had not discoursed it so fully with her majesty as he resolved to have done, because a sudden passion had seized upon her, which she must have some time to overrule;" and therefore he entreated his majesty "for a day or two to forbear pressing the queen in that matter, till he had once more waited upon her, by which he hoped he might in some degree dispose her majesty to give him satisfaction." And though he was in no degree pleased with the account, yet the other did think, that he would for a little have respited the further discourse of it.

But the king quickly found other counsellors, who told him, "that the thing he contended for was not of so much importance as the manner of obtaining it; that the contention now was, who should govern; and if he suffered himself to be disputed with, he must resolve hereafter to do all things precario." And as this advice was more suitable to his present passion and purpose, so it was embraced greedily and resolutely. The fire flamed that night higher than ever: the king reproached the queen with stubbornness and want of duty, and she him with tyranny and want of affection: he used threats and menaces, which he never intended to put in execution, and she talked loudly "how ill she was treated, and that she would return again to Portugal." He replied, "that she should do well first to know whether her mother would receive her: and he would give her a fit opportunity to know that, by sending to their home all her Portuguese servants; and that he would forthwith give order for the discharge of them all, since they behaved themselves so ill, for to them and their counsels he imputed all her perverseness."

The passion and noise of the night reached too many ears to be a secret the next day; and the whole court was full of that, which ought to have been known to nobody. And the mutual carriage and behaviour between their majesties confirmed all that they had heard or could imagine: they spake not, hardly looked on one another. Every body was glad that they were so far from the town, (for they were still at Hampton-court,) and that there were so few witnesses of all that passed. The queen sat melancholic in her chamber in tears, except when she drove them away by a more violent passion in cholerick discourse: and the king sought his diversions in that company that said and did all things to please him; and there he spent all the nights, and in the morning came to the queen's chamber, for he never slept in any other place. Nobody knew how to interpose, or indeed how to behave themselves, the court being far from one mind; with this difference, that the young and frolic people of either sex talked loudly all that they thought the king would like and be pleased with, whilst the other more grave and serious people did in their souls pity the queen, and thought that she was put to bear more than her strength could sustain.

The chancellor came not to the court in two or three days; and when he did come thither, he forbore to see the queen, till the king sent him again to her. His majesty informed him at large, and with more than his natural passion, of all that had passed; and "of the foolish extravagancy" (as he called it) "of returning to Portugal; and of the positive resolution he had taken, and the orders he had given, for the present sending away all the Portuguese, to whom he did impute all his wife's frowardness." He renewed his former declaration, "that he would gain his point, and never depart from that resolution;" yet was content to be blamed by the chancellor, for having proceeded with so much choler and precipitation, and seemed to think that he had done better, if he had followed his former advice. But then he added, "that besides the uneasiness and pain within himself, the thing was more spoken of in all places, and more to his disadvantage, whilst it was in this suspense, than it would be when it was once executed; which would put a final end to all debates, and all would be forgotten."

The chancellor desired his majesty to believe, "that he would endeavour, by all the ways he could devise, to persuade the queen to submit to his pleasure, because it is his pleasure; and that he would urge some arguments to her, which he could not himself answer; and therefore he was not without hope that they might prevail. But he desired him likewise to believe, that he had much rather spend his pains in endeavouring to convert his majesty from pursuing his resolution, which he did in his conscience believe to be unjust, than in persuading her majesty to comply with it, which yet he would very heartily do." He desired him to give him leave to put him in mind of a discourse his majesty had held with him many years ago, upon an occasion that he had administered by telling him what his father, the late king, had said to him: that he had great reason to acknowledge it [due] to God's immediate blessing, and in truth to his inspiration, that he continued firm in his religion: for though his father had always taken pains himself to inform and instruct him, yet he had been so much deceived by others that he put about him when he was young, a company of "the arrantest knaves and puritans" (they were his own words) "that could be found in the two kingdoms; whereof he named two or three, who were enemies to the church, and used to deride all religion. That when he had related this discourse accidentally of his late majesty, the king replied, that if it should please God ever to give him a wife and children, he would make choice of such people to be about both in all places of near trust, who in their natures and manners, and if it were possible in their very humours, were such as he wished his wife and children should be; for he did believe that most young people (and it may be elder) were upon the matter formed by those whom they saw continually and could not but observe." The king answered with some quickness, "that he remembered the discourse very well, and should think of it; but that the business which he had commended to him must be done, and without delay."

When the chancellor was admitted to the queen, he presumed with all plainness to blame her "for the illimited passion in which she had treated the king, and thereby provoked him to greater indignation than she could imagine, or in truth sustain:" and [begged], "that for her own sake she would decline and suppress such distempers, which could have no other effect, than in making the wound incurable; which it would do, in a very little time more, inevitably, and reduce all her faithful servants to an incapacity of serving her." She acknowledged with tears, "that she had been in too much passion, and said somewhat she ought not to have said, and for which she would willingly ask the king's pardon upon her knees; though his manner of treating her had wonderfully surprised her, and might be some excuse for more than ordinary commotion. That she prayed to God to give her patience, and hoped she should be no more transported with the like passion upon what provocation soever."

Then he entreated, "that he might find some effect of that her good resolution, in permitting him to enlarge upon the argument he was obliged to discourse to her; and that if he offered any humble advice, it should be such as he was most confident would prove for her benefit, and such as he would himself submit to if he were in her condition." He told her, "he came not to justify and defend the proposition that had been made to her concerning the lady, as a just or a reasonable proposition; he had not dissembled his own opinion as to either, and when he should now insist upon it again, which he must do, he could not but confess that it was a very hard injunction, not to be yielded to it without some reluctance;" but he besought her to tell him, "whether she thought it in her power to divert it; or that it was not in the king's power to impose it upon her."

She answered, "she knew it was in her own power to consent or not to consent to it; and that she could not despair, but that the king's justice and goodness might divert him from the prosecution of a command so unreasonable in him, and so dishonourable to her. She would not dispute the king's power, what it might impose, being sure that she could not rescue herself from it: but," she said, "nobody knew better than he, whether the king was obliged to leave the choice of her own servants to herself; and if it were otherwise, she had been deceived."

He told her, "that she had and would always enjoy that privilege: but that it was always understood in conditions of that nature, that as the husband would not impose a servant, against whom just exceptions could be made; so it was presumed, that no wife would refuse to receive a servant, that was esteemed and commended by her husband. That he did assure her, upon as much knowledge as he was capable to have in affairs of such a nature, that the king would exact an entire conformity to his pleasure in this particular; and then the question would only be, whether it would be better that she conform herself with alacrity to an obedience, with those circumstances which might be obliging and meritorious on her part; or that it should be done without her consent, and with all the repugnancy she could express, which could only be in angry words and ungracious circumstances, which would have a more bitter operation in her own breast and thoughts, than any where else: and therefore he did very importu-

"nately advise her to submit to that cheerfully, that she could not resist; which if she should not do, and do out of hand, she would too late repent."

To which she replied with great calmness, "that it may be worse could not fall out than she expected; but why she should repent the not giving her consent, she could not apprehend, since her conscience would not give her leave to consent;" which when she saw him receive with a face of trouble and wonder, which it was his misfortune and weakness never to be able to conceal or dissemble, she continued her discourse, and said, "she could not conceive how any body could, with a good conscience, consent to what she could not but suppose would be an occasion and opportunity of sin." To which he suddenly replied, "that he now understood her; and that she ought to have no such apprehension, but to believe the professions the king made, of the sincerity whereof she would hereby become a witness; and if there should be any tergiversation, the opportunity, which she fancied, would be more frequent at a distance than by such a relation, which nothing but a resolved innocence could make desirable by either party." To which he added, "that he thought her majesty had a meaner and a lower opinion of her person and her parts, if she thought it could be in the power of any other lady to deprive her of the interest she had a right to, if she did all that became her to retain it; and which in that case she could not lose but by the highest fraud and perjury, which she could not justly entertain the suspicion of."

There cannot be a greater patience and intention of hearing, than the queen manifested during the time of his discourse, sometimes seeming not displeased, but oftener by a smile declaring that she did not believe what he said: and in conclusion, in few words declared, "that the king might do what he pleased, but that she could not consent to it;" and pronounced it with a countenance, as if she both hoped and believed, that her obstinacy would in the end prevail over the king's importunity: and it is very probable, that she had advice given her to that purpose. The chancellor concluded with telling her, "that he would give her no more trouble upon this particular: that he was sorry he had not credit enough to prevail with her majesty in a point that would have turned so much to her benefit; and that she would hereafter be sorry for her refusal." And when he had given the king a faithful account of all that had passed; and "that he believed them both to be very much to blame, and that that party would be most excusable who yielded first," he made it his humble suit, "that he might be no more consulted with, nor employed in an affair in which he had been so unsuccessful."

The king came seldom into the queen's company, and when he did he spake not to her; but spent his time in other divertisements, and in the company of those who made it their business to laugh at all the world, and who were as bold with God Almighty as with any of his creatures. He persevered in all his resolutions without any remorse; directed a day for all the Portugueses to be embarked, without assigning any considerable thing of bounty to any of them, or vouchsafing to write any letter to the king or queen of Portugal of the cause of the dismission of them. And this rigour prevailed upon the great heart of the queen, who had not received any money to enable her to be liberal to any of those, who had attended her out of their own country, and promised themselves places of great advantage in her family: and she earnestly desired the king, "that she might retain some few of those who were known to her, and of most use, that she might not be wholly left in the hands of strangers;" and employed others to make the same suit to the king on her behalf. Whereupon the countess of Penalva, who had been bred with her from a child, and who, by the infirmity of her eyes and other indisposition of health, scarce stirred out of her chamber, was permitted to remain in the court: and some other inferior servants in her kitchen and in the lowest offices, besides those who were necessary to her devotions, were left here. All the rest [were] transported to Portugal.

The officers of the revenue were required to use all strictness in the receipt of that part of the portion that was brought over with the fleet; and not to allow any of those demands which were made upon computation of the value of money, and other allowances, upon the account: and Diego de Silva, who was designed in Portugal without any good reason to be the queen's treasurer, and upon that expectation had undertaken that troublesome province to see the money paid in London by what was assigned to that purpose, was committed to prison for not making haste enough in the payment and in finishing the account; and his commitment went very near the queen, as an affront done to herself. The Portugal ambassador, who was a very honest man, and so desirous to serve the king that he had upon the matter lost the queen, was heartbroken; and after a long sickness, which all men believed would have killed him, as soon as he was able to endure the air, left Hampton-court, and retired to his own house in the city.

In all this time the king pursued his point: the lady came to the court, was lodged there, was every day in the queen's presence, and the king in continual conference with her; whilst the queen sat untaken notice of: and if her majesty rose at the indignity and retired into her chamber, it may be one or two attended her; but all the company remained in the room she left, and too often said those things aloud which nobody ought to have whispered. The king (who had in the beginning of this conflict appeared still with a countenance of trouble and sadness, which had been manifest to every body, and no doubt was really afflicted, and sometimes wished that he had not proceeded so far, until he was again new chafed with the reproach of being governed, which he received with the most sensible indignation, and was commonly provoked with it most by those who intended most to govern him) had now vanquished or suppressed all those tendernesses and reluctances, and appeared every day more gay and pleasant, without any clouds in his face, and full of good humour; saving that the close observers thought it more feigned and affected than of a natural growth. However, to the queen it appeared very real, and made her the more sensible, that she alone was left out in all jollities, and not suffered to have any part of those pleasant applications and caresses, which she saw made almost to every body else; an universal mirth in all company but in hers, and in all places but in her chamber; her own servants shewing more respect and more diligence to the person of the lady, than towards their own mistress, who they found could do them less good. The nightly meeting continued with the same or more license; and the discourses which passed there, of what argument soever, were the discourse of the whole court and of the town the day following: whilst the queen had the king's company those few hours which remained of the preceding night, and which were too little for sleep.

All these mortifications were too heavy to be borne: so that at last, when it was least expected or suspected, the queen on a sudden let herself fall first to conversation and then to familiarity, and even in the same instant to a confidence with the lady; was merry with her in public, talked kindly of her, and in private used nobody more friendly. This excess of condescension, without any provocation or invitation, except by multiplication of injuries and neglect, and after all friendships were renewed, and indulgence yielded to new liberty, did the queen less good than her former resoluteness had done. Very many looked upon her with much compassion, commended the greatness of her spirit, detested the barbarity of the affronts she underwent, and censured them as loudly as they durst; not without assuming the liberty sometimes of insinuating to the king himself, "how much his own honour suffered in the neglect and disrespect of her own servants, who ought at least in public to manifest some duty and reverence towards her majesty; and how much he lost in the general affections of his subjects: and that, besides the displeasure of God Almighty, he could not reasonably hope for children by the queen, which was the great if not the only blessing of which he stood in need, whilst her heart was so full of grief, and whilst she was continually exercised with such insupportable afflictions." And many, who were not wholly unconversant with the king, nor strangers to his temper and constitution, did believe that he grew weary of the struggle, and even ready to avoid the scandal that was so notorious, by the lady's withdrawing from the verge of the court and being no longer seen there, how firmly soever the friendship might be established. But this sudden downfall and total abandoning her own greatness, this low demeanour and even application to a person she had justly abhorred and worthily contemned, made all men conclude, that it was a hard matter to know her, and consequently to serve her. And the king himself was so far from being reconciled by it, that the esteem, which he could not hitherto but retain in his heart for her, grew now much less. He concluded that all her former aversion expressed in those lively passions, which seemed not capable of dissimulation, was all fiction, and purely acted to the life by a nature crafty, perverse, and inconstant. He congratulated his own ill-natured perseverance, by which he had discovered how he was to behave himself hereafter, and what remedies he was to apply to all future indispositions: nor had he ever after the same value of her wit, judgment, and understanding, which he had formerly; and was well enough pleased to observe, that the reverence others had for all three was somewhat diminished.

The parliament assembled together at the same time in February to which they had been adjourned or prorogued, and continued together till the end of July following. They brought the same affection and duty with them towards the king, which they had formerly; but were much troubled at what they had heard and what they had observed of the divisions in court. They had the same fidelity for the king's service, but not the same alacrity in it: the despatch was much slower in all matters depending, than it had used to be. The truth is; the house of commons was upon the matter not the same: three years sitting, for it was very near so long since they had been first assembled, had consumed very many of their members; and in the places of those who died, great pains were taken to have some of the king's menial servants chosen; so that there was a very great number of men in all stations in the court, as well below stairs as above, who were members of the house of commons. And there were very few of them, who did not think themselves qualified to reform whatsoever was amiss in church or state, and to procure whatsoever supply the king would require.

They, who either out of their own modesty, or in regard of their distant relation to his service, had seldom had access to his presence, never had presumed to speak to him; now by the privilege of parliament every day resorted to him, and had as much conference with him as they desired. They, according to the comprehension they had of affairs, represented their advice to him for the conducting his affairs; according to their several opinions and observations represented those and those men as well affected to his service, and others, much better than they, who did not pay them so much respect, to be ill-affected and to want duty for his majesty. They brought those, who appeared to them to be most zealous for his service, because they professed to be ready to do any thing he pleased to prescribe, to receive his majesty's thanks, and from himself his immediate directions how to behave themselves in the house; when the men were capable of no other instruction, than to follow the example of some discreet man in whatsoever he should vote, and behave themselves accordingly.

To this time, the king had been content to refer the conduct of his affairs in the parliament to the chancellor and the treasurer; who had every day conference with some select persons of the house of commons, who had always served the king, and upon that account had great interest in that assembly, and in regard of the experience they had and their good parts were hearkened to with reverence. And with those they consulted in what method to proceed in disposing the house, sometimes to propose, sometimes to consent to what should be most necessary for the public; and by them to assign parts to other men, whom they found disposed and willing to concur in what was to be desired: and all this without any noise, or bringing many together to design, which ever was and ever will be ingrateful to parliaments, and, however it may succeed for a little time, will in the end be attended with prejudice.

But there were two persons now introduced to act upon that stage, who disdained to receive orders, or to have any method prescribed to them; who took upon them to judge of other men's defects, and thought their own abilities beyond exception.

The one was sir Harry Bennet, who had procured himself to be sent agent or envoy into Spain, as soon as the king came from Brussels; being a man very well known to the king, and for his pleasant and agreeable humour acceptable to him: and he remained there at much ease till the king returned to England, having waited upon his majesty at Fuentarabia in the close of the treaty between the two crowns, and there appeared by his dexterity to have gained good credit in the court of Spain, and particularly with don Lewis de Haro; and by that short negotiation he renewed and confirmed the former good inclinations of his master to him. He had been obliged always to correspond with the chancellor, by whom his instructions had been drawn, and to receive the king's pleasure by his signification; which he had always done, and professed much respect and submission to him: though whatever orders he received, and how positive soever, in particulars which highly concerned the king's honour and dignity, he observed them so far and no further than his own humour disposed him; and in some cases flatly disobeyed what the king enjoined, and did directly the contrary, as in the case of the Jesuit Peter Talbot; who having carried himself with notorious insolence towards the king in Flanders, had transported himself into England, offered his service to Cromwell, and after his death was employed by the ruling powers into Spain, upon his undertaking to procure orders, by which the king should not be suffered longer to reside in Flanders: of all which his majesty having received full advertisement, he made haste to send orders into Spain to sir Harry Bennet, "that he should prepare don Lewis for his reception by letting him know, that though that Jesuit was his natural subject, he had so misbehaved himself, that he looked upon him as a most [inveterate] enemy and a traitor; and therefore his majesty desired, that he might receive no countenance there, being, as he well knew, sent by the greatest rebels to do him prejudice."

This was received by sir Harry Bennet before the arrival of the man, who found no inconvenience by it; and instead of making any complaint concerning him, he writ word, "that Talbot had more credit than he in that court; that he professed to have great devotion for the king; and therefore his advice was, that the king would have a better opinion of him, and employ him in his service:" and himself received him into his full confidence, and consulted with no man so much as with him; which made all men believe that he was a Roman catholic, who did believe that he had any religion. But he had made his full excuse and defence for all this at the interview at Fuentarabia, from whence the king returned with marvellous satisfaction in his discretion as well as in his affection. And until, contrary to all his expectation, he heard of the king's return into England, all his thoughts were employed how to make benefit of the duke of York's coming into Spain to be admiral of the galleys; which he writ to hasten all that might be.

Though he continued his formal correspondence with the chancellor, which he could not decline;

yet he held a more secret intelligence with Daniel O'Neile of the bedchamber, with whom he had a long friendship. As soon as the king arrived in England, he trusted O'Neile to procure any direction from the king immediately in those particulars which himself advised. And so he obtained the king's consent, for his consenting to the old league that had been made between England and Spain in the time of the late king, and which Spain had expressly refused to renew after the death of that king, (which was suddenly proclaimed in Spain, without ever being consulted in England); and presently after leave to return into England without any letter of revocation: both which were procured, or rather signified, by O'Neile, without the privity of the chancellor or of either of the secretaries of state; nor did either of them know that he was from Madrid, till they heard he was in Paris, from whence he arrived in London in a very short time after. So far the chancellor was from that powerful interest or influence, when his credit was at highest.

But he was very well received by the king, in whose affections he had a very good place: and shortly after his arrival, though not so soon as he thought his high merit deserved, his majesty conferred the only place then void (and that had been long promised to a noble person, who had behaved himself very well towards his majesty and his blessed father) upon him, which was the office of privy purse; received him into great familiarity, and into the nightly meeting, in which he filled a principal place to all intents and purposes. The king very much desired to have him elected a member in the house of commons, and commanded the chancellor to use his credit to obtain it upon the first opportunity: and in obedience to that command, he did procure him to be chosen about the time we are now speaking of, when the parliament assembled in February.

The other person was Mr. William Coventry, the youngest son to a very wise father, the lord Coventry, who had been lord keeper of the great seal of England for many years with a universal reputation. This gentleman was young whilst the war continued: yet he had put himself before the end of it into the army, and had the command of a foot company, and shortly after travelled into France; where he remained whilst there was any hope of getting another army for the king, or that either of the other crowns would engage in his quarrel. But when all thoughts of that were desperate, he returned into England; where he remained for many years without the least correspondence with any of his friends beyond the seas, and with so little reputation of caring much for the king's restoration, that some of his own family, who were most zealous for his majesty's service, and had always some signal part in any reasonable design, took care of nothing more, than that nothing they did should come to his knowledge; and gave the same advice to those about the king, with whom they corresponded, to use the same caution. Not that any body suspected his being inclined to the rebels, or to do any act of treachery; but that the pride and censoriousness of his nature made him unconvincible, and his despair that any thing could be effectually done made him incompetent to consult the ways of doing it. Nor had he any conversation with any of the king's party, nor they with him, till the king was proclaimed in London; and then he came over with the rest to offer his service to his majesty at the Hague, and had the good fortune to find the duke of York without a secretary. For though he had a Walloon that was, in respect of the languages of which he was master, fit for that function in the army, and had discharged it very well for some years; yet for the province the duke was now to govern, having the office of high admiral of England, he was without any fit person to discharge the office of secretary with any tolerable sufficiency: so that Mr. Coventry no sooner offered his service to the duke, but he was received into that employment, very honourable under such a master, and in itself of the greatest profit next the secretaries of state, if they in that respect be to be preferred.

He had been well known to the king and duke in France, and had a brother whom the king loved well and had promised to take into his bed-chamber, as he shortly after did, Harry Coventry, who was beloved by every body, which made them glad of the preferment of the other; whilst they who knew the worst of him, yet knew him able to discharge that office, and so contributed to the duke's receiving him. He was a sullen, ill-natured, proud man, whose ambition had no limits, nor could be contained within any. His parts were very good, if he had not thought them better than any other man's; and he had diligence and industry, which men of good parts are too often without, which made [him] quickly to have at least credit and power enough with the duke; and he was without those vices which were too much in request, and which make men most unfit for business and the trust that cannot be separated from it.

He had sat a member in the house of commons, from the beginning of the parliament, with very much reputation of an able man. He spake pertinently, and was always very acceptable and well heard; and was one of those with whom they, who were trusted by the king in conducting his affairs in the lower house, consulted very frequently; but not so much, nor relied equally upon his advice, as upon some few others who had much more experience, which he thought was of use only to ignorant and dull men, and that men of sagacity could see and determine at a little light, and ought rather to persuade and engage men to do that which they judged fit, than consider what themselves were inclined to do: and so did not think himself to be enough valued and relied upon, and only to be made use of to the celebrating the designs and contrivance of other men, without being signal in the managery, which he aspired to be. Nor did any man envy him the province, if he could indeed have governed it, and that others who had more useful talents would have been ruled by him. However, being a man who naturally loved faction and contradiction, he often made experiments how far he could prevail in the house, by declining the method that was prescribed, and proposing somewhat to the house that was either beside or contrary to it, and which the others would not oppose, believing, in regard of his relation, that he had received newer directions: and then if it succeeded well, (as sometimes it did,) he had argument enough to censure and inveigh against the chancellor, for having taken so ill measures of the temper and affections of the house; for he did not dissemble in his private conversation (though his outward carriage was very fair) that he had no kindness for him, which in gratitude he ought to have had; nor had he any thing to complain of from him, but that he wished well and did all he could to defend and support a very worthy person, who had deserved very well from the king, against whom he manifested a great and causeless animosity, and desired to oppress for his own profit, of which he had an immoderate appetite.

When those two persons, sir Harry Bennet and Mr. Coventry, (between whom there had been as great a league of friendship, as can be between two very proud men equally ill-natured,) came now to sit together in the house of commons; though the former of them knew no more of the constitution and laws of England than he did of China, nor had in truth a care or tenderness for church or state, but believed France was the best pattern in the world; they thought they should have the greatest wrong imaginable, if they did not entirely govern it, and if the king took his measures of what should be done there from any body but themselves. They made friendships with some young men, who spake confidently and often, [and] upon some occasions seemed to have credit in the house. And upon a little conversation with those men, who, being country gentlemen of ordinary condition and mean fortunes, were desirous to have interest in such a person as sir Harry Bennet, who was believed to have great credit with the king; he believed he understood the house, and what was to be done there, as well as any man in England.

He recommended those men to the king "as persons of sublime parts, worthy of his majesty's caressing: that he would undertake to fix them to his service; and when they were his own, he might carry what he would in the house of commons." The men had parts indeed and good affections, and often had resorted to the chancellor, received advice from him, and thought themselves beholden to him; being at that time entirely governed by sir Hugh Pollard, who was himself still advised by the chancellor (with whom he had a long and fast friendship) how he should direct his friends, having indeed a greater party in the house of commons willing to be disposed of by him, than any man that ever sat there in my time. But now these gentlemen had got a better patron; the new courtier had raised their value, and talked in another dialect to them, of recompenses and rewards, than they had heard formerly. He carried them to the king, and told his majesty in their own hearing, "what men of parts they were, what services they had done for him, and how much greater they could do:" and his majesty received and conferred with them very graciously, and dismissed them with promises which made them rich already.

The two friends before mentioned agreed so well between themselves, that whether they spake together or apart to the king, they said always the same things, gave the same information, and took care that both their masters might have the same opinions and judgments. They magnified the affections of the house of commons, "which were so great and united, that they would do whatsoever his majesty would require. That there were many worthy and able men, of whose "wisdom the house was so well persuaded, that they commonly consented to whatsoever they proposed : and that these men complained, that they had no directions given to them which way they might best serve the king ; they knew not what he desired, which when they should do, it would quickly appear how much they were at the king's disposal, and all things which now depended long would be hereafter despatched in half the time."

The king wondered very much, "that his friends in the house were no better informed, of which he had never heard any complaint before, and wished them to speak with the chancellor:" for neither of these men were yet arrived at the confidence to insinuate in the least degree any ill-will or prejudice to him, though they were not united in any one thing more than the desire of his ruin, and the resolution to compass it by all the ill arts and devices they could use ; but till it should be more seasonable, they dissembled to both their masters to have a high esteem of him, having not yet credit enough with either to do him harm. They said, "they would very willingly repair to him, and be directed by him : but they desired that his majesty himself would first speak to him (because it would not so well become them) to call those persons, whom they had recommended to him, to meet together with the rest with whom he used to advise ; which the persons they named they were sure would be very glad of, having all of them a great esteem of the chancellor, and being well known to him," as indeed they were, and most of them obliged by him.

The king willingly undertook it : and being shortly after attended by the chancellor, his majesty told him all that the other two had said to him, and did not forget to let him know the great good-will they had both professed towards him. He asked him "what he thought of such and such men," and particularly named Mr. Clifford and Mr. Churchill, and some other men of better quality and much more interest, "who," he said, "took it ill that they were not particularly informed what the king desired, and which way they might best serve him ;" and bade him, "that at the next meeting of the rest, these men might likewise have notice to be present, together with sir Harry Bennet and Mr. William Coventry ;" for Harry Coventry (who was a much wiser man than his brother, and had a much better reputation with wise men) was constantly in those councils.

The chancellor told him, "that great and notorious meetings and cabals in parliament had been always odious in parliament : and though they might produce some success in one or two particulars till they were discovered, they had always ended unluckily ; until they were introduced in the late ill times by so great a combination, that they could not receive any discountenance. Yet that they, who compassed all their wicked designs by those cabals, were so jealous that they might be overmatched by the like practices, that when they discovered any three or four of those, who were used to concur with them, to have any private meetings, they accused them to conspire against the parliament. That when his majesty returned, and all the world was full of joy and delight to serve him, and persons were willing and importunate to receive direction how they might do it in that convention ; care had been taken without any noise, or bringing any prejudice upon those who were willing to be instruments towards the procuring what was desirable, and to prevent what would be ingrateful, that little notice might be taken of them, which had good success.

"That since this parliament the lord treasurer and he had, by his majesty's direction, made choice of some persons eminent for their affection to the crown, of great experience and known abilities, to confer with for the better preparing and conducting what was to be done in the house of commons : but the number of them was not so great as to give any umbrage. Nor did they meet oftener together with them, than upon accidents and contingencies was absolutely necessary ; but appointed those few who had a mutual confidence in each other, and every one of which had an influence upon others and advised them what to do, to meet by themselves, either at the lord Bridgman's or Mr. Attorney's chambers, who still gave notice to the other two of what was necessary, and received advice. That there were very few of any notable consideration, who did not frequent to both of them, either to dine with them or to perform some office of civility ; with every one of whom they conferred, and said what was necessary to inform and oblige them what was fit for them to do.

"That two of those who were named by his majesty, Mr. Clifford and Mr. Churchill, were honest gentlemen, and received the advice they were to follow from sir Hugh Pollard, who had in truth a very particular influence upon all the Cornish and Devonshire men. And that his majesty might know that he had not been well informed, that the others named by him took it unkindly that they did not know his pleasure, who were leading men, as indeed they were ; he assured his majesty that there was not one of those, who was not particularly consulted with, and advertised by some person who was chosen by every one of them for that [purpose] ; and that they would by no means resort to any meeting, fearing to undergo the odious name of undertakers, which in all parliaments hath been a brand : but as they had never opposed any thing that related to his service, so upon any private insinuation they had been ready to propose any thing which would not have been so acceptable from any, who had been known to have relation to his service, or to depend upon those who had."

He besought his majesty to consider, "whether any thing had hitherto, in near three years, fallen out amiss, or short of what he had expected, in the wary administration that had been in that affair ;" and did not conceal his own fears, "that putting it into a more open and wider channel, his majesty's own too public speaking with the members of parliament, and believing what every man who was present told him passed in debates, and who for want of comprehension as well as memory committed many mistakes in their relations, would be attended with some inconveniences not easy to be remedied." The king was not dissatisfied with the discourse, but seemed to approve it :

however he would have sir Harry Bennet, Mr. Clifford, and Churchill, called to the next meeting; and because they were to be introduced into company they had not used to converse with, that it should be at the chancellor's chamber, who should let the rest know the good opinion his majesty had of those who were added to the number.

By this means and with these circumstances this alteration was made in the conduct of the king's service in the parliament; upon which many other alterations followed by degrees, though not at once. Yet presently it appeared, that this introduction of new confidants was not acceptable to those, who thought they had very well discharged their trust. Sir Harry Bennet was utterly unknown to them, a man unversed in any business, who never had nor ever was like to speak in the house, except in his ear who sat next him to the disadvantage of some who had spoken, and had not the faculties to get himself beloved, and was thought by all men to be a Roman catholic, for which they had not any other reason but from his indifference in all things which concerned the church.

When they met first at the chancellor's chamber, as the king had directed, they conferred freely together with little difference of opinion: though it appeared that they, who had used to be together before, did not use the same freedom as formerly in delivering their particular judgments, not having confidence enough in the new comers, who in their private meetings afterwards took more upon them, rather to direct than to advise; so that the other grew unsatisfied in their [conversation]. And though the meetings continued at one of the places before mentioned, some always discontinued their attendance; so that by degrees there were less resolutions taken than had been formerly; nor was there so cheerful a concurrence, or so speedy a despatch of the business depending in the house, as had been.

However, there appeared nothing of disunion in the parliament, but the same zeal and concurrence in all things which related to the king. The murmurs and discontents were most in the country, where the people began to talk with more license and less reverence of the court and of the king himself, and to reproach the parliament for their raising so much money, and increasing of the impositions upon the kingdom, without having done any thing for the redress of any grievance that lay upon the people. The license with reference to religion grew every day greater, the conventicles more frequent and more insolent, which disturbed the country exceedingly; but not so much as the liberty the papists assumed, who behaved themselves with indiscretion, and bragged as if they had a toleration and cared not what the magistrates could do. The parliament had a desire to have provided against those evils with the same rigour: but though there would have been a general consent in any provision that could be made against the fanatics and the conventicles, yet there would not be the like concurrence against the papists; and it was not possible to carry on the one without the other. And therefore the court, that they might be sure to prevent the last, interrupted all that was proposed against the former, which they wished provided against, and chose to have neither out of fear of both; which increased the disorders in the country, and caused more reflections upon the court: so that this session of parliament produced less of moment than any other.

And the king, after they had given him four subsidies, which was all the money they could be drawn to give, that he might part as kindly with them as he used to do, and upon discovery of several seditious meetings amongst the officers of the disbanded army, which he could best suppress when he had most leisure, he resolved to prorogue the parliament. And so sending for them upon the twenty-seventh of July, he thanked them for the present which they had made to him of the four subsidies, "which," he told them, "he would not have received from them, if it were not absolutely necessary for their peace and quiet as well as his: and that it would yet do him very little good, if he did not improve it by very good husbandry of his own; and by retrenching those very expenses, which in many respects might be thought necessary enough. But they should see that he would much rather impose upon himself, than upon his subjects; and that if all men would follow his example in retrenching their expenses, (which possibly they might do with much more convenience than he could do his,) the kingdom would in short time gain what they had given him that day." He told them, "he was very glad that they were going into their several countries, where their presence would do much good: and he hoped their vigilance and authority would prevent those disturbances, which the restless spirits of ill and unquiet men would be always contriving, and of which his majesty did assure them they promised themselves some effects that summer. And that there had been more pains and unusual ways taken to kindle the old fatal fears and jealousies, than he thought he should ever have lived to have seen, at least to have seen so countenanced."

He told them, "that he had expected to have had some bills presented to him against the several distempers in religion, against seditious conventicles, and against the growth of popery: but that it might be they had been in some fear of reconciling those contradictions in religion into some conspiracy against the public peace, to which himself doubted men of the most contrary motives in conscience were inclinable enough. He did promise them that he would lay that business to heart, and the mischiefs which might flow from those licenses; and if he lived to meet with them again, as he hoped he should, he would himself take care to present two bills to them to that end. And that, as he had already given it in charge to the judges, in their several circuits, to use their utmost endeavours to prevent and punish the scandalous and seditious meetings of sectaries, and to convict the papists; so he would be as watchful, and take all the pains he could, that neither the one or the other should disturb the peace of the kingdom." And adding many gracious expressions of his esteem and confidence in their affections, he caused them to be prorogued towards the end of March, which would be the beginning of the year 1664.

The king had an intention at that time to have prepared against the next meeting two such bills as he mentioned to them, and was well enough content that the parliament had not presented such to him, which he well foresaw would not have been such as he should have been pleased with. He would have liked the most rigorous acts against all the other factions in religion, but did not think the papists had deserved the same severities, which would have been provided against them with the other, it being very apparent, that the kingdom generally had resumed their old jealousies of them, provoked by the very unwary behaviour of that people, who bragged of more credit in the court than they could justify, though most men thought they had too much: and that was the reason that he had commanded the chancellor to require the judges, who were then beginning their circuits, to cause the Roman catholics to be convicted, which he believed would allay much of the jealousies in the country, as for the present it did. And then he resolved to cause two such bills to be prepared for several reasons, of which the principal was, that he might divide them into two bills; presuming that when he had sent one against either, they would not affect reducing both into one, which was that which the catholic party most apprehended.

His majesty was himself very unsatisfied with the imprudent carriage of the catholics, and thought they did affect too much to appear as if they stood upon the level with all other subjects: and he received very particular and unquestionable information, that some priests had made it an argument to some whom they endeavoured to make their proselytes, "that the king was of their religion in his heart, and would shortly declare it to all the world;" with which his majesty was marvellously offended, and did heartily desire that any of those indiscreet persons might be proceeded against with severity. Yet he had no mind that any man should be put to death, which could hardly be avoided if any man should be brought to trial in the case aforesaid, except he had granted his pardon, which with these circumstances would have carried scandal in it. Besides, he did think the wisest of that party had not carried themselves with modesty enough, with what was good for themselves and for his majesty's honour. And therefore he had, without imparting it to any friends of theirs, given that direction to the judges for convicting them, as the best means to reclaim them to a better temper: and he had a purpose, that the bill he meant should be prepared should more effectually perform that part, without exposing them to any notable inconveniences in their persons or their fortunes, if they behaved themselves well and warily.

He did believe, that it was necessary for his service that they should be all convicted, that it might be evident to himself what their numbers consisted of and amounted to, which he believed would be found much inferior to what they were generally computed, and then the danger from their power would not be thought so formidable: and it could be no prejudice to them without a further proceeding upon their conviction, which he was resolved to restrain, as he well might, and had done hitherto; resolving within himself, that no man should suffer under those penal laws which had been made against them in the age before, if they lived like good subjects, and administered no occasion of scandal. And as he was not reserved in declaring that his gracious purpose towards them, (as hath been said before;) so hitherto it had not been attended by any murmurs: and yet he was not without a purpose of keeping such a power over them, as might make them wholly depend upon him.

His majesty did, in his judgment and inclination, put a great difference between those Roman catholics, who being of ancient extraction had continued of the same religion from father to son, without having ever been protestant, amongst whom there were very few who had not behaved themselves very worthily; and those, who since the late troubles had apostatized from the church of England to that of the Roman, without any such evidence of conscience, as might not administer just reason to suspect, that their inducements had been from worldly temptations. And he did resolve in his bill to make a distinction between those classes, and to prevent, or at least to discourage, those lapses which fell out too frequently in the court; nor did men believe that they need make any apology for it, but appeared the more confidently in all places. He did resolve likewise to contract and lessen the number of the ecclesiastical persons, who upon missions resorted hither as to an infidel nation, (which was and is a grievance that the catholics would be glad to be eased in,) and to reduce them into such an order and method by this bill, that he might himself know the names of all priests remaining in the kingdom, and their several stations where they resided; which must have produced such a security to those who stayed, and to those with whom they stayed, as would have set them free from any apprehension of any penalties imposed by preceding parliaments.

But this design (which comprehended many other particulars) vanished as soon as it was discovered. The king's own discourse of a bill that he would cause to be drawn against the Roman catholics awakened great jealousies; nor did they want instruments or opportunities to discover what the meaning of it could be. Nor was the king reserved in the argument, but communicated it with those who he knew were well affected to that party, and to one or two of themselves who were reputed to be moderate men, and to desire nothing but the exercise of their religion with the greatest secrecy and caution, and who often informed him and complained "of the folly and vanity of some of their friends, and more particularly of the presumption of the Jesuits." And such kind of factions and divisions there are amongst them, which might be cultivated to very happy productions: but such ingenuity, as to be contented with what might gratify all their own pretences, there is not amongst them.

These moderate men complained already, "that the king was deceived by their enemy the chancellor," who indeed was generally very odious to them, for no other reason, but because they knew he was irreconcilable to their profession; not that they thought he desired that the laws should be put in execution against them; and some of the chief of them believed him to be much their friend, and had obligations to him. But they all lamented this direction given to the judges for their conviction, "which," they informed the king, "was the necessary preamble to the highest persecution the law had prepared against them."

"That till they were convicted they were in the same predicament with the rest of his subjects; but as soon as they were convicted," (which the judges now caused to be prosecuted throughout the kingdom,) "they were liable to all the other penalties, which his majesty was inclined to protect them from." They presented to him a short memorial of the disadvantages which were consequent to a conviction, in which they alleged some particulars which were not clear in the law, at least had never been practised in the severest times.

Though the king had well weighed all he had done before he did it, and well knew, after all their insinuations and allegations, that none of those inconveniences could ensue to them, if he restrained any further prosecution, which he always had intended to do; yet they wrought so far upon him, that he was even sorry that he had proceeded so far: and though it was not fit to revoke any part of it, yet he cared not how little it was advanced. And for the bill he meant to present in the next session, they said, "all their security and quiet they had enjoyed since his majesty's happy return depended wholly upon the general opinion, that he had favour for them, and satisfaction in their duty and obedience as good subjects, and their readiness to do him any service, which they would all make good with their lives and all that they had. But if he should now discover any jealousy of their fidelities, and that there was need of a new law against them, which his purpose of providing a bill implied, what mitigation soever his majesty intended in it, it would not be in his majesty's power to restrain the passion of other men; but all those animosities which had been hitherto covered and concealed, as grateful to him, would upon this occasion break out to their destruction: and therefore they hoped, that whatever bitterness the parliament might express against them when they came together, they should receive no invitation or encouragement by any jealousy or displeasure his majesty should manifest to have towards them."

These and the like arguments, or the credit of those who urged them, made that impression, that he declined any further thought of that bill; nor was there ever after mention of it. The catholics grew bolder in all places, and conversant in those rooms of the court into which the king's chaplains never presumed to enter; and to crown all their hopes, the lady declared herself of that faith, and inveighed sharply against the church she had been bred in.

During the interval of the parliament, there was not such a vacation from trouble and anxiety as was expected. The domestic unquietness in the court made every day more noise abroad: infinite scandals and calumnies were scattered amongst the people; and they expressed their discontents upon the great taxes and impositions which they were compelled to pay, and publicly reproached the parliament; when they were in truth vexed and grieved at heart for that which they durst not avow, and did really believe that God was angry with the nation, and resolved to exercise it under greater tribulation than he had so lately freed them from. The general want of money was complained of, and a great decay of trade; so that the native commodities of the kingdom were not transported. Yet both these were but pretences, and resulted from combinations rather than from reason. For it appeared by the customs, that the trade was greater than it had ever been, though some of our native commodities, especially cloth, seemed for some time to be at a stand; which proceeded rather from the present glut, which in the general license the interlopers had irregularly transported in great quantities, by which the prices were brought low, and could only be recovered by a restraint for some time, which the merchant adventurers put upon themselves, and would have put upon the interlopers, who were at last too hard for them, even upon the matter to the suppressing the company, that had stood in great reputation for very many years, and had advanced that manufacture to a great height; and whether it deserved that discountenance, time must decide. How unreasonable the other discourse was of want of money, there needs no other argument, but the great purchases which were every day made of great estates; nor was any considerable parcel of land in any part of England offered to be sold, but there was a purchaser at hand ready to buy it.

However, these pretences, together with the sudden bringing up all the money, that was collected for the king, in specie to London, which proceeded from the bankers' advancing so much present money for the emergent occasions, for which they had those assignments upon the money of the country, did really produce such a sudden fall of the rents throughout the kingdom, as had never been known before: so that men were compelled to abate generally a fourth part of their annual rents at the least, or to take their lands into their own hands, for which they were as ill provided. All this mischief fell upon the nobility and greatest gentry, who were owners of the greatest estates, every body whose estate lay in land undergoing a share in the suffering, which made the discontent general; which they thought the best [way] to remedy would be to raise no more taxes, which they took to be the cause why the rents fell. In the mean time the expenses of the court, and of all who depended upon it, grew still higher, and the king himself less intent upon his business, and more loved his pleasures, to which he prescribed no limits, nor to the expenses which could not but accompany them.

There was cause enough to be jealous of the public peace; there being every day discoveries made of private meetings and conferences between officers of the old army; and that correspondences were settled between them throughout the kingdom in a wonderful method; and that they had a grand committee residing in London, who had the supreme power, and which sent orders to all the rest, who were to rise in one day, and meet at several rendezvous. Hereupon several persons were apprehended and committed to prison; and the king himself often took the pains to examine them; and they confessed commonly more to his majesty himself than upon any other examination. Proclamations issued often for the banishing all officers who had ever borne arms against the king twenty miles from London, which did more publish the apprehension of new troubles.

There can be no doubt, but that there were many seditious purposes amongst that people, of which there often appeared so full evidence, that many were executed for high treason, who were tried and condemned by the judges at the general sessions at Newgate: yet there was often cause to believe that many men were committed, who in truth had not been more faulty, than in keeping ill company and in hearing idle discourses. Informing was grown a trade, which many affected to get money by: and as the king's ministers could not reject in a time of so much jealousy, so the receiving them gave them great trouble; for few of them were willing to be produced as evidence against those they accused, pretending, sometimes with reason, "that if they were known they should be rendered useless for the future," whereas they were yet unsuspected and admitted "into all councils." All the sects in religion spake with more boldness in their meetings, and met more frequently, than they had used to do in the times that sir Richard Browne and sir John Robinson had been lord mayors; and the officers who succeeded them proved less vigilant. A general despondency seemed to possess the minds of men, as if they little cared what came to pass; which did not proceed so much from malice, as from the disease of murmuring, which had been contracting above twenty years, and became almost incorporated into the nature of the nation.

There happened about this time an alteration in the court, that produced afterwards many other alterations which were not then suspected, yet even at that time was not liked in the court itself, and less out of it. The keeper of the privy purse, who was more fit for that province than for any other to which he could be applied, did not think himself yet preferred to a station worthy of his merit and great qualifications. Some promises the king had made to him when he was at Fuentarabia, and had long much kindness for his person and much delight in his company: so that his friend, Mr. O'Neile, who was still ready to put his majesty in mind of all his services, had nothing hard to do but to find a vacancy that might give opportunity for his advancement; and he was dexterous in making opportunities which he could not find, and made no scruple to insinuate to the king, "that the abilities of neither of his secretaries were so great but that he might be better served." Indeed his majesty, who did not naturally love old men, had not so much esteem of them as their parts and industry and integrity deserved, and would not have been sorry if either or both of them had died.

Secretary Nicholas had served the crown very many years with a very good acceptance, was made secretary of state by the late king, and loved and trusted by him in his nearest concerns to his death: nor had any man, who served him, a more general reputation of virtue and piety and unquestionable integrity throughout the kingdom. He was a man to whom the rebels had been always irreconcilable; and from the end of the war lived in banishment beyond the seas, was with his majesty from the time he left France (for whilst the king was in France with his mother, to whom the secretary was not gracious, he remained at a distance; but from the time that his majesty came into Germany he was always with him) in the exercise of the same function he had under his father, and returned into England with him, with hope to repair his fortune by the just perquisites of his office, which had been very much impaired by his long sufferings and banishment. He had never been in his youth a man of quick and sudden parts, but full of industry and application, (which it may be is the better composition,) and always versed in business and all the forms of despatch. He was now some years above seventy, yet truly performed his office with punctuality, and to the satisfaction of all men who repaired to him: and the king thought it an envious as well as an ill-natured thing, to discharge such an officer because he lived too long.

The other secretary was secretary Morrice, whose merit had been his having transacted all that had been between the king and the general, which was thought to be much more than it was. Yet he had behaved himself very well, and as much disposed the general as he was capable of being disposed; and his majesty had preferred him to that office purely to gratify and oblige the general; and he had behaved himself very honestly and diligently in the king's service, and had a good reputation in the house of commons, and did the business of his office without reproach. He had lived most part of his time in the country, with the repute of a wise man and a very good scholar, as indeed he was both in the Latin and Greek learning; but being without any knowledge in the modern languages, he gave the king often occasion to laugh at his unskilful pronunciation of many words. In the Latin despatches, which concern all the northern parts, he was ready, and treated with those ambassadors fluently and elegantly; and for all domestic affairs no man doubted his sufficiency, except in the garb and mode and humour of the court.

And the inducement that brought him in made it unfit to remove him, lest it might grieve the general, whose friend and kinsman he was: so that there was no expedient to provide for sir Harry Bennet, but by removing secretary Nicholas by his own consent; for the king would not do it otherwise to so old and faithful a servant. And his majesty was the more inclined to it, because it would give him the opportunity to bring another person into the office of the privy purse, of whom he was lately grown very fond, and towards whom he had, when he came into England, a greater aversion than to any gentleman who had been abroad with him; and that was sir Charles Berkley, who was then captain of the duke of York's guard, and much in the good grace of his royal highness.

Whilst this intrigue was contriving and depending, great care was taken that it might not come to the notice of the chancellor, lest if he could not divert the king from desiring it, which they believed he would not attempt, he might dissuade his old friend the secretary, with whom he had held a long and particular friendship, from hearkening to any proposition, or to accept any composition; which they believed not unreasonably that the other would be very solicitous in, as well to keep a man in, whom he could entirely trust, as to keep another out, of whose abilities he had no esteem, and in whose affection he had no confidence: and it was thought by many, that the same apprehension prevailed with the good old man himself to cherish the secrecy. Certain it is, that the whole matter was resolved and consented to, before ever the chancellor had a suspicion of it.

O'Neile, who had always the skill to bring that to pass by others which he could not barefaced appear in himself, insinuated to Mr. Ashburnham, who pretended, and I think had, much friendship for the secretary, "that the king thought the secretary too old to take so much pains, and often wished that his friends would persuade him to retire, that there might be a younger man in the office, who could attend upon his majesty at all hours and in all journeys; but that his majesty always spake kindly of him, and as if he resolved to give him an ample recompense;" and in confidence told him, "that the king had an impatient desire to have sir Harry Bennet secretary of state." Ashburnham was well versed in the artifices of court too; and thought he might very well perform the office of a friend to his old confident, and at the same time find a new and more useful friend for himself, by having a hand in procuring a large satisfaction for the old, and likewise facilitating the way for the introduction of a new secretary, who could not forget the obligation. So he told O'Neile, "that all the world knew that he had for many years professed a great friendship for secretary Nicholas," (they had been both servants at the same time to the duke of Buckingham, when he was killed,) "and that he should be much troubled to see him displaced in his old age with contempt; but if his majesty would dismiss him with honour and reward, that he might be able to provide for his wife and children, he would make no scruple to persuade him to quit his employment." O'Neile had all he looked for, and only enjoined him secrecy, "that it might not come to the king's ear that he had communicated this secret to any man; and he did presume, that before any resolution was taken in it, his majesty would speak of it to the chancellor."

Within a day or two the king sent for Ashburnham, and told him "he knew he was a friend to the secretary, who was now grown old, and not able to take the pains he had done; that he had served his father and himself very faithfully, and had spent his fortune in his service; that if he were willing to retire, for without his consent he would do nothing, he would give him ten thousand pounds, or any other recompense he should choose," implying a title of honour: but intimated, though he referred all to his own will, "that he wished, and that it would be acceptable to him, that the office might be vacant and at his majesty's disposal."

He undertook the employment very cheerfully, and quickly imparted all that had passed from the king, and all that he knew before, to the secretary; who was not fond of the court, and thought he had lived long enough there, having seen and observed much that he was grieved at heart to see. He considered, that though this message was very gracious, and offered a noble reward for his service, it did withal appear that the king did desire he should be gone; and having designed a successor to him, who had already much credit with him, if he should seem sullen or unwilling, he might in a short time be put out without any consideration, or at most with the promise of one. Thereupon he wished his friend "to assure the king, that he would very readily do whatsoever his majesty thought necessary for his service; but he hoped, that after above forty years spent in the service of the crown, he should not be exposed to disgrace and contempt. That he had a wife and children, who had all suffered with him in exile till his majesty's return, and for whom he could not make a competent provision without his majesty's bounty; and therefore he hoped, that before his majesty required the signet, he would cause the recompense he designed to be more than what he had mentioned, and to be first paid."

This province could not be put into a fitter hand, for it was managed with notable skill. And as soon as it was known that the secretary would willingly resign, which was feared, and that only a better recompense was expected, every body was willing that the king should [make] the act look as graciously as might be, that the successor might be attended with the less envy. And Mr. Ashburnham cultivated their impatience so skillfully, that it cost the king, in present money and land or lease, very little less than twenty thousand pounds, to bring in a servant whom very few cared for, in the place of an old servant whom every body loved: and he received all that was promised, before he resigned his place. And if the change had been as good for the king, as it was for the good old secretary, every body would have been glad. And thus sir Harry Bennet was at the king's charge accommodated, even to the satisfaction of his own ambition: and his majesty was as well pleased, that he had gotten sir Charles Berkley into the other office about his person, whom he every day loved with more passion, for what reason no man knew nor could imagine.

And from this time they who stood at any near distance could not but discern, that the chancellor's interest and credit with the king manifestly declined: not that either of these two pretended to be his rival, or appeared to cross any thing in council that he proposed or advised; on the contrary, they both professed great respect towards him. One of them, being no privy counsellor, made great professions and addresses to him by himself, and by some friends who had much credit with him; protested "against meddling at all in business, and that he only hoped to gain a fortune by his majesty's favour, upon which he might be able to live;" nor did it appear afterwards, that he did to his death wish that the chancellor's power should be lessened: and the other made all the professions imaginable of affection and respect to him, and repaired upon occasions to him for advice and for direction. Nor in truth could either of them have done him any prejudice at that time with the king by pretending to do it; but by pretending the contrary by degrees got power to do it.

His majesty did not in the least degree withdraw his favour from him, heard him as willingly, came as often to him, was as little reserved in any thing; only in one particular he did with some solemnity conjure him never to mention it to him again, in which he did not yet punctually obey him, nor avoid seasonably saying any thing to him which he believed to be his duty, and which his majesty never seemed to take ill. And whenever he spake to him of either of the other two gentlemen, which he frequently did with much kindness, he always added somewhat of both their respects and esteem for him, as a thing that pleased him well; and said once, "that it concerned them, for whenever he should discern it to be otherwise, he should make them repent it." Yet notwithstanding all this, from that time counsels were not so secret, and greater liberty taken to talk of the public affairs in the evening conversation, than had been before, when they happened sometimes to be shortly mentioned in the production of some wit or jest; but now they were often taken into debate, and censured with too much liberty with reference to things and persons; and the king himself was less fixed and more irresolute in his counsels; and inconvenient grants came every day to the seal for the benefit of particular persons, against which the king had particularly resolved, and at last by importunity would have passed. Lastly, both these persons were most devoted to the lady, and much depended upon her interest, and consequently were ready to do any thing that would be grateful to her.

There was another mischief contrived about this time, that had a much worse influence upon the public, except we shall call it the same, because it did in truth proceed from it. Though the public state of affairs, in respect of the distempers and discomposures which are mentioned before, and that the expenses exceeded what was assigned to support it, whereby the great debt was little diminished, yielded little delight to those who were most trusted to manage and provide for them, and who had a melancholic and dreadful apprehension of consequences: yet whilst the nation continued in peace, and without any danger from any foreign enemy, that the prospect was so pleasant, especially to those who stood at a distance, that they saw nothing worthy of any man's fear; and there was reasonable hope, that the expenses might every year be reduced within reasonable [bounds]. But all that hope vanished, when there appeared an immoderate desire to engage the nation in a war.

Upon the king's first arrival in England, he manifested a very great desire to improve the general traffick and trade of the kingdom, and upon all occasions, conferred with the most active merchants upon it, and offered all that he could contribute to the advancement thereof. He erected a council of trade, which produced little other effect than the opportunity of men's speaking together, which possibly disposed them to think more, and to consult more effectually in private, than they could in such a crowd of commissioners. Some merchants and seamen made a proposition by Mr. William Coventry and some few others to the duke of York, "for the erection of a company in which they desired his royal highness to preside," (and from thence it was called the Royal Company,) "to which his majesty should grant the sole trade of Guinea, which in a short time they presumed would bring great advantage to the public, and much profit to the adventurers, who should begin upon a joint stock, to be managed by a council of such as should be chosen out of the adventurers."

This privilege had before the troubles [been] granted by the late king to sir Nicholas Crisp and others named by him, who had at their own charge sent ships thither: and sir Nicholas had at his own charge bought a nook of ground, that lay into the sea, of the true owners thereof, (all that coast being inhabited by heathens,) and built thereon a good fort and warehouses, under which the ships lay; and he had advanced this trade so far before the troubles, that he found it might be carried on with very great benefit. After the rebellion began, and sir Nicholas betook himself to serve the king, some merchants continued the trade, and either by his consent or Cromwell's power had the possession of that fort, called Cormantine; which was still in the possession of the English when his majesty returned, though the trade was small, in respect the Dutch had fixed a stronger quarter at no great distance from it, and sent much more ships and commodities thither, and returned once every year to their own country with much wealth. The chief end of this trade was, besides the putting off great quantities of our own manufactures according as the trade should advance, to return with gold, which that coast produced in good quantity, and with slaves, blacks, which were readily sold to any plantation at great prices.

The model was so well prepared, and the whole method for governing the trade so rationally proposed, that the duke was much pleased with it, and quickly procured a charter to be granted from the king to this company with ample privileges, and his majesty himself to become an adventurer, and, which was more, to assist them for the first establishment of their trade with the use of some of his own ships. The duke was the governor of the company, with power to make a deputy: all the other officers and council were chosen by the company, which consisted of persons of honour and quality, every one of which brought in five hundred pounds for the first joint stock, with which they set out the first ships; upon the return whereof they received so much encouragement and benefit, that they compounded with sir Nicholas Crisp for his propriety in the fort and castle; and possessed themselves of another place upon the coast, and sent many ships thither, which made very good returns, by putting off their blacks at the Barbadoes and other the king's plantations at their own prices, and brought home such store of gold that administered the first occasion for the coinage of those pieces, which from thence had the denomination of guineas; and what was afterwards made of the same species, was coined of the gold that was brought from that coast by the royal company. In a word, if that company be not broken or disordered by the jealousy that the gentlemen adventurers have of the merchants, and their opinion that they understand the mysteries of trade as well as the other, by which they refuse to concur in the necessary expedients proposed by the other, and interpose unskilful overtures of their own with pertinacy, it will be found a model equally to advance the trade of England with that of any other company, even that of the East Indies.

From the first entrance into this trade, which the duke was exceedingly disposed to advance, and was constantly present himself at all councils, which were held once a week in his own lodgings at Whitehall, it was easily discovered that the Dutch had a better trade there than the English, which they were then willing to believe that they had no right to, for that the trade was first found out and settled there by the English; which was a sufficient foundation to settle it upon this nation, and to exclude all others, at least by the same law that the Spaniard enjoys the West Indies, and the Dutch what they or the Portuguese possessed in the East. But this they quickly found would not establish such a title as would bear a dispute: the having sent a ship or two thither, and built a little fort, could not be allowed such a possession as would exclude all other nations. And the truth was, the Dutch were there some time before us, and the Dane before either: and the Dutch, which was the true grievance, had planted themselves more advantageously, upon the bank of a river, than we had done; and by the erection of more forts were more strongly seated, and drove a much greater trade, which they did not believe they would be persuaded to quit. This drew the discourse from the right to the easiness, by the assistance of two or three of the king's ships; to take away all that the Dutch possessed in and about Guinea, there having never been a ship of war seen in those parts; so that the work might be presently done, and such an alliance made with the natives, who did not love the Dutch, that the English [might] be unquestionably possessed of the whole trade of that country, which would be of inestimable profit to the kingdom.

The merchants took much delight to enlarge themselves upon this argument, and shortly after to discourse "of the infinite benefit that would accrue from a barefaced war against the Dutch, how easily they might be subdued, and the trade carried by the English. That Cromwell had always beaten them, and thereby gotten the greatest glory he had, and brought them upon their knees; and could totally have subdued them, if he had not thought it more for his interest to have such a second, whereby he might the better support his usurpation against the king. And therefore, after they had consented to all the infamous conditions of the total abandoning his majesty, and as far as in them lay to the extirpation of all the royal family, and to a perpetual exclusion of the prince of Orange, he made a firm peace with them; which they had not yet performed, by their retaining still the island of Poleroone, which they had so long since barbarously taken from the English, and which they had expressly promised and undertaken to deliver in the last treaty, after Cromwell had compelled them to pay a great sum of money for the damages which the English had sustained at Amboyna, when all the demands and threats from king James could never procure any satisfaction for that foul action."

These discourses, often reiterated in season and out of season, made a very deep impression in the duke; who having been even from his childhood in the command in armies, and in his nature inclined to the most difficult and dangerous enterprises, was already weary of having so little to do, and too impatiently longed for any war, in which he knew he could not but have the chief command. But these kind of debates, nor the place in which they were made, could contribute little to an affair of so huge an importance, other than by inciting the duke, which they did too much, to consider and affect it, and to dispose others who were near him to inculcate the same thoughts into him, as an argument in which his honour would be much exalted in the eye of all the world: and to the good offices they were enough disposed by the restlessness and unquietness of their own natures, and by many other motives for the accomplishing their own designs, and getting more power into their own hands.

But there was lately, very lately, a peace fully concluded with the States General upon the same terms, articles, and conditions, which they had formerly yielded to Cromwell, being very much more advantageous than they had ever granted in any treaty to the crown. And at the time of the conclusion of the peace, they delivered their orders from the States General and their East India company for the delivery of the island of Poleroone to the English, and which Cromwell himself had extorted from them with the greatest difficulty: so that there was now no colour of justice to make a war upon them. Besides that there were at present great jealousies from Spain upon the marriage with Portugal; nor did France, which had broken promise in making a treaty with Holland, make any haste to renew the treaty with England. And therefore it could not but seem strange to all men, that when we had only made a treaty of peace with Holland, and that so newly, and upon so long consideration, and had none with either of the crowns, we should so much desire to enter into a war with them.

However, the duke's heart was set upon it, and he loved to speak of it, and the benefits which would attend it. He spake of it to the king, whom he found no ways inclined to it, and therefore he knew it was unfit to propose it in council: yet he spake often of it to such of the lords of whom he had the best opinion, and found many of them to concur with him in the opinion of the advantages which might arise from thence. And sometimes he thought he left the king disposed to it, by an argument which he found prevailed with many: "that the differences and jealousies in point of trade, which did every day fall out and would every day increase between the English and the Dutch, who had in the late distractions gotten great advantages, would unavoidably produce a war between them; and then that the question only was, whether it were not better for us to begin it now, when they do not expect it, and we are better prepared for it than probably we shall be then; or to stay two or three years, in which the same jealousy would provoke them to be well provided, when probably we might not be ready. That we had the best sea officers in the world, many of whom had often beaten the Dutch, and knew how to do it again; and a multitude of excellent mariners and common seamen: all which, if they found that nothing would be done at home, would disperse themselves in merchant voyages to the Indies and the Straits; and probably so many good men would never be found together again."

And with such arguments he many times thought that he left the king much moved: but when he spake to him again (though he knew that he had no kindness for the Dutch) his majesty was changed, and very averse to a war; which he imputed to the chancellor, who had not dissembled, as often as his highness spake to him, to be passionately and obstinately against it. And he did take all the opportunities he could find to confirm the king in his aversion to it, who was in his heart averse from it, by presenting to him the state of his own affairs, "the great debt that yet lay upon him, which with peace and good husbandry might be in some time paid; but a war would involve him in so much greater, that no man could see the end of it. That he would be able to preserve himself against the factions and distempers in his own kingdom, and probably suppress them, if he were without a foreign enemy: but if he should be engaged in a war abroad, his domestic divisions, especially those in religion, would give him more trouble than he could well struggle withal."

"That it was an erroneous assumption, that the Dutch would be better provided for a war two or three years hence, and his majesty worse, for which there was no reason. That within that time it would be his own fault, if the distempers in his three kingdoms were not composed, which would make him much fitter for a war; whereas now neither of them could be said to be in peace, that of Ireland being totally unsettled, and that of Scotland not yet well pleased, and England far from it. That in that time it was very probable that the two crowns would be again engaged in a war; since it was generally believed, and with great reason, that France only expected the death of the king of Spain, who was very infirm, and meant then to fall into Flanders, having at the same time with great expense provided great magazines of corn and hay upon the borders, which could be for no other end. That whilst he continued in peace, his friendship would be valuable to all the princes of Europe, and the two crowns would strive who should gain him: but if he engaged in a war, and in such a war as [that with] Holland, which would interrupt and disturb all the trade of the kingdom, upon which the greatest part of his revenue did rise; all other princes would look on, and not much esteem any offices he could perform to them. And lastly, that a little time might possibly administer a just occasion of a war, which at present there was not."

These, and better arguments which the king's own understanding suggested to him, made him fully resolve against the war, and to endeavour to change his brother from affecting it, which wrought not at all upon him; but finding that many things fell from the king in the argument, which had been alleged to himself by the chancellor, he concluded the mischief came from him, and was displeased accordingly, and complained to his wife, "that her father should oppose him in an affair upon which he knew his heart was so much set, and of which every body took so much notice;" which troubled her very much. And she very earnestly desired her father, "that he would no more oppose the duke in that matter." He answered her, "that she did not enough understand the consequence of that affair; but that he would take notice to the duke of what she had said, and give him the best answer he could." And accordingly he waited upon the duke, who very frankly confessed to him, "that he took it very unkindly, that he should so positively endeavour to cross a design so honourable in itself, so much desired by the city of London; and he was confident would be very grateful to the parliament, and that they would supply the king with money enough to carry it on, which would answer the chief objection. That he was engaged to pursue it, and he could not but be sorry and displeased, that every body should see how little credit he had with him."

The chancellor told him, "that he had no apprehension that any sober man in England, or his highness himself, should believe that he could fail in his duty to him, or that he would omit any opportunity to make it manifest, which he could never do without being a fool or a madman. On the other hand, he could never give an advice, or consent to it whoever gave it, which in his judgment and conscience would be very mischievous to the crown and to the kingdom, though his royal highness or the king himself were inclined to it." He did assure him, "that he found the king very averse from any thought of this war, before he ever discovered his own opinion of it;" but denied not, "that he had taken all opportunities to confirm him in that judgment by arguments that he thought could not be answered; and that the consequence of that war would be very pernicious. That he did presume that many good men, with whom he had conferred, did seem to concur with his highness out of duty to him, and as they saw it would be grateful to him, or upon a sudden, and without making those reflections which would afterwards occur to them, and make them change their minds. That a few merchants, nor all the merchants in London, were [not] the city of London, which had had war enough, and could only become rich by peace. That he did not think the parliament would be forward to encourage that war; nor should the king be desirous that they should interpose their advice in it, since it was a subject entirely in the king's own determination: but if they should appear never so forward in it, he was old enough to remember when a parliament did advise, and upon the matter compel, his grandfather king James to enter into a war with Spain, upon promise of ample supplies; and yet when he was engaged in it, they gave him no more supply; so that at last the crown was compelled to accept of a peace not very honourable."

Beside the arguments he had used to the king, he besought his highness to reflect upon some others more immediately relating to himself, "upon the want of able men to conduct the counsels upon which such a war must be carried on; how few accidents might expose the crown to those distresses, that it might with more difficulty be buoyed up than it had lately been;" with many other arguments, which he thought made some impression upon the duke. And for some months there was no more mention or discourse in the court of the war; though they who first laid the design still cultivated it, and made little [doubt] of bringing it at last to pass.

At or about this time there was a transaction of great importance, which at the time was not popular nor indeed understood, and afterwards was objected against the chancellor in his misfortunes, as a principal argument of his infidelity and corruption; which was the sale of Dunkirk: the whole proceeding whereof shall be plainly and exactly related from the beginning to the end thereof.

The charge and expense the crown was at; the pay of the land forces and garrisons; the great fleets set out to sea for the reduction of the Turkish pirates of Algiers and Tunis, and for guarding the narrow seas, and security of the merchants; the constant yearly charge of the garrison of Dunkirk, of that at Tangier, and the vast expense of building a mole there, for which there was an establishment, together with the garrisons at Bombayne and in Jamaica, (none of which had been known to the crown in former times;) and the lord treasurer's frequent representation of all this to the king, as so prodigious an expense as could never be supported; had put his majesty to frequent consultations how he might lessen and save any part of it. But no expedient could be resolved upon. The lord treasurer, who was most troubled when money was wanted, had many secret conferences with the general and with the best seamen, of the benefit that accrued to the crown by keeping of Dunkirk; the constant charge and expense whereof amounted to above one hundred and twenty thousand pounds yearly: and he found by them that it was a place of little importance. It is true that he had conferred of it with the chancellor, with whom he held a fast friendship; but found him so averse from it, that he resolved to speak with him no more, till the king had taken some resolution. And to that purpose he persuaded the general to go with him to the king and to the duke of York, telling them both, "that the chancellor must know nothing of it:" and after several debates the king thought it so counsellable a thing, that he resolved to have it debated before that committee which he trusted in his most secret affairs; and the chancellor being then lame of the gout, he commanded that all those lords should attend him at his house. Beside his majesty himself and the duke of York, there appeared the lord treasurer, the general, the earl of Sandwich, the vice-chamberlain sir George Carteret, who had been a great commander at sea, and the two secretaries of state. When the king entered the room with the lord treasurer, he desired his majesty, smiling, "that he would take the chancellor's staff from him, otherwise he would break his head." When they were all sat, the king told him, "they were all come to debate an affair that he knew he was against, which was the parting with Dunkirk; but he did believe, when he had heard all that was said for it and against it, he would change his mind, as he himself had done." And so the debate was entered into in this method, after enough was said of the straits the crown was in, and what the yearly expense was.

1. "That the profit which did or could accrue to the kingdom by the keeping of Dunkirk was very inconsiderable, whether in war or peace. That by sea it was very little useful, it being no harbour, nor having place for the king's ships to ride in with safety; and that if it were in the hand of an enemy, it could do us little prejudice, because three or four ships might block it up, and keep it from infesting its neighbours: and that though heretofore it had been a place of license at sea, and had much obstructed trade by their men of war, yet that proceeded only from the unskilfulness of that time in applying proper remedies to it; which was manifested by Cromwell's blocking them up, and restraining them when he made war upon them, insomuch as all the men of war left that place, and betook themselves to other harbours. That it was so weak to the land (notwithstanding the great charge his majesty had been at in the fortifications, which were not yet finished) by the situation and the soil, that it required as many men within to defend it, as the army should consist of that besieged it; otherwise that it could never hold out and endure a siege of two months: as it appeared clearly by its having been taken and retaken so many times within the late years, in all which times it never held out so long, though there was always an army at no great distance to relieve it.

2. "That the charge of keeping and maintaining it, without any accidents from the attempt of an enemy, did amount unto above one hundred and twenty thousand pounds by the year, which was a sum the revenue of the crown could not supply, without leaving many other particulars of much more importance unprovided for." And this was not lightly or cursorily urged; but the state of the revenue, and the constant and indispensable issues, were at the same time presented and carefully examined.

3. "It could not reasonably be believed, but that if Dunkirk was kept, his majesty would be shortly involved in a war with one of the two crowns. The Spanish ambassador had already demanded restitution of it in point of justice, it having been taken from his master by the late usurper, in a time when there was not only a peace between his majesty and the king of Spain, but when his majesty resided, and was entertained by the catholic king, in Flanders: and at this time both France and Spain inhibited their subjects from paying those small contributions to the garrison at Dunkirk, and endeavoured to restrain the governor himself from enjoying some privileges, which had been always enjoyed by him from the time that it had been put into Cromwell's hands." And it was upon this and many other reasons then conceived, that as it would be very hard for the king to preserve a neutrality towards both crowns, even during the time of the war between them, (which temper was thought very necessary for his majesty's affairs;) "so it would be much more difficult long to avoid a war with one of them upon the keeping Dunkirk, if the peace that was newly made should remain firm and unshaken."

Upon these reasons, urged and agreed upon by those who could not but be thought very competent judges, in respect of their several professions and great experience, the king resolved to ease himself of the insupportable burden of maintaining Dunkirk, and to part with it in such a manner as might be most for his advantage and benefit. There remained then no other question, than into what hand to put it: and the measure of that was only who would give most money for it, their being no inclination to prefer one before another. It was enough understood, that both crowns would be very glad to have it, and would probably both make large offers for it. But it was then as evident, that whatsoever France should contract for, the king would be sure to receive, and the business would be soon despatched: whereas on the other hand it was as notorious and evident to his majesty, and to all who had any knowledge of the court of Spain, and of the scarcity of money there and in Flanders; that how large offers soever the Spaniard might make, they could not be able in any time to pay any considerable sum of money; and that there would be so much time spent in consult between Madrid and Brussels before it could be despatched, that the keeping it so long in his majesty's hands would in the expense disappoint him of a good part of the end in parting with it. Besides that it seemed at that time probable, that the Spaniard would shortly declare himself an enemy; for besides that he demanded Dunkirk as of right, so he likewise required the restitution of Tangier and Jamaica upon the same reason, and declared, "that without it there could be no lasting peace between England and Spain," and refused so much as to enter upon a treaty of alliance with the king, before he should promise to make such a restitution.

There wanted not in this conference and debate the consideration of the States of the United Provinces, as persons like enough to desire the possession of Dunkirk, from whence they had formerly received so much damage, and were like enough to receive more whenever they should be engaged in any war: and if in truth they should have any such desire, more money might be reasonably required, and probably be obtained from them, than could be expected from either of the kings. But upon the discussion of that point, it did appear to every man's reason very manifest, that though they had rather that Dunkirk should be put into the hands of the Spaniard than delivered to France, or than it should be detained by the English; yet they durst not receive it into their own possession, which neither of the two crowns would have approved of, and so it would have exposed them to the displeasure, if not to the hostility, of both the kings.

Upon this full deliberation, his majesty inclined rather to give it up to France than to Spain; but deferred any positive resolution till he had imparted the whole matter to the council-board, where the debate was again resumed, principally, "whether it were more counsellable to keep it at so vast a charge, or to part with it for a good sum of money." And in that debate the mention of what had been heretofore done in the house of commons upon that subject was not omitted, nor the bill that they had sent up to the house of peers for annexing it inseparably to the crown: but that was not thought of moment; for as it had been suddenly entertained in the house of commons, upon the Spanish ambassador's first proposition for the restitution, so it was looked upon in the house of peers as unfit in itself, and so laid aside after once being read, (which had been in the first convention soon after the king's return,) and so expired as soon as it was born. After a long debate of the whole matter at the council-board, where all was averred concerning the uselessness and weakness of the place, by those who had said it at the committee; there was but one lord of the council who offered his advice to the king against parting with it: and the ground of that lord's dissenting, who was the earl of St. Alban's, was enough understood to have nothing of public in it, but to draw the negotiation for it into his own hands. In conclusion, his majesty resolved to put it into the hands of France, if that king would comply with his majesty's expectation in the payment of so much money as he would require for it: and a way was found out, that the king might privately be advertised of that his majesty's resolution, if he should have any desire to deal for it.

The advertisement was very welcome to the French king, who was then resolved to visit Flanders as soon as he should know of the death of the king of Spain, which was expected every day. Nor had he deferred it till then, upon the late affront his ambassador had received at London from the Spanish ambassador, (who by a contrived and laboured stratagem had got the precedence for his coach before the other; which the king of France received with that indignation, that he sent presently to demand justice at Madrid, commanded his ambassador to retire from thence, and would not suffer the Spanish ambassador to remain in Paris till he should have satisfaction, and was resolved to have begun a war upon it,) if the king of Spain had not acknowledged the fault of his ambassador, and under his hand declared the precedence to belong to France; which declaration was sent to the courts of all princes: and so for the present that spark of fire was extinguished, or rather raked up.

The king sent M. D'Estrades privately to London to treat about Dunkirk, without any character, but pretending to make it his way to Holland, whither he was designed ambassador. After he had waited upon the king, his majesty appointed four or five of the lords of his council, whereof the chancellor and treasurer and general were three, to treat with M. D'Estrades for the sale of Dunkirk; when the first conference was spent in endeavouring to persuade him to make the first offer for the price, which he could not be drawn to: so that the king's commissioners were obliged to make their demand. And they asked the sum of seven hundred thousand pounds sterling, to be paid upon the delivery of Dunkirk and Mardike into the possession of the king of France; which sum appeared to him to be so stupendous, that he seemed to think the treaty at an end, and resolved to make no offer at all on the part of his master. And so the conference brake up.

At the next meeting he offered three millions of livres, which according to the common account amounted to three hundred thousand pistoles, which the king's commissioners as much undervalued; so that any further conference was discontinued, till he had sent an express or two into France, and till their return: for as the expectation of a great sum of ready money was the king's motive to part with it, besides the saving the monthly charge; so they concluded that his necessities would oblige him to part with it at a moderate price. And after the return of the expresses, the king's commissioners insisting still upon what D'Estrades thought too much, and he offering what they thought too little, the treaty seemed to be at an end, and he prepared for his return. In conclusion, his majesty being fully as desirous to part with it as the king of France could be to have it, it was agreed and concluded, "that upon the payment of five hundred thousand pistoles in specie at Calais to such persons as the king should appoint to receive it, his majesty's garrison of Dunkirk and Mardike should be withdrawn, and those places put into the hands of the king of France;" all which was executed accordingly. And without doubt it was a greater sum of money than was ever paid at one payment by any prince in Christendom, upon what occasion soever; and every body seemed very glad to see so vast a sum of money delivered into the Tower of London, as it was all together; the king at the same time declaring, "that no part of it should be applied to any ordinary occasion, but be preserved for some pressing accident, as an insurrection or the like," which was reasonably enough apprehended.

Nor was [there] the least murmur at this bargain in all the sessions of the parliament which sat after, until it fell out to some men's purposes to reproach the chancellor: and then they charged him "with advising the sale of Dunkirk, and that the very artillery, ammunition, and stores amounted to a greater value than the king received for the whole;" when upon an estimate that had been of all those, they were not esteemed to be more worth than twenty thousand pounds sterling; and the consideration of those, when the king's commissioners insisted upon their being all shipped for England, and the necessity of keeping them upon the place where they were, had prevailed with M. D'Estrades to consent to that sum of five hundred thousand pistoles. But whether the bargain was ill or well made, there could be no fault imputed to the chancellor, who had no more to do in the transaction than is before set down, the whole matter having been so long deliberated and so fully debated. Nor did he ever before, or in, or after the transaction, receive the value of half a crown for reward or present, or any other consideration relating to that affair: and the treatment he received after his coming into France was evidence enough, that that king never thought himself beholden to him.

A little before this time, the queen mother returned again for England, having disbursed a great sum of money in making a noble addition to her palace of Somerset-house. With the queen there came over a youth of about ten or a dozen years of age, who was called by the name of Mr. Crofts, because the lord Crofts had been trusted to take care of his breeding; but he was generally thought to be the king's son, begotten upon a private Welch woman of no good fame, but handsome, who had transported herself to the Hague, when the king was first there, with a design to obtain that honour, which a groom of the bed-chamber willingly preferred her to; and there it was this boy was born. The mother lived afterwards for some years in France in the king's sight, and at last lost his majesty's favour: yet the king desired to have the son delivered to him, that he might take care of his education, which she would not consent to. At last the lord Crofts got him into his charge; and the mother dying at Paris, he had the sole tuition of him, and took care for the breeding him suitable to the quality of a very good gentleman. And the queen after some years came to know of it, and frequently had him brought to her, and used him with much grace; and upon the king's desire brought him with her from Paris into England, when he was about twelve years of age, very handsome, and performed those exercises gracefully which youths of that age used to learn in France. The king received him with extraordinary fondness, and was willing that every body should believe him to be his son, though he did not yet make any declaration that he looked upon him as such, otherwise than by his kindness and familiarity towards him. He assigned a liberal maintenance for him; but took not that care for a strict breeding of [him] as his age required.

The general, during the time of his command in Scotland, had acquaintance with a lady of much honour there, the countess of Weemes, who had been before the wife of the earl of Buccleugh, and by him had one only daughter, who inherited his very great estate and title, and was called the countess of Buccleugh, a child of eight or ten years of age. All men believed, that the general's purpose was to get this lady for his own son, a [match] suitable enough: but the time being now changed, the lord Lautherdale, being a good courtier, thought his countrywoman might be much better married, if she were given to the king for this youth, towards whom he expressed so much fondness, those kinds of extractions carrying little disadvantage with them in Scotland; and the general, whatever thoughts he had before, would not be so ill a courtier as not to advance such a proposition. The lady was already in possession of the greatest fortune in Scotland, which would have a fair addition upon the death of her mother.

The king liked the motion well; and so the mother was sent to, to bring up her daughter to London, they being then both in Scotland. And when they came, the king trusted the earl of Lautherdale principally to treat that affair with the mother, who had rather have been referred to any other body, having indeed some just exceptions. They were both yet under the years of consent; but that time drawing on, such a contract was drawn up as had been first proposed to the king, which was, "that the whole estate, for want of issue by the young lady, or by her death, should be devolved upon the young man who was to marry her, and his heirs forever; and that this should be settled by act of parliament in Scotland." Matters being drawn to this length, and writings being to be prepared, it was now necessary that this young gentleman must have a name, and the Scots advocate had prepared a draught, in which he was styled the king's natural son: and the king was every day pressed by the great lady, and those young men who knew the customs of France, to create him a nobleman of England; and was indeed very willing to be advised to that purpose.

Till this time, this whole matter was treated in secret amongst the Scots: but now the king thought fit to consult it with others; and telling the chancellor of all that had passed, shewed him the draught prepared by the Scots advocate, and asked him "what he thought of it," and likewise implied, "that he thought fit to give him some

"title of honour." After he had read it over, he told his majesty, "that he need not give him any other title of honour than he would enjoy by his marriage, by which he would by the law of Scotland be called earl of Buccleugh, which would be title enough; and he desired his majesty to pardon him, if he found fault with and disliked the title they had given him who prepared that draught, wherein they had presumed to style him the king's natural son, which was never, at least in many ages, used in England, and would have an ill sound in England with all his people, who thought that those unlawful acts ought to be concealed, and not published and justified. That France indeed had, with inconvenience enough to the crown, raised some families of those births; but it was always from women of great quality, and who had never been tainted with any other familiarity. And that there was another circumstance required in Spain, which his majesty should do well to observe in this case, if he had taken a resolution in the main; which was, that the king took care for the good education of that child whom he believed to be his, but never publicly owned or declared him to be such, till he had given some notable evidence of his inheriting or having acquired such virtues and qualities, as made him in the eyes of all men worthy of such a descent. That this gentleman was yet young, and not yet to be judged of: and therefore if he were for the present married to this young lady, and assumed her title, as he must do, his majesty might defer for some years making any such declaration; which he might do when he would, and which at present would be as unpopular an action in the hearts of his subjects as he could commit."

Though the king did not seem to concur in all that was said, he did not appear at all offended, and only asked him, "whether he had not conferred with the queen his mother upon that subject." When he assured him, "he had not, nor with any other person, and though he had heard some general discourse of his majesty's purpose to make that marriage, he had never heard either of the other particulars mentioned;" the king said, "he had reason to ask the question, 'because many of those things which he had said had been spoken to him by the queen his mother, who was entirely of his opinion, which she used not to be;' and concluded, 'that he would confer with them together,' seeming for the present to be more moved and doubtful in the matter of the declaration, than in the other of the creation; and said, 'there was no reason, since she brought all the estate, that she should receive no addition by her husband.' The queen afterwards took an occasion to speak at large to the chancellor of it with much warmth, and manifestation that she did not like it. But the king spake with neither of them afterwards upon it, but signed the declaration, and created him to be duke of Monmouth; very few persons dissuading it, and the lady employing all her credit to bring it to pass: and the earl of Bristol (who in those difficult cases was usually consulted) pressed it as the only way to make the king's friendship valuable.

Since the earl of Bristol is mentioned upon this occasion, it will not be unseasonable to give him the next part in this relation. Though he had left no way unattempted to render himself gracious to the king, by saying and doing all that might be acceptable unto him, and contriving such meetings and jollities as he was pleased with; and though his majesty had been several ways very bountiful to him, and had particularly given him at one time ten thousand pounds in money, with which he had purchased Wimbleton of the queen, and had given him Ashdown-forest and other lands in Sussex: yet he found he had not that degree of favour and interest in the king's affections, as he desired, or desired that other people should think he had. The change of his religion kept him from being admitted to the council, or to any employment of moment. And whereas he made no doubt of drawing the whole dependance of the Roman catholics upon himself, and to have the disposal of that interest, and to that purpose had the Jesuits firm to him; he found that he had no kind of credit with them, nor was admitted by them to their most secret consultations, and that the fathers of the society had more enemies than friends amongst the catholics.

His estate had been sold and settled by his own consent, upon the marriage of his eldest son twice to great fortunes: so that when he returned from beyond the seas, he could not return to his estate as others did, and had little more to subsist upon than the king's bounty; and that was not poured out upon him in the measure he wished, though few persons tasted more of it. He was in his nature very covetous, and ready to embrace all ways that were offered to get money, whether honourable or no, for he had not a great power over himself, and could not bear want, which he could hardly avoid, for he was nothing provident in his expenses, when he had any temptation from his ambition or vanity. Besides, his appetite to play and gaming, in which he had no skill, and by which he had all his life spent whatever he could get, was not at all abated. He spent as much money at Wimbleton in building and gardening, as the land was worth.

By all these means he found himself in straits, which he could neither endure nor get from, and which transported him to that degree, that he resolved to treat the king in another manner than he had ever yet presumed to do. And having asked somewhat of him that his majesty did not think fit to grant, he told him, "he knew well the cause of his withdrawing his favour from him; that it proceeded only from the chancellor, who governed him and managed all his affairs, whilst himself spent his time only in pleasures and debauchery;" and in this passion upbraided him with many excesses, to which no man had contributed more than he had done. He said many truths which ought to have been more modestly and decently mentioned, and all this in the presence of the lord Aubigny, who was as much surprised as the king; and concluded, "that if he did [not give him satisfaction] within such a time," (the time allowed did not exceed four and twenty hours,) "he would do somewhat that would awaken him out of his slumber, and make him look better to his own business;" and added many threats against the chancellor. The king stood all this time in such confusion, that though he gave him more sharp words than were natural to him, he had not that presentness of mind (as he afterwards accused himself) as he ought to have had; and said, "he ought presently to have called for the guard," it being in his own closet, "and sent him to the Tower."

The court and the town was full of the discourse that the earl of Bristol would accuse the chancellor of high treason, who knew nothing of what had passed with the king. And it seems when the time was past that he prescribed to the king to give him satisfaction, he came one morning to the house of peers with a paper in his hand; and told the lords, "that he could not but observe, that after so glorious a return with which God had blessed the king and the nation, so that all the world had expected, that the prosperity of the kingdom would have far exceeded the misery and adversity that it had for many years endured; and after the parliament had contributed more towards it, than ever parliament had done: notwithstanding all which, it was evident to all men, and lamented by those who wished well to his majesty, that his affairs grew every day worse and worse; the king himself lost much of his honour, and the affection he had in the hearts of the people. That for his part he looked upon it with as much sadness as any man, and had made inquiry as well as he could from whence this great misfortune, which every body was sensible of, could proceed; and that he was satisfied in his own conscience, that it proceeded principally from the power and credit and sole credit of the chancellor: and therefore he was resolved, for the good of his country, to accuse the lord chancellor of high treason; which he had done in the paper which he desired might be read, all written with his own hand, to which he subscribed his name."

The paper contained many articles, which he called Articles of High Treason and other Misdemeanors; amongst which one was, "that he had persuaded the king to send a gentleman (a creature of his own) to Rome with letters to the pope, to give a cardinal's cap to the lord Aubigny, who was almoner to the queen." The rest contained "his assuming to himself the government of all public affairs, which he had administered unskilfully, corruptly, and traitorously; which he was ready to prove."

The chancellor, without any trouble in his countenance, told the lords, "that he had had the honour heretofore to have so much the good opinion and friendship of that lord, that he durst appeal to his own conscience, that he did not himself believe one of those articles to be true, and knew the contrary of most of them. And he was glad to find that he thought it so high a crime to send to Rome, and to desire a cardinal's cap for a catholic lord, who had been always bred from his cradle in that faith: but he did assure them, that that gentleman was only sent by the queen to the pope, upon an affair that she thought herself obliged to comply with him in, and in hope to do some good office to Portugal; and that the king had neither writ to the pope, nor to any other person in Rome." He spake at large to most of the articles, to shew the impossibility of their being true, and that they reflected more upon the king's honour than upon his; and concluded, "that he "was sorry that lord had not been better advised, for he did believe that though all that was alleged in the articles should be true, they would not all amount to high treason, upon which he desired the judges might be required to deliver their opinion; the which the lords ordered the judges to do." It was moved by one of the lords, "that the copy of the articles might be sent to the king, because he was mentioned so presumptuously in them;" which was likewise agreed; and the articles were delivered to the lord chamberlain to present to the king.

The chancellor had promised that day to dine in Whitehall, but would not presume to go thither till he had sent to the king, not thinking it fit to go into his court, whilst he lay under an accusation of high treason, without his leave. His majesty sent him word, "that he should dine where he had appointed, and as soon as he had dined that he should attend him." Then his majesty told him and the lord treasurer all that had passed between the earl of Bristol and him in the presence of the lord Aubigny; and in the relation of it expressed great indignation, and was angry with himself, "that he had not immediately sent him to the Tower, which," he said, "he would do as soon as he could apprehend him." He used the chancellor with much grace, and told him, "that the earl of Bristol had not treated him so ill as he had done his majesty; and that his articles were more to his dishonour, and reflected more upon him, for which he would have justice."

His majesty commanded the lord chamberlain to return his thanks to the house, "for the respect they had shewed to him in sending those articles to him;" and to let them know, "that he looked upon them as a libel against himself more than a charge against the chancellor, who upon his knowledge was innocent in all the particulars charged upon him;" which report the lord chamberlain made the next morning to the house; and at the same time the judges declared their opinion unanimously, "that the whole charge contained nothing of treason though it were all true." Upon which the earl of Bristol, especially upon what the lord chamberlain had reported from the king, appeared in great confusion, and lamented his condition, "that he, for endeavouring to serve his country upon the impulsion of his conscience, was discountenanced, and threatened with the anger and displeasure of his prince; whilst his adversary kept his place in the house, and had the judges so much at his devotion that they would not certify against him." The chancellor moved the house, "that a short day might be given to the earl, to bring in his evidence to prove the several matters of his charge; otherwise that he might have such reparation, as was in their judgments proportionable to the indignity." The earl said, "he should not fail to produce witnesses to prove all he had alleged, and more: but that he could not appoint a time when he could be ready for a hearing, because many of his most important witnesses were beyond the seas, some at Paris, and others in other places; and that he must examine the duke of Ormond, who was lieutenant in Ireland, and the earl of Lautherdale, who was then in Scotland, and must desire commissions to that purpose."

But from that day he made no further instance : and understanding that the king had given warrants to a sergeant at arms to apprehend him, he concealed himself in several places for the space of near two years ; sending sometimes letters and petitions by his wife to the king, who would not receive them. But in the end his majesty was prevailed with by the lady and sir Harry Bennet to see him in private ; but would not admit him to come to the court, nor repeal his warrants for his apprehension : so that he appeared not publicly till the chancellor's misfortune ; and then he came to the court and to the parliament in great triumph, and shewed a more impotent malice than was expected from his generosity and understanding.

We shall in the next place take a view of Scotland, whither we left Middleton sent the king's commissioner, who performed his part with wonderful dexterity and conduct, and with more success than some of his countrymen were pleased with. We have remembered before the debate upon his instructions, and the earnest advice and caution given by Lautherdale against any hasty attempt to make alteration in the matters of the church, which was at last left to the discretion of the commissioner, to proceed in such a manner, and at such a time, as he found most convenient. As soon as he came thither, he found himself received with as universal an exclamation, and the king's authority as cheerfully submitted to, as can be imagined or could be wished ; and such a consent to every thing he proposed, that he made no question but any thing his majesty required would find an entire obedience. The earl of Glen-carne, who was chancellor, and the earl of Rothes, and all the nobility of any interest or credit, were not only faithful to the king, but fast friends to Middleton, and magnified his conduct in all their letters.

The earl of Crawford alone, who was treasurer, which is an office that cannot be unattended by a great faction in that kingdom, retained still his rigid affection for the presbytery, when the ministers themselves grew much less rigid, and were even ashamed of the many follies and madnesses they had committed. But the earl of Crawford did all he could to raise their spirits, and to keep them firm to the kirk. In all other particulars he was full of devotion to the king, being entirely of the faction of Hamilton, and nearly allied to it ; and when the king was in Scotland had served him signally, and had then been made by him high treasurer of that kingdom ; and upon Cromwell's prevailing and conjunction with Argyle, was as odious as any man to them both, and had for many years been prisoner in England till the time of the king's return. There was always a great friendship between him and Lautherdale ; the former being a man of much the greater interest, and of unquestionable courage ; the other excelling him in all the faculties which are necessary to business, and a master in dissimulation.

Middleton, and the lords who went with him, and the general, (upon whose advice the king depended as much in the business of Scotland,) were all earnest with his majesty to remove the earl of Crawford from that great office, which would enable him to do mischief. But the king's good-nature prevailed over him, though he knew him as well as they did : and he thought it too hardhearted a thing to remove a man, whom he found a prisoner for his service, from an office he had formerly conferred upon him for his merit, and which he had not forfeited by any miscarriage. And it may be it was some argument to him of his sincerity, that when others, who to his majesty's own knowledge were as rigid presbyterians as he, were now very frank in renouncing and disclaiming all obligations from it, he, of all the nobility, was the only man who still adhered to it, when it was evident to him that he should upon the matter be undone by it. However, the king sent him down with the rest into Scotland, being confident that he would do nothing to disserve him, as in truth he never did ; and that, when the business of the church came to be agitated, if he did continue still refractory, he would take the staff from him, and resolved to confer it upon Middleton : who, though all things were very fair between him and Lautherdale, to whom all his despatches must be addressed, yet depended more upon those of the English council, to whom the king had required the secretary to communicate all that he received from the commissioner, and all the despatches which he should make to him. And by this means no orders were sent from the king which restrained him from proceeding in the matter of the church according to discretion, as he was appointed by his instructions ; though Lautherdale did not dissemble, when letters came from Scotland " of the good posture the king's " affairs were in there, and that any thing might " be brought to pass that he desired," to receive other letters to which he gave more credit ; and was still as solicitous that nothing might be attempted with reference to the kirk.

As soon as the parliament was convened at Edinburgh, and the commissioner found the temper of them to be such as he could wish, the marquis of Argyle (who had been sent by sea from the Tower of London to Leith) was brought to his trial upon many articles of treason and murder ; wherein all his confederacies with Cromwell were laid open, and much insisted upon to prove his being privy to the resolution of taking the king's life, and advising it : and though there was great reason to suspect it, and most men believed it, the proofs were not clear enough to convict him. But then the evidence was so full and clear of so many horrid murders committed by his order upon persons in his displeasure, and his immediate possessing himself of their estates, and other monstrous and unheard of acts of oppression ; that the parliament condemned him to be hanged upon a gallows of an unusual height, and in or near the place where he had caused the marquis of Mountrose to be formerly executed : all which was performed the same day with the universal joy of the people ; the unfortunate person himself shewing more resolution and courage than was expected from him, and expressing much affection and zeal for the covenant, for which he desired all men should believe he was put to death. There was likewise one seditious preacher, Gilasp, who had been a notorious and malicious rebel against the last and the present king, underwent the same trial and judgment, with the same faith in the covenant, and without show of repentance. And it was much wondered at, that no more of that tribe, which had kindled the fire that had almost burned two kingdoms, and never had endeavoured to extinguish it, were ever brought to justice; and that the lives of two men should be thought a sufficient sacrifice for that kingdom to offer for all the mischief it had done.

When this work was done, the parliament without hesitation repealed all those acts prejudicial to the crown and the royal dignity, which had been made since the beginning of the rebellion, and upon which all the rebellions had been founded; and branded their beloved covenant with all the reproaches it deserved, and this even with the consent and approbation of the general assembly of the kirk. By all which the obstructions were removed; and it was now in the power of the king to make bishops as heretofore, and to settle the church in the same government to which it had formerly been subject. But the commissioner thought not this enough; and apprehended that the king might yet be persuaded, though there was no such appearance, "that the people were against it, and that it would be better to defer it:" and therefore the parliament prepared a petition to the king, highly aggravating the wickedness of the former time in destroying episcopacy, without which they could not have brought their wicked devices to pass; and therefore they were humble suitors to his majesty, "that he would make choice of such grave divines, as he thought fit to be consecrated bishops, for all the vacant sees," they being at that time all vacant, there being not one bishop of the nation alive.

And the commissioner having declared that he meant to prorogue the parliament, they appointed a draught of an oath or subscription to be prepared against the next session, whereby every man, who was possessed of a church or any other ecclesiastical promotion in that kingdom, should be bound to renounce the covenant upon the penalty of being deprived; intimating likewise, that they resolved, at the next meeting, "that no man should be capable of holding any office, or of being a privy counsellor, who would not formally subscribe the same."

They settled a standing militia of forty thousand men, to be always ready to march upon the king's orders; and raised two good troops of horse, and provided for the payment of them; and granted such a sum of money to the king, as could be reasonably expected from so poor and harassed a country, and which would serve the defraying the necessary expenses thereof. And all this being done, and the prorogation made, the commissioner and some of the other lords came to London to kiss the king's hand, and to receive his further directions, having so fully despatched all his former orders. They brought likewise with them some other propositions, which will be mentioned anon.

The king received the commissioner with open arms, and was very well pleased with all that he had done; and nobody seemed to magnify it more than Lautherdale, who was least satisfied with it. Nor could he now longer oppose the making of bishops there: so having presented the names of such persons to the king who were thought fit to be consecrated bishops, whereof some had been with his majesty abroad, they were all sent for to London; and such of them who had not before received their ordination from a bishop, but from the presbytery in Scotland, whereof the archbishop of St. Andrew's was one, first received orders of deacon and priest from the bishop of London, and were afterwards consecrated in the usual form by the bishops who were then near the town, and made so great a feast as if it had been at the charge of their country.

The commissioner, the chancellor, the earl of Rothes and others, with the lord Lautherdale, were deputed by the parliament to be humble suitors to the king; "since they had performed on their part all that was of the duty of good subjects, and were ready to give any other testimony of their obedience that his majesty would require; and since the whole kingdom was entirely at his devotion, and in such a posture that they were able as well as willing to preserve the peace thereof, and to suppress any seditious party that should attempt any disturbance; that his majesty would now remove the English garrisons from thence, and permit the fortifications and works, which had been erected at a vast charge, to be demolished, that there might remain no monuments of the slavery they had undergone." And thus they demanded as in justice due to them, "since there were few men now alive, none in the least power, who had contributed to the ills which had been committed; and all the men of power had undergone for ten or a dozen years as great oppression as could be put upon them, because they would not renounce their fidelity to the king: and since it had pleased God to restore his majesty, they hoped he would [not] continue those yokes and shackles upon them, which had been prepared and put upon them to keep them from returning to their allegiance."

This was proposed in the presence of those of the English council, who had been formally admitted to be of the council of Scotland, and continued to meet upon that affair. The Scots lords enlarged with much warmth "upon the intolerable oppression that nation had undergone, on the poverty they still suffered, and the impossibility of being able to bear any part of the charge, and the jealousy that it would keep up between the nations, which could not be to the king's profit and convenience." They had privately spoken before with the king upon it, and had prevailed with him to think what they desired had reason and justice in it; and the English lords could not upon the sudden, and without conference together, resolve what was fit for them to say: so that they desired, without expressing any inclination in the matter, "that the debate might be put off to another day;" which the Scots took very ill, as if the very deferring it were an argument that they thought it might be denied. But when they saw they would not presently speak to it, they were content that another day should be appointed for the consideration of it: and they afterwards desired the king, "that he would call the committee of the English council, who used to attend him in the most secret affairs, to consult what was to be done." Nobody could deny but that the Scots had reason to demand it. And they who thought it a bridle fit to keep in their mouths, to restrain them from future rebellions which they might be inclined to, could not easily resolve what answer should be given to them in the negative. And they who thought the demand to be so just and reasonable, and so much for the king's benefit and advantage, that it ought to be granted, did believe likewise that it was a thing so capable of censure and reproach, in regard of the general prejudice which the English have against that people, that no particular person was able to bear the odium of the advice; nor that the king himself should take the resolution upon himself without very mature deliberation.

That which advanced the proposition as fit to be granted, was the charge of maintaining those forces; which that kingdom was so incapable of bearing, that Middleton and Glencarne (whose duties and entire devotion to the king were above all exception or suspicion) declared not only to the king, but to those of the lords with whom they would confer freely, "that if the king thought it necessary to keep that people still there, he must send more forces of horse and foot thither; otherwise they were not strong enough to subdue the whole kingdom, but would as soon as they stirred out of their garrisons be knocked in the head; nor would the country pay any thing towards their support, but what should be extorted by force: so that his majesty would not be thought to possess that kingdom in peace, which otherwise he would unquestionably do."

And this consideration was improved by the reflection upon the body of men of which those forces consisted, which was a parcel of the worst affected men to the king of the whole army, and which the general had therefore left in Scotland, when he marched into England under the command of major general Morgan, (who was worthy of any trust,) because he was not sure enough of their fidelity to take them with him, yet [thought them] fit enough to be left to restrain the Scots from any sudden insurrection. But now they saw all their model brought to confusion, they were not so much above temptation, but that they might, especially if they were drawn together, concur in any desperate design with a discontented party in Scotland, or with their brethren of the disbanded army of England, who at that season had rebellious resolutions in the north. And that which was of no small importance, there was at this very time an opportunity to transport all those forces (the very disbanding whereof would not be without danger for the reasons aforesaid) to Portugal, in compliance with the king's obligation upon his marriage.

On the contrary, it was very notorious that the people generally throughout England, of what quality soever, a few London presbyterians excepted, were marvellously pleased to see the Scots so admirably chastised and yoked; nor had Cromwell ever done an act that more reconciled the affections of the English to him, than his most rigorous treatment of that nation; and they never contributed money so willingly towards any of his designs, as for the erecting those forts in the several quarters of the kingdom; which, with a little addition of force, they had good experience would suffice to keep it from giving any disturbance to their neighbours. And the demolishing all those structures in one instant, and leaving an unquiet and an impoverished people to their own inclinations, could not be grateful.

The king had, during the time that he resided in Scotland before his march to Worcester, contracted, and had brought with him from thence, a perfect detestation of their kirk and presbyterian government, and a great prejudice against the whole family of Argyle and some other persons. But he was exceedingly reconciled to the nation; and besides the esteem he had of the persons of very many noblemen, he did really believe the burgesses and common people to be as heartily affected to him, and as much at his disposal, as any subjects he had. And the lord Lautherdale cultivated this gracious credulity with so much diligence, that he assured the king, "that he might depend upon the whole Scots nation as upon one man, to be employed as one man in his service and commands of what kind soever, and against what enemy soever." His majesty upon the debate of this business declared, "that he did not only think it good husbandry in respect of the expense, and good policy, that he might keep Scotland entirely at his devotion, whilst Ireland remained in this confusion, and England itself was threatened by such factions in religion, to gratify them in what they desired; but that he held himself obliged in honour, justice, and conscience, to send all the forces out of that kingdom, and to deface the monuments of that time: and that there would be no more to be consulted, but what to do with those forces," (which was quickly resolved, that they should be all sent for Portugal; and order was presently given for ships upon which they were to be embarked,) "and then to consider in what method the other should be done."

The Scots were very well [satisfied] with the king's resolution upon the main, but troubled at somewhat that the English lords proposed for the way, "that the privy-council first, and then the parliament, should be informed of his majesty's intentions: which," they said, "would be against the honour and the interest and the right of Scotland, which never submitted any of their concerns to be debated at the council-board of England; and the innovation would be no less in remitting it to the parliament, which had no pretence of jurisdiction over them." To both which they were answered, "that the withdrawing the English forces, and demolishing the English fortifications, concerned England no less than the other kingdom; and that his majesty did not intend it should be proposed to them, as a thing of which he made any doubt or required their advice, but only as a matter of fact, which would prevent all murmurings or censures, which otherwise might arise." The English lords desired, "that the king's orders might be very positive, and that the commissioner might see them executed, for the utter demolishing all those fortifications which the English were to abandon, that they might not be continued for the entertainment of new garrisons of the natives, which would administer matter of new jealousies:" all which they cheerfully consented to, well knowing that they might afterwards perform what they found convenient; and many did since believe, that there remains enough in some of the places to be shelter to a rebellion hereafter.

The king appointed the chancellor to make a relation, at a conference between the two houses of parliament, "of the good posture his majesty's "affairs of Scotland stood in; of their having repealed all those ill laws which had been made by the advantage of the rebellion, and all that concerned the church; upon which that his majesty forthwith resolved to settle bishops in that kingdom, which appeared very unanimously devoted to his service: and that the king could not but communicate this good news to them, which he knew would give them cause of rejoicing." And then he told them, "that the Scots parliament, in regard of the peace and quiet that they enjoyed, without the least apprehension of trouble from abroad or at home, had desired the king, that the English forces might be withdrawn and all the fortifications razed; and that those forces might be convenient, if his majesty thought fit, to be transported to Portugal;" without discovering what his majesty had resolved to do, or asking any opinion from them, which however they might have given if they pleased. The effect was, that both houses sent their humble thanks to the king "for his having vouchsafed to let them know the good condition of Scotland, of which they wished his majesty much joy; and hoped his other dominions would in a short time be in the same tranquillity:" without taking any notice of withdrawing the garrisons. And so that affair ended.

During this agitation in London, it was discernible enough that there were great jealousies between the Scots lords. The commissioner and the other had cause to believe, that the king gave much more credit to Lautherdale than to them, and looked upon him as a man of great interest in that country, when they knew he had none, being neither in his quality or fortune amongst those who were esteemed men of power and dependance. And he thought them linked in a faction against him, to lessen the value the king had of him, which indeed was the foundation of all his credit and interest. What countenance soever he set upon it, he was sensibly afflicted at the downfall of the presbytery, and that Middleton had brought that to pass without any difficulty, (as he had before told the king he would,) which he had assured his majesty was impossible to be effected but in long time and by many stratagems.

The marquis of Argyre had been a man universally odious to the whole nation, some ministers and preachers excepted: and there had been always thought to have been an implacable animosity from Lautherdale towards him; and after the king's return no man had appeared more against him, nor more insisted upon his not being admitted to his majesty's presence, or for his being sent into Scotland to be tried. Yet after all this it was discovered, that he had interposed all he could with his majesty to save him, and employed all his interest in Scotland to the same purpose. And the marquis was no sooner executed, but the earl of Lautherdale had prevailed with the king immediately to give his son, the lord Lorne, (who had remained in London to solicit on his father's behalf,) leave to kiss his hand, and to create him earl of Argyre, and to confer on him the office of general justice in the Highlands, by which his father had been qualified to do most of the wickednesses he had committed; all which the parliament of Scotland should [have treated as] the most sensible affront to them that they could undergo.

It was well known that this young man, who was captain of the king's guard when he was in Scotland, had treated his majesty with that rudeness and barbarity, that he was much more odious to him than his father; and in all the letters which Lautherdale had found opportunity to write, whilst he was a prisoner in England, to the king when he was beyond the seas, he inveighed equally against the son as the father, and never gave him any other title than, "That Toad's Bird:" so that nobody could imagine from whence this change could proceed, but from a design to preserve an interest in the presbyterian party against the time he should have occasion to use them.

Then there were circumstances in this grace of the king to the lord Lorne, that exceeded all men's comprehension: for his majesty caused all the estate of the marquis of Argyre, which did not appear in any degree so considerable as it was generally believed to have been, to be seized upon as forfeited to him; and then would grant it to the son so absolutely, that neither the owners should recover what had been injuriously and violently taken from them for their loyalty to the king, nor the creditors receive satisfaction for the just debts which were due to them, and which must have been satisfied if the king had retained the forfeiture. But upon the application of the commissioner and the other lords, that the king would hear all persons concerned, there was some mitigation in those particulars, notwithstanding all the opposition which Lautherdale did barefaced make on the behalf of the lord Lorne, and which the other bore with great indignation: which he knew very well, and did believe that the oath and subscription, which he well knew they had contrived for the next session of parliament, was levelled at him; that not taking it, as they did not believe he would do, the secretary of Scotland's place might become void, which they had much rather should have been in any man's hand than in his. And therefore he took all occasions to profess and declare, besides his constant raillery against the presbytery, "that if they should require him to subscribe that he is a Turk, he would do it before he would lose his office."

The matter of these offences being most in private, and so not publicly taken notice of, they made a fair show and kept good quarter towards each other. And the king consenting to all that the commissioner proposed with reference to the public, being indeed abundantly satisfied with his comportment, and at parting promising to give him the office of treasurer, when by Crawford's refusing to subscribe it should become void; they, with all their bishops, returned again for Scotland with incurable jealousy of Lautherdale, who remained waiting upon the king, and resolved to cross all their designs he could, and quietly to expect a better opportunity to undo what he could not for the present prevent.

It is time now to return to the parliament of England, which, according to the time of the prorogation, met again in March towards the entrance into the year 1664: when at their first meeting the king informed them at large of the insurrection that had been endeavoured in the summer before in Yorkshire, which, how foolishly soever contrived, was a very great instance of the distemper of the nation; that three years after the disbanding of the army, the officers thereof should remain still so unquiet, as to hope to give any signal disturbance to the peace of the kingdom, by such a commotion as they could upon their credit raise.

The continual discourse of plots and insurrections had so wearied the king, that he even resolved to give no more countenance to any such informations, nor to trouble himself with inquiry into them; but to leave the peace of the kingdom against any such attempts to the vigilance of the civil magistrates, and the care of the officers of the militia, which he presumed would be sufficient to quell and suppress any ordinary fanatic design. And upon this resolution, and to avoid the reproach of the late times, of contriving plots only to commit men to prison against whom there was any prejudice, he totally neglected the first information he received of this seditious purpose. But when the intelligence was continued from several parts, and so particular for the time and place of the rendezvous, and for the seizing upon the city of York; and there was evidence that some men of estate and fortune, and who were held wary and discreet men, were engaged in it; his majesty thought it time to provide against it, and not only commended the care of it to the lords lieutenants and deputy lieutenants of the counties adjacent, but sent likewise several troops of his own horse to possess the city of York before the day appointed, and to attend some of the places of the rendezvous. And they came very seasonably, and surprised many upon the very place, before their company was strong enough to make resistance. Others did make some resistance, but quickly fled and were dispersed. Many were taken, and upon their examination behaved themselves as if they were sure to be quickly rescued; for it appeared that they did believe that the insurrection would have been general throughout the kingdom, and that all the disbanded army would have been brought together at several rendezvous.

All the prisons in the north were so full, that the king thought it necessary to send down four or five of the judges of the several benches of Westminster-hall to York, with a commission of oyer and terminer, to examine the whole matter. There, though the judges did not believe that they had discovered the bottom of the whole conspiracy, they found cause to condemn very many; whereof seventeen or eighteen were executed, some reprieved, and very many left in prison to be tried at the next assizes. Amongst those who were executed, the man who was most looked upon was one Rymer, of the quality of the better sort of grand-jurymen, and held a wise man, and was known to be trusted by the greatest men who had been in rebellion: and he was discovered by a person of intimate trust with him, who had heretofore the same affections with him, but would venture no more. He was a sullen man, and used few words to excuse himself, and none to hurt any body else; though he was thought to know much, and that having a good estate he would never have embarked in a design that had no probability of success. Some of the prisoners declared, "that they were assured by those who engaged them, that such and such great men would appear at the rendezvous or soon after." But that was not thought a sufficient ground to trouble any man, though some of them were very liable to suspicion; since in all combinations of that kind, it is a most usual artifice to work upon weak men, by persuading them that other men, of whom they have great esteem, are engaged in it, who in truth know nothing of it.

The judges were returned from York little time before the parliament met; and therefore the king thought it fit to awaken them to much vigilance, by informing them with what secrecy that conspiracy had been carried. And his majesty assured them, "that he was not yet at the bottom of that business; and that it appeared manifestly, that this conspiracy was but a branch of that which he had discovered as well as he could to them about two years since, and had been then executed nearer hand, if he had not by God's goodness come to the knowledge of some of the principal contrivers, and so secured them from doing the mischief they intended."

His majesty told them, "that they would wonder (yet he said what was true) that they were now even in those parts, when they see their friends under trial and execution, still pursuing the same consultations: and it was evident that they had correspondence with desperate persons in most counties, and a standing council in London itself, from which they received their directions, and by whom they were advised to defer their last intended insurrection. But those orders served only to distract them, and came too late to prevent their destruction." He said, "he knew more of their intrigues, than they thought he did; and hoped he should shortly discover the bottom: in the mean time he desired the parliament, that they might all be as watchful to prevent, as they were to contrive their mischief." He said, "he could not upon this occasion omit to tell them, that these desperate men in their counsels (as appeared by several examinations) had not been all of one mind in the ways of carrying on their wicked resolutions. Some would still insist upon the authority of the long parliament, of which they say they have members enough willing to meet: others have fancied to themselves, by some computation of their own, upon some clause in the triennial bill, that this present parliament was at an end some months since; and that for want of new writs they may assemble themselves, and choose members for parliament; and that this is the best expedient to bring themselves together for their other purposes. For the long parliament," his majesty said, "that he and they together could do no more than he had done to inform and compose the minds of men; let them proceed upon that at their peril. But he thought there had been nothing done to disabuse men in respect of the triennial bill. He confessed that he had often himself read over that bill; and though there is no colour for the fancy of the determination of this parliament; yet he would not deny to them, that he had always expected that they would, and even wondered that they had not considered the wonderful clauses in that bill, which had passed in a time very uncareful for the dignity of the crown, or the security of the people." His majesty desired the speaker and the gentlemen of the house of commons, "that they would once give that triennial bill a read"ing in their house; and then in God's name they might do what they thought fit for him, themselves, and the whole kingdom." His majesty said, "that he needed not tell them how much he loved parliaments: never king was so much beholding to parliaments as he had been; nor did he think that the crown could ever be happy without frequent parliaments. But he wished them to assure themselves, that if he should think otherwise, he would never suffer a parliament to come together by the means prescribed by that bill."

He renewed his thanks to them "for the free supply they gave him the last session of four subsidies; yet he could not but tell them, that that supply was fallen much short of what he expected and they intended. That it would hardly be believed, yet they knew it to be true, that very many persons, who have estates of three or four thousand pounds by the year, do not pay for these four subsidies sixteen pounds: so that whereas they intended and declared, that they should be collected according to former precedents, they do not now arise to half the proportion they did in the time of queen Elizabeth; and yet sure the crown wants more now than it did then, and the subject is at least as well able to give." His majesty said, "the truth is, by the license of the late ill time, and ill humour of this, too many of the people, and even of those who make fair professions, believe it to be no sin to defraud the crown of any thing that is due to it. That they no sooner gave him tonnage and poundage, than men were devising all the means they could to steal custom; nor could the farmers be so vigilant for the collection, as others were to steal the duties. They gave him the excise, which all people abroad believed to be the most insensible imposition that can be laid upon a people: what conspiracies and combinations were entered into against it by the brewers, who he was sure did not bear the burden themselves, even to bring that revenue to nothing, they would hear in Westminster-hall. They had given him the chimney-money, which they had reason to believe was a growing revenue, for men build at least fast enough; and they would therefore wonder, that it was already declined, and that this half year brings in less than the former did." He desired them therefore, "that they would review that bill; and since he was sure that they would have him receive whatsoever they gave, that he might have the collecting and husbanding of it by his own officers, and then he doubted not but to improve that receipt, and he would be cozened as little as he could."

His majesty concluded with "desiring and conjuring them to keep a very good correspondence together, that it might not be in the power of any seditious or factious spirits to make them jealous of each other, or either of them jealous of him, till they see him pretend one thing and do another, which he was sure they had never yet done." He assured them, "it should be in nobody's power to make him jealous of them." And so desired them, "that they would despatch what they found necessary, that they might be ready for a session within two months or thereabout, because the "season of the year would invite them all to take the country air."

It was very happy for his majesty, that he did cut out their work to their hand, and asked no money of them, and limited them a short time to continue together. It made their counsels very unanimous: and though they raised no new taxes and impositions upon the people, they made what they had before raised much more valuable to the king than it was before, by passing other acts and declarations for the explaining many things, and the better collecting the money they had formerly given; which much added to his majesty's profit without grieving the people, who were rather gratified in the remedies which were provided against frauds and cozenage.

The parliament had sat but very little more than ten days, when they presented a bill to his majesty for the repeal of the triennial bill, which he had recommended to them; and which was so grateful to him, that he came in person to the house to pass it and to thank them: and he told them, "that every good Englishman would thank them for it; for it could only have served to discredit parliaments, to make the crown jealous of parliaments and parliaments of the crown, and persuaded neighbour princes that England was not governed under a monarch." The truth is: it had passed in a very jealous and seditious time, when the wickedness was first in hatching, that ripened afterwards to a dismal perfection; and when all, who were sworn never to consent to the disherison of the crown, thought only of preserving their own inheritance which they had gotten, or improving it at the expense of the crown; and made it manifest enough, that it should wither, at least while it stood upon the head of that king; for at that time the conspiracy went no further, that is amongst those who had then credit to promote its passage, though they were weak men who thought it could rest there.

As they made this entrance, so they were wholly intent upon matters of moment, and despatched all they intended to do within the two months, in which the king desired they would be ready for a prorogation. And as there was greater order and unanimity in their debates, so they despatched more business of public importance and consequence, than any other parliament had done in twice the time: for, besides the repeal of the odious bill before mentioned, they made a very good additional bill for the chimney-money, which made that revenue much more considerable; and they passed likewise another bill against the frequenting of conventicles, which was looked upon as the greatest discountenance the parliament had yet given to all the factions in religion, and if it had been vigorously executed would no doubt have produced a thorough reformation. They made likewise a very good act, and very necessary for a time of such corruption, that had contracted new ways of dishonesty and villany that former times had not thought of, when many unworthy and cowardly masters of ships and seamen had been contented to be robbed, and to [suffer] all their owners' goods to be taken, upon an allowance made to them by the pirates; for the discovery and punishment whereof the law had not enough provided. They therefore presented a bill to the king, "for the discovery and punishment of all such treacherous and infamous "actions; and for the reward of such honest and stout seamen, as should manfully and courageously defend their owners' goods, and therein maintain the honour of the nation."

All this they presented to his majesty, and was confirmed by his royal assent on the seventeenth of May; when his majesty, after giving such thanks to them as they deserved, told them, "he did not intend to bring them together again till the month of November, that they might enjoy the summer in the transaction of their own affairs: yet because there might some emergent occasion fall out, that might make him wish to find them together sooner, he would prorogue them only to August; and before the day they should have seasonable notice, by proclamation, not to give their attendance, except such occasion should fall out." And so they were prorogued to a day in August, but met not till November following.

During this short session of parliament, they, who were very solicitous to promote a war with Holland, forgot not what they had to do; but they quickly discerned that it was not a good season to mention the giving of money, (which the king himself had forborne to mention, that the people might see one session of parliament pass without granting new impositions, which they had not yet seen,) and therefore it would be as unseasonable to speak of a war. However, they made such an approach towards it, as might make a further advance much more easy.

The merchants in the committee of trade much lamented the obstructions and discouragements, which they had long found in their commerce by sea, and with other nations, and which were not removed even by the blessed return of the king; all which they imputed to the pride and insolence of the Hollanders, "who," they said, "observed no laws of commerce, or any conditions which themselves consented to. That by their fraud and practice the English were almost driven out of the East and West Indies, and had their trade in Turkey and in Africa much diminished. In sum, that besides many insufferable indignities offered by them to his majesty and to the crown of England, his subjects had in few years sustained the damage of seven or eight hundred thousand pounds sterling."

All which with some particular instances being reported from the committee of trade to the house, they had desired an audience from his majesty, and then presented this grievance to him, and desired his majesty, "that he would give such order in it, as to his wisdom should seem fit, that might produce just and honourable satisfaction." The king, who continued firm to his former resolution, answered them, "that he would transmit the address they had presented to him to his resident at the Hague, with order that he should inform the States of it, and require satisfaction, which he hoped the States General would yield unto, rather than they compel him to demand justice in another way." The answer pleased them well, nor could they wish that the prosecution should be put into a better hand than the resident's, who was a member of the house, and a man who had inflamed them more than the merchants themselves against the Dutch.

That resident was sir George Downing, a man of an obscure birth, and more obscure education, which he had received in part in New England: he had passed through many offices in Cromwell's army, of chaplain, scoutmaster, and other employments, and at last got a very particular credit and confidence with him, and under that countenance married a beautiful lady of a very noble extraction, which was the fate of many bold men in that presumptuous time. And when Cromwell had subdued the Dutch to that temper he wished, and had thereupon made a peace with them, he sent this man to reside as his agent with them, being a man of a proud and insolent spirit, and [who] would add to any imperious command of his somewhat of the bitterness of his own spirit.

And he did so fully execute his charge in all things, especially when he might manifest his animosity against the royal party, that when the king himself had once, during his residence at Brussels, for his divertisement made a journey incognito, with not above four persons, to see Amsterdam, and from thence the towns of North Holland; Downing coming to have notice of it delivered a memorial to the States of Holland, wherein he enclosed the third article of their treaty, by which they were obliged "not to suffer any traitor, rebel, or any other person, who was declared an enemy to the commonwealth of England, to reside or stay in their dominions;" and told them, "that Charles Stuart and the marquis of Ormond had been lately in Amsterdam, and were still in some places adjacent;" and required "that they might not be permitted to remain in any part of their dominions." Whereupon the States of Holland sent presently to the princess royal, who was then at her country house at Hounslerdike, "that if her brother were then with her or should come to her, he should forthwith depart out of their province:" and not satisfied herewith, they published an order in the Hague to the same purpose, which was sent to Amsterdam and other towns according to their custom.

With this rude punctuality he behaved himself during the life of Cromwell, and whilst his son retained the usurpation; but when he saw him thrown out with that contempt, and that the government was not like to be settled again till there was a resort to the old foundation, he bethought himself how he might have a reserve of the king's favour. And the marquis of Ormond making about that time a journey incognito to the Hague, [to treat of] a marriage for his eldest son with a noble lady whose friends lived there, Downing found opportunity to have a private conference with him, and made offer of his service to the king, if his devotion might be concealed, without which it would be useless to his majesty. And for an earnest of his fidelity, he informed him of some particulars which were of moment for the king to know: amongst which one was, "that a person, who in respect of his very honourable extraction, and the present obligations himself had to the royal family, was not suspected, gave him, as he had long done, constant intelligence of what the king did, and of many particulars which in their nature deserved to be more secret, which he had always sent to Cromwell whilst he was living; but since his death, having a resolution to serve the king, he had never dis- served him, and would hereafter give him notice of any thing that it would be necessary [for "him] to be informed of with reference to England or to Holland."

The marquis thought it very fit to accept of such an instrument, and promised him "to acquaint his majesty with his good affection, who he presumed would receive it graciously, and give him as much encouragement to continue it as his present condition would permit." To which the other replied, "that he knew the king's present condition too well to expect any reward from him: but if his majesty would vouchsafe, when he should be restored, to confirm to him the office he then held of a teller in the exchequer, and continue him in this employment he then had in Holland, where he presumed he should be able to do him more service than a stranger could do, he would think himself abundantly rewarded." Of all which when the marquis advertised the king at his return to Brussels, he had authority to assure him "of the king's acceptance, and that all that he expected should be made good."

This was the ground and reason, that when the king came to the Hague the year following to embark for England, he received Downing so graciously, and knighted him, and left him there as his resident; which they who were near the king, and knew nothing of what had passed, wondered at as much as strangers who had observed his former behaviour. And the States themselves, who would not at such a time of public joy do any thing that might be ingratul to his majesty, could not forbear to lament in private, "that his majesty would depute a person to have his authority, who had never used any other dialect to persuade them to do any thing he proposed, but threats if they should not do it, and who at several times had disoblged most of their persons by his insolence." And from the time of his majesty's departure from thence, he never made those representations which men in those ministeries used to do, but put the worst commentaries upon all their actions. And when he sat afterwards as a member of the house, returning still in the interval of parliament to his employment at the Hague, he took all opportunities to inveigh against their usurpations in trade; and either did or pretended to know many of their mysteries of iniquity, in opening of which he rendered himself acceptable to the house, though he was a voluminous speaker, which naturally they do not like.

When this province was committed to him of expostulation for the injuries sustained in several places from the Dutch, he had his wish, and used little modesty in the urging of it. They answered, "that most of the particulars of which he complained were put under oblivion by the late treaty, and that in consideration thereof they had yielded to many particulars for the benefit of the English; and that for the other particulars, they were likewise by the same treaty referred to a process in justice, of which they had yet no cause to complain: nor had there been any action pretended to be committed since the treaty was concluded," which was not many months before, "that might occasion a misunderstanding." And surely at this time when these things were urged all this was true: but he, according to the method he had been accustomed [to], insisted upon his own demands; and frequently reproached them with their former submissions to Cromwell, and their present presumptions upon the goodness and generosity of the king.

It is without question, that the States General did, by the standard of their own wariness and circumspection, not suspect that the king did intend to make a war upon them. They well knew the straits and necessities in which his affairs stood, with reference to money, and to the several distempers of the nation in matters of religion, which might probably grow more dangerous if there were a foreign war; and concluded, that Downing's importunities and menaces were but the results of his own impetuosity, and that the king would not be solicitous to interrupt and part with his own peace. And therefore their own ships they sent out as they used to do, and those for the coast of Guinea better prepared and stronger than of course. Nor was the royal company less vigilant to carry on that trade, but about the same time sent a stronger fleet of merchants' ships than they had ever before done; and for their better encouragement the king lent them two of his own ships for a convoy.

And at this time they gave the king an advantage in point of justice, and which concerned all other nations in point of traffick and commerce. It had been begun by them in the East Indies; where after they had planted themselves in great and strong towns, and had many harbours well fortified, in which they constantly maintained a great number of good and strong ships; by which they were absolute masters of those seas, and forced the neighbour kings and princes to enter into such terms of amity with them as they thought fit to require. And if they found that any advantageous trade was driven in any port by any other nation, they presently sent their ships to lie before that port, and denounced war against the prince to whom that port belonged; which being done, they published a declaration, "that it should not be lawful for any nation whatsoever to trade in the territories of that prince with whom they then were in war." And upon this pretence they would not suffer an English ship, belonging to the East India company, to enter into a port to lade and take in a cargason of goods, that had been provided by their factors there before there was any mention or imagination of such a war, and of which there was no other instance of hostility than the very declaration. And at this time they transplanted this new prerogative to Guinea: and having, as they said, for there was no other evidence of it, a war with one of those princes, they would not suffer the English ships to enter into those harbours where they had always traded. The king received animadversion of this unheard of insolence and usurpation, and added this more just complaint to the former, and required his resident "to demand a positive renunciation of all pretence to such an odious usurpation, and a revocation of those orders which their officers had published." To this complaint and demand they deferred to make answer, till their ambassador had presented a grievance to the king.

One of those ships of war, which the king had lent to the royal company for the convoy of their fleet to Guinea, had in the voyage thither assaulted and taken a fort belonging to the Dutch near Cape Verde; which was of more incommodity to them than of benefit to the English. Of this invasion their ambassador made a loud complaint, and demanded, "that the captain might be punished severely; and in the mean time that the king would give a present order to him, the ambassador, for the redelivery of the place and all that was in it, and he would send it to his masters, who would forthwith send a ship to demand it." The king had in truth heard nothing of it; and assured the ambassador, "that the captain, if he had done any such thing, had not the least commission or authority for the doing it; and that he was sure he was upon his way homeward, so that he might be expected speedily; and then he should be sure to undergo such punishment as the nature of his offence required, when the matter should be examined, and they should then receive full reparation." This answer, how reasonable soever, satisfied them not: nothing would serve [their] turn but a present restitution, before his majesty could be informed of the provocation or ground that had produced so unwarrantable an action. They gave present orders for the equipping a very great fleet, and the raising many land soldiers, making greater preparations for war than they had made in many years before. They likewise prepared a strong fleet for Guinea, and granted a commission (which was published in print) to the commander in chief, "to make war upon the English in those parts, and to do them all the mischief they could."

Prince Rupert, who had been heretofore with the fleet then under his command, in the beginning of the king's reign, upon the coast of Guinea, (and by the report and testimony he gave of that coast the royal company had received great encouragement,) and now upon this insolent demeanour of the Dutch, and publishing the commission they had sent to their commander in chief, he offered his service to the king, "to sail into those parts with such a fleet as his majesty thought fit to send, with which he made little doubt to secure trade, and abate the presumption of the Dutch." And hereupon a fleet was likewise preparing for that purpose, to be commanded by prince Rupert.

The parliament had before declared, when they made their address to the king against the Dutch for obstructing the trade, "that they would with their lives and fortunes assist his majesty against all oppositions whatsoever, which he should meet with in the removal of those obstructions;" which they believed would terrify, but in truth made the Dutch merry: and in some of their declarations or answers to Downing's memorials, they mentioned it with too much pride and contempt. And in this posture the disputes were when the parliament met again in November, which came together for the most part without a desire either to give money or make war. And Downing, who laboured heartily to incense us and to provoke them, in all his despatches declared, "that all those insolences proceeded only from the malignity of the States of Holland, which could vent itself no further than in words; but that the States General, without whose concurrence no war could be made, abhorred the thought of it:" and there is no doubt that was true. And the Dutch ambassador, who remained at London, and was a very honest weak man, and did all the offices he could to prevent it, did not think it possible it could come to pass; "and that there might be some scuffles upon the coast of Guinea, by the direction of the West India company, of whose actions the States General took notice, but would cause justice to be done upon complaint, and not suffer the public peace to be disturbed upon their pretences." And so the king forbore to demand any supply from the parliament, because an ordinary supply would rather discredit his demands than advance them, and he could not expect an extraordinary supply but when the war was unquestionable. And the States General at this time were made a property by the States of Holland, (who had given private orders for their own concernments,) and presented an humble desire to the king by their ambassador, "that prince Rupert's fleet might stay in harbour, as theirs likewise that was prepared for Guinea should do, till some means might be found for the accommodation of all differences." Whereas before they pretended, that they would send their Guinea fleet through the Channel, convoyed by their admiral with a fleet of fifty sail; which report had before stopped prince Rupert, when he was under sail for Guinea, to wait and expect that piece of bravery. But this address from the States General made all men believe there would be an accommodation, without so much as any hostility in Guinea.

But it was quickly discovered, that they were the honestest men when they gave the worst words. For before the States General sent to the king to stop prince Rupert in harbour, "and that their fleets should likewise remain in their harbours," the States of Holland, or that committee that was qualified by them, had with great privacy sent orders to De Ruyter, who was in the Mediterranean, "to make all possible haste with his fleet to go to the coast of Guinea, and not only to retake the fort near Cape Verde that the English had taken from them, but likewise to take what places he could which were in possession of the English, and to do them what damage he could in those parts:" so that they might well offer that their fleet should now remain in their harbours in Holland.

When De Ruyter had been sent into the Mediterranean, the pretence was, that it was against the pirates of Algiers and Tunis, who had in truth preyed very much upon the Dutch, taken very many of their ships, and had abundance of their subjects in chains. And when that fleet was sent into the Mediterranean, their ambassador had desired the king, "that his majesty's fleet that was then in those parts might upon all occasions join with De Ruyter, when opportunity should be offered thereby to infest the Turks;" which the king consented to, and sent orders accordingly. But the Dutch had no such purpose: his business was to ransom their captives with money, and not to exact the delivery of them by force; and to make an accommodation for the time to come as well as he could. And when the English fleet was at any time in pursuit of any of the Turks' vessels, and expected that the Dutch, by whom they must pass, would have given a little stop to their flight, which they might easily have done; they rather assisted than obstructed their escape. And having made a very dishonourable peace with the pirates, he made haste to prosecute his orders for the coast of Guinea.

As soon as the king knew of this impudent affront, and that De Ruyter was in truth gone out of the Mediterranean, he thought he might justly seize upon any ships of theirs, to satisfy the damage that he could not but sustain by De Ruyter in Guinea: and so, it being the season of the year that the Dutch fleet returned with their wines from Bourdeaux, Rochelle, and other parts of France, such of them as were forced by the weather to put into the English harbours were seized upon. And the duke of York, having put himself on board with a fleet of about fifty sail, upon the report of the Dutch being come out to defend their ships, took many others, even upon their own coasts; which they chose rather to suffer, than to venture out of their ports to relieve them. However, there was not any one of all those ships suffered to be unladen, or any prejudice done to them; but they were all preserved unhurt, till notice might arrive from Guinea what De Ruyter had done there. But undoubted intelligence arrived in a very short time after, that De Ruyter had declared and begun the war upon the coast of Africa, not only by a forcible retaking the fort which had been taken from them, and which his majesty had offered to deliver, but by seizing upon several English ships in those parts, and by assaulting and taking other his majesty's forts and places, and exercising all the acts of hostility which his commission authorized [him] to do.

And in a very short time after, the East India company complained and informed the king, "that when their officer had demanded the redelivery of the isle of Poleroone according to the article of the late treaty, and delivered the letters and orders from the States General and States of Holland, which their ambassadors had given at London, to the governor and captain of that island; who, after making him stay two or three days there with his ship and the men he had brought with him, told him, that upon a better perusal of the orders which he had brought, he found that they were not sufficient; and therefore till he should receive fuller orders, he could not give up the place." And so the officer and ship, which had been sent at a great charge, were necessitated to return without any [other] effect than the affront and indignity to his majesty.

When there was now no remedy, and the war was actually made upon the king upon what provocation soever, there was nothing to be done but to resort to the parliament, which had been so earnest to enter into it. A fleet must be prepared equal to what the Dutch would infallibly make ready against the spring, and worthy of the presence of the duke of York, who was impatient to engage his own person in the conduct of it; and the king had given his promise to him that he should, when he had, God knows, no purpose that there should be a war. It was now quickly discovered, that there was not the same alacrity towards a war now, after it was begun, in the parliament, as there had been when they made their vote: and they would have been glad that any expedient might have been found for a reconciliation, and that the captain might have been called in question, who first gave offence by taking the fort from the Dutch near Cape Verde, which some had pressed for when he came home, before any more mischief [was] done; and the not calling him in question made many believe, that he had done nothing without warrant or promise of protection.

The Dutch still disclaimed all thought or purpose of war, and seemed highly offended with their governor of Poleroone, and protested, "that the not-delivery of the place proceeded only from want of an order from the governor of Batavia, which order came the next day after the English ship was departed: but that they had given notice of it to the English factory at Bantam, that the same or another English ship might return and receive it; and they were confident that it was then in the hand of the English." But it was now too late to expect any honourable peace, at least without making very notable preparations for a war, which [could] not be done without ready money. And whatever orders had been given for the preservation of the Dutch ships, it quickly appeared that much of them had been embezzled or disposed of, before they were brought to any judicatory, or adjudged to be prize; and there was too much cause to fear, that the rest would be disposed of to other purposes than the support of the war; though nothing was more positively spoken, than that the war would maintain itself.

The parliament still promised fairly, and entered upon consultation how and what money to raise. And now the king commanded the chancellor and the treasurer to meet with those members of the house of commons, with whom they had used to consult, and to whom the king had joined others upon whom he was told he might more depend, and to adjust together what sum should be proposed, and how and in what manner to propose and conduct it. It was about the month of January. And though the duke took indefatigable pains, by going himself sometimes to Portsmouth and sometimes to Chatham, to cause the ships and all provisions to be ready, that he might be at sea before the Dutch; yet let what advance could be made, as indeed there was great, nothing could be said to be done, till a great stock of ready money could be provided; and it would be long after the parliament had done their part, before ready money would be got; and therefore no more time must be lost, without taking a particular resolution.

The meeting of those persons the king appointed was at Worcester-house, where the chancellor and treasurer (who were known to be averse from the war) told the rest, "that there was no more debate now to be, war or no war: it was come upon us, and we were now only to contrive the best way of carrying it on with success; which could only be done by raising a great present sum of money, that the enemy might see that we were prepared to continue it as well as to begin." They who were most desirous of the war, as sir Harry Bennet and Mr. Coventry, (who were in truth the men who brought it upon the nation,) with their friends, were of the opinion, "that there should not be a great sum demanded at present, but only so much as might carry out the fleet in the spring, and sufficient provisions might be made for the summer service: and then, when the war was once thoroughly entered into, another and a better supply might be gotten about Michaelmas, when there was reason to hope, that "some good success would dispose all men to a frank prosecution of the war." Whereas these gentlemen had hitherto inflamed the king with an assurance, "that he could not ask more money of the parliament than they would readily give him, if he would be engaged in this war which the whole kingdom so much desired."

The chancellor and the treasurer were of opinion, "that the house of commons could never be in a better disposition to give, than they were at present; that hereafter they might grow weary, and apt to find fault with the conduct, especially when they found the country not so well pleased with the war as they were now conceived to be: whereas, now the war was begun, and the king engaged in it as much as he could be after ten battles, and all upon their desire and their promise; they could not refuse to give any thing proposed within the compass of that reason, which all understanding men might examine and judge of. That it was evident enough, that the true ground of all the confidence the Dutch had was from their opinion of the king's necessities and want of money, and their belief that the parliament would supply him very sparingly, and not long to continue such an expense, as they very well knew that a war at sea would require: and they would be much confirmed in this their imagination, if at the beginning they should see the parliament give him such a sum of money, as seemed to be implied by what had been said. That they therefore thought it absolutely necessary, that the king should propose as much, that is, that his friends should move for such a sum, as might upon a reasonable computation, which every man would be ready to make, and of which wise men upon experience would easily make an estimate, carry on the war for a full year; that is, for the setting out the present fleet and paying it off upon its return, and for the setting out another fleet the next spring. If this were now done, his majesty would not be involved in importunate necessities the next winter; but he might calmly and deliberately consult upon such further supplies, as the experience of what would be then past should suggest to be necessary: and that this would give his majesty such a reputation with all his neighbours, and such terror to his enemies, that it would probably dispose them to peace."

They told them, "the best method to compute what the expense might amount to in a year, would be by reflecting upon the vast disproportion of the charge we were now already engaged in, and what had been estimated four months since, when the war was designed. That it was well known to Mr. Coventry, who had been always present at those conferences, that it had been said by the most experienced sea-officers, and those who had fought all the late battles against the Dutch, that a fleet of forty or fifty such ships, as the king's were, would be strength sufficient to beat all the ships the Dutch had out of the narrow seas; and one very eminent man amongst them said, he would not desire above fifty ships to fight with all they had, and that he was confident that a greater number than fifty could never be brought to fight orderly or usefully: and yet that there were at present no fewer than fourscore good ships

"preparing for the duke. And the charge in many other particulars appeared already to amount to double the sum that was first computed."

They concluded, "that a less sum than two millions and a half" (which is five and twenty hundred thousand pounds sterling) "ought not to be proposed, and being once proposed ought to be insisted on and pursued without consenting to any diminution; for nobody could conceive that it would do more than maintain the war one year, which the parliament could not refuse to provide for in the beginning, and there being already so much in truth of it already expended in the preparations and expedition the duke had made in November, when he went to sea upon the fame of the Dutch fleet's intention to convoy their Guinea ships through the channel."

There was not a man in the company, who did not heartily wish that that sum or a greater might be proposed and granted: but they all, though they agreed in few other things, protested, "that they could not advise that so prodigious a sum should be as much as named; and that they did not know any one man, since it could not be thought fit that any man who had relation to the king's service should move it, who had the courage to attempt it, or would be persuaded to it."

The two lords continued very obstinate, "that a less sum should not be named for the reasons they had given," which the other confessed to be just; and they acknowledged too, "that the proposition ought not to be made by any man who [was] related to the court, or was thought to be in any grace there that might dispose him, nor yet by any gentleman, how well soever thought of, who was of a small estate, and so to pay little of so great a sum he was so liberal to give." They therefore desired them "to name some of those members, who were honest worthy men, and looked upon as lovers of their country, and of great fortunes, unsuspected to have any designs at court; and if they were not enough acquainted with them, the lords would find some way by themselves or others to move them to it." Whereupon they named five or six persons very well known, of whom the house had a very good esteem, but without any hope that either of them would be prevailed with to undertake it. The lords said, "they would try what might be done, and give them notice the next day, that if it were possible it might be the business of the following day."

The chancellor and the treasurer chose three Norfolk gentlemen of those who had been named, because they were good friends and grateful to each other, and desired them the next day "that they might confer together." They told them, "they knew well the state of affairs; the parliament had engaged the king in a war, that could not be carried on without a vast expense: and therefore if at the entrance into it there should be a small or an ordinary supply given, it would blast all their hopes, and startle all other princes from joining, with whom the Dutch were not in favour, and who would be inclined to the king, if they saw such a provision for the war as would be sufficient to continue it for some time. And therefore they desired to confer with them,

"who upon all occasions manifested good affections to the king, and whose advice had a great influence upon the house, upon the whole matter how it might be conducted." They all consented to what had been said, and promised their own concurrence and utmost endeavours to compass what the king should desire. The lords said, "they promised themselves more from them, and that they would not only concur, but propose what should be necessary to be granted." And thereupon they enlarged upon the charge which was already in view, and upon what was to be expected, and concluded "that two millions and a half were necessary to be insisted on;" and desired, "that when the debate should be entered upon, which they hoped might be the next day, one of them would propose this sum and the other would second it."

They looked long one upon another, as if they were surprised with the sum. At last one of them said, "that the reasons were unanswerable for a liberal supply; yet he did not expect that so prodigious a sum, which he believed had never yet been mentioned in parliament to be granted at one time, would be proposed: however, he did not think it too much, and that he would do the best he could to answer any objections which should be made against it, as he doubted many would; but he confessed he durst not propose it." Another was of the same mind, and with many good professions desired to be excused as to the first proposing it. The third, who was sir Robert Paston, a person of a much greater estate than both the other, who had yet very good fortunes, and a gentleman of a very ancient extraction by his father, (and his mother was daughter to the earl of Lindsey,) declared very frankly, "that he was satisfied in his conscience, that it would be very good for the kingdom as well as for the king that such a sum should be granted: and therefore if they thought him fit to do it, he would propose it the next morning, let other men think what they would of him for it."

The lords gave him the thanks they ought to do, and said what was necessary to confirm him, and to thank the other gentlemen for their promise to second him, and gave notice to the rest of the resolution, that they might call for the debate the next day; which was entered into with a general cheerfulness, every man acknowledging the necessity and the engagement of the house, but no man adventuring to name the proportion that should be given. When the house was in a deep silence expecting that motion, sir Robert Paston, who was no frequent speaker, but delivered what he had a mind to say very clearly, stood up, mentioned shortly the obligation, the charge of the war, and "that the present supply ought to be such as might as well terrify the enemy as assist the king; and therefore he proposed that they might give his majesty two millions and a half, which would amount to five and twenty hundred thousand pounds." The silence of the house was not broken; they sat as in amazement, until a gentleman, who was believed to wish well to the king, without taking notice of what had been proposed, stood up, and moved that they might give the king a much less proportion. But then the two others, who had promised to second, renewed the motion one after the other; which seemed to be entertained with a consent of many, and was contradicted by none: so that, after a short pause, no man who had relation to the court speaking a word, the speaker put it to the question, "whether they would give the king five and twenty hundred thousand pounds for the carrying on the war against the Dutch;" and the affirmative made a good sound, and very few gave their negative aloud, and it was notorious very many sat silent. So the vote was presently drawn up into an order; and the house resolved the next day to be in a committee, to agree upon the way that should be taken for the raising this vast sum, the proportion whereof could no more be brought into debate.

This brave vote gave the king the first liking of the war: it was above what he had expected or indeed wished to be proposed. And they, who had been at the first conference, and delivered the resolution of the two lords as impossible to be compassed, not without insinuation as if it were affected only to indispose the house to the war, (yet they did not think fit to vary from the proportion, till they saw the success of the proposition, which the lords were engaged to procure a fit person to make,) when they found the conclusion to be such as could be wished, they commended the counsel, and fell into another extreme, that in the thing itself and in the consequence did very much harm; which shall be next mentioned, after I have said that there appeared great joy and exaltation of spirit upon this vote, and not more in the court than upon the exchange, the merchants generally being unskilfully inclined to that war, above what their true interest could invite them to, as in a short time afterwards they had cause to confess.

The king sent to the lord mayor to call a common council, and commanded the chancellor, treasurer, and other lords of his council, to go thither; who, upon the credit of this vote of the house of commons for this noble supply, prevailed with the city presently to furnish the king with the loan of two hundred thousand pounds; which being within few days paid into the hands of the treasurer of the navy, all preparations for the fleet, and of whatever else was necessary for the expedition, were provided with marvellous alacrity: and the parliament made what haste was possible to despatch the bill, by which their great present might be collected from the people.

It hath been said before, that in most vacant places, upon the death of any members, ways were found out to procure some of the king's domestic servants elected in their places; so that his majesty had many voices there at his devotion; which did not advance his service. These men confidently ran out of the house still to inform the king of what was doing, commended this man, and discommended another who deserved better; and would many times, when his majesty spake well of any man, ask his majesty "if he would give them leave to let that person know how gracious his majesty was to him, or to bring him to kiss his hand." To which he commonly consenting, every one of his servants delivered some message from him to a parliament-man, and invited him to court as if the king would be willing to see him. And by this means the rooms at court, where the king was, were always full of the members of the house of commons; this man brought to kiss his hand, and the king induced to confer with that man, and to thank him for his affection, which never could conclude without some general expression of grace or promise, which the poor gentleman always interpreted to his own advantage, and expected some fruit from it that it could never yield: all which, being contrary to all former order, did the king no good, and rendered those unable to do him service who were inclined to it.

The new secretary, and sir Charles Berkley, who by this time was entered very far into the king's favour and his confidence, were the chief, and by their places had access to him in all places and hours: and they much disliked the officiousness of the others, as if they presumed to invade their province. They thought it but their due, that the king should take his measures of the house of commons by no other report but theirs, nor dispense his graces there through any other conduit. They took this occasion to caress sir Robert Paston, who was a stranger to them, and to magnify the service he had done the king, and the great sense the king had of it, and [that he] did long to give him his own thanks: they invited him to come to the court, and sir Charles Berkley told him as from the king, "that his majesty resolved to make him a baron." And by these daily courtships and importunities the gentleman, who was well satisfied with what he had done, and never proposed any advantage to himself from it, was amused, and thought he was not to refuse any honour the king thought him worthy of, nor to neglect those graces which were offered to him by persons of their interest. Yet he made not haste to go to the court, believing that it might make him less capable of serving the king, and that any favour his majesty should do him would be more seasonable hereafter than at present, lest he might be thought to have made that motion in the house upon promise of the other reward. Yet after continued invitations he went thither, and those gentlemen presented him to the king, who spake very graciously to him, told him, "he had done him great service, which he would never forget," and many other princely expressions, and "that he should be glad to see him often," but no particular to that purpose which had been mentioned to him.

When he went next, he found his majesty's countenance the same: but they, who had courted and amused him so much, grew every day more dry and reserved towards him; of which he complained to a friend of his who he knew had interest in the chancellor, and desired him to acquaint him with all that had passed, who had not till then heard that he had been at court, and when he was informed of the whole relation was very much troubled, well knowing, that how acceptable soever those kinds of courtships were for few days, they were attended with many inconveniences when the end was not correspondent with the beginning. He knew well the resolution the king had taken to create no more noblemen, the number whereof already too much exceeded: however, he was very sorry, that a person of that quality and merit should be exposed to any indignity, for having endeavoured in such a conjuncture to do his majesty a signal service, and succeeded so well; and spake with the king at large of it, and gave his majesty a full account of the modesty and temper of the gentleman, of his quality and interest, and what had been said and promised to him. The king was troubled, owned all that he had said himself to him, as being very hearty, and "that he would never forget the service he had done, but requite it upon any opportunity;" but protested, "that he had never made any such promise, nor given sir Charles Berkley any authority to mention any such thing to him, which would prove very inconvenient;" and therefore wished, "that his friend would divert him from prosecuting such a pretence, which he knew to be contrary to his resolution."

The chancellor knew not what to say, but truly advertised his friend of all the king had said, who again informed sir Robert Paston, who thought himself very hardly treated, and went to sir Charles Berkley, who had not the same open arms, yet assured him, "that he had said nothing to him but by the king's direction, which he must aver." That he did not use to interpose or move the king in any of his affairs: but if he would desire the chancellor to take notice of it, who he knew had a great affection for him, and upon whose desire he had performed that great service, he was confident it would be attended with the success he wished, to which he would contribute all his endeavours;" intimating, "that if he had not what he desired, he might impute it to the chancellor." Upon which sir Robert, who was well assured of the chancellor's kindness, concluded that his court friends had deluded him, or expected money, which he would not give: and so the matter ended with prejudice to the king.

Notwithstanding these and the like very inconvenient activities, which lost more friends than were gotten by them, the noise of this stupendous supply, given to the king at one time, made good impressions upon all who had any affections for the king, and was wondered at in those places where money was most plenty. In Holland it wrought even to consternation, and the common people cried aloud for peace, and the States pretended to have great hope as well as desire of it, and sent their ambassador, who remained still in England, new orders to solicit it.

In the mean time the king neglected not to apply what endeavours he could use, to dispose his allies to act such parts as their own interest might reasonably invite them to. From France he expected only neutrality, by reason he knew he had renewed the alliance with the States; but never suspected, that it was in such a manner as would hinder the neutrality. Spain could do little good or harm, nor durst it to engage against Holland: yet all was done that was necessary towards a good correspondence with it. The two northern kings would find themselves concerned, at least to wish better to one side than to the other; and had been both so disobliged by the Dutch, that had it not been for the irreconcilable jealousy they had of each other, they might have been united to the interest of England. But Denmark had in the late war given what they could not keep nor recover, and yet could hardly be without; and Sweden looked with too much contempt upon the weakness and inactivity of their neighbour, to give back any thing they had got: and this restrained them both from provoking an enemy that might give strength to the other.

Yet Denmark had the year before by Hannibal Zested, who went ambassador into France and made England his way, made many complaints to the king "of the oppression the crown of Denmark underwent by the Dutch, and the resolution it had to shake off that yoke as soon as an opportunity should be offered;" and made a request to the king, "that he would endeavour to make the alliance so fast between Denmark and Sweden, that the jealousy of each other might hinder neither of them from doing any thing that was for their own interest, without prejudice to the other." And when the difficulty was alleged, in regard that Sweden would never be persuaded to part with Elsinour, and those other places which had been given up in the late treaty; Hannibal Zested consented that what was done in that treaty should be again confirmed, and said "his master was willing and desirous that the king of England should undertake and be cautious for the observation of this treaty;" implying, "that if this were done, and thereby the fear of any further attempt from Sweden were extinguished, Denmark would not be long without redeeming itself from the vexation which it endured from Holland, which, upon former necessities and ill bargains, upon the matter had an exemption from paying all duties upon their own great trade through the Sound, as much to the prejudice of all other princes as of the poor crown of Denmark." This having so lately passed from a minister of that crown, the king thought it a good time to endeavour to do that office between the two crowns, and thereby to unite them both to the king in this conjunction against the Dutch; at least that they might both remain good friends to his majesty, and supply him with all those provisions without which his navy could not be supported, and as far as was possible restrain the Dutch from those supplies, by making such large contracts with the English, that there would not be enough left for the other.

Upon this ground he sent Mr. Henry Coventry of his bedchamber to the Swede, whose friendship he much more valued as more able to assist him, and upon whose word he could more firmly depend. And to Denmark he sent sir Gilbert Talbot, who was acceptable to that crown by his having performed many offices of respect to the prince of Denmark, when he had been incognito in England, and waited upon [him] to several parts of the kingdom which he had a mind to see, and so caused him to be entertained in several gentlemen's houses in his journey, of which the prince seemed very sensible when he departed. That which was expected from that negotiation, except the confidence could be created between the two crowns, was only to preserve Denmark a friend, that he might not favour the Dutch, and might recall all his subjects out of their service; and that we might have the same freedom of trade, and the security of his ports for our men of war.

Whilst the king took this care for the advancement of his affairs abroad, there was an advantage offered him, that looked as if it came from Heaven. There came one day a gentleman, who looked rather like a carter, who spoke ill English, and desired that he might have a private audience with the chancellor; who presently sent for him, and in a short time knew him to be a Benedictine monk, who had been sometimes with him at Cologne, and belonged to the English abbey at Lamspring in Westphalia, where a very reverend person of the family of Gascoigne in Yorkshire was abbot, with whom the chancellor had much acquaintance, and esteemed him very much; and he had, during the time the king stayed in Cologne, sent this monk several times thither, who was likewise a gentleman, but by living long in Germany had almost forgot the language as well as the manners of his own country. His business now was to deliver him a letter (whereof he knew little of the contents) from the bishop of Munster, upon the edge of whose dominions that English abbey was seated, which had likewise a territory that extended to the principality of the other, and received much favour and protection from the other; who desired the abbot to give him an honest man, that would carry a letter from him to the court of England: upon which this monk was deputed, the rather because he was known to the chancellor. The matter of the letter was no more, than "that if the war against Holland was to be resolutely prosecuted by the king of England, he (the bishop) conceived that a conjunction with those allies, who could infest the Dutch by land as his majesty would do by sea, might not be unacceptable to his majesty; and in that case, upon the answer to this letter, he would send a fit person to make some propositions to the king and to treat with him." The instructions the monk had, were "to make all possible haste back, and that as soon as he returned on that side the sea, he should send the answer he had received, by the post, so directed as was appointed; and then that himself should stay at Brussels till he received further orders."

The chancellor quickly informed the king of this despatch, to whom the monk was likewise known; and his majesty immediately assembled those lords with whom he consulted in the most secret cases. Every body knew so much of the bishop of Munster, that he was a warlike prince, having had command in armies before he dedicated himself to the church, and that he had a great animosity against Holland, which had obliged him in the highest point, by encouraging his subjects to rebel against him, and those of his city of Munster to shut their gates against him: and when he endeavoured to reduce them by force, and to that purpose had besieged them with his army, the Dutch sent an army to relieve it, and declared that they would protect that city. And by this means, and by the mediation of the neighbour princes, who had no mind that the peace of their country should be disturbed by such an incursion, the bishop was hindered from taking that vengeance upon his rebel subjects which he intended, and compelled to accept of such conditions as did not please him. And all this was but two years before, and boiled still in his breast, that was naturally very hot. But he was a poor prince, unable to give any disturbance to the United Provinces, whose dominions extended within a day's march of his. However, every man was of opinion, that the proposition ought to be very kindly received, and the bishop invited to send his agent. And to that purpose the chancellor wrote to him, and the monk was despatched the next day. And having observed his orders in sending away the answer, he was very few days at Brussels, when a servant of the bishop arrived with orders that the monk should accompany him back into England: and so they both arrived in London in less time than could be expected.

The gentleman who came from the bishop was a very proper man, well-bred, a baron of that country, but a subject to the bishop: he brought with him a letter of credit from the bishop to the king, and full authority to treat and conclude according to his instructions, which he likewise presented to his majesty. He brought likewise a letter to the chancellor from the elector of Mentz, in which he recommended to him the person whom the bishop of Munster should send, and declared "that he believed the bishop of Munster would be able to perform whatsoever he should undertake:" which letter was a very great encouragement to the king: for his majesty knew the elector of Mentz very well to be a very wise prince and notoriously his friend, and that he would not say so much of the ability of the bishop to perform, except he knew particularly his design, and what he would undertake to do.

The baron's instructions were to propose, "that his majesty would cause one hundred thousand pounds to be immediately paid, by bills of exchange at Hamburgh or Cologne or Francfort, to such persons as the bishop should appoint to receive it; and should promise to pay fifty thousand pounds by the month in the same places for three months to come: afterwards he hoped the army would provide for its own support. This being undertaken on his majesty's part, the bishop would be engaged, within one month after the first bills of exchange for the one hundred thousand pounds should be delivered into the hands of his agent the baron, that he would be in the dominions of the States General with an army of sixteen thousand foot and four thousand horse; with which he was very confident he should within few days be possessed of Arnheim, and shortly after of Utrecht: and if the king's fleet came before Amsterdam, that army of the bishop should march to what place or quarter his majesty should direct."

The baron was asked, "how it could be possible for the bishop, though a gallant prince and very active, to draw together such an army in so short a time out of his small province; and how he was sure that his neighbours, who two years before had compelled him to make so disadvantageous a peace with the Dutch, would not again use the same violent importunity to obstruct his proceedings." To which he answered, "that the bishop would never undertake to bring such an army together in so short a time, in which they could not be levied, but that he knows they are already levied, and upon an assurance of money can be brought together in the short time proposed: for the other, the interposition of his neighbours, he had not then, when they prevailed, half that army which he was sure he should now have; besides, those neighbours were now as much incensed against the Dutch as his master was, and would all engage with him against them; and that many of the army that is designed were at present quartered in their dominions; and that the bishop intended not to march in his own private capacity, but as general of the empire, for which the elector of Mentz had undertaken to "procure him a commission." He was demanded "how his master stood with France, and whether he did not fear that it would either prevent the enterprise by mediation, or disappoint it by sending aid to Holland." He answered, "his master was confident France would not do him any harm: that he had sent an agent, from whom he should be sure to receive letters by every post." And within few days after, he shewed a letter that he had received from that agent, in which he said, "that Monsieur de Lionne bade him assure the bishop, that his Christian majesty would do nothing to his prejudice."

This being the state of that affair, the king considered what he was to do. The propositions made by the bishop were such, as it was not possible for him to comply with. But then it was presumed by every body, that very much would be abated of the money that was demanded: for it was not an auxiliary army that was to be raised for the king's service, whose conquests were to be applied to his benefit, but an army raised to revenge the injuries which himself had received, and what he should get must be to his own account; and his majesty's hostility at sea would as much facilitate his enterprise at land, as the marching of his army might probably disturb and distract their preparations for the sea. Yet it could not be expected, that the bishop could draw this army together (and the attempt was not to be made with less force) without a good supply of money, nor keep it together without pay.

The advantage, that would with God's blessing attend this conjunction, spread itself to a very large prospect. That the people generally in the provinces were very unsatisfied with this war, was a thing notorious; and that the province of Holland which began it, and was entirely governed by De Wit, did even compel the other provinces to concur with them, partly upon hope that a further progress would be prevented by treaty, or that a peace would follow upon the first engagement. But when they should see an army of twenty thousand men, which they suspected not, to invade their country at land, and in that part where they were most secure, and from whence so much of their necessary provisions were daily brought; they must be in great consternation, and draw all their land army together, which they had not done in near twenty years, and could not be done to any effect without vast charge, which would put the people into a loud distraction. Finally, there was great reason to cherish the design: and therefore the king resolved by an unanimous advice to undertake any thing towards it, that could be in his power to perform.

There was one difficulty occurred, that had not been thought of nor so much as apprehended by the baron, which was the return of the money, whatsoever should be assigned to that service; for of the three places proposed by him, besides the secrecy that was requisite, all the trade of London could not assign one thousand pounds in the month to be paid upon Cologne and Francfort; nor could Hamburgh itself be charged with twenty thousand pounds in three months' time: which when the agent knew, he seemed amazed, and said, "they had believed that it had been as easy to have transmitted money to those three towns, as it was for them to receive it from thence."

In conclusion, the king gave his answer in writing, what sum of money he would cause to be paid at once for the first advance, that the bishop might begin his march, and what he would afterwards cause to be paid by the month; which being less than the baron's instructions would admit him to accept, he sent an express with it to the bishop: and "till his return," he desired, "that the king would appoint some person of experience to confer with him; and they might together inform themselves of the best expedients to return money into Germany, since his majesty had hitherto only undertaken to pay his assignations in London." What success this treaty afterwards had will be related in its place.

These advantages from abroad being in this manner deliberated and designed, it may be very seasonable to look back, and consider what preparations were made at home towards the carrying [on] this war, for which the parliament had provided so bountifully: and if ordinary prudence had been applied to the managery, if any order and method had been consulted and steadily pursued for the conducting the whole, the success would have been answerable, and at least any inconvenience from the sudden want of money would have been prevented. But whoever was at any distance in that time when those transactions were in agitation, as there are yet many worthy men who were, or shall be able to procure a sincere information of the occurrences of that time, will be obliged to confess, that they who contrived the war had the entire conducting it, and were the sole causes of all the ill effects of it; which cannot be set down particularly without wounding those, who were by their confidence in ill instruments made accessory to those mischiefs, in which themselves suffered most. Nor is it the end of this true relation to fix a brand upon the memory of those, who deserve it from the public and from very many worthy men, but is to serve only for a memorial to cast my own eyes upon, when I cannot but reflect upon those proceedings; and by my consent shall never come into any hands but theirs, who for their own sakes will take care to preserve it from any public view or perusal.

It cannot be denied and may very truly be averred, that from the hour of the king's return, and being possessed of the entire government, the naval affairs were never put into any order. That province, being committed to the duke as lord high admiral of England, was so entirely engrossed by his servants, in truth by Mr. Coventry, who was newly made his secretary, and who made use of his other servants, who were better known to him, to infuse into his highness the opinion, "that whoever presumed to meddle in any thing that related to the navy or the admiralty, invaded his jurisdiction, and would lessen him in the eyes of the people; and that he ought to be jealous of such men, as of those who would undermine his greatness; and that as he was superior to all men by being the king's brother, so being high admiral he was to render account to none but to the king, nor suffer any body else to interpose in any thing relating to it." Whereas in truth there is no officer of the crown more subject to the council-board than the admiral of England, who is to give an account of all his actions and of every branch of his office constantly to the board, and to receive their orders: nor hath he the nomination of the captains of the ships, till upon the presentation of their names he receives their approbation, which is never denied. Nor was there any counsellor who had ever sat at the board in the last king's time, to whom this was not as much known as any order of the table.

But there was no retrieving this authority, not only from the influence Mr. Coventry, and they of the family who adhered to him, had upon the duke, but from the king's own inclination, who thought that those officers, who immediately depended upon himself and only upon himself, were more at his devotion than they who were obliged to give an account to any other superior. And from the time that he came first into France, he had not been accustomed to any discourse more than to the undervaluing the privy-council, as if it shadowed the king too much, and usurped too much of his authority, and too often superseded his own commands. And the queen his mother had, upon these discourses, always some instances of the authority which in such a case the council had assumed against the king's judgment; the exception to which, according to the relation which nobody could question, seemed to be very reasonable. This kind of discourse, being the subject of every day, made so great impression that it could never be defaced, and made the election and nomination of counsellors less considered, since they were to be no more advised with afterwards than before.

Another argument, that used to be as frequently insisted upon by the queen, and with more passion and indignation, was of the little respect and reverence that by the law or custom of England was paid to the younger sons of the crown; and though there was nobody present in those conversations who knew any thing of the law or custom in those cases, yet all that was said was taken as granted. And not only the duke but the king himself had a marvellous prejudice to the nation in that part of good manners: and it was easily agreed, that the model of France was in those and other cases much more preferable, and which was afterwards observed in too many.

This being then the state and temper of the royal family when the king returned, which then consisted of the duke of Gloucester, and two princesses more than it now hath; the very next morning after the fleet came to Scheveling, the duke went on board and took possession of it as lord high admiral: and so his secretary provided new commissions for all the officers who were in present command, for which it is probable they all paid very liberally; for with him the custom began to receive five pounds for every warrant signed by the duke, and for which no secretary to any lord admiral formerly had ever received above twenty shillings. Mr. Coventry, who was utterly unacquainted with all the rules and customs of the sea, and knew none of the officers, but was much courted by all, as the secretary to the admiral always is, made choice of captain Pen, whom the king knighted as soon as he came on board; who from a common man had grown up under Cromwell to the highest command, and was in great favour with him till he failed in the action of St. Domingo, when he went admiral at sea, as Venables was general at land, for which they were both imprisoned in the Tower by Cromwell, nor ever employed by him afterwards : but upon his death he had command again at sea, as he had at this time under Mountague when he came to attend the king. With this man Mr. Coventry made a fast friendship, and was guided by him in all things.

All the offices which belonged to the ships, to the navy, to the yards, to the whole admiralty, (except the three superior officers, which are not in the disposal of the admiral,) were now void, and to be supplied by the duke, that is, by Mr. Coventry ; who by the advice of sir William Pen, who was solely trusted by him in the brocage, conferred them upon those (without observing any other rule) who would give most money, not considering any honest seaman who had continued in the king's service, or suffered long imprisonment for him. And because an incredible sum of money was and would rise this way, some principal officers in the yards, as the master smith and others, and the keepers of the stores, yielding seven, eight hundred, or a thousand pounds ; he had the skill to move the duke to bestow such money as would arise upon such place upon sir Charles Berkley, for another to another, and for some to be divided between two or three : by which means the whole family was obliged, and retained to justify him ; and the duke himself looked upon it as a generosity in Mr. Coventry, to accommodate his fellow servants with what he might have asked or kept for himself. But it was the best husbandry he could have used : for by this means all men's mouths were stopped, and all clamour secured ; whilst the lesser sums for a multitude of offices of all kinds were reserved to himself, and which, in the estimation of those who were at no great distance, amounted to a very [great] sum, and more than any officer under the king could possibly get by all the perquisites of his place in many years. By this means, the whole navy and ships were filled with the same men who had enjoyed the same places and offices under Cromwell, and thereby were the better able to pay well for them ; whereof many of the most infamous persons which that time took notice of were now become the king's officers, to the great scandal of their honest neighbours, who observed that they retained the same manners and affections, and used the same discourses they had formerly done.

Besides many other irreparable inconveniences and mischiefs which resulted from this corruption and choice, one grew quickly visible and notorious, in the stealing and embezzling all manner of things out of the ships, even when they were in service : but when they returned from any voyages, incredible proportions of powder, match, cordage, sails, anchors, and all other things, instead of being restored to the several proper officers which were to receive them, were embezzled and sold, and very often sold to the king himself for the setting out other ships and for replenishing his stores. And when this was discovered (as many times it was) and the criminal person apprehended, it was alleged by him as a defence or excuse, "that he had paid so dear for his place, that he could not maintain himself" and family without practising such shifts : and none of those fellows were ever brought to exemplary justice, and most of them were restored to their employments.

The three superior officers of the navy were possessed of their offices by patents under the great seal of England before the king's return ; and they are the natural established council of the lord high admiral, and are to attend him when he requires it, and always used of course to be with him one certain day in a week, to render him an account of all the state of the office, and to receive his orders and to give their advice. And now, because these three depended not enough upon him, but especially out of animosity against sir George Carteret, who, besides being treasurer of the navy, was vice-chamberlain of the king's household, and so a privy counsellor ; Mr. Coventry proposed to the duke, "that in regard of the multiplicity of business in the navy, much more than in former times, and the setting out greater fleets than had been accustomed in that age when those officers and that model for the government of the navy had been established, his royal highness would propose to the king to make an addition, by commissioners, of some other persons always to sit with the other officers with equal authority, and to sign all bills with them ;" which was a thing never heard of before, and is in truth a lessening of the power of the admiral. It is very true, there have frequently been commissioners for the navy ; but it hath been in the same [place] of the admiral and to perform his office : but in the time of an admiral commissioners have not been heard of. One principal end in this was, to draw from the treasurer of the navy (whose office Mr. Coventry thought too great, and had implacable animosity against him from the first hour after he had made his friendship with Pen) out of his fees (which, though no greater than were granted by his patent and had been always enjoyed by his predecessors, were indeed greater than had used to be in times of peace, when much less money passed through his hands) what should be enough to pay those commissioners ; for it was not reasonable they should serve for nothing, nor that they should be upon the king's charge, since the treasurer's perquisites might be enough for all.

The duke liked the proposition well, and, without conferring with any body else upon it, proposed it to the king at the council-board, where nobody thought fit to examine or debate what the duke proposed ; and the king approved it, and ordered, "that the commissioners should receive each five hundred pounds by the year : " but finding afterwards that the treasurer of the navy's fees were granted to him under the great seal, his majesty did not think it just to take it from him, but would bear it himself, and appointed the treasurer to pay and pass those pensions in his account. The commissioners named and commended by the duke to the king were the lord Berkley, sir John Lawson, sir William Pen, and sir George Ayscue ; the three [last] the most eminent sea-officers under Cromwell, but it must not be denied but that they served the king afterwards very faithfully. These the king made his commissioners, with a pension to each of five hundred pounds the year, and in some time after added Mr. Coventry to the number with the same pension : so that this first reformation in the time of peace cost the king one way or other no less than three thousand pounds yearly, without the least visible benefit or advantage. The lord Berkeley neither understood any thing that related to the office or employment, and therefore very seldom was present in the execution. But after he had enjoyed the pension a year or thereabout, he procured leave to sell his place, and procured a gentleman, Mr. Thomas Harvey, to give him three thousand pounds for it : so soon this temporary commission, which might have expired within a month, got the reputation of an office for life by the good managery of an officer.

This was the state of the navy before the war with Holland was resolved upon. Let us in the next place see what alterations were made in it, or what other preparations were made, or counsels entered upon, for the better conduct of this war : and a clear and impartial view or reflection upon what was then said and done, gave discerning men an unhappy presage of what would follow. There was no discourse now in the court, after this royal subsidy of five and twenty hundred thousand pounds was granted, but, "of giving the law to the whole trade of Christendom ; of making all ships which passed by or through the narrow seas to pay an imposition to the king, as all do to the king of Denmark who pass by the Sound ; and making all who pass near to pay contribution to his majesty ;" which must concern all the princes of Christendom : and the king and duke were often desired to discountenance and suppress this impertinent talk, which must increase the number of the enemies. Commissioners were appointed to reside in all or the most eminent port-towns, for the sale of all prize-goods ; and these were chosen for the most part out of those members of the house of commons, who were active to advance the king's service, or who promised to be so, to whom liberal salaries were assigned.

There were then commissioners appointed to judge all appeals, which should be made upon and against all sentences given by the judge of the admiralty and his deputies ; and these were all privy counsellors, the earl of Lauderdale, the lord Ashley, and the secretaries of state, who were like to be most careful of the king's profit. But then the rules which were prescribed to judge by were such as were [warranted] by no former precedents, and acknowledged to be just by the practice of any neighbour nation, and such as would make all ships which traded for Holland, from what kingdom soever, lawful prize ; which was foreseen would bring complaints from all places, as it did as soon as the war begun. French and Spaniard and Swede and Dane were alike treated ; whilst their ambassadors made loud complaints every day to the king and the council for the injustice and the rapine, without remedy, more than references to the admiralty, and then to the lords commissioners of appeal, which increased the charge, and raised and improved the indignity. Above all, the Hanse-Towns of Ham-burgh, Lubeck, Bremen, and the rest, (who had large exemptions and privileges by charter granted by former kings and now renewed by this,) had the worst luck ; for none of them could ever be distinguished from the Dutch. Their ships were so like, and their language so near, that not one of their vessels were met with, from what part of the world soever they came, or whithersoever they [were] bound, but they were brought [in] ;

and if the evidence was such as there could be no colour to retain them, but that they must be released, they always carried with them sad remembrances of the company they had been in.

There was one sure rule to make any ship prize, which was, if above three Dutch mariners were aboard it there need [no] further proof for the forfeiture ; which being no where known could not be prevented, all merchants' ships, when they are ready for their voyage, taking all seamen on board of what nation soever who are necessary for their service : so that those Dutchmen who run from their own country to avoid fighting, (as very many did, and very many more would have done,) and put themselves on board merchants' ships of any other country, where they were willingly entertained, made those ships lawful prize in which they served, by a rule that nobody knew nor would submit to.

It was resolved that all possible encouragement should be given to privateers, that is, to as many as would take commissions from the admiral to set out vessels of war, as they call them, to take prizes from the enemy ; which no articles or obligations can restrain from all the villany they can act, and are a people, how countenanced soever or thought necessary, that do bring an unavoidable scandal, and it is to be feared a curse, upon the justest war that was ever made at sea. A sail ! A sail ! is the word with them ; friend or foe is the same ; they possess all they can master, and run with it to any obscure place where they can sell it, (which retreats are never wanting,) and never attend the ceremony of an adjudication. Besides the horrible scandal and clamour that this classis of men brought upon the king and the whole government for defect of justice, the prejudice which resulted from thence to the public and to the carrying on the service is unspeakable : all seamen run to them. And though the king now assigned an ample share of all prizes taken by his own ships to the seamen, over and above their wages ; yet there was great difference between the condition of the one and the other : in the king's fleet they might gain well, but they were sure of blows, nothing could be got there without fighting ; with the privateers there was rarely fighting, they took all who could make little resistance, and fled from all who were too strong for them. And so those fellows were always well manned, when the king's ships were compelled to stay many days for want of men, who were raised by pressing and with great difficulty. And whoever spake against those lewd people, upon any case whatsoever, was thought to have no regard for the duke's profit, nor to desire to weaken the enemy.

In all former wars at sea, as there was great care taken to appoint commissioners for the sale of all prize-goods, who understood the value of those commodities they had to sell, yet were compelled to sell better bargains than are usually got in public markets ; so there was all strictness used in bringing all receivers to as punctual an account, as any other of the king's receivers are bound to make, and to compel them to pay in all the money they receive into the exchequer, that it might be issued out to the treasurer of the navy or to other officers for the expense of the war. And it had been a great argument in the first consultations upon this war, "that it would "support itself; and that after one good fleet should be set out once to beat the Dutch," (for that was never thought worthy of a doubt,) "the prizes, which would every day after be taken, would plentifully do all the rest; besides the great sum that the Dutch would give to purchase their peace, and the yearly rent they would give for the liberty of fishing;" with all which it was not thought fit to allow them "to keep above such a number of ships of war, limited to so many ton and to so many guns;" with many particulars of that nature, which were carefully digested by those who promoted the war. But now, after this supply given by the parliament, there was no more danger of want of money: and many discourses there were, "that the prize-money might be better disposed in rebuilding the king's houses, and many other good uses which would occur;" and the king forbore to speak any more of appointing receivers and treasurers for that purpose, when all or most other officers, who were judged necessary for the service, were already named; and the lord treasurer, who by his office should have the recommendation of those officers to the king, had a list of men, who for the reputation and experience they had were in his judgment worthy to be trusted, to be presented to the king when he should enter upon that subject.

But one evening a servant of the lord Ashley came to the chancellor with a bill signed, and desired in his master's name, "that it might be sealed that night." The bill was, "to make and constitute the lord Ashley treasurer of all the money that should be raised upon the sale of all prizes, which were or should be taken in this present war, with power to make all such officers as should be necessary for the service; and that he should account for all monies so received to the king himself, and to no other person whatsoever, and pay and issue out all those monies which he should receive, in such manner as his majesty should appoint by warrant under his sign manual, and by no other warrant; and that he should be free and exempt from accounting into the exchequer." When the chancellor had seen the contents, he bade the messenger tell his lord, "that he would speak with the king before he would seal that grant, and that he desired much to speak with himself."

The next morning he waited upon the king, and informed him "of the bill that was brought to him, and doubted that he had been surprised: that it was not only such an original as was without any precedent, but in itself in many particulars destructive to his service and to the right of other men. That all receivers of any part of his revenue were accountable in the exchequer, and could receive their discharge in no other place: and that if so great a receipt, as this was already," (for the fleet of wine and other ships already seized were by a general computation valued at one hundred thousand pounds,) "and as it evidently would be, should pass without the most formal account; his majesty might be abominably cozened, nor could it any other way be prevented. And in the next place, that this grant was not only derogatory to the lord treasurer, but did really degrade him, there being another treasurer made more absolute than himself, and without dependence upon him." And therefore he besought his majesty, "that he would reconsider the thing itself and hear it debated, at least that the treasurer might be first heard, without which it could not be done in justice:" to which he added, "that he would speak with the lord Ashley himself, and tell him how much he was to blame to affect such a province, which might bring great inconveniences upon his person and his estate."

He quickly found that the king had not been surprised in what he had done, "which," he said, "was absolutely in his own power to do; and that it would bring prejudice only to himself, which he had sufficiently provided against." However, he seemed willing to decline any thing that looked like an affront to the treasurer, and therefore was content that the sealing it might be suspended till he had further considered.

The lord Ashley came shortly to the chancellor, and seemed "to take it unkindly that his patent was not sealed:" to which he answered, "that he had suspended the immediate sealing it for three reasons; whereof one was, that he might first speak with the king, who he believed would receive much prejudice by it; another, that it would not consist with the respect he owed to the lord treasurer, who was much affronted in it, to seal it before he was made acquainted with it. And in the last place, that he had stopped it for his, the lord Ashley's, own sake: and that he believed he had neither enough considered the indignity that was offered to the lord treasurer, to whom he professed so much respect, and by whose favour and powerful interposition he enjoyed the office he held, nor his own true interest, in submitting his estate to those incumbrances which such a receipt would inevitably expose it to. And that the exemption from making any account but to the king himself would deceive him: and as it was an unusual and unnatural privilege, so it would never be allowed in any court of justice, which would exact both the account and the payment or lawful discharge of what money he should receive; and if he depended upon the exemption he would live to repent it."

He answered little to the particulars more than with some sullenness, "that the king had given him the office, and knew best what is good for his own service; and that except his majesty retracted his grant, he would look to enjoy the benefit of it. That he did not desire to put an affront upon the lord treasurer; and if there were any expressions in his commission which reflected upon him, he was content they should be mended or left out: in all other respects he was resolved to run the hazard."

The treasurer himself, though he knew that he was not well used, and exceedingly disdained the behaviour of his nephew, (for the lord Ashley had married his niece,) who he well knew had by new friendships cancelled all the obligations to him, would not appear to oppose what the king resolved, but sat unconcerned, and took no notice of any thing. And so within a short time the king sent a positive order to the chancellor to seal the commission; which he could no longer refuse, and did it with the more trouble, because he very well knew, that few men knew the lord

Ashley better than the king himself did, or had a worse opinion of his integrity. But he was now gotten into friendships which were most beboveful to him, and which could remove or reconcile all prejudices: he was fast linked to sir Harry Bennet and Mr. Coventry in a league offensive and defensive, the same friends and the same enemies, and had got an entire trust with the lady, who very well understood the benefit such an officer would be to her. Nor was it difficult to persuade the king (who thought himself more rich in having one thousand pounds in his closet that nobody knew of, than in fifty thousand pounds in his exchequer) how many conveniences he would find in having so much money at his own immediate disposal, without the formality of privy seals and other men's warrants, and the indecency and mischief which would attend a formal account of all his generous donatives and expense, which should be known only to himself.

Though the king seemed to continue the same gracious countenance towards the chancellor which he had used, and frequently came to his house when he was indisposed with the gout, and consulted all his business, which he thought of public importance, with him with equal freedom; yet he himself found, and many others observed, that he had not the same credit and power with him. The nightly meetings had of late made him more the subject of the discourse; and since the time of the new secretary they had taken more liberty to talk of what was done in council, than they had done formerly; and the duke of Buckingham pleased himself and all the company in acting all the persons who spake there in their looks and motions, in which piece of mimicry he had an especial faculty; and in this exercise the chancellor had a full part. In the height of mirth, if the king said "he would go such a journey or do such a trivial thing to-morrow," somebody would lay a wager that he would not do it; and when he asked why, it was answered, "that the chancellor would not let him:" and then another would protest, "that he thought there was no ground for that imputation; however, he could not deny that it was generally believed abroad, that his majesty was entirely and implicitly governed by the chancellor." Which often put the king to declare in some passion, "that the chancellor had served him long, and understood his business, in which he trusted him: but in any other matter than his business, he had no other credit with him than any other man;" which they reported with great joy in other companies.

In the former session of the parliament, the lord Ashley, out of his indifferency in matters of religion, and the lord Arlington out of his goodwill to the Roman catholics, had drawn in the lord privy seal, whose interest was most in the presbyterians, to propose to the king an indulgence for liberty of conscience: for which they offered two motives; the one, "the probability of a war with the Dutch;" though it was not then declared; and in that case the prosecution of people at home for their several opinions in religion would be very inconvenient, and might prove mischievous." The other was, "that in the fright men were in by reason of the late bill against conventicles, and the warmth the parliament expressed with reference to the church, had so "prepared all sorts of non-conformists, that they would gladly compound for liberty at any reasonable rates: and by this means a good yearly revenue might be raised to the king, and a firm concord and tranquillity be established in the kingdom, if power were granted by the parliament to the king to grant dispensations to such whom he knew to be peaceably affected, for their exercise of that religion which was agreeable to their conscience, without undergoing the penalty of the laws." And they had prepared a schedule, in which they computed what every Roman catholic would be willing to pay yearly for the exercise of his religion, and so of every other sect; which, upon the estimate they made, would indeed have amounted to a very great sum of money yearly.

The king liked the arguments and the project very well, and wished them to prepare such a bill; which was done quickly, very short, and without any mention of other advantage to grow from it, than "the peace and quiet of the [kingdom], and an entire reference to the king's own judgment and discretion in dispensing his dispensations." This was equally approved: and though hitherto it had been managed with great secrecy, that it might not come to the knowledge of the chancellor and the treasurer, who they well knew would never consent to it; yet the king resolved to impart it to them. And the chancellor being then afflicted with the gout, the committee that used to be called was appointed to meet at Worcester-house: and thither likewise came the privy seal, and the lord Ashley, who had never before been present in those meetings.

The king informed them of the occasion of their conference, and caused the draught for the bill to be read to them; which was done, and such reasons given by those who promoted it, as they thought fit; the chief of which was, "that there could be no danger in trusting the king, whose zeal to the protestant religion was so well known, that nobody would doubt that he would use this power, when granted to him, otherwise than should be for the good and benefit of the church and state." The chancellor and the treasurer, as had been presaged, were very warm against it, and used many arguments to dissuade the king from prosecuting it, "as a thing that could never find the concurrence of either or both houses, and which would raise a jealousy in both, and in the people generally, of his affection to the papists, which would not be good for either, and every body knew that he had no favour for either of the other factions." But what the others said, who were of another opinion, prevailed more; and his majesty declared, "that the bill should be presented to the house of peers as from him, and in his name; and that he hoped none of his servants, who knew his mind as well as every body there did, would oppose it, but either be absent or silent:" to which both the lords answered, "that they should not be absent purposely, and if they were present, they hoped his majesty would excuse them if they spake according to their conscience and judgment, which they could not forbear to do;" with which his majesty seemed unsatisfied, though the lords of the combination were better pleased than they would have been with their concurrence.

Within few days after, the chancellor remaining still in his chamber without being able to go, the bill was presented in the house of peers by the lord privy seal, as by the king's direction and approbation, and thereupon had the first reading: and as soon as it was read, the lord treasurer spake against it, "as unfit to be received and to have the countenance of another reading in the house, being a design against the protestant religion and in favour of the papists," with many sharp reflections upon those who had spoken for it; and many of the bishops spake to the same purpose, and urged many weighty arguments against it. However it was moved, "that since it was averred that it was with the king's privy, it would be a thing unheard of to deny it a second reading;" and that there might be no danger of a surpriſal by its being read in a thin house, it was ordered "that it should be read the second time" upon a day named "at ten of the clock in the morning;" with which all were satisfied.

In the mean time great pains were taken to persuade particular men to approve it: and some of the bishops were sharply reprehended for opposing the king's prerogative, with some intimation "that if they continued in that obstinacy they should repent it;" to which they made such answers as in honesty and wisdom they ought to do, without being shaken in their resolution. It was rather insinuated than declared, "that the bill had been perused," some said "drawn, by the chancellor," and averred "that he was not against it:" which being confidently reported, and believed or not believed as he was more or less known to the persons present, he thought himself obliged to make his own sense known. And so on the day appointed for the second reading, with pain and difficulty he was in his place in the house: and so after the second reading of the bill, he was of course to propose the commitment of it. Many of the bishops and others spake fiercely against it, as a way to undermine religion; and the lord treasurer, with his usual weight of words, shewed the ill consequence that must attend it, and "that in the bottom it was a project to get money at the price of religion; which he believed was not intended or known to the king, but only to those who had projected it, and, it may be, imposed upon others who meant well."

The lord privy seal, either upon the observation of the countenance of the house or advertisement of his friends, or unwilling to venture his reputation in the enterprise, had given over the game the first day, and now spake not at all: but the lord Ashley adhered firmly to his point, spake often and with great sharpness of wit, and had a cadence in his words and pronunciation that drew attention. He said, "it was the king's misfortune that a matter of so great concernment to him, and such a prerogative as it may be would be found to be inherent in him without any declaration of parliament, should be supported only by such weak men as himself, who served his majesty at a distance, whilst the great officers of the crown thought fit to oppose it; which he more wondered at, because nobody knew more than they the king's unshakable firmness in his religion, that had resisted and vanquished so many great temptations; and therefore he could not be thought un"worthy of a greater trust with reference to it, than he would have by this bill."

The chancellor, having not been present at the former debate upon the first day, thought it fit to sit silent in this, till he found the house in some expectation to hear his opinion: and then he stood up and said, "that no man could say more, if it were necessary or pertinent, of the king's constancy in his religion, and of his understanding the constitution and foundation of the church of England, than he; no man had been witness to more assaults which he had sustained than he had been, and of many victories; and therefore, if the question were how far he might be trusted in that point, he should make no scruple in declaring, that he thought him more worthy to be trusted than any man alive. But there was nothing in that bill that could make that the question, which had confounded all notions of religion, and erected a chaos of policy to overthrow all religion and government: so that the question was not, whether the king were worthy of that trust, but whether that trust were worthy of the king. That it had been no new thing for kings to divest themselves of many particular rights and powers, because they were thereby exposed to more trouble and vexation, and so deputed that authority to others qualified by them: and he thought it a very unreasonable and unjust thing to commit such a trust to the king, which nobody could suppose he could execute himself, and yet must subject him to daily and hourly importunities, which must be so much the more uneasy to a nature of so great bounty and generosity, that nothing is so ungrateful to him as to be obliged to deny."

In the vehemence of this debate, the lord Ashley having used some language that he knew reflected upon him, the chancellor let fall some unwary expressions, which were turned to his reproach and remembered long after. When he insisted upon the wildness and illimitedness in the bill, he said, "it was ship-money in religion, that nobody could know the end of, or where it would rest; that if it were passed, Dr. Goffe or any other apostate from the church of England might be made a bishop or archbishop here, all oaths and statutes and subscriptions being dispensed with:" which were thought too envious instances, and gave his enemies opportunities to make glosses and reflections upon to his disadvantage. In this debate it fell out that the duke of York appeared very much against the bill; which was imputed to the chancellor, and served to "heap coals of fire upon his head." In the end, very few having spoken for it, though there were many who would have consented to it, besides the catholic lords, it was agreed that there should be no question put for the commitment; which was the most civil way of rejecting it, and left it to be no more called for.

The king was infinitely troubled at the ill success of this bill, which he had been assured would pass notwithstanding the opposition that was expected; and it had produced one effect that was foreseen though not believed, in renewing the bitterness against the Roman catholics. And they, who watched all occasions to perform those offices, had now a large field to express their malice against the chancellor and the treasurer, "whose pride only had disposed them to shew "their power and credit in diverting the house "from gratifying the king, to which they had "been inclined;" and his majesty heard all that could be said against them without any dislike. After two or three days he sent for them both together into his closet, which made it generally believed in the court, that he resolved to take both their offices from them, and they did in truth believe and expect [it]: but there was never any cause appeared after to think that it was in his purpose. He spake to them of other business, without taking the least notice of the other matter, and dismissed them with a countenance less open than he used to have towards them, and made it evident that he had not the same thoughts of them he had formerly.

And when the next day the chancellor went to him alone, and was admitted into his cabinet, and began to take notice "that he seemed to have "dissatisfaction in his looks towards him;" the king, in more choler than he had ever before seen him, told him, "his looks were such as they "ought to be; that he was very much unsatisfied "with him, and thought he had used him very "ill; that he had deserved better of him, and did "not expect that he would have carried himself "in that manner as he had done in the house of "peers, having known his majesty's own opinion "from himself, which it seemed was of no authority with him if it differed from his judgment, "to which he would not submit against his reason."

The other, with the confidence of an honest man, entered upon the discourse of the matter, assured him "the very proposing it had done his "majesty much prejudice, and that they who "were best affected to his service in both houses "were much troubled and afflicted with it: and "of those who advised him to it, one knew nothing of the constitution of England, and was "not thought to wish well to the religion of it; "and the other was so well known to him, that "nothing was more wonderful than that his majesty should take him for a safe counsellor." He had recourse then again to the matter, and used some arguments against it which had not been urged before, and which seemed to make impression. He heard all he said with patience, but seemed not to change his mind, and answered no more than "that it was no time to speak to "the matter, which was now passed; and if it "had been unseasonably urged, he might still "have carried himself otherwise than he had "done;" and so spake of somewhat else.

His majesty did not withdraw any of his trust or confidence from him in his business, and seemed to have the same kindness for him: but from that time he never had the same credit with him as he had before. The lord Ashley got no ground, but sir Harry Bennet very much, who, though he spake very little in council, shewed his power out of it, by persuading his majesty to recede from many resolutions he had taken there. And afterwards, in all the debates in council which were preparatory to the war, and upon those particulars which have been mentioned before, which concerned the justice and policy that was to be observed, whatsoever was offered by the chancellor or treasurer was never considered. It was answer enough, "that they were enemies to the war;" which was true, as long as it was in deliberation: but from the time it was resolved and remediless, none of them who promoted it contributed any thing to the carrying it on proportionably to what was done by the other two.

There was another and a greater mischief than hath been mentioned, that resulted from that unhappy debate; which was the prejudice and disadvantage that the bishops underwent by their so unanimous dislike of that bill. For from that time the king never treated any of them with that respect as he had done formerly, and often spake of them too slightly; which easily encouraged others not only to mention their persons very negligently, but their function and religion itself, as an invention to impose upon the free judgments and understandings of men. What was preached in the pulpit was commented upon and derided in the chamber, and preachers acted, and sermons vilified as laboured discourses, which the preachers made only to shew their own parts and wit, without any other design than to be commended and preferred. These grew to be the subjects of the mirth and wit of the court; and so much license [was] manifested in it, that gave infinite scandal to those who observed it, and to those who received the reports of it: and all serious and prudent men took it as an ill presage, that whilst all warlike preparations were made in abundance suitable to the occasion, there should so little preparation of spirit be for a war against an enemy, who might possibly be without some of our virtues, but assuredly was without any of our vices.

There begun now to appear another enemy, much more formidable than the Dutch, and more difficult to be struggled with; which was the plague, that brake out in the winter, and made such an early progress in the spring, that though the weekly numbers did not rise high, and it appeared to be only in the outskirts of the town, and in the most obscure alleys, amongst the poorest people; yet the ancient men, who well remembered in what manner the last great plague (which had been near forty years before) first brake out, and the progress it afterwards made, foretold a terrible summer. And many of them removed their families out of the city to country habitations; when their neighbours laughed at their providence, and thought they might have stayed without danger: but they found shortly that they had done wisely. In March it spread so much, that the parliament was very willing to part: which was likewise the more necessary, in regard that so many of the members of the house of commons were assigned to so many offices and employments which related to the war, and which required their immediate attendance. For though the fleet was not yet gone out, yet there were many prizes daily brought in, besides the first seizure, which by this time was [adjudged] lawful prize; in all which great loss was sustained by the license of officers as well as common men, and the absence of such as should restrain and punish it: so that, as soon as the bill was passed the houses for the good aid they had given the king, and was ready for the royal assent, his majesty passed it, and prorogued the parliament in April (which was in 1665) till September following; his majesty declaring, "that if it pleased God to extinguish or "allay the fierceness of the plague," which at that time raged more, "he should be glad to meet them then; by which time they would judge by some success of the war, what was more to be done. But if that visitation increased, they should have notice by proclamation that they might not hazard themselves."

The parliament being thus prorogued, there was the same reason to hasten out the fleet; towards which the duke left nothing undone, which his unwearied industry and example could contribute towards [it], being himself on board, and having got all things necessary into his own ship that he cared for. But he found that it was absolutely requisite to put out to sea, though many things were wanting in other ships, even of beer and other provision of victual; not only to be before the enemy, but he saw it would be impossible, whilst the ships were in port, to keep the seamen from going on shore, by which they might bring the plague on board with them; and there was already a suspicion that the infection was got into one of the smaller ships.

It hath been said before, that all things relating to the fleet were upon the matter wholly governed by Mr. Coventry. It is very true, that the officers of the navy constantly attended the duke together with those three sea-captains who have been named before: but from the time that the war was declared, his highness consulted daily, for his own information and instruction, with sir John Lawson and sir George Ayscue and sir William Pen, all men of great experience, and who had commanded in several battles. Upon the advice of these men the duke always made his estimates and all propositions to the king. There was somewhat of rivalry between the two last, because they had been in equal command: therefore the duke took sir William Pen into his own ship, and made him captain of it; which was a great trust, and a very honourable command, that exempted him from receiving any orders but from the duke, and so extinguished the other emulation, the other two being flag-officers and to command several squadrons.

In all conferences with these men Mr. Coventry's presence and attendance was necessary, both to reduce all things into writing which were agreed upon, and to be able to put the duke in mind of what he was to do. Lawson was the man of whose judgment the duke had the best esteem; and he was in truth, of a man of that breeding, (for he was a perfect tarpawling,) a very extraordinary person; he understood his profession incomparably well, spake clearly and pertinently, but not pertinaciously enough when he was contradicted. Ayscue was a gentleman, but had kept ill company too long, which had blunted his understanding, if it had been ever sharp: he was of few words, yet spake to the purpose and to be easily understood. Pen, who had much the worst understanding, had a great mind to appear better bred, and to speak like a gentleman; he had got many good words, which he used at adventure; he was a formal man, and spake very leisurely but much, and left the matter more intricate and perplexed than he found it. He was entirely governed by Mr. Coventry, who still learned enough of him to offer any thing rationally in the debate or to cross what was not agreeable to his own fancy, by which he was still swayed out of the pride and perverseness of his will.

Upon debate and conference with these men, the duke brought propositions to the king reduced into writing by Mr. Coventry; and the king commonly consulted them with the lord treasurer in the presence, the propositions being commonly for increase of the expense, which Mr. Coventry was solicitous by all the ways possible to contrive. To those consultations the duke always brought the sea-officers, and Mr. Coventry, who spake much more than they, to explain especially what sir William Pen said, who took upon himself to speak most, and often what the others had never thought though they durst not contradict; and sir John Lawson often complained, "that Mr. Coventry put that in writing which had never been proposed by them, and would continue disputing it till they yielded." Every conference raised the charge very much; and what they proposed yesterday as enough was to-day made twice as much; if they proposed six fire-ships to be provided, within two or three days they demanded twelve: so there could be no possible computation of the charge.

By this means the fleet that was now ready to put to sea amounted to fourscore sail; and the king willingly consented, upon the reasons the duke presented to him, that they should set sail as soon as was possible. And before the end of April the duke was with the whole fleet at sea, and visited the coast of Holland, and took many ships in their view, their fleet being not yet in readiness. Many noblemen, the earl of Peterborough, the lord viscount Ferrers, and others, with many gentlemen of quality, went as volunteers, and were distributed into the several ships with much countenance by the duke, and as many taken into his own ship as could be done with convenience.

The duke of Buckingham had from the first mention of the war, which he promoted all he could, declared "that he would make one in it:" and when it was declared, he desired to have the command of a ship, which the duke positively denied to give him, except the king commanded it, (and his majesty was content to refer that, as he did the nomination of all the other officers, to his brother,) and did not think fit that a man, of what quality soever, who had never been at sea, should his first voyage have the command of any considerable ship, (and a small one had not been for his honour;) at which he was much troubled. Yet his friends told him that he was too far engaged, to stay at home when his royal highness ventured his own person: and thereupon he resolved to go a volunteer, and put himself on board a flag-ship, the captain whereof was in his favour. And then he desired, "that in respect of his quality, and his being a privy counsellor, he might be present in all councils of war." The duke thought this not reasonable, and would not make a new precedent. There were many of the ancient nobility, earls and barons; who were then on board as volunteers; and if the consideration of quality might entitle them to be present in council, all orders would be broken, there being none called but flag-officers: and therefore his royal highness positively refused to gratify him in that point; which the duke of Buckingham thought (it being enough known that the duke had neither esteem or kindness for him) to be such a personal disobedience, that would well excuse him for declining the enterprise. And pretending that he did appeal to the king in point of right, he left the fleet, and returned to the shore to complain. And we return back too to the view of other particulars.

There were two persons, whom the king and his brother did desire to make remarkable by some extraordinary favours: one of which was equally grateful to both, sir Charles Berkley, who had been lately created an Irish viscount by the name of lord Fitzharding, the old and true surname of the family; upon whom the king had, for reasons only known to himself, set his affection so much, that he had never denied anything he asked for himself or for any body else, and was well content that he should be looked upon as his favourite. He had been long thought so to the duke, who was willing to promote any thing to his advantage: and the king had deferred those instances only till the parliament should be prorogued, lest it should raise the appetites of others to make suits, which he had hitherto defended himself from, by declaring he would make no more lords. But the parliament was no sooner prorogued, than it was resolved to be put in execution: and when it was to be done, the chancellor had the honour to be present alone with the king and duke, when it seemed to be first thought of. And when the duke proposed it as a suit to the king, that he would make the lord Fitzharding an earl, extolling his courage and affection to the king; who was pleased with the motion to that degree, that he extolled him with praises which could be applied to few men: and it was quickly resolved that he should be an earl of England, and a title was as soon found out; and so he was created earl of Falmouth, before he had one foot of land in the world.

And to gratify the king for this favour, the duke likewise proposed that the king would make sir Harry Bennet a lord, whom all the world knew he did not care for; which was as willingly granted: and he had no more estate than the other, and could not so easily find a title for his barony. But because he had no mind to retain his own name, which was no good one, his first warrant was to be created Cheney, which was an ancient barony expired, and to which family he had not the least relation: and for some days upon the signing the warrant he was called lord Cheney, until a gentleman of the best quality in Buckinghamshire, who, though he had no title to the barony, was yet of the same family, and inherited most part of the estate, which was very considerable, and was married to a daughter of the duke of Newcastle, heard of it, and made haste to stop it. He went first to sir Harry Bennet himself, and desired him "not to affect a title to which he had no relation; and to which though he could not pretend of direct right, yet he was not [so] obscure but that himself or a son of his might hereafter be thought worthy of it by the crown; and in that respect it would be some trouble to him to see it vested in the family of a stranger." The secretary did not give him so civil an answer as he expected, having no knowledge of the gentleman. Yet shortly after, upon information of his condition and quality, (as he was in all respects very worthy of consideration,) the patent being not yet prepared, he was contented to take the title of a little farm that had belonged to his father and was sold by him, and now in the possession of another private person; and so was created lord Arlington, the proper and true name of the place being Harlington, a little village between London and Uxbridge.

The king took the occasion to make these two noblemen from an obligation that lay upon him to confer two honours at the same time; the one upon Mr. Frescheville, of a very ancient family in Derbyshire, and a fair estate, who had been always bred in the court, a menial servant of the last king, and had served him in the head of a troop of horse raised at his own charge in the war, and whom his late majesty had promised to make a baron.

The other was Mr. Richard Arundel of Trerice in Cornwall, a gentleman as well known by what he had done and suffered in the late time, as by the eminency of his family, and the fortune he was still master of after the great depredation of the time. John Arundel, his father, was of the best interest and estate of the gentlemen of Cornwall: and in the beginning of the troubles, when the lord Hopton and the other gentlemen with him were forced to retire into Cornwall, he and his friends supported them, and gave the first turn and opposition to the current of the parliament's usurpation; and to them, their courage and activity, all the success that the lord Hopton had afterwards was justly to be imputed as to the first rise. The old gentleman was then above seventy years of age, and infirm; but all his sons he engaged in the war: the two eldest were eminent officers, both members of the house of commons, and the more zealous soldiers by having been witnesses of the naughty proceedings of those who had raised the rebellion. The eldest was killed in the head of his troop, charging and driving back a bold sally that was made out of Plymouth when it was besieged: and this other gentleman of whom we now speak, and who was then the younger brother, was an excellent colonel of foot to the end of the war.

When sir Nicholas Slanning, who was governor of Pendennis, lost his life bravely in the siege of Bristol, the king knew not into what hands to commit that important place so securely, as by sending a commission to old John Arundel of Trerice to command, well knowing that it must be preserved principally by his interest; and in respect of his age joined his eldest son with him: and after his death he added the younger brother to the command, of whom we are speaking, who was in truth then looked upon as the most powerful person in that county.

When the king, then prince, was compelled, after almost the whole west was lost, to retire into Cornwall, he remained in Pendennis castle, and from thence made his first embarkation to Scilly: and at parting, out of a princely sense of the affection and service of that family, he took the old gentleman aside, and in the presence of his son wished him "to defend the place as long as he could, because relief might come, of which there was some hope from abroad;" and promised him, "if he lived to come back into England, he would make him a baron; and if he were dead, he would make it good to his son." The old man behaved him bravely to his death, having all his estate taken from him; and his son remained as eminently faithful, and had as deep marks of it as any man : so that at the king's return, who never forgot his promise, he might have received the effect of it in the first creation, if he had desired it ; but he chose rather to recover the bruises his fortune had endured by seizures and sequestrations, before he would embark him in a condition that must presently raise his expense in his way of living. And as soon as he found himself at ease in that respect, he got a friend to inform the king, "that he was ready to receive his bounty."

And his majesty, being under these two obligations, was willing to take the same opportunity to prefer the two other persons he loved so well. But at the same time that he declared his resolution for the last two, (but what concerned the others had been long known and expected,) his majesty reflected upon the number of the house of peers, which was in many respects found grievous, and declared to his brother and the chancellor, who were only present, "that no importunity should prevail with him to make any more lords in many years, and till the present number should be lessened;" in which resolution the duke willingly concurred, and protested "that he would never more importune him in that point." The reason of mentioning this declaration and resolution will appear hereafter. This creation was no sooner over, than the new earl of Falmouth went with the duke to sea : for though his relation was now immediately to the king and near his person, yet he thought himself obliged not to be from the duke when he was to be engaged in so much danger ; and he was confessed by all men to abound in a most fearless courage.

It will not be unseasonable in this place to take a view of an act of state that passed about this time, and which afterwards administered matter of reproach against the chancellor, and was made use of by his enemies as an evidence of his corruption ; for the better understanding whereof, it will be necessary to begin the relation from the original ground of the counsel. About the first Christmas after the king's happy return into England, the chancellor, treasurer, privy seal, and the two chief justices (being the persons appointed by the statute for that purpose) met together to set the prices upon the several sorts of wines ; and were attended, according to custom, by the company of vintners, and the chief merchants in the city who traded in that commodity. And being first to limit the merchants to a reasonable rate, before they could prescribe any price to the vintners upon the retail, they found, by the best inquiry they could make, that the first prices beyond the seas which the merchants paid for their wines were so excessive, that the retail could not be brought within any compass ; and that since the beginning of the troubles the price of wines in general was exceedingly increased, and particularly that of the Canaries was almost double to what it had been in the year 1640.

The chancellor knew very well, by the correspondence he had held in the Canaries, (during the time that he had served his majesty as his ambassador in Spain,) that the whole trade for the Canary wine was driven solely by the English, and the commodity entirely vended in the king's dominions, all Christendom beside not spending any quantity of that wine : and thereupon he asked the merchants "whether what he had reported was not true, and what would be the way to remedy that mischief."

They all confessed it to be very true, and "that it was a great reproach to the nation to be so much imposed upon in a trade that they might govern themselves : and that the unreasonable prices of the wine were not the greatest prejudice that was befallen that trade. That before the troubles they had been so far from employing any stock of money for the support of that traffick, that they used to send their ships fully laden with all commodities thither, which yielded very good markets, being sent from thence into the West Indies with their Plate fleets ; and that the very pipe-staves which they carried did very near supply the value of their wine, so that they brought home the proceed of their commodities either in pieces of eight, or such other merchandizes as had been brought thither from the Indies, and upon which they received great profit. On the contrary, that the trade was now wholly driven by ready money ; that the commodities they send thither are not taken off, except at their own prices, so that they have for the late years sent their vessels empty thither, except only with some few pipe-staves, which by the destruction in Ireland they could not send in any great proportion ; and that their ships return from thence with no other lading but those wines, which they trade for in ready money, either by pieces of eight sent in their ships from hence, or by bills of exchange charged upon some known merchants in Spain. That over and above these disadvantages, the Spaniards in those islands had of late imposed new duties upon the wine, and laid other impositions upon the merchants than the English nation had been ever accustomed to." They said, "all these inconveniences proceeded from the immoderate appetite this nation hath for that sort of wine, and therefore they take from them as much as they can make ; and from our own disorder and irregularity in buying them, and contending who shall get the most, and so raising the price upon one another, and making the Spaniards themselves the judges what the merchants shall pay."

The lords, upon consultation between themselves, found the matter too hard for them, and that the reformation of so much evil must be made by degrees, and upon a representation of the whole, with the difficulties which attended it, to the king and his privy-council, whose wisdoms only could provide a remedy proportionable to the mischiefs. For the present, as they resolved not to raise the prices at which wine was at that time bought and sold, (which they believed, how reasonably soever it might be done, would yet be very unpopular,) so they thought it not just to draw down and abate those prices, since it appeared to them that the wines cost more in proportion upon the places of their growth. They declared therefore to the merchants and to the vintners, "that though for the present they would permit the same prices to continue for the next year, which they had been sold for the present year," and which indeed were confirmed by the late act of parliament, "they should hereafter take care what markets they made ; for that they "were resolved the next year to make the prices much lower both to the merchant and to the vintner:" and so, upon the report made by the lords of the whole matter to the king in council, and of what they thought fit to be done for the present, a proclamation was published accordingly.

The next year both the merchants and vintners were very earnest suitors to the lords at their accustomed meeting, that greater prices might be allowed, or at least that the same might be continued; making it very evident, that their wines cost them more than they had done the year before. Upon the debate the Canary merchants were much divided. Some of them insisted very importunately to have the price raised, "because it was notorious that they had paid much more than formerly, by reason," as they alleged, "that the vintage had not yielded near the proportion that it used to do." Others, though confessing the increase of price, yet pretended a more public spirit and the necessity of a reformation: and therefore they pressed as earnestly, "that the price might not be raised, but that they might be permitted to take what they had done already for this year." It was quickly discovered whence this moderation proceeded; and that the last proposers had a great quantity of wine upon their hands, which had been provided the year before, and so might well be sold at the same price, but that the former had no old wine left, but were supplied with a full provision of new, which had cost them so much dearer. Both the one and the other desired the lords, "that whatever resolution they took for the present, a clause might be inserted in the proclamation, that, the next year which followed, Canary wine should not be sold for above four and twenty pounds the pipe, and that every year after it should be drawn lower," as it might well be, it having been sold in the year 1640 for twenty pounds the pipe; though, in the year when his majesty returned, it had been permitted to be sold at six and thirty pounds the pipe. "Such a clause," they said, "would give notice to the islanders, and oblige them to sell their wines at more reasonable rates, and would render the merchants unexcusable if they should give greater." Notwithstanding all their allegations, the lords remembered what they had declared to them the last year, which was as fair a warning as any thing they could now say would be. And accordingly they set lower prices upon all wines for the year to come than had been allowed the last, as the most effectual warning for the future: which was thought a very rigorous proceeding; but being reported to the king and council, what they had done was allowed and confirmed, and his majesty was well contented that such a clause as they had proposed should be inserted in the proclamation; which was accordingly done.

The year following, when the lords met again according to custom, which is, as hath been said, about Christmas, they found not the least reformation; on the contrary, that the Canary merchants had paid dearer than ever, which made them all more solicitous to have the price raised, and the vintners as importunate for their retail. And indeed the vintners seemed to be in a much worse condition than the merchants. And they made it appear, "that they were often compelled to pay "higher prices to the merchant than [were] imposed by their lordships; without which they could get no good wine, and so must give over their keeping house: that the penalty upon the merchant was very small, being not above forty shillings a pipe, and the crime not easy to be discovered, as was evident by there not having been one merchant questioned in many years for that common transgression; whereas on the vintner's part the penalty was very severe, and easily discovered by any man who went to a tavern and would be an informer, and that most of the vintners in London were at that very time sued in the exchequer upon those very penalties, which, if exacted, must produce their ruin."

The merchants excused themselves for their present pretence, and for their having given more for their wines than was lawful for them to have done by their own desire: "that they had done their best, and that the greatest traders amongst them had consented between themselves not to suffer the prices to be raised upon them; but that they found it ineffectual, and that though they should give over their trades, it would produce no reformation. That the trade was open to all adventurers, and that there had been many ships sent from England in that very year by Jews, and people of several trades, who had never been before known to trade to the Canaries: insomuch as when they who had been long bred up to the trade, and had been long factors in those islands, sent their ships thither, they found other English ships there, and the wines bought at a greater price than they had allowed their factors to give; so that they must either have their ships return empty and unladen, or take the wines at the prices other men gave. That they had chosen the latter, as well to continue their trade, as to draw home some part of the stock they had in that country. That they could imagine but two ways to reform that excess: the one, by putting the trade into such a method and under such rules, as might restrain that license, and not leave it in the power of persons who never had been in the trade to give the law to it; and by this means the islanders would find it necessary to set reasonable prices upon their commodities, and to yield such other advantages and privileges to the merchants as they had heretofore enjoyed. The other, that the king would by his proclamation prohibit the importation of any Canary wines into his dominions: and hereby he would quickly receive such propositions from Spain, as would put it into his own power to make the reformation; otherwise the islanders had been persuaded that England could not live without their wines."

The lords were resolved, notwithstanding all that had been said, that they would execute the former proclamation, and reduce the prices of wines to what had been then determined: and after they had given a full account of the whole business to the king in council, the resolution was approved, and a proclamation was issued out to that purpose. The merchants and vintners applied themselves to his majesty, and to many of the lords of the council, and thought they had encouragement enough to hope for a relief in an appeal to the king and council by petition; and they had thereupon a day assigned to be heard. Many of the lords thought it very hard, if not unjust, to compel men to sell cheaper than they bought, which was the truth of the case, and which must oblige both merchants and vintners to sophisticate and corrupt their wines to preserve their estates; which might probably turn to the great damage of the whole kingdom, in producing sickness and diseases: and this charitable and generous consideration prevailed with the major part of the lords to be well contented, and to wish that some indulgence might be exercised towards them. On the contrary, when the king had well weighed the whole proceedings, and with trouble and indignation considered the obstinate vice of the nation, which made it ridiculous to all the world, he expressed a positive resolution to vindicate himself and his government from this reproach. He thought the adhering firmly to the prices which had been resolved upon by the lords would be the best preface to this reformation, though it might be attended with particular damage to particular persons, who had yet less cause to complain, because their own advice had been followed. And thereupon his majesty declared, "that he would make no alteration;" but withal told them, "that if they could make any proposition to him for the better regulation of the trade," (for they had themselves mentioned a charter,) "he would graciously receive any propositions they would make, and gratify them in what was just:" and so, notwithstanding all attempts which were often repeated, the price set by the lords was ratified for the year following.

Shortly after, many of the merchants who had always traded to the Canaries did petition the king, "that they might be incorporated; and that none might be permitted to trade thither but such who would be of that corporation, and observe the constitutions which should be made by them:" which petition was presented to the king at the council-board; and being read, his majesty (according to his custom in matters of difficulty and public concernment) directed it to be read again on that day month, at which time his majesty presumed that all who would oppose it would present their reasons and objections against it, which he desired to hear. At the day appointed, though there was no petition against it, yet it was observed that there were many of the most eminent merchants of that trade, whose names were not to the petition, nor [who] otherwise appeared desirous to have a charter granted: which his majesty considering, he put off the debate for another week, and directed "that the other merchants by name should be desired to be present, and to give their advice freely upon the point."

And there was at that day a very full appearance; when his majesty directed, "that a relation should be made to them of the whole progress that had been in the business, and the damage and dishonour the nation underwent in the carrying on that trade: that many merchants had presented a petition to him, containing an expedient to bring it into better order; but finding them not to appear in it, and being informed that they were best acquainted with and most engaged in that trade, he had sent for them to know their opinion, whether they thought what was proposed to be reasonable and fit to be granted, and if so, why they did "not concern themselves in it." They answered, "that the reason why they had not appeared in it was, because they thought they should be losers by it, and therefore were not solicitous to procure a grant from his majesty to their own damage;" and so enlarged "upon the nature of the trade, their long experience in it, and the greatness of their stock, which they should not be allowed to continue under any regulation. But as they did not think themselves [in a situation] to be solicitous for a change, so they could not deny, being required by his majesty to speak the truth, but that the proposition that was made was for the public good and benefit of the kingdom, and that they conceived no other way to redeem that trade, and the nation from the insolence which the Spaniard exercised upon them;" implying, "that if his majesty would command them, they would likewise concur and join in the carrying on the service." To which his majesty giving them gracious encouragement, they all seemed to depart of one mind; and his majesty remained confirmed in the former opinion he had of it.

But there remained yet an objection, which was principally insisted on by the ministers of the revenue, who alleged very reasonably, "that this new-modelling the trade must produce some alteration, and would meet some opposition from the Spaniard, which for the time would lessen the customs and entitle the farmers to a defalcation." The petition was therefore referred to the farmers of the customs, who were to attend the next council-day: and being then called, they did acknowledge, "that the design proposed would prove very profitable to the kingdom in many respects," upon which they enlarged, "and that in the end it would not be attended with any diminutions of the customs; but for the present," they said, "they could not but expect, that the obstinacy and contradiction of the Spaniard would give such a stop to trade, at least for one year, that if his majesty did not reimburse them for what should fall short in the receipt of custom, they must look to be very great losers." The merchants on the other hand offered "to be bound, that if they did not the first year bring in as much as had been usually entered, they would make good what should be wanting to the farmers upon a medium." Whereupon his majesty himself declared, "that he would not, for a small damage to himself, hinder the kingdom from enjoying so great a benefit:" and he commanded his solicitor general, who then attended the board, "to prepare such a charter as might provide for all those good ends which were desired in the petition," and which had been so largely debated; and it was notorious, that there had never been a greater concurrence of the board in any direction.

Many months passed before the charter was prepared; in which time there was never the least new objection made against it, nor was it known that any man was unsatisfied with it. After it was engrossed and had passed the king's hand, it was brought to the great seal; and there the lord mayor of London and the court of aldermen had entered a caveat to stop the passing of it. The chancellor, according to course, appointed a time when he would hear all parties. The city alleged an order made a year or two before by the king in council, upon a complaint then exhibited by the court of aldermen against the Turkey company and other corporations, "in which," they said, "there were very many merchants of the best trade and of the greatest estates in the city, who would never take out their freedom, and so refused to bear any charge or office in it, to the very great prejudice and dishonour of the city and of the government thereof; since they were thereby compelled to call inferior citizens to be aldermen, before they had estates to bear the charge of it, whilst the gravest and the richest men, who were most fit, could not be obliged to accept of it, because they were not freemen." The persons concerned, which were indeed a great number of very valuable and substantial men and of great estates, answered, "that they had traded very many years without finding any reason to take out their freedom, which they might do or not do as they thought best for themselves; that they had always paid scot and lot in the several parishes where they lived with the highest of the inhabitants, and were taxed the more because they had not taken out their freedom, they who taxed them being always freemen; that they were grown old now, and had no mind to become young freemen, but would rather give over their trade, and retire into the country where they had estates."

Besides the rules which the king gave upon the difference then in question, he was pleased to declare, and appointed it to be entered as an order in the council-book, "that care should be taken, that in all charters which he should hereafter renew or grant to any companies or corporations in the city of London, they should first make themselves freemen of the city; by which they might be liable to the charges of it, as other citizens are." They said, "that there were many of this company that was now to be incorporated who were not freemen;" and therefore the lord mayor and court of aldermen desired the benefit of the king's order, which was read.

The merchants confessed, "that many of them were not freemen, and resolved not to be:" they said, "they had never heard of this order, and were sorry that they had spent so much money to no purpose." The chancellor declared to them, "that he could not seal their charter till they had complied with the king's determination, and given the court of aldermen satisfaction:" and they all seemed as positive that they would rather be without their charter, than they would submit to the other inconveniences: and so they departed. But after some days' deliberation and consultation between themselves, and when they found that there was no possibility to procure a dispensation from that order, they treated with the city, and agreed with them in the preparing a clause to be inserted in their charter, by which they were obliged in so many years to become freemen; which clause, being approved by all parties, was in the king's presence entered in the bill that his majesty had signed, and being afterwards added to the engrossment, it was again thus reformed and sent to the great seal, and presented to the chancellor to be sealed.

There were by this time several new caveats entered against it at the seal; all which the chancellor heard, and settled every one of them to the joint satisfaction of all parties, and all caveats were withdrawn. There was then a rumour, that there would be some motions made against it in the house of commons: and some parliament-men, who served for the western boroughs, came to the chancellor, and desired him "that he would defer the sealing it for some days till they might be heard, since it would undo their western trade;" and, they said, "they resolved to move the house of commons to put a stop to it." The chancellor informed them of the whole progress it had passed, and told them, "he believed that they would hardly be able to offer any good reasons against it:" however, since it was then well known that the parliament would be prorogued within ten or twelve days, he said "he would suspend the sealing it till then, to the end that they might offer any objections against it there or any where else." But though the parliament sat longer than it was then conceived it would have done, there was no mention or notice taken of it: and after the prorogation no application was further made for the stopping it, and the merchants pressed very importunately that it might be sealed, alleging with reason "that the deferring it so long had been very much to their prejudice." Whereupon the chancellor conceived that it would not consist with his duty to delay it longer, and so affixed the great seal to it.

The company then chose a governor and other officers according to their charter, and made such orders and by-laws as they thought fit for the carrying on and advancement of their trade, which they might alter when they thought convenient; and for the present they resolved upon a joint stock, and assigned so many shares to each particular man. In this composition and distribution there fell out some difference between themselves, which could not be taken notice of abroad: and even some of them, who first petitioned and were most solicitous to procure the charter, did what they could to hinder the effect of it; sent privately to their factors at the Canaries, "to oppose any orders that should be sent from the governor and the company, and that they should do all they could to incense the Spaniards against the charter," and bade them promise "that all their wine should be taken off in spite of the corporation." Whereupon great disorders did arise in the Canaries between the English themselves; and by the conjunction of the Spaniards with those few English who opposed the charter, they proceeded so far as to send the principal factors for the company out of the island into Spain, and to make a public act by the governor and council there, "that no ship belonging to the company should be suffered to come into the harbour, or to take in any lading from the island:" all which was transacted there many months before it was known in England, and probably would have been prevented or easily reformed, if it had not pleased God that the plague at this time spread very much in London, and if the war with the Dutch had not restrained all English ships from going to the Canaries for the space of a year; which intermission, not to be prevented nor in truth foreseen, gave some advantage to the merchants at home who opposed their charter, who complained for the not-return of their several stocks within the time that the company had promised they should be returned.

I am not willing to resume this discourse in another place, which I should be compelled to do if I discontinued the relation in this place, as in point of time I should do; but I choose rather to insert here what fell out afterwards, and to finish the account of that affair, that there may be no occasion in the current of this narration to mention any particulars that related to it.

When the king was at Oxford, and was informed of what had passed at the Canaries, some merchants appeared there to petition against the charter, whereof there were some who were the first petitioners for it. His majesty appointed a day for the solemn hearing it in the presence of his privy-council, the governor being likewise summoned and present there. Upon opening all their grievances the petitioners themselves confessed, "that they could not complain of the charter; that it was a just and necessary charter, and for the great benefit of the kingdom, though some private men might for the present be losers by it: that their complaint was only against their constitutions and by-laws, and the severe prosecution thereupon contrary to the intention of the charter itself;" instancing, amongst other things, "the very short day limited by the charter, after which they could not continue their trade without being members of the corporation; and that day was so soon after the sealing the charter, that it was not possible for them to draw their stocks from thence in so short a time."

When they had finished all their objections, the king observed to them, "that they complained only of what themselves had done, and not at all of the charter, which gave them only authority to choose a governor, and to make constitutions and by-laws, but directed not what the constitutions and by-laws should be, which were the result of their own [consultations], in which the major part must have concurred; and of that kind the resolution for a joint stock was one, which and all the rest they might alter again at the next court, if the major part were grieved with it." But because they had complained of some particulars, in which they might have reason on their side, his majesty expressed a willingness to mediate and to make an agreement between them: and thereupon he required the governor to answer such and such particulars which seemed to have most of justice; but the governor answered all at large, and made it clearly appear, that they had in truth no cause of complaint. As to the short day that was assigned for the drawing away their stocks, which had the greatest semblance of reason in all they complained of, he said, "they had no reason to mention their want of warning, for that the day was well enough known to them long before the sealing the charter, and might very well have been complied with," (the reasons why the sealing the charter was so long deferred are set down before,) "and could be no reason to them to neglect the giving direction in their own concerns; but that they knew likewise, that the day was enlarged to a day desired by them"selves, that there might be no pretence for discontent:" and thereupon the order of the court to that purpose was read to his majesty, and they could not deny it to be true.

In conclusion, since it did appear that their stock did in truth still remain in the Canaries, and in justice belonged to them, whether it was their fault or their misfortune that it had not been drawn over in time; the king persuaded the governor and his assistants to give them such satisfaction in that and other particulars, that before they retired from his majesty's presence they were unanimously agreed upon all their pretences: and though some of the lords, upon some insinuations and discourses which they had heard, had believed the company to have been in the wrong, they were now fully convinced of the contrary, and believed the charter to be founded upon great reason of state, and that the execution of it had been very justifiable and with great moderation. And it is to be observed, that the parliament being then assembled at Oxford, there was not the least complaint against that charter or corporation.

And this was the whole progress of that affair, until it served some men's turns to make it afterwards matter of reproach to the chancellor, in a time when he had too great a weight of the king's displeasure upon him to defend himself from that and other calumnies, which few men thought him guilty of. And if the motives of state were not of weight enough to support the patent, more ought not to be objected to him than to every other counsellor, there having [never] been a more unanimous concurrence at that board in any advice they have given: and the delays he used in the passing the charter after it came to his hand, his giving so long time for the making objections against it, and his so positively opposing the company with reference to their being freemen of the city, are no signs that he had such a mind to please them, as a man would have who had been corrupted by them, or who was to have a share in the profit of the patent, as was afterwards suggested, but never believed by any to whom he was in any degree known, who knew well that he frequently refused to receive money that he might very lawfully have done, and never took a penny which he was obliged to refuse. He was indeed, as often as that affair came to be debated, very clear in his judgment for the king's granting it, and always continued of the same opinion: nor did he ever deny, that some months after the patent was sealed the governor made him a present in the name of the corporation, as it is presumed he did to many other officers through whose hands it passed, and which was never refused by any of his predecessors when it came from a community upon the passing a charter; which he never concealed from the king, who thought he might well do it. In the last place it is to be remembered, that after all the clamour against this charter in parliament, and upon the arguing against the legality of it by eminent lawyers before the house of peers, it was so well supported by the king's attorney general and other learned lawyers, that the lords would not give judgment against it: but the governor and the corporation durst not dispute it further with the house of commons, but chose to surrender their charter into the king's hands.

The French had their ambassador, monsieur Comminge, remaining still in England, who pretended to be ready to finish still the treaty of commerce, but formalized so much upon every article, though nothing was demanded but what had been granted to Cromwell, that it was concluded that he wanted power, though somewhat was imputed to the capriciousness of his nature, which made him hard to treat with, and not always vacant at the hours himself assigned, being hypochondriac and seldom sleeping without opium. As soon as the war was declared, the king of France sent two other ambassadors, whereof, for the countenance and splendour of it, the duke of Vernueil was one, who being uncle to both the kings was received rather under that relation than in the other capacity, and was lodged and treated by the king during the whole time of his stay. With him came likewise monsieur Courtine, a master of requests, and much the quicker man of the three, and upon whose parts and address most of the business depended. The former ambassador was joined in commission with the other two: and their declared business was to mediate a peace between the king and the Dutch, when there had been yet little harm done, only great preparations made on both sides for the war; which they did not seem very solicitous to interrupt, but contented themselves with declaring at their first audience, "that the king their master out of Christianity, and to prevent the effusion of Christian blood, desired to mediate a peace, which the States of the United Provinces were very [willing] he should do, and professed to have a very great desire of peace; which made his Christian majesty hope that he should find the same good inclinations here, and if he might be informed what his majesty did require, or what would be grateful to him, he did not doubt but that he should persuade the States to submit to it."

And with this general discourse, and without delivering any memorial in writing, the ambassadors acquiesced for many months, as if their business was only that the Dutch ambassador, who remained still in London, might know and send word to his masters that they had begun their mediation. Otherwise they seemed in all their discourses to make some kind of apology for being sent, implying, "as if the extraordinary importunity of the Dutch had prevailed with the king to undertake this mediation, and which he did the rather, upon their promise that they would yield to any thing he should advise them; and he was very far from desiring that his majesty might not receive ample satisfaction in whatsoever he required:" so that the king did not imagine, whatever information he had received before, and whatever jealousy he had entertained, that this embassy would be concluded in the denunciation of a war against him. Nor is it probable that the ambassadors themselves at that time knew that they were to perform that office, though it was afterwards evident that the matter had been long before resolved in France. They lived between the two courts, for the queen mother was likewise at that time at her palace of Somerset-house, in much jollity, and as vacant from any affairs till they might receive new orders from court, but spending much time with the Dutch ambassador, whom they persuaded "that they were very intent upon and had much advanced the treaty," as appeared by the ambassador's letters to the Hague.

The plague increased so fast, that the queen mother, who had all the winter complained of her indisposition of health, and declared that she would in the summer go again into France, took that occasion, albeit she was recovered to a very good state; and about the end of July removed and embarked for France, and took so many things with her, that it was thought by many that she did not intend ever to return into England. Whatever her intentions at that time were, she never did see England again, though she lived many years after.

It was in April that the duke went to sea: and from the day of his going thither with the fleet, letters and orders came from him to the day of the battle for an addition of more ships, upon intelligence of an increase of strength added to the enemy, though they yet lay still in the harbours, whilst the duke was upon their coasts. But Mr. Coventry still made new demands, and wrote to the chancellor, "that whilst the king's brother was at sea and ventured his own person, nobody who wished him [well] would, for saving money, hinder any thing from being sent that his highness thought necessary for his defence:" and all things were sent, though procured with wonderful difficulty.

The treasurer had believed, when all the provisions were delivered which had been demanded, and all computations satisfied which had been made, and the fleet at sea, that there would have been no more expense till its return; whereas every day added new expense which had not been thought of: and the requiring of more ships was then believed, and more afterwards, to proceed from the restless spirit of Mr. Coventry, who cared not how much to increase the expense, and was willing to put the treasurer and all the king's ministers to contend with all difficulties, that he might reproach their laziness or want of ability. But they did not gratify him in that, but all the ships, and whatever else was sent for, were sent; insomuch as the fleet amounted to no less than one hundred sail, and was now retired, for want of somewhat to do, to our own coast, where they resolved to attend the motion of the enemy: and in this time most of the volunteers, having endured the unpleasantness of the sea above a month, begun to think that the war was not so necessary as they had thought it to be.

The duke's family, that was numerous in his own ship, were not at ease, and found less respect from the seamen than they looked for: they grew into factions between themselves, and the earl of Falmouth and Mr. Coventry were rivals who should have most interest in the duke, who loved the earl best, but thought the other the wiser man, who supported Pen (who disoblged all the courtiers) even against the earl, who contemned Pen as a fellow of no sense, and not worthy of the charge and trust that was reposed in him. In this discomposure, and having nothing to do, every body grew angry at the occasion that brought them thither, and wished for peace.

The earl of Falmouth, as in a time of leisure, was sent by the duke with compliments to the king, and to give him an account of the good state of the fleet: he visited the chancellor, to whom he had always paid great respect and made many professions; and he told him, "that they were all mad who had wished this war, and that himself had been made a fool to contribute to it, but that his eyes were open, and a month's experience at sea had enough informed him of the great hazards the king ran in it." He reproached Pen "as a sot, and a fellow he thought would be found without courage." He told him, "that the king and the duke too were both inclined to peace, and discerned that the charge and expense of the war would be insupportable;" and concluded, "that as soon as this action should be over, which could not be avoided many days if the Dutch fleet put to sea, as it could not be doubted it would, it would be good time to make a peace, which he desired him to think of, and to speak with the king, whom he would find disposed to it:" and so he returned to the fleet.

And by that time the Dutch were come out, and the next day were in view. They were near of equal number, and well manned, under the command of Opdam, the admiral of the whole fleet, upon whom the States had conferred that charge, that the prince of Orange's party might conclude, that they never intended that he should have the charges of his father and grandfather, and likewise to gratify the nobility of Holland, that had a very small share in the government. And this gentleman, who had never been at sea before, and had but a small fortune, was of that number, and had joined with that faction which was averse from the family of Orange. The fleets came within sight of each other on the first of June, and had some skirmishes, which continued on the second, the wind favouring neither party, as willing to keep them asunder: but upon the third it served both their turns, and brought them as near each other as they could desire to be.

Nor did the Dutch seem to advance with less courage and resolution. Opdam the Dutch admiral with his squadron bore directly upon the duke, with a resolution to board him: but before he came near enough, and very little before, whether by an accident within his own ship, or from a grenado or other shot out of the duke's ship, his gunroom took fire, and in a moment the ship sunk without any man being saved. The vice-admiral of the same squadron, being a Zealander, pursued the same resolution, and had boarded the duke if captain Jeremy Smith, a captain of the duke's squadron, had not put himself between and boarded the vice-admiral, who was equally attacked by the duke: and so that ship was taken after most of the men were killed; and the captain himself was so wounded, that he only lived to be brought on board the duke's ship, and to complain of his companions "for not having second-ed him according to an oath they had taken on board their admiral the day before," and died within half an hour, to the great trouble of the duke, who gave him a great testimony for a very gallant man, and much desired to preserve him.

The fight continued all the day with very great loss of men on all sides, though after the first two hours the Dutch, seeing many of their best ships burned and more taken, did all that the wind would give them leave to separate themselves from the English fleet, which pursued them so close, that they found they lost more by flying than by fighting, and did lessen their sails to give some stop to the pursuit till the night might favour them: and the evening no sooner came, but they hoisted up all their sails, and intended nothing but their escape.

When there was no more to be done by the approach of the night, the duke, who was infinitely tired with the labour of the day, having lost above two hundred men aboard his own ship, whereof some [were] persons of quality, who stood next his own person, and shall be named anon, was prevailed with to repose himself after he had taken some sustenance; which he did, after he had given the master of the ship, an honest and a skilful seaman, direct and positive charge "to bear up in that manner upon the Dutch fleet that he might lose no ground, but find himself as near, when the day should appear, as he was then when he went to sleep." The fleet had no guide but the lanthorn of the admiral, and were not to outtail him of course, and behaved themselves accordingly. But when the duke arose and the day appeared, the Dutch fleet was out of view; and before he could reach them, they were got into their ports, or under the shelter of their flats, that it was not counsellable for the great ships to pursue them further: yet some of those ships which made not so much way, or had not steered so directly, were taken by the lesser ships that followed them. And the duke had received so many blows on his own and the other ships, that it was necessary to retire in port, where they might be repaired.

It was a day of signal triumph, the action of it having much surpassed all that was done in Cromwell's time, whose navals were much greater than had ever been in any age: but the Dutch had never then fought with so much courage and resolution; nor were their ships then in strength to be compared to the English, as Van Trump assured them, "and that except they built better ships, they would be as often beaten as they fought with the English." And from that time they new-built all their navy, and brought now with them as good ships as any the king had: and the men for some hours behaved themselves well. In that day the duke sunk, burned, and took eighteen good ships of war, whereof half were of the best they had, with the loss of one single small ship, for there was no more missing of his whole fleet. It is true the number of the killed and wounded men was very great, and was thought the greater, because in the great massacre that was on the other side there was no man, except Opdam their admiral, who had a name. There were many excellent officers killed and taken, men of courage and of great experience in naval affairs, and therefore an irreparable damage to them; but they had grown up from common seamen, and so were of no other quality than every mariner of the fleet.

On the part of the English, besides above two hundred men that were killed on board the duke's own ship, there fell the earl of Falmouth, who hath been lately spoken of, and the lord Muskerrey, eldest son to the earl Clancarty, a young man of extraordinary courage and expectation, who had been colonel of a regiment of foot in Flanders under the duke, and had the general estimation of an excellent officer: he was of the duke's bed-chamber, and the earl and he were at that time so near the duke, that his highness was all covered with their blood. There fell likewise in the same ship Mr. Richard Boyle, a younger son of the earl of Burlington, a youth of great hope, who came newly home from travel, where he had spent his time with singular advantage, and took the first opportunity to lose his life in the king's service. There were many other gentlemen volunteers in the same ship, who had the same fate.

In prince Rupert's ship, who did wonders that day, and in that of the earl of Sandwich, who behaved him with notable courage and conduct, there were very many men slain, and some gentlemen volunteers, of the best families, whose memories should be preserved. The earl of Marlborough, who had the command of one of the best ships, and had great experience at sea, having made many long voyages at sea, and being now newly returned from the East Indies, whither the king had sent him with a squadron of ships to receive the island of Bombayne from Portugal, was in this battle likewise slain. He was a man of wonderful parts in all kinds of learning, which he took more delight in than his title; and having no great estate descended to him, he brought down his mind to his fortune, and lived very retired, but with more reputation than any fortune could have given him. The earl of Portland was a volunteer on board his ship, and lost his life by his side, being a young man of very good parts, newly come of age, and the son of a very wise and worthy father, who died few months before: and he having a long and entire friendship with the earl of Marlborough, his son, though of a melancholic nature, intended to lead an active life, and to apply himself to it under the conduct of his father's friend, with whom he died very bravely.

There was another almost irreparable loss this day in sir John Lawson, who was admiral of a squadron, and of so eminent skill and conduct in all maritime occasions, that his counsel was most considered in all debates, and the greatest seamen were ready to receive advice from him. In the middle of the battle he received a shot with a musket-bullet upon the knee, with which he fell: and finding that he could no more stand, and was in great torment, he sent to the duke to desire him to send another man to command his ship; which he presently did. The wound was not conceived to be mortal; and they made haste to send him on shore, as far as Deptford or Greenwich, where for some days there was hope of his recovery; but shortly his wound gangrened, and so he died with very great courage, and profession of an entire duty and fidelity to the king.

He was indeed of all the men of that time, and of that extraction and education, incomparably the modestest and the wisest man, and most worthy to be confided in. He was of Yorkshire near Scarborough, of that rank of people who are bred to the sea from their cradle. And a young man of that profession he was, when the parliament first possessed themselves of the royal navy; and Hull being in their hands, all the northern seamen easily betook themselves to their service: and his industry and sobriety made him quickly taken notice of, and to be preferred from one degree to another, till from a common sailor he was promoted to be a captain of a small vessel, and from thence to the command of the best ships.

He had been in all the actions performed by Blake, some of which were very stupendous, and in all the battles which Cromwell had fought with the Dutch, in which he was a signal officer and very much valued by him. He was of that classis of religion which were called independents, most of which were anabaptists, who were generally believed to have most aversion to the king, and therefore employed in most offices of trust. He was commander in chief of the fleet when Richard was thrown out: and when the contest grew between the rump and Lambert, he brought the whole fleet into the river, and declared for that which was called the parliament; which brake the neck of all other designs, though he intended only the better settlement of the commonwealth.

When the council of state was settled between the dissolution of the rump and the calling the parliament, they did not like the temper of the fleet, nor especially of Lawson, who, under the title of vice-admiral, had the whole command of the fleet, which was very strong, and in which there were many captains they liked well: yet they durst not remove the vice-admiral, lest his interest in the seamen, which was very great, should give them new trouble. The expedient they resolved upon was to send colonel Mountague as admiral to command the fleet, without removing Lawson, who continued still in his command, and could not refuse to be commanded by Mountague, who had always been his superior officer, and who had likewise a great interest in very many of the officers and seamen. Yet Mountague, who brought with him a firm resolution to serve the king, which was well known to his majesty, had no confidence in Lawson till the parliament had proclaimed the king: and when he brought the fleet to Scheveling to receive the king, all men looked upon the vice-admiral as a great anabaptist, and not fit to be trusted. But when the king and the duke had conferred with him, they liked him very well: and he was from time to time in the command of vice-admiral in all the fleets which were sent into the Mediterranean. Nor did any man perform his duty better: he caused all persons, how well qualified soever, who he knew were affected to a republic, to be dismissed from the service, and brought very good order into his own ship, and frequented the church-prayers himself, and made all the seamen do so. He was very remarkable in his affection and countenance towards all those who had faithfully served the king, and never commended any body to the duke to be preferred but such; and performed to his death all that could be expected from a brave and an honest man.

It looked like some presage that he had of his own death, that before he went to sea he came to the treasurer and the chancellor, to whom he had always borne much respect, and spake to them in a dialect he had never before used, for he was a very generous man, and lived in his house decently and plentifully, and had never made any the least suit or pretence for money. Now he told them, "that he was going upon an expedition in which many honest men must lose their lives: and though he had no apprehension of himself, but that God would protect him as he had often done in the same occasions, yet he thought it became him against the worst to make his condition known to them, and the rather, because "he knew he was esteemed generally to be rich." He said, "in truth he thought himself so some few months since, when he was worth eight or nine thousand pounds: but the marriage of his daughter to a young gentleman in quality and fortune much above him, (Mr. Richard Norton of Southwick in Hampshire, who had fallen in love with her, and his father, out of tenderness to his son, had consented to it,) had obliged him to give her such a portion as might in some degree make her worthy of so great a fortune; and that he had not reserved so much to himself and wife, and all his other children, which were four or five, as he had given to that daughter." He desired them therefore, "that if he should miscarry in this enterprise, the king would give his wife two hundred pounds a year for her life; if he lived, he desired nothing. He hoped he should make some provision for them by his own industry: nor did he desire any other grant or security for this two hundred pounds yearly, than the king's word and promise, and that they would see it effectual." The suit was so modest, and the ground of making it so just and reasonable, that they willingly informed his majesty of it, who as graciously granted it, and spake himself to him of it with very obliging circumstances; so that the poor man went very contentedly to his work, and perished as gallantly in it with an universal lamentation. And it is to be presumed that the promise was as well performed to his wife: sure it is, it was exactly complied with whilst either of those two persons had any power.

The victory and triumph of that day was surely very great, and a just argument of public joy: how it came to be no greater shall be said anon. And the trouble and grief in many noble families, for the loss of so many worthy and gallant persons, could not but be very lamentable in wives, in fathers and mothers, and the other nearest relations: but no sorrow was equal, at least none so remarkable, as the king's was for the earl of Falmouth. They who knew his majesty best, and had seen how unshaken he had stood in other very terrible assaults, were amazed at the flood of tears he shed upon this occasion. The immensity of the victory, and the consequences that might have attended it; the safety and preservation of his brother with so much glory, on whose behalf he had had so terrible apprehensions during the three days' fight, having by the benefit of the wind heard the thunder of the ordnance from the beginning, even after by the lessening of the noise, as from a greater distance, he concluded that the enemy was upon flight: yet all this, and the universal joy that he saw in the countenance of all men for the victory and the safety of the duke, made no impression in him towards the mitigation of his passion for the loss of this young favourite, in whom few other men had ever observed any virtue or quality which they did not wish their best friends without; and very many did believe that his death was a great ingredient and considerable part of the victory. He was young and of insatiable ambition; and a little more experience might have taught him all things which his weak parts were capable of. But they who observed the strange degree of favour he had on the sudden arrived to, even from a detestation the king had towards him, and concluded from thence, and more from the deep sorrow the king was possessed with for his death, to what a prodigious height he might have reached in a little time more, were not at all troubled that he was taken out of the way.

The duke, after he had given directions for the speedy repairing of the fleet, and for the present sending out such ships as could quickly be made ready to [ride] before the coast of Holland, made haste to present himself to the king, and to the queen his mother, who was ready to begin her journey to France, and had stayed some days to see the success of the naval fight, and afterwards to see the duke; and within few days after his arrival her majesty left the kingdom.

And now the whisper began in the duke's family of the reason, why the victory, after so great advantages, had not been pursued with that vigour that might have made it more destructive to the enemy than it proved to be. The master of the duke's ship (captain . . . . .) pursued his orders very punctually after the duke was gone to sleep, and kept within a just distance of the Dutch fleet that remained in order together, for many fled in confusion and singly to that part of the coast that they thought they knew best; and many of them were taken. But the duke was no sooner in sleep, but Mr. Brounker of his bed-chamber, who with wonderful confusion had sustained the terror of the day, resolved to prevent the like on the day succeeding. He first went to sir William Pen, who commanded the ship, and told him, "that he knew well how miraculously the duke was preserved that day, and that they ought not further to tempt God;" wished him to remember, "that the duke was not only the king's brother, but the heir apparent of the crown, and what the consequence would be if he should be lost. And therefore it would concern him not to suffer the duke's known and notorious courage to engage him in a new danger, which he would infallibly be [exposed to] the next morning, if they continued to make so much sail as they did, and to keep so near the Dutch, who fled, but if they were pressed and in despair would fight as stoutly as they had done in the beginning. And therefore he desired and advised him to give the master order to slacken the sails, that the Dutch might get what ground they could, to avoid a further encounter." Pen answered him honestly, and told him, "he durst give no such orders, except he had a mind to be hanged, for the duke had himself given positive charge to the contrary."

Mr. Brounker, when he could not prevail there, confidently went to the master of the ship, who was an honest and a stout man, and carefully kept the steerage himself, that he might be sure to observe the order he had received from his highness, and told him, "that it was the duke's pleasure that he should slack the sails, without taking notice of it to any man." Whereupon the master did as he was commanded, making no doubt that a servant so near the person of his highness, and in so much favour with him, would [not] have brought such an order without due authority.

And by this means the remainder of the fleet escaped, which otherwise would probably have been all taken: for it was afterwards known, that there was such a confusion amongst the officers, that nobody would obey; for though in truth the right of commanding, according to the course observed amongst them, after the death of Opdam, was in the vice-admiral of Zealand, yet, he being likewise killed, the other could not agree. But young Trump, the son of the old famous admiral, who had behaved himself very bravely all the day, challenged the command in the right of Holland; but John Evertson of Zealand, brother to him that was killed, required it as his right: which begat so great an animosity as well as confusion amongst them, that the morning, if they had been pursued, would in all probability have [proved] as dismal to them as the day before had done.

But the duke never suspected this, nor did any presume to tell him of it, which made many men presume that it was done with the privy of Mr. Coventry, not only for the great friendship between him and Brounker, but because both Pen and the master were so silent when the duke was so much troubled the next morning: nor did the duke come to hear of it till some years after, when Mr. Brounker's ill course of life and his abominable nature had rendered him so odious, that it was taken notice of in parliament, and upon examination found to be true, as is here related; upon which he was expelled the house of commons, whereof he was a member, as an infamous person, though his friend Coventry adhered to him, and used many indirect arts to have protected him, and afterwards procured him to have more countenance from the king than most men thought he deserved, being a person throughout his whole life never notorious for any thing but the highest degree of impudence, and stooping to the most infamous offices, and playing very well at chess, which preferred him more than the most virtuous qualities could have done.

With this victory a new vast charge and expense (beside the repairing the hurt ships, masts, and rigging, and fitting out new ships of war, and buying more fireships) appeared, that was never foreseen or brought into any computation; which was a provision for sick and wounded men, which amounted to so great a number upon all the coast, that the charge amounted in all places, notwithstanding the general charity of the people, and the convenience that many hospitals yielded, to above two thousand pounds the week for some weeks, and though less afterwards by the death and recovery of many, yet continued very great; besides the charge of keeping the Dutch prisoners, which were above two thousand, and every day increased.

The duke was very impatient to repair and set out the fleet again to sea, and resolved nothing more than to go in person again to command it, his family remaining still on board, and preparing such things as were wanting for his accommodation: but the queen mother had prevailed with the king at parting to promise her, "that the duke should not go again in person in that expedition;" which was concealed from the duke, his majesty believing that the confidence of his royal highness's going contributed very much to the setting out the fleet, as it did so much, that but for that, it had been impossible to have procured so much money as was with infinite difficulty procured, to satisfy the expenses of so many kinds, whereof many had been unthought of. And towards this there was a benefit that flowed from a fountain of extreme misery, which was the increase of the plague, which spread so fast that the king's staying so long in town was very dangerous. Yet the approach of this great calamity, that in other respects produced great mischiefs, advanced the present enterprise: for all people who had money knew not what to do with it, not daring to leave it in their houses where they durst not stay themselves; so they willingly put it into the bankers' hands, who supplied the king upon such assignations, as the late act of parliament and other branches of the king's revenue would yet bear.

And if at this time the French ambassadors had pursued their office of mediation, it is very probable that it might have been with success. For besides the great loss the Dutch had received in the battle and in their being deprived of so many of the merchants' ships, the factions were irreconcilable in the fleet: there were many officers who had behaved themselves very basely and cowardly in the action, but they knew not how to punish them; Evertson and Trump, who were their best seamen, would not submit to be commanded by each other; the people were ready to rise upon De Wit, upon whom they looked as the occasion of the war, and cried aloud for peace. And the faction amongst the States themselves was very visible: all the other complained bitterly against the province of Holland, "which," they said, "had engaged them in a war against their will and without their privy, which was directly contrary to the form and constitution of their government." In a word, peace was universally desired and prayed for; and, in the opinion of all men, any reasonable conditions would at that time have been yielded to. And as the people of England generally had not [been] pleased with the beginning the war, so the court was weary of it; and the king would have been willing to have received any good overtures for the composing it; and the duke, since he was kept from bearing a part in it, would not have opposed it. But the ambassadors pressed no such matter, but congratulated the victory with the same joy they found in the court, and seemed to think that any misfortune that could befall the Dutch would be but a just punishment for their pride and insolence towards all their neighbour princes: the two nations had not yet worried themselves enough, entirely to submit to the arbitration of France; which it resolved they should do.

Within less than a month the fleet was again prepared and ready for the sea, as strong and in as good a condition as it had been before the battle; and the king and the duke went thither, the duke making no doubt of putting his person on board. And the king at that time resolved that prince Rupert and the earl of Sandwich should have the joint command of it: in order to which prince Rupert was prepared, of whose easy concurrence only there was some doubt, his majesty promising himself all conformity and resignation from the earl of Sandwich; which he met with in both, for the prince very cheerfully submitted to his majesty's pleasure. In the journey the king acquainted his brother with his resolution, and the promise he had made to the queen their mother; with which the duke was much troubled, and offered many reasons to divert his majesty from laying his command upon him: but when he found there was no remedy, he submitted, and gave orders for disembarking his family and goods.

But when this was communicated to Mr. Coventry, who was to prepare such commissions and warrants as upon this alteration of counsels were necessary, he persuaded the duke, and prevailed with him to believe, "that it would be much better to commit the sole command of the fleet to the earl of Sandwich, than to join prince Rupert in it with him," who, for no other reason but for not esteeming him at the rate he valued himself, had been long in his disfavour. He suggested some defects in the prince, which nobody could absolve him from, and which the gentle temper of the earl of Sandwich, who knew him as well as the other, could have complied with: and many thought it would have in the conjunction produced a very good mixture, the danger from the prince being too sudden resolutions from too much heat and passion, and the earl having enough of phlegm and wariness in deliberating, and much vigour in the executing what was concluded; and they were both well prepared and inclined to perform the function.

But Mr. Coventry's advice prevailed both with the duke and king: and so in the instant that the king and duke were to return from the fleet that was ready to set sail with the first wind, and not till then, the king told prince Rupert, without enlarging upon the reasons, "that he would have him to return with him to London, and accompany him this summer, and that the earl of Sandwich should have the sole command of the fleet;" with which the prince was wonderfully surprised and perplexed, and even heart-broken; but there was no contending. He stayed behind the king only till he could get his goods and family disembarked, and then returned with very much trouble to the court: and the earl of Sandwich set sail with the fleet, with direction first to visit the coast of Holland, and if he found that the Dutch fleet was not ready to come out, that he should go to the northward to watch the East India fleet, which had orders from their superiors to come by the north, that they might avoid the English fleet, that was master of the sea.

It was in the end of June or beginning of July that the king and duke returned from the fleet; and within few days after, it set sail: when the plague increased so fast, that there died about two thousand in a week; so that all men cried out against the king's staying so long at Whitehall, the sickness being already in Westminster. Whereupon the king, after he had taken the best care he could with the lord mayor for the good ordering the city, and published such orders as were thought necessary for the relief and regulation of infected persons, and prevailed with some justices of the peace in the Strand and in Westminster to promise to reside there, (which they were the more easily persuaded to do by the general's declaring that he would stay in his lodgings at Whitehall, which he did during the whole time of the pestilence; and the lord Craven, out of friendship to him, stayed likewise in his house in Drury-lane: and it cannot be denied that the presence of those two great persons prevented many mischiefs which would have fallen out by the disorder of the people, and was of great convenience and benefit to that end of the town :) I say, when the king had settled all this, he removed to Hampton, resolving there to consider how to dispose of himself for the remainder of the summer. And because there were many particulars still unresolved concerning the business of Ireland, his majesty for some days appointed that numerous people, that they might have no pretence to come to Hampton-Court, to attend at Sion; where for many days together his majesty spent many hours, till he had composed that affair as well as it was for the present capable of.

The plague still increased at London, and spread about the country; so that it was not thought safe for the court to remain longer where it then was, the sickness being already in some of the adjacent villages. Whereupon the king resolved that his own family and his brother's should remove to Salisbury, and spend the summer there. And because it was already in view, that it would not be fit for the parliament to assemble again at Westminster in September, to which time it was prorogued, nor could it be computed at what time it could be safe to meet in that place; and it was as notorious that if the parliament met not somewhere, whereby the king might have another supply before the winter, there would be very great confusion for want of money: he caused therefore a proclamation to issue out, "that he intended to adjourn the parliament to meet at Oxford upon the tenth of October next, and that the members need not to attend at Westminster in September." And then he directed the speaker of the house of commons, who lived within half a day of London, and the general and the lord Craven, to give notice to the members of both houses, who lived within that distance, to be present in both houses at the day to which they were prorogued, and then to adjourn to Oxford according to the proclamation. And this being settled, his majesty appointed a day for beginning his progress from Hampton-Court to Salisbury; against which time all carriages and whatsoever was necessary for the journey [were prepared].

In the morning, when every body believed that the king and queen and duke and duchess, with both their families, were to go together one way, Mr. Coventry found a way to break that resolution, having no mind to be in so great a court that his greatness would not appear. He told the duke, "that there were general discontents throughout the kingdom," which was true, "and a probability of insurrections," which were much spoken of and apprehended; "and therefore it might be better that the king and the duke might not be together, but in several places, that they might draw what forces were necessary to them, which the presence of their own persons would easily do: that the fleet would probably be all the summer upon the northern coast in expectation of the Dutch East India fleet;" for it was not then thought that the Hollanders would have been able to have set out another fleet able to have encountered ours. Upon the whole matter he proposed to him, "that since the king meant to spend the summer in the west, with which there could very hardly be any correspondence from the fleet, his highness should go into the north, and reside at York;

"by which he would have an influence upon all those parts where the most disaffected persons [were] most inhabitant, and from Hull and those maritime parts he could not be long without receiving intelligence from the fleet."

The truth is; the constitution of the court at this time was such, the prevalence of the lady so great, and the queen's humour thereupon so inconstant, and all together so discomposed the king, that there was no pleasure in being a part of it: and therefore the advice was as soon embraced as given, by the duke and his wife, who were well content to enjoy themselves in their own family apart. And the duke presently proposed it to the king, and Mr. Coventry discoursed all the motives to him so fully, that his majesty approved it. And then, if it were to be done at all, the first attending the king to Salisbury, which was so much out of the way, would be to no purpose: and therefore it was resolved (all the coaches and carriages being then at the doors to go to Farnham, which was the first day's journey towards Salisbury) that the king and his brother would part upon the place, and that the king and queen should continue their purpose for Farnham, and the duke and his wife should go that night to St. Alban's, and so prosecute his journey for York; and all orders were in the instant given out to this purpose.

Whether the reasons of this counsel were of importance or not, the alteration on such a sudden from what had been before determined was thought very strange, and wondered at, and made many believe that some accident was fallen out that must not be discovered: for on the sudden it was, there having been no such thought overnight, when the chancellor left the court to go to his own house at Twickenham. And when he returned the next morning, the resolution was taken, and every body well pleased with the change, and both the king and the duke told him with satisfaction of it; nor did he understand it enough to make objections against it, which would have been ingratul; nor was it convenient to spend longer time in deliberation at that place, where some of the inferior servants had died the night before of the plague: and so they all entered upon their journey by nine of the clock the same morning.

It is necessary in this place to remember, that the express, that had been sent by the bishop of Munster's agent with the conditions which were offered by the king, returned with great expedition, and brought the bishop's acceptation and engagement, "that, upon the payment of the first sum that was agreed upon, he would draw his army together, and march with an army of twenty thousand horse and foot into the States' dominions." And the king before he left London had signed the treaty, and made the first payment, and provided for the second: so that he now expected that the bishop should be shortly upon his march, and fix his winter quarters in those provinces; which he did resolve and intend with courage and sincerity, and which in that conjuncture must have put the counsels of Holland into great confusion, when they began to be again reduced into some order.

The indefatigable industry and dexterity of the pensionary De Wit prevailed with the States to believe, "that he thought a peace to be necessary "for their affairs, and desired nothing but that it might be upon honourable and safe conditions, and that France was very real in the endeavouring it: but that the enemy was so insolent upon their late success, that they neglected all overtures, and believed that the factions and divisions amongst themselves would hinder them from being able to set out another fleet; and therefore that ought to be the first design. And if their fleet were ready to go out, he doubted not but a peace would quickly follow: for that France was engaged, if the king should not consent to what is just and reasonable, to declare a war against England, and to assist them with men and money, and all his own naval power, which the duke of Beaufort was then preparing and making ready in all the ports of France. But that it was not to be expected that they would send out their fleet, which was much inferior to the English, except they first saw a Dutch fleet at sea ready to join with them." He wished them to consider how much they were all concerned in their India ships, which were in their voyage, and could not be far from their coasts in a short time; all which would inevitably fall into the hands of the English, if they had no fleet at sea to relieve them."

These reasons, of weight in themselves, and the concernment of most of them in the preservation of the Indian ships, prevailed with them to do all that could be done to set out a new fleet: and to that purpose they sent very strict and severe orders to their several admiralties, for the proceeding against all, without distinction of persons, who had misbehaved themselves in the late battle, and to provide new ships and all necessary provisions, to the end that their fleet might be at sea by a time. And this grew the more easy to them, by the seasonable return of De Ruyter with his fleet from Guinea, which brought a present addition of good strength; and he had began the war upon the English, and was the best sea-officer they had, and had exercised those commands that no other officer could refuse to obey him.

For the speedy carrying on these present preparations, they made, according to their usual custom in extraordinary occurrences, committees of the States to assist in the admiralties of Zealand, Amsterdam, and Rotterdam; and to that purpose De Wit, and such other as he thought fittest at this time to join with him, were appointed. They went first to the fleet to reform the disorders there: and though they durst not proceed with that severity as had been fit, yet they cashiered many captains and other officers, and put some other marks of disgrace upon others, and caused one or two to die.

But that which De Wit's heart was most set upon was to take revenge upon Van Trump, and to remove him from ever having any command at sea: for though he was an excellent officer, and upon the stock of his father's credit of great estimation with the seamen, and inferior to no man but De Ruyter, and had behaved himself in the battle with signal courage; yet his dispute with Evertson upon command had brought much prejudice to them. But that which was worst of all and incensed De Wit implacably was, that he was of entire devotion to the prince of Orange, as his father had always been, and all his children continued to be, and he knew well had an especial part, how covertly soever, in fomenting the murmurs of the people [against] him and the war: and he resolved to take this opportunity of the good temper the States were in in their concurrence for the setting out the fleet, not only to provide for the better government of their ships and marine conduct, but to punish and prevent the murmurs at land, by removing all those out of any power whom he suspected to have secretly contributed to them. He did all he could to make Van Trump's offence capital, as if the right of command had been so clear in Evertson that the other could not dispute it: but Van Trump defended himself [so well], and had so many friends, that he was absolved from that guilt. Yet for some passionate and indiscreet words, in which he did naturally abound, he was deprived of his command, with a declaration, "that he should no more be employed in the service of the States;" which whilst the government was in those hands he cared not for, and had a good estate to subsist without it. And so for the present all differences were composed so far, as to have a general concurrence in whatsoever was necessary, and in order to the making ready and setting out their fleet to sea.

The king had been few days at Salisbury before the French and Spanish ambassadors arrived there, and then they made some instance with the king, that there might be a treaty for peace; and [the French ambassadors] declared, "that the king their master was so far engaged by treaty with the Dutch, that if the king would not accept of a just and an honourable peace, his majesty must declare himself on their behalf, which he was unwilling to do." The king answered, "that if there were any such engagement he had not been well dealt with; for that the French king had given his word to him, that he would not enter into any treaty with the Dutch but 'pari passu' with his majesty," (and when his majesty had been informed that there was some treaty concluded with them, he was assured from France "that it was only a treaty of commerce, which he had been obliged to enter into to prevent an edict in Holland, by which strong waters and other French commodities would have been inhibited to be brought into those provinces, but that there was nothing in that treaty that could be to his majesty's prejudice:") "that his majesty had been always ready to embrace peace, which had been never yet offered by the Dutch, nor did he know what conditions they expected."

The ambassadors seemed to be much offended with the insolent behaviour of the Dutch; and confessed "that they were not solicitous for peace, but only desired to engage the king their master in the war: but that if his majesty would make his demands, which they presumed would be reasonable, the other should be brought to consent to them." To which the king replied, "that they had begun the war upon him, and not he upon them; and that God had hitherto given him the advantage, which he hoped he should improve; and till they were as desirous of a peace as he, it would not become him to make any propositions." And in this manner that affair stood whilst the court remained at Salisbury.

And there now fell out an unexpected accident, which looked as if Providence had been inclined to repair the mischief and the damage that the plague had produced to the affairs of the king. It hath been mentioned before, that upon the first thoughts of a war with the Dutch, the king had sent Mr. Henry Coventry to Sweden, and sir Gilbert Talbot to Denmark, to engage those crowns as far as might be on his majesty's behalf, both of them being enough disoblighed and provoked by the Dutch.

Mr. Coventry in Sweden found a frank and open reception, avowing a hearty affection to the king, and an inclination to join in any thing that might not be destructive to their own affairs: nor did they dissemble the injuries they had received from the Hollander even to the Dutch ambassador himself, who was at the same time sent thither to unite that crown to their interest, to which purpose he had made several specious overtures. Nor did they conceal the jealousy they had of the French, who had not complied with the payment of the yearly sum of money which they were obliged to make to them for the support of their army, of which they were in a great arrear, that discomposed their affairs very much. And though M. Pomponne, who had been long resident in that court as an envoy, was now come thither as ambassador from France, and brought with him a good sum of money to retain them fast to their dependance upon them; yet the money was not half that was due to them, and they well knew what dark ends it was for: and they did exceedingly fear the omnipotence of France.

There were two things which kept them from a full declaration on the king's behalf, and engaging presently in his interest. The first was the apprehension that they had of Denmark, that it would take this opportunity to unite themselves more firmly to the Hollander, and so attempt to deprive Sweden of all their late conquest, which was confirmed to them by their own treaty of Copenhagen, which they were resolved never to part from: and in this particular they were to expect some satisfaction and security from the negotiation of sir Gilbert Talbot. The other was, that they might see the bishop of Munster fully engaged, upon whose expedition they had much expectation. And Mr. Coventry had informed them of that whole agreement, which would have given them opportunity to have prosecuted their own design upon Bremen, to which their hearts were most devoted.

Sir Gilbert Talbot had been as well received in Denmark, with all the professions imaginable of affection to the king, and of their detestation of the Dutch, who in truth had exercised a strange tyranny over them by the advantage of their necessities; nor is the injustice, oppression, and indignities which they had sustained from them to be expressed and described, without entering into a large discourse of particulars which are foreign to this relation: let it suffice, that there needed few arguments to persuade that king to any thing that was within his power, and which would have done signal mischief to the Dutch. But the truth is, the kingdom was very poor, the people unwarlike, the king himself very good and very weak, jealous of all the great men, and not yet recovered of the fright that Wolfelt had put him into. His chief minister, one Gabell, had gotten his credit by having been his barber, an illiterate and unbred man, yet his sole confident in his business of greatest trust; which made all the persons of quality in the kingdom, who are as proud of their nobility as any nation, full of indignation. And they were able to cross many resolutions after they were taken, though they could not establish others in the place; which made the king very irresolute and unfixed: so that what was concluded to-day was reversed or not pursued to-morrow. They professed a great jealousy of the Swede, as the greatest argument, but their weakness, against [a war with] the Dutch; yet were not willing to propose any expedients which might secure them against those jealousies. And the king absolutely denied that he had ever given Hannibal Zested authority to declare, "that he would again confirm the treaty he had made;" and seemed to take it unkindly that his majesty should think it reasonable, who therefore thought it so, because it was proposed by himself, and because he still confessed, "that he could make no attempt to recover what he had parted with." That which he did unreasonably design, in all the disguises which were put on, was to engage the king to endeavour to persuade the Swede to give up and restore Elsinour and the other places to Denmark, or to assist him with force for the recovery of them when there should be a peace concluded with Holland: so that the king despaired of any good from that negotiation, and resolved shortly to recall his minister from thence.

But there was on a sudden a change to wonder. Gabell came early in a morning to sir Gilbert Talbot, and told him, "his master was now resolved to unite his interest entirely to that of the king of England, having now an opportunity to do it securely to both their benefits." He told him, "that there were letters arrived that night from Bergen, with news that the Dutch East India ships were all arrived in that port with orders to remain there till they received new orders from Holland, which they should have as soon as their fleet should be ready to join with them. This had disposed the king to resolve to give the king of England opportunity to possess himself of all that treasure, out of which he presumed he would allow him such a share, as might enable him to declare, and assist his majesty vigorously in his war, against the Dutch. That if he gave speedy notice to the king's fleet, which every body knew was then at sea, it might easily go to Bergen, where they might as easily surprise all those ships in the port, since they should receive no opposition from the castles under whose protection they lay."

And when he had done his relation, he offered him to go with him to the king, that he might receive the obligation from himself; which sir Gilbert Talbot presently did, and found his majesty as cheerful in the resolution as Gabell had been. He repeated all that the other had said, and more particularly "that he thought it reasonable that he might expect half of the value that the whole would amount to; which he would rely upon the king's honour and justice for, after the ships should be in England, and that he might not be suspected by the Hollander, for he would protest [against] the act as a violence that he could not resist: and so he would expect so many of his majesty's [ships] to arrive in Denmark, and to assist him, before he positively declared against the Dutch." He wished sir Gilbert Talbot "to send an express forthwith to the king with all these particulars;" which he did the next day.

This express arrived within few days after the king came to Salisbury, and was despatched presently back again with letters to the king of Denmark of his majesty's consent and ratification of all that he had proposed, and with letters likewise to the earl of Sandwich, who according to his former orders had sailed northward in hope to meet with that fleet, which was before got into Norway. The king's letters to him came in a very good season, and he immediately continued his course for Norway: and when he came to that length, and near enough to that land of rocks which are terrible to all seamen, he thought it best to remain at sea with his fleet, lest De Ruyter might by this time be come out with his fleet, (since his being come northward could not be concealed, nor the arrival of the East India fleet at Bergen; which would hasten the other,) and sent in a squadron of fifteen or sixteen good ships (of strength sufficient for the business) into the harbour of Bergen with a letter to the governor. And with it he sent a gentleman that was a volunteer on board him, who hath been often mentioned before, Mr. Clifford, the confident of the lord Arlington, who was well instructed in all the transactions which had been at Copenhagen. Before they went into the harbour, Mr. Clifford and another gentleman or two went by boat to the town, where he found all the Dutch ships (about a dozen in number) riding very near the shore, and all under the protection of the castle, into which they had put much of their richest lading from the time of their first coming thither, as to a place of unquestionable security.

The governor was not surprised with the messengers or the letter, as appeared by the reception of both, but seemed troubled that they were come so soon, before the manner of performing the action was enough adjusted: he could not deny but "that he had received orders from Copenhagen; but that he expected more perfect directions within four and twenty hours, and expected likewise the presence of the vice-king of Norway, who was his superior officer, and would infallibly be there the next day." The behaviour of the man was such as made them believe it sincere, as in truth it was, for he meant well, and was content that the ships, which though they were not come into the port did not ride safe amongst the rocks, should come into the port, upon assurance that they would not attempt any hostile act without his consent, which was till all things should be agreed between them: and so the fleet entered; which the Dutch perceived with great consternation, yet changed the posture of some of their ships, and new-moored the rest, and put themselves upon their defence.

It is a port like no other that the world knows, a very great number of formidable rocks, between each of which the sea runs deep enough for the greatest ships to ride securely; so that the ships were as in so many chambers apart between the rocks: and the Dutch, which came thither first, had possessed themselves of that line of the sea that lay next to the shore, to which they lay so near that they could descend from their vessels on land; which had been much the better for the enterprise, if the Dane had concurred in it.

It was so late before the English ships had taken their places, which was as near the Dutch as the rocks would permit, that they remained quiet all night, which was spent in consultation between the commander in chief of the English ships (who was a stout and a good officer, but a rough man, who knew better how to follow his instructions than to debate the ground of them; but he was advised by Mr. Clifford, and conformed to his judgment) and the governor of the town and castle, who seemed still inclined not only to suffer the English to do what they would, but to be willing to act a part in it himself from the shore, and to expect hourly orders to that purpose, as likewise the arrival of the vice-king, whose authority was more equal to that attempt, and who was a man well known to have a particular reverence for the king, and as particular a prejudice and animosity against the Dutch. The night being over, the governor continued all the next day as desirous and importunate that the enterprise might be longer deferred; upon which there were some choleric words between the governor and a gentleman of quality who was a volunteer on board the ships, which many thought in some degree irreconciled the governor to the affair.

In conclusion, the commander of the squadron was willing to think that the governor had rather it should be done without his declared consent than by it, and so told him, "that the next morning he was resolved to weigh his anchors and to fall upon the Dutch;" to which the other made such a reply as confirmed him in his former imagination. And in the morning the ships were brought out of their several channels, and placed as near the sides of the Dutch as they could be, from whence they resolved to board them as soon as they had sent their broadsides upon them. But they found that the Dutch had spent their time well; for in the two days and two nights that the English had been in the harbour, besides the unloading the richest of their commodities that were left into the castle, they had drawn all their ordnance, which lay on that side of the ships which was to the shore, on land, and planted them upon a rising ground, that they could shoot over their own ships upon the English: and a breastwork was cast up, behind which all the inhabitants of the town were in arms.

It was a fair warning, and might very well have persuaded our men to be glad to retire out of the harbour, which yet they might have done: but their courage or their anger disposed them to make further trial of the governor, for they feared not the ordnance from the land which the Dutch had planted, nor the muskets from the breastworks, if the castle did them no harm, under the power of which they all were. And so they fell upon their work: and in some time, and [with] the loss of many men from the ships and from the land, they had dismounted many of the ordnance upon the shore, and were even ready to board the ships; when out of absurd rage or accident a ship or two of the English discharged some guns both upon the breastworks, from whence they had received no prejudice, and upon the town, which beat down some houses. But then all the muskets from the breastworks were poured out, and guns from the castle, which killed very many common men, and five or six officers of very good account, and some gentlemen volunteers, amongst which was Edward Mountague, eldest son to the lord Mountague of Boughton, and cousin german to the earl of Sandwich, a proper man and well-bred, but not easy to be pleased, and who was then withdrawn from the court, where he was master of the horse to the queen, and in some discontent had put himself on board the fleet with a captain, without the privity of the earl of Sandwich, and was now slain. There was now no further experiment to be made, but how they could get to sea, which might easily have been prevented from the shore and from the rocks: but from the minute that they prepared to be gone and gave over shooting, there was no more done against them, and they had pilots from the country that carried them safe out.

The noise of the guns had called the earl of Sandwich as near the mouth of the harbour as could safely be, to discover what became of his squadron; so that they came shortly to him with the whole account of their ill success, and within a short time after a shallop [from the governor], with a letter to the officer who had commanded the squadron, complaining as much as he could do of the misbehaviour of the English in shooting upon the town, and desiring "that Mr. Clifford would give him a meeting at a place he appointed, to which the shallop should convey him." Mr. Clifford was more willing to go than the earl was to permit him; yet at last upon his earnest desire he consented, and he put himself into the shallop. It happened that when the action was over and the English under sail, the vice-king arrived at Bergen, with two or three regiments of the country; and the orders were likewise come from Copenhagen, whereby, at least as they pretended, they were required to permit all that the English desired: and the vice-king had caused the shallop to be sent, and was himself with the governor at the place whither Mr. Clifford was to come, and there he spake with them together.

The governor with many protestations excused himself for shooting from the castle, after the town was assaulted, and many of the burghers killed, who had stood in arms only to defend the town, without being concerned for the Dutch or their ships; and made it an argument of his integrity and respect, "that he had permitted them to depart when it was in his power to have sunk them." He complained, "that the commander would not have the patience to defer the assault one day longer, which if he had done, the orders from Copenhagen had been come, and the vice-king had been present with his forces, which would have secured the enterprise." The vice-king seemed very much troubled for what had been done, and earnestly desired "that the same or another squadron might be again sent in, when they should be at liberty to do what they would upon the Dutch; and if they stood in need of assistance, they should have as much as was necessary."

Mr. Clifford replied to many of the excuses which were made, and urged "the suffering the Dutch to bring their ordnance on shore, and

"the townsmen being in arms to assist them;" and proposed, "that they would first begin by seizing upon some of their ships, and then that their fleet should answer:" but this the vice-king did absolutely refuse, and made another proposition, that startled more, and was directly new, "that when the English had seized upon all the Dutch ships, they should not have carried any of them away till a perfect division of the goods was made, that the king of Denmark might have his just proportion." Mr. Clifford made no answer but "that he would present all that they proposed to the earl of Sandwich, in whom the power of concluding and executing remained solely:" and so he returned to the fleet, and they to the town, and expected an answer.

The earl of Sandwich thought not fit to run any more hazards, and was not satisfied that they had proceeded sincerely. But that which most prevailed with him was, that he had received intelligence "that De Ruyter was come out with the fleet," and he would not he should find him entangled in those rocks, or obliged to fight with him upon that coast; and the season of the year now made that station very unsecure, for it was already the beginning of October, when those seas run very high and boisterous: and therefore he resolved to be master of more sea-room, that he might fight De Ruyter, if he came; and if he did not, he might then meet those East India ships more securely in their way to Holland, than by making another attempt in the harbour. And so, after some letters had passed and repassed between the vice-king and him, and both the vice-king and governor had undertaken to keep the Dutch ships there for the space of six weeks, for they desired to see the success of another engagement between the two fleets; the earl steered that way with his fleet that most probably might bring him and De Ruyter together, which above all things he desired.

This whole affair of Bergen and the managery thereof was so perplexed and intricate, that it was never clearly understood. That which seemed to have most probability was, that as soon as the Dutch fleet came to Bergen, they had unladen many of their richest commodities and put them into the castle, before the governor had received his orders from Copenhagen: and so both his own and his master's faith and honour were engaged to discharge the trust, of which he made haste to send an account to the king, and thereupon expected new directions, which were not arrived when the English fleet came thither. And when they did come, whether that court, according to its custom, did change its mind, and believe they should make a better bargain by keeping what was already deposited in their hands in the castle, than by making an uncertain division with the king; or whether they did in truth continue firm to the first agreement, and that the messenger was stopped by extraordinary accidents in his journey, (which was positively alleged,) so that he did not arrive in time; or whether the governor was not able to master the town that was much inclined to the Hollanders, before the vice-king came with his troops, who did make all possible haste as soon as he heard that the English were arrived; or whether the English did proceed more unadvisedly and rashly than they ought to have done; remains still in the dark: and both parties reproached each other afterwards, as they found most necessary for their several defences and pretences; of which more hereafter.

The king stayed not altogether so long at Salisbury as he had intended to have done: for besides a little accidental indisposition which made him dislike the air, some inferior servants and their wives came from London or the villages adjacent, and brought the plague with them; so that the court removed to Oxford before the end of September, the parliament being to assemble there on the tenth of the next month. And before he left Salisbury, his majesty sent an express to York to his brother, "that he would meet him as soon as he could." The duke had lived in great lustre in York all that summer, with the very great respect and continual attendance of all the persons of quality of that large county: and the duke no sooner received his majesty's summons than he took post, and left his wife and family to follow by ordinary journeys, and himself came to Oxford the next day after the king, where there were indeed matters of the highest importance to be consulted and resolved.

The king had sent Mr. Clifford to Denmark to be satisfied, upon conference with sir Gilbert Talbot, concerning the miscarriage at Bergen, and if the ships remained still there according to the promise the vice-king had made, and if that king were ready to perform what he had undertaken, that all particulars might be so adjusted that there might be no further mistake; and if he found that the jealousy of Sweden was a real obstruction to that alliance, that he should make a journey to Sweden, and upon conference with Mr. Coventry, who by his dexterity and very good parts had reconciled the affections of that court to a very great esteem of him, to endeavour to remove all those obstructions: and as soon as his majesty should receive full information of that whole affair, he must consider what he was to do to vindicate himself in that business of Bergen; for he knew well that he must suffer with all the world, for violating the peace of a port that was under the government of a neighbour prince with whom he was allied, if he did not make it appear that he had the consent of that prince, which he was not willing to do till he first knew what that king would do.

In the next place his majesty was to resolve what answer to make to the French ambassadors, who now desired frequent audiences, and positively declared, "that their master was engaged by his treaty with the Dutch, that in case they were invaded or assaulted by any prince, he would assist them with men, money, and ships, which he had hitherto deferred to do out of respect to the king, and in hope that he would accept his mediation, and make such propositions towards peace as he might press the others to consent to." The Dutch ambassador was likewise come to town, rather to treat concerning the prisoners and to observe what the French ambassadors did, than that he had any thing to propose in order to peace, there appearing now since their fleet was at sea more insolence in the Dutch, and a greater aversion from the peace, than had been formerly.

The king complained to the ambassadors of the French king's proceedings, "that the entering into that treaty was expressly against his word

"given to the king: that the Dutch had first began the war, and ought to make the first approach towards peace, but that [their] ambassador had no instruction to make any such instance; and therefore it seemed very strange to his majesty, that the French king should press for that which they had no desire to have."

The ambassadors confessed "that the Dutch did not desire a peace; that they thought they were too much behindhand, and that they had at present great advantages; that they looked upon the great plague in London" (which continued in its full rage and vigour, insomuch as at that time in the end of September there died not so few as six thousand in the week, amongst which some were of the best quality in the city) "as of such insupportable damage to the king, that he would not be able to set out another fleet the year following: and therefore that, when they had been pressed by the French king to make some propositions towards peace, he could get no other answer from them, than that they expected that the island of Poleroone should be released to them, and that the fort at Cabo Corso in Guinea should be thrown down and slighted; which they confessed was an insolent proposition. That they complained that the king their master, instead of giving them the assistance he was obliged to do, spent the time in procuring a peace, which they cared not for: so that," they said, "their master continued the same Christian office principally to do his majesty of Great Britain a service, who he in truth believed would be reduced to great straits by the terrible effect of the plague; and in the next place to defend himself from entering into the war, which he could no longer defer to do, if his majesty did not, by consenting to some reasonable overture, give him a just occasion to press them to yield to it; and in that case he would behave himself in that manner that the king should have no cause to complain of his partiality." The king's indignation was so provoked by the pride and impudence of the Dutch demands, that he gave the ambassadors no other answer, than "that he hoped God Almighty had not sent that heavy judgment of the plague upon him and his people on the behalf of the Hollanders, and to expose him to their insolence."

The parliament convened at Oxford in greater numbers than could reasonably have been expected, the sickness still continuing to rage and spread itself in several counties; so that between the danger that was in the towns infected, and the necessary severity in other towns to keep themselves from being infected, it was a very inconvenient season for all persons of quality to travel from their own habitations. Upon the tenth of October the king commanded both houses to attend him in Christ Church hall, and told them, "that he was confident they did all believe, that if it had not been absolutely necessary to consult with them, he would not have called them together at that time, when the contagion had spread itself over so many parts of the kingdom: and he thanked them for their compliance so far with his desires."

His majesty said, "the truth was; as he had entered upon the war by their advice and encouragement, so he desired that they might as

"frequently as was possible receive information of the effects and conduct of it, and that he might have the continuance of their cheerful supply for the carrying it on. He would not deny to them, that it had proved more chargeable than he could imagine it would have been: the addition the enemy had still made to their fleets, beyond their first purpose, made it unavoidably necessary for him to make proportionable preparations, which God had hitherto blessed with success in all encounters. And as they had used their utmost endeavours by calumnies and false suggestions to gain friends to themselves, and to persuade them to assist them against him, so he had not been wanting to encourage those princes who had been wronged by the Dutch, to recover their own by force; and in order thereunto, he had assisted the bishop of Munster with a great sum of ready money, and was to continue a supply to him, who he believed was at that time in the bowels of their country with a powerful army."

"Those issues, which he might tell them had been made with very much conduct and husbandry, (nor indeed did he know that any thing had been spent that could have been well and safely saved;) he said, "those expenses would not suffer them to wonder, that the great supply which they gave him for this war in so bountiful a proportion was upon the matter already spent: so that he must not only expect an assistance from them to carry on that war, but such an assistance as might enable him to defend himself and them against a more powerful neighbour, if he should prefer the friendship of the Dutch before his."

He put them in mind, "that when he entered upon this war, he had told them, that he had not such a brutal appetite as to make war for war's sake; he was still of the same mind: he had been ready to receive any propositions that France had thought fit to offer to that end, but hitherto nothing had been offered worthy his acceptance; nor was the Dutch less insolent, though he knew no advantage they had got but the continuance of the contagion, and he hoped that God Almighty would shortly deprive them of that encouragement."

The chancellor at the same time, by the king's command, made a short narrative of the history of the war, the circumstances with which it was begun, and the progress it had since made, and the victory that the duke had attained; of the vast number of the prisoners and sick and wounded men, a charge that had never been computed.

He told them, "the French king had indeed offered his mediation, and that if he intended no more than a mediation, it was an office very worthy the most Christian king: he wished, that as a mediator he would make equal propositions, or that he would not so importunately press his majesty to consent to those he makes, upon an instance and argument, that he holds himself engaged by a former treaty (of which his majesty had never heard till since the beginning of the war, and had some reason to have presumed the contrary) to assist the Dutch with men and money, if his majesty would not consent."

He said, "his majesty had told them, that he had no appetite to make war for war's sake;

"but he would be always ready to make such a peace as might be for his honour and the interest of his subjects. And no doubt it would be a great trouble and grief to his majesty to find so great a prince, towards whom he had manifested so great an affection, in conjunction with his enemies: yet even the apprehension of such a war would not terrify him to purchase a peace by such concessions as he should be ashamed to make them acquainted with; of which nature they would easily believe the propositions hitherto made to be, when they knew the release of Poleroone in the East Indies, and the demolishing the fort of Cabo Corso upon the coast of Guinea, were two; which would be upon the matter to be contented with a very vile trade in the East Indies under their control, and with none in Guinea. And yet those are not propositions unreasonable enough to please the Dutch, who reproached France for interposing for peace, instead of assisting them in the war, boldly insisting upon the advantage the contagion in London and some other parts of the kingdom gives them; by which, they confidently say, the king will be no longer able to maintain a fleet against them at sea."

He told them, "that he had fully obeyed the command that had been laid upon him, in making that plain, clear, true narrative of what had passed; he had no order to make reflection upon it, nor any deduction from it: the king himself had told them, that the noble, unparalleled supply they had already given him is upon the matter spent, spent with all the animadversions of good husbandry that the nature of the affair would bear. What was more to be done he left to their own generous understandings, being not more assured of anything that was to come in this world, than that the same noble indignation for the honour of the king and the nation, that first provoked them to inflame the king himself, would continue the same passion still boiling in their loyal breasts; that all the world may see, which they never hoped to have seen, that never prince and people were so entirely united in their affections, for their true, joint, inseparable honour, as their only sure infallible expedient to preserve their distinct several interests."

The king could not expect or wish a fuller concurrence from a parliament than he now found. With very little hesitation they declared, "that they would supply his majesty with another million, (ten hundred thousand pounds:)" and because they desired to be dismissed as soon as might be to their several habitations, not without apprehension that so great a concourse of persons from all places, even from London itself, (for the term was likewise adjourned to Oxford,) might bring the contagion thither likewise; they rejected all other businesses but what immediately related to the public. To the supply they designed to the king they added the sum of above forty thousand pounds, which they desired his majesty to confer upon the duke, having received some insinuation, "that it would not be ingrateful to the king that such a present should be made to his brother." Then they passed two or three acts of parliament very much for the king's honour and security, amongst which one was, "for the attainting all those his subjects who either re-

"aided in Holland" (as some of the English officers who had long served in that country presumed still to do) "and continued in their service, or in any other parts beyond the seas, if they did not appear at a day prefixed, after notice by the king's proclamation:" and the nomination of the persons was entirely left to his majesty.

His majesty did hope, that this very good carriage in the parliament would have made some impression upon France, either to give over their mediation, or to have drawn reasonable and just concessions from the States: but it did produce the contrary. The Hollander had received a new damage which inflamed them exceedingly, which shall be particularly mentioned in the next place, whereupon they made grievous complaints to France of its breach of faith upon the promises that had been made to them. The king upon this required his ambassadors once more to make a lively instance to his majesty, "that he would declare what he meant to insist upon in order to a peace, which if he should refuse to do, they should take their leaves and return into France with all possible expedition." In this audience they spake in a higher style than they had formerly used. They complained "of the intolerable damage the subjects of France had sustained in their goods and estates by the king's ships, and those who were licensed by his authority, which without any distinction seized upon all that came in their way as if they were Dutch: and when they complained to the admiralty or to the lords commissioners, they could procure no justice, and were obliged to [such] an attendance and expense, that what they sued for did not prove of value to satisfy the charge of the prosecution; and if after a long and a tedious solicitation they did at last procure a sentence for the redelivery of what had been taken from them, when they hoped to enjoy the benefit of this just sentence by the execution, they found the goods embezzled in the port or plundered by the seamen, that the owners had rarely a third part of their goods ever restored to them. And that by this violence and unjust proceeding, of which they had often made complaint, the French merchants had lost near five hundred thousand pistoles; which their master represented and looked upon as a great indignity to himself, which he had hitherto borne, in hope that the license would have been restrained by the end of the war."

They urged it as an argument of their master's friendship to the king, "that after an offensive treaty had been so long since entered into by him, by which he was obliged to assist the Dutch with men, money, and ships, he had notwithstanding hitherto forborne it, and looked on whilst they were soundly beaten, and had lately sustained another blow; and that it was not possible for him to defer it longer:" and so concluded with very earnest persuasions, "that his majesty would consent to such a peace as their master should judge to be reasonable, who could not but be very just to his majesty;" and wished, "that it might be considered, besides the damage by the plague, which nobody knew how long it might continue, how impossible it was for the king to sustain the arms of France in conjunction with those of Holland, when possibly some other prince might join likewise with them."

They who were appointed by the king to confer with the ambassadors were most perplexed to justify their first charge, "of the depredation that had been made upon the French merchants," which had in truth been very great, though not amounting to the sum they mentioned. Yet to that they answered, "that the damage and loss which the subjects of France had undergone that way had originally proceeded from themselves, and their own default in owning the goods and merchandise of the Dutch to belong to themselves as their proper goods, and in undertaking to carry and deliver the wine and other goods, which were bought and paid for in France by the Hollanders, in French vessels in that country; all which had been fully and notoriously proved, and could not be contradicted: and when that discovery was once made, it was no wonder if the seamen sometimes seized upon some vessels which were not liable to the same reproach. But when any complaints of that kind had been made, the king had always given strict charge to the judges to cause restitution to be made, and the transgressors to be severely punished; and his majesty presumed that the judges had done their duty. For the French king's being bound by his treaty to assist the Hollanders," they said, "that if the king had any such obligation upon him, it was subsequent to his obligation to his majesty, by which he was bound to make no such treaty: nor in truth did they believe that he had entered into any such treaty; for if it were only such as they themselves stated it to be, a defensive league, it would neither engage nor excuse France in giving assistance to them who had done the wrong and begun the war; and therefore if the king was in truth bound to assist them, it must be from some offensive, not defensive clause."

The ambassadors replied, "that their master concluded that their king was the aggressor, and then the defensive article did oblige him;" and they acknowledged there was no other. It was answered, "that the king had assumed a power to judge upon a matter of fact of which he had taken no examination; and that it was a partiality not agreeable to the office of a judge, to believe what the Dutch said, and not to believe what the king said, who had clearly published the true history of the fact; and that it was notorious, and not possible to be denied, that they had refused to deliver Poleroone according to their treaty, and that De Ruyter had begun the war in Guinea before one of their ships had been seized on by the king." To which they replied, "that their master thought otherwise, and did look upon the king as aggressor." When they were urged with the violation of the former obligation by entering into the latter, all the answer they gave was, "that they knew nothing of it, and that they had commission only to treat upon the present state of affairs, and not upon what had passed long before;" and so, according to the character they underwent near fourteen hundred years since, "Galli ridentes fidem fragerunt."

The counsellors of the king told them, "that their master had very well considered the disadvantage he must undergo by the access of so powerful a friend, and of whose friendship he had thought himself possessed, to the part of his enemies, who were too insolent already; and therefore to prevent that disadvantage, he had and would do any thing that would consist with the dignity of a king: but that he must be laughed at and despised by all the world, if he should consent to make him the arbitrator of the differences who had already declared himself to be a party, and that he is resolved to make war against him on the behalf of his enemy; and that such menaces would make no impression in the last article of danger that could befall the king." The ambassadors took that expression of menaces very heavily, as if it were a tax upon their manners, and said "they had never used words that could imply a menace." To which it was replied, "that there was no purpose to make any reflection upon their persons, who had always carried themselves with great respect to the king, and who his majesty believed did in their own particular affection wish him better than they did the Dutch: however the declaring, that if the king did not do this or that, the French king would make war upon him, could in no language be looked upon to have any other signification than of a menace and threat." This raised a little warmth on both sides, which made the conference break off at that time.

The ambassadors prepared to be gone; and the king discerned clearly that there was no way to divert the French from an entire conjunction with the Dutch: and thereupon he assembled his secret council together again, to consult what should be the final answer his majesty should give to the French ambassadors at parting. There was no person present, who had not a deep apprehension of the extreme damage and danger that must fall upon the king's affairs, if in this conjuncture France should declare a war against England.

It was well known, that the duke of Beaufort was forthwith to be at Brest, where all the French king's ships were to assemble at their rendezvous by Christmas; that [the French king] had already sent to the bishop of Munster to dissuade him from prosecuting his enterprise against Holland, and that probably he might unite Denmark again to the Dutch, and probably even allay those warm inclinations which the Swede had for the king. It was well known, that the French king had in the last distractions in Holland contributed very much to the composing them, and to the support of the power and credit of De Wit, who was the soul of the war, and that he had sent him one hundred thousand pistoles, without which they would have hardly been able to have set out their last fleet under De Ruyter. And above all this, his giving life to some domestic rebellion in England and in Ireland, by sending money to discontented persons, was apprehended: for as there were enough discontented and desperate persons in the latter, who wanted only arms and money to declare for any prince who would take them into his protection; it was well known that there was a general combination amongst those of the late army to have risen, if the duke of York had been defeated at sea, and that it was that victory that disappointed that intended insurrection. That there had been a later design, in the very height of this dismal sickness and contagion, in London, (whither the fanatic party had repaired from all the quarters of the kingdom, and had appointed a day upon which the general should be assassinated, which some soldiers of his own regiment had undertaken, and then the whole rendezvous was to be in several streets at the same time;) which in so formidable a conjuncture might have succeeded to a great degree, if by God's blessing it had not been discovered two days before to the general, who caused some of the chief conspirators to be apprehended, who suffered afterwards by the hand of justice. And yet the chief amongst them, colonel Danvers, who in spite of all the vigilance that could be used had been always searched for and always concealed from the time of the king's return, being at this time apprehended and brought before the general, and by him sent with a lieutenant and a guard of soldiers to the Tower, was rescued in Cheapside, and so escaped, all the citizens looking on without aiding the officer.

This was the prospect that the king had of his condition and affairs in this consultation: and therefore if any thing could have occurred that might probably have diverted this storm, it would no doubt have been embraced. But then the exceeding breach of faith in entering into that treaty, the denying it afterwards, and concealing his engagement by it so long after the war was entered into, (which if he had not done, the king could never have looked upon him as a fit mediator,) and the impossibility of depending upon any thing that should be promised for the future, were convincing arguments against any such reference of the conditions to his determination as was proposed, and was the only expedient that was proposed towards the making a peace. It was well known that the chief counsels of France, since monsieur Colbert entered upon the ministry, had been directed towards the advancement of manufactures at home, by which they might have less need of commerce with their neighbours; and for the erecting a foreign trade abroad, with which they had been very little acquainted in former times. And it was justly to be feared, that where the judgment was left to them, they would imitate the infamous Roman precedent, of adjudging that to themselves that was in difference between their neighbours and left to their decision: and so both Polerones in the East Indies, and Cabo Corso for the West, must be determined to belong to them; which might be the rather apprehended, by their having erected an East India company and a West India company, before they had any visible foundation for a trade in either, to which both these places might carry with them great conveniences.

These considerations being seriously reflected upon, with a little generous indignation to find himself thus treated, prevailed with the king to lay aside all thoughts of further complying with France, and to resolve to dismiss the ambassadors without any other answer, than what should contain complaints, "of the French king's want of kindness, which his majesty had cultivated by all the offices he could perform since his restoration, which did not receive an equal return, by the preferring the friendship of the Dutch before that of his majesty." And with this answer the ambassadors were dismissed, with liberal presents and all gracious demonstrations of esteem of their persons, and so returned for France, where they always gave just testimony of the civilities and fair treatment they had received.

But this resolution increased the king's appetite to peace, and made him think of all other expedients that might contribute to it; and none seemed so hopeful, as that France and Holland might be divided: and he would have been very willing to have agreed with Holland upon any reasonable conditions, that he might continue the war with France; which there were many reasonable inducements to hope might be brought to pass. It was notorious, that preparations had been made for two or three years past by France at a very great expense upon the borders, that they might be ready to enter into Flanders as soon as news should arrive of the king of Spain's death; and that war would immediately fall out as soon as that king's decease should be known, which from his age and infirmities must be expected every day: and in that case the friendship could not continue long with Holland, which thought that France was already too near a neighbour to them, to be willing that they should be nearer by a conquest of Flanders, which with its own force could not make an equal resistance. It was likewise as notorious that all the other provinces, Holland only excepted, did impatiently desire the peace; and Holland had only been restrained from the same impatience by the sole credit and authority of De Wit, and by his persuading them, "that France would assist them with men, money, and ships, and likewise declare a war against England, which" (as hath been said before) "would produce a peace upon such conditions as would make it happy to them:" and that though it was true that it had indeed assisted them with some money, it was not considerable to their vast expenses, nor in truth of importance in comparison of the other, which it was equally obliged to do, and had performed nothing. And it was evident that Holland itself was jealous of those proceedings; and even De Wit, in his private discourses to other ministers, seemed to be much unsatisfied with their breach of faith, and not to be without apprehension that they would in the end enter into a stricter alliance with England, and leave Holland as a prey to both.

The Spanish ambassador, who always desired that the peace might be established between the English and the Dutch, and that they would both join with Spain in a defensive league, into which Denmark would be glad to enter, and Sweden might be drawn in upon the same conditions which they now received from France, towards which he had often desired the king to interpose, was now very glad that the French ambassadors had taken their leaves and were gone; and he pretended to have many assurances from the Spanish ambassador at the Hague, that the Dutch had those inclinations which are mentioned before, "and that De Wit would be glad to confer in private with any man trusted by the king, if he might be sure that it should not be communicated to France." Upon all these probabilities, and the certainty that no good could be expected from France, his majesty resolved to embrace all opportunities to agree with Holland; towards which he had a secret intelligence, to which he gave more credit than to all the rest, which shall be mentioned hereafter.

There were so many great transactions during the king's residence in Oxford, besides what was done in the parliament and what related to the dismissal of the French ambassadors, so many counsels which were executed, and so many secret designs only initiated then, and not executed till long after, that there cannot be too particular a recollection of the occurrences of all that time. And if some things are mentioned which seem too light and of too small importance to have a place in this relation, they will be found at last to be the rise and principal ingredient to some counsel and resolution, which proved afterwards of consequence enough, as well to the public as to the interest of particular persons.

The first attempt that was made was to make a breach between the chancellor and the treasurer, who had been long fast friends, and were believed to have most credit with the king; and they who loved neither of them thought the most likely way to hurt them was to make them love one another less. Several attempts had been made upon the chancellor to that purpose without effect: he knew the other too well to be shaken in the esteem he had of his friendship, and the knowledge he had of his virtue.

But there was now an accident fell out, that gave them an opportunity to suggest to the treasurer, "that the chancellor had failed in his friendship towards him." The occasion was upon the vacancy of an office near the queen by the death of Mr. Mountague, master of the horse to her majesty, who had been killed before Bergen: and the news arriving with the duke at York, before it was known at Salisbury to the king, the duke and his wife writ to the king and to the queen "to confer that place upon his younger brother," who was now become both the eldest and the only son to his father, the lord Mountague of Boughton; and the gentleman himself, on whose behalf the letters were writ, came himself by post with them within two or three hours after the news was brought to Salisbury, and he brought likewise a letter from the duchess to the chancellor, "to assist the gentleman all he could in his pretence," he at the same time enjoying the same office under the duchess that his brother had under the queen.

The chancellor had never used to interpose in matters of that nature, nor had he any acquaintance with this gentleman who was now recommended: yet he could not refuse to wait upon the queen, and shew her the letter he had received, without any intention to appear further in it. But when he waited upon the queen, who had received her letter before, her majesty seemed graciously disposed to gratify the gentleman, if the king approved it; but said, "that she would make no choice herself of any servant without knowing first his majesty's pleasure:" and she added, "that she had been informed, that the lord Mountague was very angry with his son that was unfortunately slain, for having taken that charge in her family, and that he never allowed him any thing towards his support; and if all other obstructions were out of the way, she would not receive him, except she were first assured that his father would like and desire it." Her majesty vouchsafed to wish the chancellor "to speak with the king, and as dexterously as "he could to dispose him to recommend Mr. Mountague to her, as just and reasonable, since his brother had lost his life in his service."

This command of her majesty obliged the chancellor to wait upon the king, and to shew him the letter he had received from the duchess; and at the same time the king gave him that which he had from the duke, in which his highness desired him, "that if that place was not presently conferred upon Mr. Mountague, his majesty would not dispose of it till he waited upon him." The chancellor told him, "that the queen gave no answer, but referred it entirely to his majesty." And he said, "he would never recommend any person to her but such a one as would be very grateful to her." He said, "it would seem very hard to deny one brother to succeed another who was killed in his service." He confessed, "that the lord Crofts had moved him on the behalf of Mr. Robert Spencer, of whom he had a good opinion: but that he had answered him, that he would not do any thing in it till he saw his brother; which resolution he would keep." To which the chancellor made no reply, having in his own private inclinations and affection much more kindness for Mr. Spencer, of whose pretence he had never received the least intimation before, than for the other, with whom he had spoken very few words in his life. He told Mr. Mountague no more but that which the king himself had told him, "that he would not dispose of the place till the duke should arrive;" only he added what the queen had said of his father, and advised him to think of the way to remove that obstruction. Whereupon he resolved to make a journey to his father, which he knew he might well do before the king and his brother could meet.

The same night Mr. Spencer came to the chancellor, and brought him a letter from the treasurer (whose nephew he was, and who was unfortunately gone out of the town the day before to a house of his own twenty miles distant) to recommend his nephew to the queen, to whom and to the king he had likewise letters. The chancellor gave him an account of all that had passed, shewed him the letter that he had received from the duchess, and told him what the queen and the king had said, and "that it was not possible for him to do him service, for which he was very sorry;" but advised him "to deliver both his letters, and to attend their majesties, who he was confident had yet taken no resolution:" with all which he was very well satisfied, and confessed "he could not expect that he should appear for him." When he delivered his letters to both their majesties, he received so gracious an answer from both, that he might reasonably [expect] his suit to be granted, though the king told him, "he would not dispose of the place till he spake with his brother." And there is no doubt but if the lord treasurer had been in the town when the news first came to the king of Mr. Mountague's death, which was a whole day before the arrival of the duke's letter, the king or queen would not have denied him his request.

Within a short time after Mr. Spencer had left him, the lord Crofts, who had married his sister, and was governed by the lord Arlington, came to the chancellor, and desired him "to take care,

"out of his friendship with the treasurer, that the king might not refuse to gratify him in this suit for his nephew, which was the first he had ever made; and if he should be denied, it would exceedingly trouble him. That when he spake to the king of it, as soon as the news came, and told him, he was sure that the treasurer would be a suitor to him for his nephew, his majesty did promise him that he should have it; and that both their majesties had as good as said the same now to Robert Spencer: and therefore, if he would now use his credit, the thing might be despatched presently, and without further delay."

The chancellor asked him, "whether Mr. Spencer had informed him of all that had passed between them two?" he said, "yes; and that he had done all that the duchess had desired him, in speaking both to the king and queen, and that his friendship to the lord treasurer should prevail with him to use all his endeavours for his nephew." Whereupon the chancellor shewed the duchess's letter, and repeated to him again all that he had formerly said to Mr. Spencer, and asked him, "what the duke and his wife must think of him, if, instead of pursuing what they desired, he should solicit quite contrary to it." He said, "that he might tell them that he was engaged by the lord treasurer before he received their letter;" and then talked passionately and indiscreetly "of the affront the treasurer would think he received, if this were denied him; and that all the world would say, that he might have compassed it, if he had not failed in his friendship." To which he made no other answer, than "that the doing so base a thing as he desired would more probably destroy that friendship with a man so punctual in honour and justice as the treasurer was, than any thing that he had done or should leave undone;" and advised him "not to make the business worse by his activity, and that if he had the king's and queen's promise, as he pretended, he might very well acquiesce till the duke came."

However, his very great indiscretion and presumption made the thing much worse, by delivering messages from the king to the queen, and from her majesty to the king, that they both disavowed, and by his usual discourses, "that it should now appear who had the most credit with the king, the duke or the treasurer, and how much the king would suffer, if he disobliged the treasurer;" all which was quickly transmitted by the intelligence that was every day sent to York. On the other hand, he still advised the treasurer "to continue his importunity to the king and queen," (a thing the most contrary to his nature,) and assured him, "that it would be grateful to them, and was expected by them." Whereupon, as soon as the treasurer came to the court, which was not till the king came to Oxford, he went to both their majesties, and renewed his suit to them with more warmth and concernment than was customary to him, and received such an answer from both as very well satisfied him; and without doubt the king intended to persuade his brother to desist from pressing him further on the behalf of the other, for whom he had no kindness.

But the duke, who arrived by post the very next day, came in another temper than was expected. The intelligence from Salisbury of the contest that was for that place, and the insolent behaviour and expressions used by the lord Crofts, had exceedingly moved him, and he looked upon the treasurer as engaged to try who had the greatest power, and in opposition to him: so that the same night that he came to town, when the king and he were in private, he complained of it with much warmth; and he besought his majesty importunately "that he would declare, that the world might know who had most interest in his favour, he or the treasurer." The king was so much put out of the method he intended to use in this affair, knowing that the expressions the duke had mentioned had been too often used by the lord Crofts, for which he had often reprehended him, that he presently applied that remedy which he thought most proper; and, after conference with the queen, signed the warrant for admitting Mr. Mountague into the office, who was sworn the next morning: so that the first news the treasurer heard, after both their majesties had the day before said all to him that he could desire, was, that the place was already full; which he received with more commotion than was natural to him, and looked upon it as a designed contrived affront, to expose him to contempt. "Why would not the king, if he had changed his mind after he left him, first send him word of it, that he might have known his purpose?"

All this storm fell presently upon the chancellor: the lord Crofts assured him, "that it had been done at Salisbury, if he had not hindered it; that he had been with the duke before he spake with the king, and given him advice what tune he should speak in, which was used accordingly, and had prevailed; and that when he came into the duke's chamber to kiss his hand, his highness turned away, and would not speak to him, which must proceed from the influence of the chancellor." Whereas in truth the chancellor had only seen the duke in public, and said no more to him than what he said in public, thinking it no good manners to trouble him with any private discourse, when he was so weary of his journey; nor did he know that any thing was done in that affair till the day after it was done, and after it was known to the treasurer. Upon the whole matter, how unwilling soever he was to believe that he could be so grossly faulty to him, when he saw the chancellor next, his countenance was not the same it used to be; which the other taking notice of, asked him, according to his usual familiarity, "what the matter was;" but received such an answer as made him discern that there was somewhat amiss: and so he said no more. The other being the same day with the king, the duke came into the room, and in his looks manifested a displeasure towards the treasurer, which confirmed the former jealousy of the chancellor; which was improved by the ladies, who did not like their lodging, and thought it proceeded from want of friendship in him, who had the power over the university, and might have assigned what lodgings he pleased to the treasurer; and he had assigned this, as the best house in the town for so great a family, and which their own servant had desired as the best in the town, as it was.

When the chancellor discovered the ground of this alteration, he grew out of humour too, and thought himself unworthily suspected: and so for two or three days the two friends came not together. And in that time the chancellor had enough to do to inform the duke, who was not only very much offended with the treasurer, but thought that he had been, out of his friendship to the treasurer, more remiss than he ought to have been in a business so earnestly recommended by him and his wife; and the intelligence from Salisbury had made reflections upon him as much as upon the other. But his royal highness willingly received information of all that had passed, and discerned the foul carriage of others as well as of the lord Crofts; and was pleased to confess, "that he had done all he ought to do, and that he had been misinformed of the lord treasurer's part in that affair, which had made him think amiss of him; which he would acknowledge to him next time he saw him."

After this the chancellor, having a more clear view, upon conference with the king and the duke, of this pernicious design, which in some degree had compassed its end, if there grew a strangeness between the treasurer and him, went to him: and they being together without any others, he told him, "it should not be in his power to break friendship with him to gratify the humour of other people, without letting him know what the matter was," which he conjured him to impart to him; assuring him, "that he would find that nothing was more impossible than that he could commit a fault towards him, and that they who wished well to neither of them had contrived this separation as the best way to hurt them both." And when he saw that he did not yet open himself, he told him, "that he had heard that he had received some umbrage in the pretence of his nephew, and therefore he would give him an account of all that he knew of it," which he did exactly; and concluded with a protestation, "that he had not known what had been done at Oxford till after he came from him, when he observed the change of his countenance towards him, of the cause of which he could not then make any conjecture."

The treasurer thereupon with his usual freedom told him, "that if his part had been no other than as he related, he thought himself obliged to give him a narration of all he had done, and of the grounds and motives he had to think that he had failed in his friendship." And thereupon he mentioned "the kindness and esteem he had for his nephew, whom he thought in all respects of birth and breeding at least as worthy of that relation as the gentleman who was possessed of it; and yet that since he was not upon the place, he had no mind to engage himself in the suit: and that when his nephew had given him an account what the chancellor had said to him," which he did with great ingenuity, "and he knew that the duke of York appeared in it for another, he resolved to prosecute it no further; until the lord Crofts with all confidence assured him, that the king had promised him to confer the place upon Robert Spencer, and that both their majesties expected that he should make it his suit, to the end that they might thereby decline the importunity that he expected from his brother." He told him of some expressions he had used to the king in that affair, which the king himself had reported; and "that when he took his leave of the queen to go to Oxford," (which was the next day after Mr. Mountague came from York,) "he dissuaded her majesty from receiving Mr. Spencer, alleging some reasons against it, which a lady who was near overheard, and informed the person of it who acquainted him with it: all which, with the king's and queen's so ample promises to him so few hours before the conferring the place upon another, and the duke of York's manner of receiving him after he had been shut up with him, as he was informed, might very well excuse him for thinking he had some share in the affront he had undergone."

To which the other replied, "that if indeed he did believe all that he had been told, he could not but think so; but," he said, "he thought he had known him better than to give credit to such reports, which must make him a fool and a knave: that for the words he should have used to the king or the queen, there had nothing passed like it to either of them, but that they were purely devised out of malice; which should be manifest unto him, for he would not speak a word of it to the king till they were both with him together, and then he would ask before him what his carriage had been, and by his majesty's sudden answer he might judge of the report." He told him then, "how much he had suffered with the duke, and what excellent stories had been made to his royal highness of both of them, and of the good part the lord Crofts had acted, of which he was not without some evidence." After this éclaircissement, of the sincerity whereof every day administered new testimony, they both returned to their mutual confidence in each other: and they who had contrived this former device entered into a new confederacy, how they might first remove the treasurer, which would facilitate the pulling the chancellor down; of which anon.

Within a short time after the duke returned out of Yorkshire, his highness told the chancellor in confidence, "that he had two suits which he intended to make to the king, and with which he first acquainted him, that he might have his assistance in the obtaining them. The first was, in which he and his wife were equally engaged, to prevail with the king to make sir George Savile a viscount." He said, "he knew well the resolution the king had taken, to which he had contributed his advice, to make no more lords: but that he hoped in this particular case his majesty would upon his desire dispense with a general rule. That sir George had one of the best fortunes of any man in England, and lived the most like a great man; that he had been very civil to him and his wife in the north, and treated them at his house in a very splendid manner; and that he was engaged to prevail with the king in this point, or to confess he had no power, which he hoped he should not be without in this matter;" and asked his opinion.

The chancellor in his usual freedom, which he always took when he was to deliver his advice to the king or duke, said, "that he could not advise his highness to move the king in it; for besides that he knew the king's positive determination, the departure from which might be of ill con"sequence, sir George Savile was a man of a very ill reputation amongst men of piety and religion, and was looked upon as void of all sense of religion, even to the doubting, if not denying, that there is a God, and that he was not reserved in any company to publish his opinions: which made him believe that it would neither be for his highness's honour to propose it, nor for the king's to grant it, in a time when all license in discourse and in actions was spread over the kingdom, to the heart-breaking of very many good [men], who had terrible apprehensions of the consequence of it." The duke was not at all pleased with his discourse, and said, "he was resolved to use all his credit with the king to compass it, and that he hoped, that whatever he thought, he would not oppose it."

The other particular was, "that he would move the king to make Mr. Coventry his secretary a privy counsellor;" and asked him "what he thought of that." To which he answered, "that his opinion in that point would please him no better than in the former. That he did not think it fit to be asked: and if the king his brother were inclined to be jealous of him, as some had endeavoured to persuade him, such an instance as this would very much confirm it; for never any prince of Wales had a servant of the highest degree about him called to the council, till his father called the earl of Newcastle, who was the prince's governor, to the board; which was not till upon the approach of the troubles he discerned that he should employ him in another charge. That the members of that board had been always those great officers of state, and other officers, who in respect of the places they held had a title to sit there, and of such few others who, having great titles and fortunes and interest in the kingdom, were an ornament to the table. That there were at present too many already, and the number lessened the dignity of the relation: that his highness had already brought the lord Berkley thither, who had no manner of title to be there but his dependance upon him; and now to bring in his secretary, for no other reason but for being his secretary, might be thought an encroachment, and be misinterpreted by the king." He added, "that his wrangling litigious nature would give the board much trouble; and that he knew him to be so much his particular enemy, that he would watch all the opportunities to do him all possible ill offices to the king and to his royal highness."

The duke replied only to the last, and said, "he perceived somebody had done Will. Coventry ill offices, which he knew to be unjust and false: and that he could assure him, upon his own knowledge, that he had a great respect for him, and desired his favour; and that he would pass his word for him, that he would never do any thing to disserve him, which if he should do, he should for ever lose his favour, which he knew well." And no doubt the duke did believe all he said, for he had a perfect kindness for the chancellor; and when he did not comply with what he wished, he knew that it was out of the integrity of his judgment, and his strict duty to the king and himself, and that he had never flattered or dissembled with either of them. And Mr. Coventry had skill enough to persuade him to believe what he desired should be true, though there were in the view of all men frequent instances of the contrary, and of the absence of all ingenuity and sincerity in his actions.

Within very few days after this conference, and when the duchess had made new instance with her father in the case of sir George Savile, and with more importunity than the duke, and appeared more concerned and troubled that he should not be more forward to comply with the duke's desires, (but the chancellor, who always with the respect that was due to her quality preserved the dignity of a father very entire, would give no other answer than he had done to the duke, and advised her to dissuade him from making the request to the king;) his highness one day desired the king that he would retire into his closet, and call the chancellor to him: and when they three were together in the room, after a short discourse of letters which he had received from the earl of Sandwich, which there will be occasion anon to mention at large, the duke told the king, "he had an humble suit to his majesty;" and then spake much of the great interest that sir George Savile had in the northern parts, of the greatness of his estate, and his orderly and splendid way of living, and concluded with his desire, "that his majesty would make him an English viscount." Upon which the king presently put him in mind "of the resolution he had formerly made in that room, and he thought upon his own motion, but he was sure it had been with his concurrence and approbation."

The duke replied, "that he remembered it very well, and thought he should do well still in the general to observe it: yet it was in those cases always supposed, that an extraordinary case might fall out, that might produce an exception; and he did most humbly beseech his majesty, that he would, upon his very earnest interposition, from which nobody could make a precedent, dispense with the rule." He did confess, "that he was so confident of his majesty's favour, that he had given sir George Savile cause to believe that he would prevail in that suit; which if he should not do, he must be thought either not to have intended what he promised, or to have no credit with his majesty, neither of which would be for his honour."

The king replied roundly, and with more presence of mind than he had always about him, "that it was absolutely necessary to be very precise in the observation of the rule, which if he should once break, a world of inconveniences would break in upon him, which he could not defend himself against." He named two or three persons who were very solicitous for honours, and had several pretences to it, and his majesty had only been able to resist and evade their importunity, by objecting this declared resolution to them. The plain truth is; he had made some promise (a weakness he was too often liable to) to those persons or to their friends, "that when he should make any new creations, they should be sure to be in the number:" nor did he apprehend any inconvenience from redeeming himself from the present importunity, which was still grievous to him, since he had resolved to make no new creation. And this was the true reason that made him now so inexorable to his brother, who was very much troubled, and declined to move any thing else in so unlucky a season, not without some apprehension, from the king's quicker way of discourse, that he had been prepared for it by the chancellor, who though present had not spoke one word in the debate, nor indeed ever informed the king of the conference his highness had formerly held with him upon that subject, nor ever spoken to him concerning it.

However, in this perplexity, as the duke thought it necessary to inform Mr. Coventry, who had principally advanced this pretence, all that had passed before the king, that his nephew (for so sir George Savile was) might see he could make no further progress in it; so in the passion he unwarily told him all that had passed in the former conference with the chancellor, which he took care should not be concealed from any who were like to be willing to revenge it. And the duke, to shew how willing he was to oblige the family, immediately received a younger brother of sir George Savile, whom he had only seen in the north, to wait upon him in his bedchamber; who being a young man of wit, and incredible confidence and presumption, omitted no occasion to vent his malice against the chancellor, with a license that in former times would have been very penal, though it had concerned a person of a much inferior quality in the state.

Within a short time after, the king told the chancellor, "that his brother had desired him that his secretary Mr. Coventry might be admitted of the privy-council, which he could not deny, but had promised it should be done at the next meeting;" which was accordingly done, and he knighted: and quickly after, upon the like desire of the duke, he was called to that committee with which his majesty used to consult his most secret affairs. And from this time there was an alteration in the whole carriage and debate of all manner of business: and as the chancellor had found his own credit with the king much diminished from the time of the lord Arlington's being secretary; so a greater decrease of it was now visible to all men from the access of this new counsellor.

The lord Arlington had not the gift of speaking nor of a quick conception, and so rarely contradicted any thing in council: his talent was in private, where he frequently procured, very inconveniently, changes and alterations from public determinations. But sir William Coventry (between whom and the other there was an entire conjunction and combination) was a man of quick parts and a ready speaker, unrestrained by any modesty or submission to the age, experience, or dignity of other men, equally censorious of what had been done before he was a counsellor, as solicitous in contradiction of whatsoever was proposed afterwards: insomuch as the very first time that he was admitted to the private committee, the debate being about providing money to be paid at a day approaching to the bishop of Munster, according to the king's obligation, he said, "we had need enough of money for our own immediate occasions; and that we ought not to assign any to the advancement of the affairs of other men." Whereupon he was informed "of the treaty the king had entered into, and that the bishop was at that time upon his march, which was by every body looked upon as of great importance "to his majesty;" to which he answered, "that he had heard somewhat of it, how secretly soever it had been carried, and that he had never liked it from the beginning, nor would give his consent that any more money should be paid towards it;" which the king himself looked upon as a rare impudence.

His great ambition was to be taken notice of for opposing and contradicting whatsoever was proposed or said by the chancellor or treasurer, towards whom all other counsellors, how little soever they cared for their persons, had ever paid respect in regard of their offices. He was a declared enemy to all lawyers, and to the law itself; and any thing passed under the great seal of England was of no more authority with him, than if it were the scroll of a scrivener. He had no principles in religion or state; of one mind this day, and another to-morrow; and always very uneasy to those who were obliged to consult with him; whose pride and insolence will administer frequent occasions of mention throughout the ensuing relation.

The king had not been many days in Oxford, when news arrived that the earl of Sandwich had been engaged in some conflict with the Dutch fleet; of the particulars whereof there was a general longing to be advertised. The truth was, that whilst the earl rode, after the business of Bergen, as near that coast as was safe, in expectation of the Dutch fleet, the winds, which are always tempestuous in that season of the year, September, made it absolutely necessary for him to remove with his whole fleet to the coast of Scotland, where there were harbours enough for him to ride safe; and in this interval of time De Ruyter was passed by towards that of Norway. The news of their Indian fleet having been attacked by the English in Bergen, and the letters of some of their officers, which implied as if they were not satisfied in the security of the port and of the fidelity of the governor, produced a wonderful consternation in Holland; and if they should be deprived of that wealth, the very company of the East Indies would be in danger of being dissolved.

The fleet was ready to set sail, under the command of De Ruyter, well fitted and manned: but there were still so many factions amongst the captains and other officers, that might upon any accidents produce many mischiefs; for the better prevention whereof, the pensionary De Wit was willing to venture his own person, believing himself to be as secure any where as on shore, if any misfortune should befall the fleet. And so he was by a special commission made plenipotentiary, with an ample allowance for his table, and a guard of halberdiers for the safety of his person, with a good train of volunteers: and so he put himself on board the ship of De Ruyter, who received orders from him.

The earl of Sandwich, after he had received advertisements of the Dutch fleet's being passed by for Norway, took all the care he could to put himself and his fleet in the way of their return. They made a short stay on the coast of Norway, where upon good consideration their ships were dismissed, and loud clamour raised against the hostility of the English. And notwithstanding all the vigilance the earl could use, the darkness and length of the nights so favoured them, that he could not engage their whole fleet, as he endeavoured to do: yet he had the good fortune in two encounters to take eight of their great ships of war, two of their best East India ships, and about twenty of their other merchant ships, which were all under the protection of their fleet, or ought to have been. After which he was by tempest driven to put the fleet into security in the English harbours, it being already the month of October.

It was a fair booty, and came very opportunely to supply the present necessities of the navy, and to provide for the setting out of the next fleet at spring, and was in truth gotten with very good conduct, and without any considerable damage: but it being much less than was expected, (for whatsoever was upon the sea was looked upon as our own,) the news no sooner arrived at Oxford, but intelligence came with it of many oversights which had been committed and opportunities lost, otherwise it had been easy to have taken the whole fleet; and that it might have been pursued further when it was in view, after those East India ships were taken, which were indeed surprised and boarded at the break of day, when they thought themselves in the middle of their own fleet. And it is as true that the earl did then pursue to engage the fleet, till they were got so near the French shore, that the wind blowing in to the land, it was by all the flag officers thought absolutely necessary to give over the chase.

Sir William Coventry, who had never paid a civility to any worthy man but as it was a dis-obligation to another whom he cared less for, and so had only contributed to the preferment of the earl of Sandwich in the last expedition that he might cross prince Rupert, received much intelligence from several officers in the fleet, which he scattered abroad to the prejudice of the earl, and was willing that it should be believed that he had been too wary in avoiding danger. But the king and the duke were very just to the earl, and discountenanced all those reports as scandals and calumnies: and the duke, who had seen his behaviour in the most dangerous action, gave him a loud testimony "of a prudent and brave commander, and as forward and bold in the face of danger as the occasion required or discretion permitted." And his highness undertook "that he had in all this expedition done what a man of honour was obliged to do," and was abundantly satisfied (as his majesty likewise was) with the rich prizes he had brought home, which had caused equal lamentation in Holland, and almost broke the heart of De Wit himself. But what success soever the earl had at sea, it was his misfortune to do an unadvised action when he came into the harbour, that lessened the king's own esteem of him, and to a great degree irreconciled the duke to him, and gave opportunity to his enemies to do him much prejudice.

It was a constant and a known rule in the admiralty, that of any ship that is taken from the enemy bulk is not to be broken, till it be brought into the port and adjudged lawful prize. It seems that when the fleet returned to the harbour, the flag-officers petitioned or moved the earl of Sandwich, "in regard of their having continued all the summer upon the seas with great fatigue, and been engaged in many actions of danger, that he would distribute amongst them some reward out of the Indian ships;" which he thought reasonable, and inclined to satisfy them, and writ a letter to the vice-chamberlain to inform the king of it, and "that he thought it fit to be done;" to which the vice-chamberlain, having shewed the letter to the king, returned his majesty's approbation. But before the answer came to his hand, he had executed the design, and distributed as much of the coarser goods to the flag-officers, as by estimation was valued to be one thousand pounds to each officer, and took to the value of two thousand pounds for himself. This suddenly made such a noise and outcry, as if all the Indian and other merchant ships had been plundered by the seamen: and they again cried out as much, that no care was taken of them, but all given to the flag-officers; which the other captains thought to be an injury to them.

The general (who had nothing like kindness for the earl of Sandwich, whose service he thought had been too much considered and recompensed by the king at his arrival) had notice of it before it came to Oxford; and, according to his universal care, (which was afterwards found to proceed from private animosity,) sent orders to all the port towns, to seize upon goods which were brought in shallops from the fleet; and gave advertisement to Oxford of the extraordinary ill consequence of that action, and "that it would spoil the sale of all that remained of those ships, since the East India company, which probably would have been the best chapmen, would not now be forward to buy, since so much was disposed of already to other hands as would spoil their market." And by this time the earl himself had given an account of all that had been done, and the motives, to the duke. The king was justly displeased for the expedition he had used, "Why had his approbation been desired, when he resolved to do the thing before he could receive an answer?" and was glad that he had done so, because he would have been more excusable if he had received it.

But the duke, who had been constantly kind to the earl, was offended in the highest degree, and thought himself injured and affronted beyond any precedent. "This most unjustifiable action could proceed only from two fountains: the one of extreme vanity and ambition, to make himself popular amongst the officers of the fleet, who ought not to have been gratified by him at the king's charge. When any such bounty should be seasonable, it was the duke's province to have been the author, and the conduit to have conveyed it: he had himself been an eyewitness of their behaviour in the greatest action; and for the earl to assume the rewarding them by his own authority, was to defraud and rob him of his proper right and jurisdiction." And he looked upon his having desired the king's allowance by the vice-chamberlain, as a trick and an aggravation; for he ought to have asked his advice, as his superior officer: and the poor vice-chamberlain underwent his share in the reproach, for having presumed to move the king in a particular, that, if it was to be moved at all, had been to be moved by the duke. "The other fountain which might produce this presumption might be avarice," which was the sole blemish (though it never appeared in any gross instance) that seemed to cloud many noble virtues in that earl, who now became a very pregnant evidence of the irresistible strength and power of envy; which though it feeds on its own poison, and is naturally more grievous to the person who harbours it, than to him that is maligned, yet when it finds a subject it can effectually work upon, it is more insatiable in revenge than any passion the soul is liable unto.

He was a gentleman of so excellent a temper and behaviour, that he could make himself no enemies; of so many good qualities, and so easy to live with, that he marvellously reconciled the minds of all men to him, who had not intimacy enough with him to admire his other parts: yet was in the general inclinations of men upon some disadvantage. They who had constantly followed the king whilst he as constantly adhered to Cromwell, and knew not how early he had entertained repentance, and with what hazards and dangers he had manifested it, did believe the king had been too prodigal in heaping so many honours upon him. And they who had been familiar with him and of the same party, and thought they had been as active as he in contributing to the revolution, considered him with some anger, as one who had better luck than they without more merit, and who had made early conditions: when in truth no man in the kingdom had been less guilty of that address; nor did he ever contribute to any advancement to which he arrived, by the least intimation or insinuation that he wished it, or that it would be acceptable to him. Yet upon this blast the winds rose from all quarters, reproaches of all sorts were cast upon him, and all affronts contrived for him.

The earl had conveyed that part of the goods which he had assigned to himself in a shallop to Lynn, from whence it could pass by water to his own house. An officer in that port seized upon it by virtue of the general's warrant, and would cause it presently to be unladen, which he began to do. But the servants of the earl appealed to the other officers in equal authority, to whom they brought a letter with them from the earl of Sandwich, in which he owned all those goods to be his, (amongst which were his bedding and furniture for his cabin, and all his plate, and other things suitable,) and likewise a note of all the other goods which might be liable to pay custom; and desired them "to send one of their searchers with the boat to his house, where he should receive all their dues, without being unladen in the port;" which, besides the delay, would be liable to many inconveniences. The officer who had first arrested it, and who had dependance upon a great man of the country, who was not unwilling that any affront should be put upon the earl, roughly refused to suffer it to pass without being first unladen; but being overruled by the other officers, vented his anger in very unmannerly language against the earl: of all which he, being advertised by his servants, sent a complaint to the lords of the council, and desired "the fellow might be sent for and punished;" which could not be refused, though it proved troublesome in the inquiry. For the officer, who was a gentleman of a fair behaviour and good repute, denied all those words which carried in them the worst interpretation; but justified the action, and produced the general's warrant, which had unusual expressions, and apparent enough to have a particular and not a general intention.

The general had quick advertisement of it, and writ very passionately from London, "that an officer should be sent for without having committed any other offence than in obeying and executing a warrant of his:" and the other great man, who was of great importance to the king's service, and in the highest trust in that country, writ several letters, "how impossible it would be to carry on the king's service in that country, if that officer should be punished for doing that, when he ought to be punished if he had not done it;" and therefore desired, "that he might be repaired by them who had caused him to be sent for."

Sir William Coventry had now full sea-room to give vent to all his passions, and to incense the duke, who was enough offended without such contributions: "if this proceeded from covetousness, it was not probable that it would be satisfied with so little; and therefore it was probable, that though the officers might not have received above the value of one thousand pounds," which was assigned to each, "yet himself would not be contented with so little as two thousand; and they might therefore well conceive that he had taken much more, which ought to be examined with the greatest strictness." There had been nothing said before of not taking advantage enough upon the enemy in all occasions which had been offered, and of not pursuing them far enough, which was not now renewed without advice, "that he might be presently sent for;" though it was known that, as soon as he could put the ships into the ports to which they were designed, he would come to Oxford. And there were great underhand endeavours, that the house of commons might be inflamed with this miscarriage and misdemeanor, and present it as a complaint to the house of peers, as fit to be examined and brought to judgment before that tribunal. And they, who with all the malice imaginable did endeavour in vain to kindle this fire, persuaded the king and the duke, "that by their sole activity and interest it was prevented for that time, because the session was too short, and that all necessary evidence could not be soon produced at Oxford; but that, as soon as the plague should cease to such a degree in London that the parliament might assemble there, it would be impossible to restrain the house of commons from pursuing that complaint," of which nobody thought but themselves and they who were provoked by them.

The earl of Sandwich had so good intelligence from Oxford, that he knew all that was said of him, and began to believe that he had done unadvisedly in administering occasion of speaking ill to those who greedily sought for it: and as soon as his absence from the fleet could be dispensed with, he made haste to Oxford, and gave so full an account of every day's action, from the time that he went to sea to the day of his return, and of his having never done any thing of importance, nor having left any thing undone, but with and by the advice of the council of war, upon the orders he had received, that both the king and the duke could not but absolve him from all the imputations of negligence or inadvertency.

But for the breaking bulk, and the circumstances that attended it, they declared they were unsatisfied. And he confessed "that he had been "much to blame," and asked pardon, and with such excuses as he thought might in some degree plead for him. He protested, "it seemed to him" "to have had some necessity: that the whole fleet was in a general indisposition, and complained, that for all that summer action" (which indeed had been full of merit) "they had nothing given to them, not without some muttering that they would have somewhat out of those Indian ships before they would part with them; inasmuch as he had a real apprehension that they had a purpose to plunder them. And he should have feared more, if he had not complied with the flag-officers' importunity: and thereupon he consented that they should have each of them the value of one thousand pounds, and which he was most confident the goods which had been delivered to them did not exceed." He confessed "he had not enough considered the consequence, and that they who had not received any donative would be more displeased, than they who had it were satisfied with it; which he acknowledged was the case: that he was heartily sorry for permitting any such thing to be done, and more for having taken any himself, and humbly [asked] pardon for both; and [desired] that his own part, which remained entire, might be restored to the ship from whence it had been taken, which he would cause to be done."

A more ingenuous acknowledgment could not be made: and they who could not but observe many persons every day excused for more enormous transgressions, did hope that he, who had so few faults to answer for, would have been absolved for that trespass. And the king himself used him very graciously, and so did the duke; and he was sent back to the fleet, to give order for the sending out a winter-guard and ordering all other maritime affairs, and for the sending up the India ships into the river, with great care that none of the seamen should go on shore, where the plague still raged little if at all less than it had done in the summer: and so he himself and most other men believed and were glad, that an ill business was so well composed. But sir William did not intend that it should end there.

The present business, that must admit no interruption, was the raising what money might be to supply the present necessities of the fleet, to pay the seamen, and to make all preparations to set out the fleet against the spring, when the French ships would be infallibly ready to join with the Dutch; and the money that was given by the parliament would not be paid till long after; and the affairs of the bankers were in such disorder by the death of servants, and the plague having been in some of their houses, that the usual course of advancing monies by assignments could not be depended upon. The general had written to the lord treasurer, "that he thought that there could not be so good chapmen for those ships as the East India company, some whereof had been with him to know the king's pleasure; and if authority were granted to any men to treat upon that affair, they would send for members enough of their company, who were dispersed in the country, to be present at a court, which would authorize a committee to treat and contract with them;" and he said, "that he was confident that half the money would be paid

"upon the making the bargain." The king was no sooner advertised of this overture, than he sent sir George Carteret and Mr. Ashburnham to London, to confer with the general and to be advised by him, and granted authority to them three to sell those two prizes to those who would give most. And they found no overtures to be so advantageous as those which were made by that company: and yet they made so much use of the advantage of the time, when all men of notorious wealth were out of the town, that they thought not fit to make any agreement till they gave the king an account of the whole transaction, with their opinions, upon conference with other men of business; and to that purpose the two persons who had been sent to the general returned safe to Oxford.

It hath been mentioned before, that it was thought a great presumption in any body to presume to interpose in the maritime affairs, which was interpreted to be an invasion of the duke's peculiar [province]; and by this means the credit of sir William Coventry was so absolute, that the disposal of all was in his power. He had persuaded the duke, and the lord Arlington, who was in firm conjunction with him, had prevailed with the king to believe, "that the house of commons was so incensed against the lord Sandwich for his late presumption, that it would not be possible to hinder them in their next assembling" (which was appointed or resolved to be in April, if it pleased God to extinguish the sickness) "[from falling] very severely upon the earl of Sandwich, which would be a very great dishonour to the king, if he were at that time in the command of the fleet; and that there was no way to preserve him" (for that was their method when they had a mind to ruin a man, to pretend a great care that he might not be undone) "but by dismissing him from that charge, which probably might preserve him from being further questioned, since it would be interpreted a punishment inflicted on him by the king for his crime, and so might stop him from being further prosecuted for the same offence." To which they added, "that it would be necessary in another respect; for that many of the officers, as well as common seamen, had opened their mouths very wide against him, especially after it was generally known that the king and the duke were offended with him, and had not been at all reserved in charging him with several reproaches: and that if the same command were still continued in him, it could not be presumed that those men would ever put themselves under his command whom they had so much provoked."

These arguments, urged by men who were not known, at least by the king and duke, to be his enemies, and one of them thought to be (and in truth was, but for his conjunction with the other) his friend, and to wish him very well, prevailed upon the judgments of both of them; inasmuch as they resolved to confer with the chancellor, whom they knew to be much the earl's friend. And they both expressed "very much kindness to and confidence in the affection and integrity and courage of the earl of Sandwich, though he was to be blamed for his late indiscretion, and a resolution with their utmost power to defend him from undergoing any disgrace by it: but

"that it would contribute most to his preservation, that he quitted the employment, and that some other persons should be sent to command the next fleet in the spring. For if he should again go to sea, and parliament should press to have him sent for, to answer what they had to object against him, his majesty must either refuse to consent to it, which would make a breach with his parliament, or by consenting disorder his maritime affairs to that degree, that the enemy could not but take very great advantage of it." Therefore they commanded the chancellor to confer with him and discourse the whole matter to him, [to assure] him "of the king's and duke's favour, and that they were in this particular moved only by their tenderness to him; and that some expedient should be first found out to remove him with honour, before any notice should be taken of the purpose to remove him, and before any other person should be deputed to the command; and that he himself should either propose the expedient, if any such occurred to him that would be grateful, or judge of any that should be proposed to him."

The chancellor did presume to declare, "that he thought that they were persuaded to apprehend somewhat that could not fall out. That he would not take upon him to excuse the earl of Sandwich for any offence he had committed: if it were of that magnitude that his majesty thought fit to remove him from his command, nobody could censure it; and it may be, in a time of so much license, the severity might be thought seasonable. But the apprehension that the parliament would take more notice of what the earl had done, than they would of any other breach of order that was every day committed, was without any just reason." But that argument was presently silenced by their undertaking to know somewhat that the other could not do, and that there was no other way to preserve [him] but that which was proposed.

There was at that time an opportunity in view, that might give the earl of Sandwich an employment very worthy of him, and which no man could imagine would be assigned to any man who was in disgrace. Sir Richard Fanshawe, who was a gentleman very well known and very well beloved, had been first ambassador in Portugal, and had behaved himself so well there, that when he returned from thence, he was recommended, and upon the matter desired, by that crown to be sent to Spain, as the fittest person to mediate in the king's name between Spain and Portugal; and the king had before designed to send him ambassador into Spain, as well to settle a treaty between England and Spain, (for there was none yet,) as to do all the offices between those other crowns which were requisite to the end aforesaid. No man knew that court [better], or was so well versed in the language, having lived many years before in that court in much better times. He had remained now about two years, with such frequent mortifications as ministers use to meet with in courts irresolute and perplexed in their own affairs, as the counsels of Madrid were in the last years of the king, as his indisposition increased, or by relaxing administered some hope. He had made a journey to Lisbon upon the earnest desire of Spain, and returned without effect. The peace was equally desired and equally necessary to both nations: but the Portugal [was] unmoveable in the conditions of it, preferring the worst that could fall out, even the abandoning their country, rather than to be without the sovereignty of it; and the Spaniard as positive not to part with their title, though they had no hope of their subjection. Nor did Spain appear solicitous to conclude any treaty with England, except either Portugal might be comprehended in it or abandoned by it.

On a sudden, when the recovery or long continuance of the king grew more desperate, (which is never a thing notoriously known in that court,) a project for a treaty was sent to the ambassador, containing more advantages in trade to the nation, (which are the most important matters in all those treaties,) and insisting upon fewer inconvenient conditions, than had ever been in any former treaties; without any mention of Tangier or Jamaica, which had hitherto in the entrance into any treaty since the king's return made the progress impossible: only it was urged, "that it might either be presently accepted and signed by the ambassador, with a covenant that it should be confirmed by the king within so many days after it should be presented to him, or else that there should be no more mention or discourse of it."

The ambassador, surprised with this overture, compared what was offered with what he was to demand by his instructions; and what was defective in those particulars he added to the articles presented to him, with such additions as, upon his own observation and conference with the merchants, occurred to him, or which seemed probable to be granted from somewhat themselves had offered more than had been demanded by him. These alterations and amendments were approved and consented to, and quickly returned engrossed and signed by the king, on condition to be presently signed by him, with the undertaking that is formerly mentioned. It had been wisely done by the ambassador, and no more than his duty, if he had first acquainted his master or the ministers with all that had passed, and expected a particular order before he had signed it. But that being expressly refused, without concealing the reason or the king's weakness, "which," they declared, "might make such an alteration in counsels, that if it were not done in his lifetime, they knew not what might happen after:" this was thought as good an argument by him for the despatch, as it was to them; and that if he should not make use of this conjuncture, there would never be the like advantageous treaty offered again. Hereupon he presently signed the treaty, with some secret article which was not to the advantage of Portugal, otherwise than that he concluded, by what had been said to him at Lisbon, it would have been acceptable to them.

This treaty was no sooner brought to the king by the Spanish ambassador, (who had received it by an express,) and perused at the council-table, but many gross faults were found to be in it. Besides the gentleman's absence, who would with greater abilities have defended himself than any of those who had reproached him, it was no advantage to him that he was known to be much in the chancellor's confidence: and therefore the more pain was taken to persuade the king that he was a weak man, (which the king himself knew him not to be;) and they put such a gloss upon many of the articles, and rejected others as unprofitable which were thought to contain matters of great moment, as they would not consent that a trade to the West Indies could be any benefit to England, and the like. In the end, the king concluded that he would not sign the treaty; for which he had some access of reason within a month after, by the death of the king of Spain.

When all these reproaches were cast upon the ambassador, and notice given that the king did disavow the treaty and refused to sign it; it was reasonably resolved that he ought not to remain there longer as ambassador, but to be recalled. But the plague driving the king from London and dispersing the council, the pursuing this resolution was no more assumed, till the business of the earl of [Sandwich] made it thought on as a good expedient; and the chancellor was directed in his discourse with the earl to mention it, as a proper expedient in his condition to be laid hold on and embraced.

The chancellor entered upon the whole discourse with that freedom and openness that became a man who he knew was not suspected by him. He told him all that himself knew of the affair, and the apprehension the king had of the parliament, and the expedient he had thought of to remove him out of the reach or noise of clamour, of which he made him the judge; and "if he did not like this [employment] for Spain, some other should be thought of and published before it should be known, and before the command of the fleet should be committed to any other."

The earl of Sandwich lamented "that it had been in any body's power to make so ill impressions in the king and the duke, upon his having committed a trespass, for which he was heartily sorry;" and confessed "it was a presumption and indiscretion, the ill consequence whereof he had not had wit enough to discover: however, he did not yet think it so great, as to make him fear to give an account of it before the parliament, or any thing that they could do upon it." He seemed not to be ignorant of the offices sir William Coventry did him, "in drawing complaints and reproaches from those who had neither cause nor inclination to speak to his disadvantage. He was sensible of the general's want of justice towards him, which he knew not to what to impute, but to his pride and weakness. He did acknowledge it great bounty in the king, since he thought him unfit and unworthy to continue in the command he had, that he would yet assign him to so honourable an employment; which, though it could not wipe off the reproach of being dismissed from the other charge, was yet a sufficient evidence that he was not out of his majesty's good opinion and confidence: and therefore he did with all cheerfulness submit to his majesty's pleasure, and would be ready for his journey to Spain as soon as his despatch should be prepared."

He told him then, "that he was in one respect glad to be removed from his present command, for he was confident that he would see no more great matters done at sea, for that the common men were weary of the war; and that sir William would never suffer any peace to be in the fleet, but had creatures ready to do all ill offices

"amongst them, whom he cherished and preferred before the best officers;" and told him many other things which fell out afterwards, and said, "sir William would make any man who should succeed him weary of his command, by sending such variety of orders that he would not know what to do." And shortly after, he gave him a perfect journal of his last expedition, in which there were indeed many orders which must needs startle and perplex a commander in chief, it being his usual course to signify the duke's pleasure in matters of the greatest importance without the duke's hand; which yet they durst not disobey, nor produce in their own justification, being such as in truth were no such warrants as they ought to obey, and yet would reflect upon his royal highness: and told him likewise of the ill inventions he had set on foot, by which prince Rupert was stopped from being joined with him in the command of the last fleet.

When the chancellor had informed the king of the earl of Sandwich's submission to his pleasure, and that he would be ready to undertake the employment for Spain as soon as his majesty pleased; hereupon the king declared his resolution in council to send the earl of Sandwich his extraordinary ambassador, as well to correct and amend the mistakes and errors in the late treaty, and further to mediate the peace with Portugal, which upon the death of the king was in some respect more practicable. And to that purpose he sent sir Robert Southwell, one of the clerks of the council, envoy into Portugal, that the earl might the better know the inclinations of that people: and all instructions necessary were presently to be prepared to both those ends.

This first work being thus despatched, it remained to settle the command, for the ensuing year, of the fleet; and there can be little doubt made, but that the king and the duke had resolved this at the same time that they determined that the earl of Sandwich should not continue in it: however, it was communicated to nobody, till the designation of the other was published. Then the king told the chancellor, "that his brother and he had long considered that affair, and could not think of any expedient so good for the performance of that service, as a conjunction between prince Rupert and the general, and making them both joint commanders in chief of the fleet for the next expedition." There had many exceptions occurred to them against committing the charge to either of them singly; nor were they without apprehension of some which might fall out by joining them together, which would be much greater, if they were not both well prepared to embrace the occasion, and themselves to like the designation. For the doing this the chancellor was again thought to be the fittest man, being believed to have the greatest interest in both of them, and most in him from whom the greatest difficulties were expected to arise, which was prince Rupert. It was easy to know prince Rupert's mind, who was in the house: yet they were both in cases of that nature desirous always to impart what they desired by others, rather than to debate it first themselves. But then the general was at London, besieged by the plague; and the matter was not fit to be communicated by letter, because, if he should make any scruple of concurring in it, it was to be declined.

Upon these considerations it was resolved, first, that the chancellor should prepare prince Rupert, and then that the general should be sent for to Oxford upon pretences, of which enough would occur. The prince, though he was much more willing to have gone alone, willingly conformed to the king's pleasure: and so both the king and duke spake at large with him upon all that was necessary to be adjusted. And the general was sent to, "that it was necessary for the king to confer with him upon some propositions, which were made to him upon the East India ships," (which transaction was not at that time yet concluded;) "and therefore that on such a day he should come from London early in the morning," (for it was deep winter,) "in his own coach to Beaconsfield, where he should find another coach ready to receive him, and another at another stage; so that he might be with ease at Oxford the same night," as he was, and very graciously received by the king, as he deserved to be. But as he had no manner of imagination of the true reason why he was sent for, so neither his majesty nor the duke would impart it to him, out of real imagination that it would not be grateful to him; but that was left to be imparted and dexterously managed by the chancellor, in whom, as was said before, it was generally believed that he had great confidence.

He the next morning entered into conference with him, and after general discourses told him, "that the king had disposed the earl of Sandwich to another employment, for which he did not seem sorry; and that it must be now thought of, who was fit to command in his place: that there was no hope of peace, instead whereof there would be an entire conjunction between France and the Dutch; and that the French fleet" (the ambassadors being about this time gone) "would be ready to join with them as soon as they should put to sea; and there was much doubt that the Dane would betake himself to the same alliance; and all would be at sea before we should be, except extraordinary diligence were used, which the continuance of the plague would hardly admit." The general presently answered, "that no person was so fit for that command as prince Rupert, who understood the seas well, and had that courage that was necessary in this conjuncture."

The chancellor told him, "that the king had great confidence in the affection and unquestionable courage of prince Rupert: but he was not sure, that the quickness of his spirit and the strength of his passion might not sometimes stand in need of the advice and assistance of a friend, who should be in equal authority with him; and had therefore thought of finding some fit person to be joined with him, and so make one admiral of two persons." To which the other not replying suddenly, he continued his discourse, saying, "that the king had such a person in his view, whom he would never acquaint with it, until he might find some way to discover that the proposing it would not be ingrateful to him; and that he was obliged to make this discovery, and that the person in the king's view was himself; and that if he and prince Rupert were joined in the command of the fleet and undertook it, his majesty would believe that he had done all that was in his power, and would, with great hope, commit all the rest to God Almighty." He said, "he thought he had behaved himself most like a friend in telling him shortly and plainly what the king's drift was, towards which, though the secret was known to none but the duke of York, yet such an advance was made, that his majesty was well assured that prince Rupert would readily comply with his pleasure." Upon the whole matter he desired him "to deal as like a friend with him, and to tell him freely if he had no mind to the employment; and he would take upon him to prevent the making the proposition to him, and that neither the king nor duke should take it unkindly."

The general appeared really surprised and full of thoughts; and after a short pause he desired him "not to believe that he made the least [difficult] in his thoughts of undertaking the service; but many things had occurred to him in the discourse, which he would mention anon." He said, "that for his own part he should be willing to go out of London to-morrow, and think himself much safer in any action against the Dutch than he could be in the post he was, where every day men died about him and in his view; and as he thought that he had done the king better service by staying in London, than he could have done in any other place, so he believed, if the sickness should continue," (as it was like enough to do, there appearing yet very little decrease,) "his majesty might think that his presence might be as necessary there as it had been." The chancellor replied, "that his majesty had foreseen that contingency; and had already resolved, that if that fell out to be the case, he should rather desire his residence should be where it had been (though he was much troubled to expose him to so much hazard) than in any other place: but that his majesty's confidence in the mercy of God, that he would take off this heavy visitation before the end of winter, had suggested the other designation of him to the service of the fleet, upon the good conduct whereof his own and the kingdom's happiness so much depended."

The general quickly replied, "that for that matter he was so willing to engage himself, that if the king pleased, he would most readily serve under the command of prince Rupert:" to which the other answered as readily, "that the king would never consent to that." And so they resolved presently to go to the king, that his majesty and the duke might know what would please them so much. And as they were going, the general said smiling, "that he would tell him now what the true cause was, that had made that pause in him upon the first discourse of the business; and that it would be necessary for him, after all things should be adjusted with the king and duke and prince Rupert, that what concerned him should still remain a secret, and prince Rupert be understood to have that command alone. For if his wife should come to know it, before he had by degrees prepared her for it, she would break out into such passions as would be very uneasy to him: but he would in a short time dispose her well enough; and in the mean time nothing should be omitted on his part, that was necessary for the advancement of the service." Hereupon the king, the duke, the prince, and the general consulted of all that was to be done: and he at the end of two days returned to London with the same expedition that he came to Oxford, together with sir George Carteret the treasurer of the navy, and all orders that were requisite for the sale of the East India ships, upon which all provisions for the fleet were to be made.

Though the parliament at Oxford had preserved that excellent harmony that the king had proposed, and hardly wished any thing in which they had not concurred, insomuch as never parliament so entirely sympathised with his majesty; and [though] it passed more acts for his honour and security than any other had ever done in so short a session: yet it introduced a precedent of a very unhappy nature, the circumstances whereof in the present were unusual and pernicious, and the consequences in the future very mischievous, and therefore not unfit to be set out at large.

The lord Arlington and sir William Coventry, closely united in the same purposes, and especially against the chancellor, had a great desire to find some means to change the course and method of the king's counsels; which they could hardly do whilst the same persons continued still in the same employments. Their malice was most against the chancellor: yet they knew not what suggestions to make to the king against him, having always pretended to his majesty, how falsely soever, to have a great esteem of him. Their project therefore was to remove the treasurer, who was as weary of his office and of the court as any body could be of him: but his reputation was so great, his wisdom so unquestionable, and his integrity so confessed, that they knew in neither of those points he could be impeached. And the king himself had kindness and reverence towards him, though he had for some years thought him less active, and so less fit for that administration, than every body else knew him to be: and these men had long insinuated unto his [majesty], "how ill all the business of the exchequer was managed by the continual infirmities of the treasurer, who, between the gout and the stone, had not ease enough to attend the painful function of that office, but left the whole to be managed and governed by his secretary sir Philip Warwick;" upon whose experience and fidelity he did in truth much rely, as he had reason to do, his reputation for both being very signal and universal. And towards fastening this reproach they had the contribution of the lord Ashley, who was good at looking into other men's offices, and was not pleased to see sir Philip Warwick's credit greater than his with the treasurer, and his advice more followed. And the other two had craftily insinuated to him, that he would make much a better treasurer; which, whilst he thought they were in earnest, prevailed with him not only to suggest materials to them for that reproach, but to inculcate the same to the king upon several occasions: but when he discovered that they intended nothing of advantage to his particular, he withdrew from that intrigue, though in all other particulars he sided with them.

The king was too easy in making assignments upon his revenue, which would make it incapable to satisfy others which were more necessary, and to grant suits by lease or farm, (sometimes to worthy men,) which were of mischievous consequence to all the measures which could be taken; and those the treasurer found himself obliged to stop: and commonly, upon informing the king of it and of his reasons, his majesty was very well pleased with what he had done, and (as hath been said before) did often give himself ease from the importunity of many, by signing the warrants they brought to him, in confidence that either the chancellor or treasurer would not suffer them to pass. However, it raised clamour; and there were men enough who had the same provocation to make a great noise; and they easily found countenance from others, who desired it should be believed, "that it was a high arrogance and presumption in any subject to stop any signature of the king, and so make his majesty's grace and bounty to be ineffectual, if his approbation and consent was not likewise procured." There was visibly great want of money, though there were vast sums of money raised; which they laboured to persuade the king proceeded from the unskilfulness or inactivity of the treasurer, who was again tired with the vexation and indignity, when he had so frequently presented the king with the particulars of the receipts and disbursements, and made it demonstrable how much his expenses exceeded all his income; and how impossible it would be, without lessening these, to provide wherewithal to supply [necessary occasions]: but this was an ungracious subject, and opened more mouths than could easily be stopped.

There was a man who hath been often named, sir George Downing, who by having been some years in the office of one of the tellers of the exchequer, and being of a restless brain, did understand enough of the nature of the revenue and of the course of the receipt, to make others who understood less of it to think that he knew the bottom of it, and that the expedients, which should be proposed by him towards a reformation, could not but be very pertinent and practicable. And he was not unhurt in the emoluments of his own office, which were lessened by the assignments made to the bankers, upon the receipts themselves, without the money's ever passing through the tellers' office; by which, though they did receive their just fees, they had not what they would have taken, if the money had passed through their own hands. He was a member of parliament, and a very voluminous speaker, who would be thought wiser in trade than any of the merchants, and to understand the mystery of all professions much better than the professors of them. And such a kind of chat is always acceptable in a crowd, (where few understand many subjects,) [who] are always glad to find those put out of countenance who thought they understood it best: and so they were much pleased to hear sir George Downing inveigh against the ignorance of those, who could only smile at his want of knowledge.

This gentleman was very grateful to sir William Coventry as well as to lord Arlington, and was ready to instruct them in all the miscarriages and oversights in the treasury, and to propose ways of reformation to them. "The root of all miscarriage was the unlimited power of the lord treasurer, that no money could issue out without his particular direction, and all money was paid upon [no] other rules than his order; so that, let the king want as much as was possible,

"no money could be paid by his, without the treasurer's warrant;" which, to men who understood no more than they did, seemed a very great incongruity. "But," he said, "if there were such a clause inserted into the bill which was to be passed in the house of commons for money, it might prevent all inconveniences, and the king's money would be paid only to those persons and purposes to which his majesty should assign them; and more money would be presently advanced upon this act of parliament, than the credit of the bankers could procure;" for he foresaw that would be a very natural objection against his clause and the method he proposed.

He made his discourse so plausible to them, that they were much pleased with it; and it provided for so many of their own ends, that they neither did nor were able to consider the reverse of it, but were most solicitous that there might no obstructions arise in the way. If it should come to the knowledge of the chancellor, he would oppose it for the novelty, and the consequences that might attend it; and if the treasurer had notice of it, he would not consent to it for the indignity that his office was subjected to: they therefore discoursed it to the king as a matter of high importance to his service, if it were secretly carried; and then brought the projector, who was an indefatigable talker, to inform his majesty of the many benefits which would accrue to his service by this new method that he had devised, and the many mischiefs which would be prevented.

There were so many things which were suggested, that were agreeable to some fancies that the king himself had entertained; there would not need now so many formalities, as warrants and privy seals, before monies could be paid; and money might hereafter issue out and be paid without the treasurer's privy; in which many conveniences seemed to appear: though besides the innovation and breach of all old order, which is ever attended by many mischiefs unforeseen, there were very great inconveniences in view in those very particulars which they fancied to be conveniences. But it was enough that the king so well liked the advice, upon conference with them three, that he resolved to communicate it with no others; but appointed, that when the bill for supply should be brought into the house, (it being to be, as was said before, for the sum of . . . .) at the commitment Downing should offer that proviso, which had been drawn by himself, and read to the king and the other two. And because it was foreseen, that it would be opposed by many of those who were known to be very affectionate to the king's service, they had all authority privately to assure them, that it was offered with the king's approbation.

Against the time that the bill was to be brought in, they prepared the house by many unseasonable bitter invectives against the bankers, called them cheats, bloodsuckers, extortioners, and loaded them with all the reproaches which can be cast upon the worst men in the world, and would have them looked upon as the causes of all the king's necessities, and of the want of monies throughout the kingdom: all which was a plausible argument, as all invectives against particular men are; and all men who had faculties of depraving, and of making ill things appear worse than they are, were easily engaged with them. The bankers did not consist of above the number of five or six men, some whereof were aldermen, and had been lord mayors of London, and all the rest were aldermen, or had fined for aldermen. They were a tribe that had risen and grown up in Cromwell's time, and never heard of before the late troubles, till when the whole trade of money had passed through the hands of the scriveners: they were for the most part goldsmiths, men known to be so rich, and of so good reputation, that all the money of the kingdom would be trusted or deposited in their hands.

From the time of the king's return, when though great and vast sums were granted, yet such vast debts were presently to be paid, the armies by land and sea to be presently discharged, [that] the money that was to be collected in six and six months would not provide for those present unavoidable issues; but there must be two or three hundred thousand pounds gotten together in few days, before they could begin to disband the armies or to pay the seamen off; the deferring whereof every month increased the charge to an incredible proportion: none could supply those occasions but the bankers, which brought the king's ministers first acquainted with them; and they were so well satisfied with their proceedings, that they did always declare, "that they were so necessary to the king's affairs, that they knew not how to have conducted them without that assistance."

The method of proceeding with them was thus. As soon as an act of parliament was passed, the king sent for those bankers, (for there was never any contract made with them but in his majesty's presence:) and being attended by the ministers of the revenue, and commonly the chancellor and others of the council, the lord treasurer presented a particular information to the king of the most urgent occasions for present money, either for disbanding troops, or discharging ships, or setting out fleets, (all which are to be done together, and not by parcels;) so that it was easily foreseen what ready money must be provided. And this account being made, the bankers were called in, and told, "that the king had occasion to use such a sum of ready money within such a day; they understood the act of parliament, and so might determine what money they could lend the king, and what manner of security would best satisfy them." Whereupon one said, "he would within such a time pay one hundred thousand pounds," another more, and another less, as they found themselves provided; for there was no joint stock amongst them, but every one supplied according to his ability. They were desirous to have eight in the hundred, which was not unreasonable to ask, and the king was "willing to give:" but upon better consideration amongst themselves, they thought fit to decline that demand, as being capable of turning to their disadvantage, and would leave the interest to the king's own bounty, declaring "that themselves paid six in the hundred for all the money with which they were intrusted," which was known to be true.

Then they demanded such a receipt and assignment to be made to them by the lord treasurer, for the payment of the first money that should be payable upon that act of parliament, or a branch of that act, or tallies upon the farmers of the customs or excise, or such other branches of the revenue as were least charged; having the king's own word and the faith of the treasurer, that they should be exactly complied with; for, let the security be what they could desire, it would still be in the power of the king or of the lord treasurer to divert what was assigned to them to other purposes. Therefore there is nothing surer, than that the confidence in the king's justice, and the unquestionable reputation of the lord treasurer's honour and integrity, was the true foundation of that credit which supplied all his majesty's necessities and occasions; and his majesty always treated those men very graciously, as his very good servants, and all his ministers looked upon them as very honest and valuable men. And in this manner, for many years after his majesty's return, even to the unhappy beginning of the Dutch war, the public expenses were carried on, it may be, with too little difficulty, which possibly increased some expenses; and nobody opened his mouth against the bankers, who every day increased in credit and reputation, and had the money of all men at their disposal.

The solicitor general brought in the bill for supply according to course, in that form as those bills for money ought and used to be: and after it had been read the second time, when it was committed, Downing offered his proviso, the end of which was, "to make all the money that was to be raised by this bill to be applied only to those ends to which it was given, which was the carrying on the war, and to no other purpose whatsoever, by what authority soever;" with many other clauses in it so monstrous, that the solicitor, and many others who were most watchful for the king's service, declared against it, as introductive to a commonwealth, and not fit for monarchy. It was observed, "that the assignment of the money that was given by act of parliament to be paid in another manner and to other persons than had been formerly used, though there wanted not plausible pretences, was the beginning of the late rebellion, and furnished the parliament with money to raise a rebellion, when the king had none to defend himself; which had made Cromwell wise enough never to permit any of those clauses, or that the impositions which were raised should be disposed to any uses or by any persons but by himself and his own orders." And by such and other arguments, which the contrivers had not foreseen, the proviso had been absolutely thrown out, if sir William Coventry and Downing had not gone to the solicitor and others who spoke against it, and assured them, "that it was brought in by the king's own direction, and for purposes well understood by his majesty." Upon which they were contented that it should be committed, yet with direction "that such and such expressions should be reformed and amended."

In the afternoon the king sent for the solicitor, and forbade him any more to oppose that proviso, for that it was much for his service. And when he would inform him of many mischiefs which would inevitably attend it, some were of those which he had no mind to prevent, being to lessen their power who he thought had too much, and the other he cared not to hear; and said only, "that he would bear the inconveniences which would ensue upon his own account, for the benefits which would accrue, and which it was not yet seasonable to communicate with other members of the house of commons, whom he thought not to be so able to dispute it with him."<sup>a</sup>

He enlarged more in discourse, and told them, "that this [would be an] encouragement to lend money, by making the payment with interest so certain and fixed, that there could be [no] security in the kingdom like it, when it should be out of any man's power to cause any money that should be lent to-morrow to be paid before that which was lent yesterday, but that all should be infallibly paid in order; by which the exchequer (which was now bankrupt and without any credit) would be quickly in that reputation, that all men would deposit their money there: and that he hoped in few years, by observing the method he now proposed, he would make his exchequer the best and the greatest bank in Europe, and where all Europe would, when it was once understood, pay in their money for the certain profit it would yield, and the indubitable certainty that they should receive their money." And with this discourse the vain man, who had lived many years in Holland, and would be thought to have made himself master of all their policy, had amused the king and his two friends, undertaking to erect the king's exchequer into the same degree of credit that the bank of Amsterdam [stood upon], the institution whereof he undertook to know, and from thence to make it evident, "that all that should be transplanted into England, and all nations would sooner send their money into the exchequer, than into Amsterdam or Genoa or Venice." And it cannot be enough wondered at, that this intoxication prevailed so far, that no argument would be heard against it, the king having upon those notions, and with the advice of those counsellors, in his own thoughts new-modelled the whole government of his treasury, in which he resolved to have no more superior officers. But this was only reserved within his own breast, and not communicated to any but those who devised the project, without weighing that the security for monies so deposited in banks is the republic itself, which must expire before that security can fail; which can never be depended on in a monarchy, where the monarch's sole word can cancel all those formal provisions which can be made, (as hath since been too evident,) by vacating those assignments which have been made upon that and the like acts of parliament, for such time as the present necessities have made counsellable; which would not then be admitted to be possible.

And so without any more opposition, which was not grateful to the king, that act passed the house of commons, with the correction only of such absurdities as had not been foreseen by those who framed the proviso, and which did indeed cross their own designs: and so it was sent from the commons to the house of peers for their consent.

<sup>a</sup> Something seems to be wanting here to make the sense clear. Qu. Whether what follows was spoken by Downing to the king, Arlington, and Coventry; or, by the king to the solicitor. In the latter case, told them (as it is in the MS.) should be altered to told him. [Note in the first edition.]

Bills of that nature, which concern the raising of money, seldom stay long with the lords; but as of custom, which they call privilege, they are first begun in the house of commons, where they endure long deliberation, so when they are adjusted there, they seem to pass through the house of peers with the reading twice and formal commitment, in which any alterations are very rarely made, except in any impositions which are laid upon their own persons, for which there are usually blanks left, the filling up whereof is all the amendment or alteration that is commonly made by the lords: so that the same engrossment that is sent up by the commons, is usually the bill itself that is presented to the king for his royal assent. Yet there can be no reasonable doubt made, but that those bills of any kind of subsidies, as excise, chimney-money, or any other way of imposition, are as much the gift and present from the house of peers as they are from the house of commons, and are no more valid without their consent than without the consent of the other; and they may alter any clause in them that they do not think for the good of the people. But because the house of commons is the immediate representative of the people, it is presumed that they best know what they can bear or are willing to submit to, and what they propose to give is proportionable to what they can spare; and therefore the lords use not to put any stop in the passage of such bills, much less diminish what is offered by them to the king.

And in this parliament the expedition that was used in all business out of fear of the sickness, and out of an impatient desire to be separated, was very notorious: and as soon as this bill for supply was sent to the lords, very many members of the house of commons left the town and departed, conceiving that there was no more left for them to do; for it was generally [thought], that at the passing that act, with the rest which were ready, the king would prorogue the parliament. Yet the novelty in this act surprised the lords, that they thought it worthy a very serious deliberation, and used not their customary expedition in the passing it. It happened to be in an ill conjuncture, when the terrible cold weather kept the lord treasurer from going out of his chamber for fear of the gout, of which the chancellor laboured then in that extremity, that he was obliged to remain in his bed; and neither of them had received information of this affair. Many of the lords came to them, and advertised them of this new proviso; and some of them went to the king, to let him [know] the prejudice it would bring him, and censured the ill hand that had contrived it.

The lord Ashley, who was chancellor of the exchequer, and had been privy in the first cabal in which this reformation was designed, whether because he found himself left out in the most secret part of it, or not enough considered in it, passionately inveighed against it, both publicly and privately, and, according to the fertility of his wit and invention, found more objections against it than any body else had done, and the consequences to be more destructive; with which he so alarmed the king, that his majesty was contented that the matter should be debated in his presence; and because the chancellor was in his bed, thought his chamber to be the fittest place for the consultation: and the lord [treasurer], though indisposed and apprehensive of the gout, could yet use his feet, and was very willing to attend his majesty there, without the least imagination that he was aimed at in the least.

The king appointed the hour for the meeting, where his majesty, with his brother, was present, the chancellor in his bed, the lord treasurer, the lord Ashley, the lord Arlington, and sir William Coventry; the attorney general and the solicitor were likewise present, to word any alterations which should be fit to be made; and sir George Downing likewise attended, who the king still believed would be able to answer all objections which could be made. The chancellor had never seen the proviso which contained all the novelty, (for all the other parts of the bill were according to the course,) and the treasurer had read it only an hour or two before the meeting: the lord Ashley therefore, who had heard it read in the house of peers, and observed what that house thought of it, opened the whole business with the novelty, and the ill consequence that must inevitably attend it; all which he enforced with great clearness and evidence of reason, and would have enlarged with some sharpness upon the advisers of it.

But the king himself stopped that by declaring, "that whatsoever had been done in the whole transaction of it had been with his privy and approbation, and the whole blame must be laid to his own [charge], who it seems was like to suffer most by it." He confessed, "he was so fully convinced in his own understanding, that the method proposed would prove to his infinite advantage and to the benefit of the kingdom, that he had converted many in the house who had disliked it; and that since it came into the house of peers, he had spoken with many of the lords, who seemed most unsatisfied with it: and he was confident he had so well informed many of them, that they had changed their opinion, and would be no more against that proviso. However, he confessed that some remained still obstinate against it, and they had given some reasons which he had not thought of, and which in truth he could not answer: he wished therefore that they would apply themselves to the most weighty objections which were in view, or which might probably result from thence, and think of the best remedies which might be applied by alterations and amendments in the house of lords, which he doubted not but that the commons would concur in."

The first objection was "the novelty, which in cases of that nature was very dangerous, remembering what hath been mentioned before of the beginning of the late rebellion, by putting the money to run in another channel than it had used to do: and that when once such a clause was admitted in one bill, the king would hardly get it left out in others of the same kind hereafter; and so his majesty should never be master of his own money, nor the ministers of his revenue be able to assign monies to defray any casual expenses, of what nature soever; but that upon the matter the authority of the treasurer and chancellor of the exchequer must be invested in the tellers of the exchequer, who were subordinate officers, and qualified to do nothing but by the immediate order of those

"their superior officers. And though there are "four tellers in equal authority, yet sir George
 "Downing would in a short time make his office
 "the sole receipt, and the rest neither receive nor
 "pay but by his favour and consent."

The king had in his nature so little reverence or esteem for antiquity, and did in truth so much condemn old orders, forms, and institutions, that the objections of novelty rather advanced than obstructed any proposition. He was a great lover of new inventions, and thought [them] the effects of wit and spirit, and fit to control the superstitious observation of the dictates of our ancestors: so that objection made little impression. And for the continuance of the same clause in future bills, he looked for it as necessary, in order to the establishment of his bank, which would abundantly recompense for his loss of power in disposal of his own money. And though it was made appear, by very solid arguments, that the imagination of a bank was a mere chimera in itself, and the erecting it in the exchequer must suppose that the crown must be always liable to a vast debt upon interest, which would be very ill husbandry; and that there was great hope, that after a happy peace should be concluded, and care should be taken to bring the expenses into a narrower compass, the king might in a short time be out of debt: yet all discourse against a bank was thought to proceed from pure ignorance. And sir George was let loose to instruct them how easy it was to be established, who talked imperiously "of the method by which it came to be "settled [in Holland] by the industry of very "few persons, when the greatest men despaired "of it as impracticable; yet the obstinacy of the "other prevailed, and it was now become the "strength, wealth, and security of the state: that "the same would be brought to pass much more "easily here, and would be no sooner done, than "England would be the seat of all the trade of "Christendom." And then assuming all he said to be demonstration, he wrapped himself up, according to his custom, in a mist of words that nobody could see light in, but they who by often hearing the same chat thought they understood it.

The next objection was "against the injustice "of this clause, and the ill consequence of that "injustice. The necessities of the crown being "still pressing, and the fleet every day calling "for supply, money had been borrowed from the "bankers upon the credit of this bill, as soon as "the first vote had passed in the house of commons for so considerable a supply; and the "treasurer had made assignments upon several "branches of the revenue, which had been preserved and designed for the army and the immediate expenses of the king's and queen's household, and the like unavoidable issues, upon presumption that enough would come in from this new act of parliament to be replaced to those purposes, before the time that would require it should come. But by this proviso especial care was taken, that none of the money that should be raised should be applied to the payment of any debt that was contracted before the royal assent was given to the bill: so that both the money lent by the bankers upon the promise made to them must be unpaid and unsecured, and the money that had been sup"plied from other assignments must not be applied to the original use; by which the army and household would be unprovided for, the inconvenience whereof had no need of an enlargement."

"Besides that the bankers had the king's word, and the engagement of the ministers of the revenue, that all new bills of supply should still make good what former securities were not sufficient to do; as by this heavy visitation of the plague, the assignments which had been made upon the excise and chimney-money, and by the decay of trade that the war and sickness together had produced, the assignments made upon the customs had brought in so little money, that the debt to the bankers, which, but for those obstructions, might by this time have been much abated, remained still very little less than it was in near a year before. And when it should be known, that this sum of money that was to be raised was exempt from the payment of any of those and the like debts, it would be a great heartbreaking to all those, who had not only lent all their own estates, but the whole estates of many thousands of other men, to the king, and must expect to be called upon by all who have trusted them for their money, which, by this invention, they have no means to pay: and for the future, let the necessities be what they will that the crown may be involved in, there is no hope of borrowing any money, since it is not in the power of the king himself to make any assignment upon this new imposition."

Very much of this had been so absolutely unthought of by the king, that he was very much troubled at it; and he had in his own judgment a just esteem of the bankers, and looked upon any [prejudice] that they should suffer as hurtful to himself, and a great violation of his honour and justice. But it was plain enough that the principal design of the contrivers was to prejudice the bankers, nor did they care what ruin befell them, and so talked loosely and bitterly "of their "cozening the king, and what ill bargains had "been made with them;" though it was made manifest, that no private gentleman in England did, upon any real or personal security, borrow money, but considering the brokerage he pays, [and] the often renewing his security, it costs him yearly much more than the king paid to the bankers.

They slighted what was past as sufficiently provided for; and for the future confidently undertook the king should never more have need of the bankers, "for that this act would be no "sooner passed, but, upon the credit of it, money "would be poured into the exchequer faster than
 "it could be told." And when they were told, that expectation would deceive them, and that great sums would not come in, and small sums would do hurt, because they would but stop up the security from giving satisfaction to others, because whatever was first paid in must be first paid: all this was answered confidently, that vast sums were ready, to their knowledge, to be paid in as soon as the bill [should pass]; which fell out as was foretold. For after ten or twenty thousand pounds were delivered in by themselves and their friends to save their credit, there was no more money like to come; and that sum did more harm than good, by interrupting the security.

But notwithstanding all their answers, the king remained unsatisfied in many particulars which he had not foreseen, and wished "that the matter had been better consulted;" and confessed "that Downing had not answered many of the objections;" and wished "that alterations might be prepared to be offered in the house of peers as amendments, and transmitted to the commons, without casting out the proviso;" the foundation and end of which still pleased him, for those reasons which he would not communicate, and for which only it ought to have been rejected. But as it had been very easy to have had it quite left out, which was the only proper remedy; so the mending it would leave much argument for debate, and would spend much time. And it was to be apprehended, that there were so many of the best affected members of the house of commons gone out of the town, as having no more to do, that when it should be sent down thither again, it might be longer detained there than would be convenient for the public; and so the parliament be kept longer from a prorogation, than would be grateful to them or agreeable to the king.

And therefore, upon the whole matter, his majesty chose that no interruption should be given to it in the house of peers, and only such small amendments, which would be as soon consented to in both houses as read, should be offered, rather than run the other hazard of delay: and so accordingly it was passed; and upon the doing thereof, the parliament was prorogued to April following.

In this debate, upon the insolent behaviour of Downing in the defence of that which could not be defended, and it may be out of the extremity of the pain which at that time he endured in his bed, the [chancellor] had given some very sharp reprehensions to Downing, for his presumption in undertaking to set such a design on foot that concerned the whole fabric of the exchequer, (in which he was an inferior officer,) and such a branch of the king's revenue, without first communicating it to his superior officers, and receiving their advice; and told him, "that it was impossible for the king to be well served, whilst fellows of his condition were admitted to speak as much as they had a mind to; and that in the best times such presumptions had been punished with imprisonment by the lords of the council, without the king's taking notice of it:" which, with what sharpness soever uttered, (in which he naturally exceeded in such occasions,) in a case of this nature, in which, with reference to any disrespect towards himself, he was not concerned, he thought did not exceed the privilege and dignity of the place he held; and for which there were many precedents in the past times.

At the present there was no notice taken, nor reply made to what he said. But they who knew themselves equally guilty, and believed they were reflected upon, found quickly opportunity to incense the king, and to persuade him to believe, "that the chancellor's behaviour was a greater affront to him than to Downing: that a servant should undergo such reproaches in the king's own presence, for no other reason but having,

"with all humility, presented an information to his majesty, which was natural for him to understand in the office in which he served him, and afterwards followed and observed the orders and directions which himself had prescribed; that this must terrify all men from giving the king any light in his affairs, that he may know nothing of his own nearest concerns but what his chief ministers thought fit to impart to him." All which, and whatsoever else was natural to wit sharpened with malice to suggest upon such an argument, they enforced with warmth, that they desired might be taken for zeal for his [service] and dignity, which was prostituted by those presumptions of the chancellor.

And herewith they so inflamed the king, that he was much offended, and expressed to them such a dislike that pleased them well, and gave them opportunity to add more fuel to the fire; and told them, "that the chancellor should find that he was not pleased;" as indeed he did, by a greater reservedness in his countenance than his majesty used to carry towards him; the reason whereof his innocence kept him from comprehending, till in a short time he vouchsafed plainly to put him in mind of his behaviour at that time, and to express a great resentment of it, and urged all those glosses which had been made to him upon it, and "what interpretation all men must make of such an action, and be terrified by it from offering any thing, of what importance soever to his service, if it would offend his ministers;" and all this in a choler very unnatural to him, which exceedingly troubled the chancellor, and made him more discern, though he had evidence enough of it before, that he stood upon very slippery ground.

He told his majesty, "that since he thought his behaviour to be so bad in that particular, for which till then his own conscience or discretion had not reproached him, he must and did believe he had committed a great fault, for which he did humbly ask his pardon; and promised hereafter no more to incur his displeasure for such excesses, which he could never have fallen into at that time and upon that occasion, but upon the presumption, that it had been impossible for his majesty to have made that interpretation of it which it seems he had done, or that any body could have credit enough with him to persuade him to believe, that he desired that his majesty should not have a clear view, and the most discerning insight, into the darkest and most intricate parts of all his affairs, which they knew in their consciences to be most untrue. And he must with great confidence appeal to his majesty, who knew how much he had desired, and taken some pains, that his majesty might never set his hand to any thing, before he fully understood it upon such references and reports, as, according to the nature of the business, was to be for his full information."

He besought him to remember, "how often he had told him, that it was most absolutely necessary that he should make himself entirely master of his own business, for that there would be no acquiescence in any judgment but his own; and that his majesty knew with what boldness he had often lamented to himself, that "he would not take the pains perfectly to understand all his own affairs, which exposed his ministers to the censures of half-witted men, and was the greatest discouragement to all who served him honestly : and he desired his pardon again for saying, that he would hereafter find that they who had advised him in this late transaction, in the handling whereof he had taken the liberty that had offended his majesty, had but a very dim insight into that business which they took upon themselves to direct."

But his majesty was not willing to enter again into that discourse, and concluded with forbidding him to believe, "that it was or could be in any men's power to make him suspect his affection or integrity to his service;" and used many other very gracious expressions to him, nor ever after seemed to remember that action to his prejudice. But within a short time the bishopric of Salisbury becoming void by the never enough lamented death of Dr. Earle, his majesty conferred that bishopric upon Dr. Hyde, the dean of Winchester, upon the chancellor's recommendation, whose near kinsman he was. Nor was his credit with the king thought to be lessened by any body but himself, who knew more to that purpose than other people could do : yet he judged more from the credit that he found his enemies got every day, than from the king's withdrawing his trust and kindness from him ; nor did the king believe that they had then that design against him, which shortly after they did not dissemble.

The purpose of making the alteration in the government of the treasury was pursued very industriously. And since that proviso, with all the circumstances thereof, had not produced the effect they proposed, for they had believed that the indignity of the affront would have wrought so far upon the great heart of the treasurer, that he would thereupon have given up his staff ; which he was too much inclined to have done, if he had not been prevailed with by those who he knew were his friends, not to gratify those who desired him out of their way, in doing that which they of all things wished : therefore, that plot not succeeding, they persuaded the king to try another expedient. For they all knew, that it was too envious a thing for his majesty himself to remove him from his office by any act of his, and that it would be loudly imputed to them. But if he could be himself persuaded to quit that which every body knew he was weary of, it would prevent all inconveniences : and they had been told that the chancellor only had dissuaded him from doing it, which he would not presume to do, if he were clearly told that the king desired that he should give it up.

Hereupon the king one day called the chancellor to him, and told him, "that he must speak with him in a business of great confidence, and which required great secrecy;" and then enlarged in a great commendation of the treasurer, (whom in truth he did very much esteem,) "of his great parts of judgment, of his unquestionable integrity, and of his general interest and reputation throughout the kingdom. But with all this," he said, "he was not fit for the office he held : that he did not understand the mystery of that place, nor could in his nature [go through] with the necessary obligations of it. That his bodily infirmities were such, that many "times he could not be spoken with for two or three days, so that there could be no despatch; of which every body complained, and by which his business suffered very much. That all men knew that all the business was done by sir Philip Warwick, whom, though he was a very honest man, he did not think fit to be treasurer; which he was to all effects, the treasurer himself doing nothing but signing the papers which the other prepared for him, which was neither for the king's honour nor his." The truth was, that his understanding was too fine for such gross matters as that office must be conversant about, and that if his want of health did not hinder him, his genius did not carry him that way ; nor would the laziness of his nature permit him to take that pains, that was absolutely necessary for the well discharging that great office.

His majesty concluded, "that he loved him too well to disoblige him, and would never do any thing that would not be grateful to him : but he had some reason, even from what he had sometimes said to him, to think that he was weary of it, and might be easily persuaded to deliver up his staff, which his majesty would be very glad of; and therefore he wished that he, the chancellor, who was known to have most interest in him, would persuade him to it, in which he would do his majesty a singular service."

The chancellor presently asked him, "if he were so unfit, whom he would make treasurer in his room." The king as presently answered, "that he would never make another treasurer, which was an office of great charge, and would be much more effectually executed by commissioners; which had been done in Cromwell's time, as many offices had been : and that his majesty found by experience, that in offices of that kind commissioners were better than single officers ; for though sir William Compton was a very extraordinary man, of great industry and fidelity, yet that the office of the ordnance was neither in so good order nor so thriflily managed whilst he was master of it, as it hath been since his death, since when it hath been governed by commissioners ; and so he was well assured his treasury would be."

The chancellor replied, "that he was very sorry to find his majesty so much inclined to commissioners, who were indeed fittest to execute all offices according to the model of a commonwealth, but not at all agreeable to monarchy : that if he thought the precedent of Cromwell's time fit to be followed, he should be in the posture that Cromwell was, with an army of one hundred thousand men, which made him have no need of the authority and reputation of a treasurer, either to settle his revenue or to direct the levying it ; he could do both best himself." But he very passionately besought his majesty to believe, "that they who advised him to this method of government, though they might have good affection to his person and his service, were very unskilful in the constitution of this kingdom and in the nature of the people. That the office of treasurer had sometimes, upon the death of a present officer, been executed by commissioners, but very seldom for any time, or longer than whilst the king could deliberately make choice of a fit minister. That himself had "been twice a commissioner for the treasury, once in the time of his father, and again upon his majesty's return: and therefore that he could upon experience assure him, that commissioners, in so active a time as this, could never discharge the duty of that office; and that the dignity of the person of the treasurer was most necessary for his service, both towards the procuring the raising of money in parliament, and the improving his revenue by the grant of additions there, as likewise for the collecting and conducting it afterwards. For the present treasurer," he said, "there was no question, but if he knew that his majesty was weary of his service, and wished to have the staff out of his hand, he would most readily deliver it: but that they who gave the counsel, and thought it fit for his majesty's service, were much fitter to give him that advertisement, than he who in his conscience did believe, that the following it would be of the most pernicious consequence to his service of any thing that could be done."

He most humbly and with much earnestness besought his majesty "seriously to reflect, what an ill savour it would have over the whole kingdom, at this time of a war with at least two powerful enemies abroad together, of so great discontent and jealousy at home, and when the court was in no great reputation with the people, to remove a person the most loved and revered by the people for his most exemplary fidelity and wisdom, who had deserved as much from his blessed father and himself as a subject can do from his prince, a nobleman of the best quality, the best allied and the best beloved; to remove at such a time such a person, and with such circumstances, from his councils and his trust: for nobody could imagine, that, after such a manifestation of his majesty's displeasure, he would be again conversant in the court or in the council, both which would be much less esteemed upon such an action. That many with the same diseases and infirmities had long executed that office, which required more the strength of the mind than of the body: all were obliged to attend him, and he only to wait upon his majesty."

"That it was impossible for any man to discharge that office without a secretary: and if the whole kingdom had been to have preferred a secretary to him, they would have commended this gentleman to him whom he trusted, who had for many years served a former treasurer in the same trust, in the most malignant, captious, and calumniating time that hath been known, and yet without the least blemish or imputation; and who, ever since that time, had served his father in and to the end of the war, and himself since in the most secret and dangerous affairs," (for he had been trusted by the persons of the greatest quality to hold intelligence with his majesty to the time of his return;) "so that all men [rather] expected to have found him preferred to some good place, than in the same post he had been in twenty years before; which he would never have undertaken under any other officer than one with whom he had much confidence, and who he knew would serve his majesty so well. Yet," he said, "that whoever knew them could [never] believe that sir Philip Warwick could govern the lord treasurer."

The king said, "he had a very good opinion of sir Philip Warwick, and had never heard any thing to his prejudice." But upon the main point of the debate he seemed rather moved and troubled than convinced, when by good fortune the duke of York came into the room, who had been well prepared to like the king's purpose, and to believe it necessary; and therefore his majesty was glad of his presence, and called him to him, and told him what he had been speaking of; and the chancellor informed him of all that had passed between the king and him, and told him, "that he could never do a better service to the king his brother, than by using his credit with him to restrain him from prosecuting a purpose that would prove so mischievous to him." And so the discourse was renewed: and in the end the duke was so entirely converted, that he prevailed with his majesty to lay aside the thought of it; which so broke all the measures the other contrivers had formed their counsels by, that they were much out of countenance. But finding that they could not work upon the duke to change his mind, and to return to the former resolution, they thought not fit to press the king further for the present; and only made so much use of their want of success, by presenting to his majesty his irresoluteness, which made the chancellor still impose upon him, that the king did not think the better of the chancellor or the treasurer, for his receding at that time from prosecuting what he had so positively resolved to have done, and promised them "to be firmer to his next determination."

After Christmas the rage and fury of the pestilence began in some degree to be mitigated, but so little, that nobody who had left the town had yet the courage to return thither: nor had they reason; for though it was a considerable abatement from the height it had been at, yet there died still between three and four thousand in the week, and of those, some men of better condition than had fallen before. The general writ from thence, "that there still arose new difficulties in providing for the setting out the fleet, and some of such a nature, that he could not easily remove them without communication with his majesty, and receiving his more positive directions; and how to bring that to pass he knew not, for as he could by no means advise his majesty to leave Oxford, so he found many objections against his own being absent from London." Windsor was thought upon as a place where the king might safely reside, there being then no infection there: but the king had adjourned the term thither, which had possessed the whole town; and he was not without some apprehension, that the plague had got into one house.

In the end, towards the end of February, the king resolved that the queen and duchess and all their families should remain in Oxford; and that his majesty and his brother, with prince Rupert, and such of his council and other servants as were thought necessary or fit, would make a quick journey to Hampton-Court, where the general might be every day, and return again to London at night, and his majesty give such orders as were requisite for the carrying on his service, and so after two or three days' stay there return again to Oxford; for no man did believe it counsellable, that his majesty should reside longer there, than the despatch of the most important business required : and with this resolution his majesty made his journey to Hampton-Court.

It pleased God, that the next week after his majesty came thither, the number of those who died of the plague in the city decreased one thousand ; and there was a strange universal joy there for the king's being so near. The weather was as it could be wished, deep snow and terrible frost, which very probably stopped the spreading of the infection, though it might put an end to those who were already infected, as it did, for in a week or two the number of the dead was very little diminished. The general came and went as was intended : but the business every day increased ; and his majesty's remove to a further distance was thought inconvenient, since there appeared no danger in remaining where he was.

And after a fortnight's or three weeks' stay, he resolved, for the quicker despatch of all that was to be done, to go to Whitehall, when there died above fifteen hundred in the week, and when there was not in a day seen a coach in the streets, but those which came in his majesty's train ; so much all men were terrified from returning to a place of so much mortality. Yet it can hardly be imagined what numbers flocked thither from all parts upon the fame of the king's being at Whitehall, all men being ashamed of their fears for their own safety, when the king ventured his person. The judges at Windsor adjourned the last return of the term to Westminster-hall, and the town every day filled marvellously ; and which was more wonderful, the plague every day decreased. Upon which the king changed his purpose, and, instead of returning to Oxford, sent for the queen and all the family to come to Whitehall : so that before the end of March the streets were as full, the exchange as much crowded, and the people in all places as numerous, as they had ever been seen, few persons missing any of their acquaintance, though by the weekly bills there appeared to have died above one hundred and threescore thousand persons : and many, who could compute very well, concluded that there were in truth double that number who died ; and that in one week, when the bill mentioned only six thousand, there had in truth fourteen thousand died. The frequent deaths of the clerks and sextons of parishes hindered the exact account of every week ; but that which left it without any certainty was the vast number that was buried in the fields, of which no account was kept. Then of the anabaptists and other sectaries, who abounded in the city, very few left their habitations ; and multitudes of them died, whereof no churchwarden or other officer had notice ; but they found burials, according to their own fancies, in small gardens or the next fields. The greatest number of those who died consisted of women and children, and the lowest and poorest sort of the people : so that, as I said before, few men missed any of their acquaintance when they returned, not many of wealth or quality or of much conversation being dead ; yet some of either sort there were.

The business of the king and of all about him was, that the fleet might be ready and at sea with all the possible expedition : and in or towards this there was less disturbance and interruption than could reasonably have been expected, an universal cheerfulness appearing in all who could obstruct or contribute towards it, the people generally being abundantly satisfied in the king's choice of the commanders. Prince Rupert was very much beloved, for his confessed courage, by the seamen ; and the people believed that they could not but have the victory where the general commanded, who only underwent unquietness and vexation from the tempestuous humour of his wife. She, from his return from Oxford, and from the time that she had the first intimation that the king had designed her husband for the command of the fleet, was all storm and fury ; and, according to the wisdom and modesty of her nature, poured out a thousand full-mouthed curses against all those who had contributed to that counsel : but the malice of all that tempest fell upon the chancellor. She declared, "that this was a plot of "his to remove her husband from the king, that "he might do what he had a mind to ;" and threw all the ill words at him which she had been accustomed to hear, accompanied with her good wishes of what she would have befall him. But the company she kept, and the conversation she was accustomed to, could not propagate the reproaches far ; and the poor general himself felt them most, who knew the chancellor to be his very fast and faithful friend, and that he would not be less so because his wife was no wiser than she was born to be. He was indefatigable in taking pains night and day, that the fleet might be at sea.

The duke of Beaufort, admiral of France, was already gone to Brest, and had taken leave of the king at Paris, whither he was not to return till after the summer's service at sea, and had appointed a rendezvous of all the ships to be at Brest by the middle of March, which they reported should consist of fifty ships of war.

The rupture was declared on both sides with Denmark. That king had appeared much troubled at the ill accident at Bergen, which had fallen out merely by the accidents of weather, which had hindered the positive orders from arriving in the precise time : and he seemed still resolved to detain the Dutch ships there, and only to fear the conjunction of the Swede with the Hollander, which the king's agent, sir Gilbert Talbot, assured him he need not to fear. Which the better to confirm, Mr. Clifford, who had been present at Bergen, and is before mentioned to be sent after that by the king to Denmark, went from thence into Sweden (where Mr. Coventry yet remained) with a project of such a treaty as would have been with little alterations consented to in Sweden, who had good inclinations to the king, and resolved to join with the bishop of Munster, when he should advance, according to his engagement. But the Danish resident in Sweden delayed to conclude, and pretended to have received less positive orders than the nature of the affair required, and that he expected fuller : and so all matters were deferred, till ambassadors came from Holland with no expostulations, and a desire to renew their alliance, and release some engagements they had upon the Sound, which had been very grievous to the Dane ; and many other conditions were granted which were very convenient to them. An ambassador likewise arrived in the nick of time from France, to dispose them to a conjunction with Holland, and to warrant the performance of whatsoever the Hollander should promise, and likewise to undertake that France would protect them against England, and therefore that they should not apprehend any danger from a war from thence; and De Ruyter was now gone with the fleet for Bergen.

Upon all these motives concurring in the same conjuncture, the poor king embraced that party; and then declared and complained, "that the English had broken the law of nations in violating the peace of his ports, and endeavouring to fire his town, when they were hospitably received and treated there under the protection of his castle." He denied that he had ever made such an offer or promise as sir Gilbert Talbot still charged him with, and which he had not denied to Mr. Clifford when he came first thither. But now he reproached sir Gilbert Talbot "for falsifying his words, at least for mistaking them, and sending that to the king his master which he gave him no liberty to do." And now sir Gilbert found his error in not having drawn from him or his servant Gabell, in writing, some evidence of the engagement: but after many indignities he left the court and returned to England. All English ships in Denmark or Norway were seized upon; and the persons of all merchants and others who were his majesty's subjects, and to some of whom the king of Denmark owed great sums of money, which they had lent to him, were imprisoned, and their goods seized and confiscated.

All which proceedings provoked the king to give the like orders, and to look upon them as enemies, and to emit a declaration of the motive he had to send his fleet to Bergen, "which he could never have done but upon the invitation and promise of that king; which was evident enough by the reception his ships had there, and expectation the governor had of their arrival, and his allegation, that he expected that very night fuller orders than he had yet received; and lastly, his suffering them to depart securely, after all the acts of hostility had passed in the port." Much of this was denied with many indecent expressions, and such evasions as made all that was said believed by equal considerers: and so the war was declared.

And then in the beginning of the year 1666, a year long destined by all astrologers for the production of dismal changes and alterations throughout the world, and by some for the end of it, the king found his condition so much worse than it had been the last year, as the addition of France and Denmark could make it; against all which, and the prodigies which the year was to produce, (and it did truly produce many,) the king prepared with his accustomed vigour and resolution, though the predictions had a strange operation upon vulgar minds.

The proclamation of the war in France, and the seizure upon the estates of the English, with some circumstances in the point of time, and other actions very unjust and unusual, the great maritime preparations there, and the visible assistance of force that was sent thence to the Dutch, did not trouble nor hurt the king so much as the secret and invisible negotiations of that crown. From the first declaration of the bishop of Munster of his resolution to make a war upon Holland, (with which he acquainted the king of France before he resolved it, and received such an answer that made him very confident (as hath been remembered before upon his first address to the king of Great Britain) that he should meet with no obstruction from thence; and upon that confidence the treaty was concluded with the king, and great sums of money paid to the bishop upon his promise and engagement, "that he would fix himself with his army within the territories of the States General before the winter was ended; that against the spring, when the king's fleet should be ready for the sea, he would at the same time march with an army of twenty thousand foot and five thousand horse into the heart of their country;" and what the effect of that would have been in that conjuncture may be in some degree guessed at by what hath since fallen out: [I say], France, from the first knowledge they had of his purpose, and before they declared on the behalf of the Dutch, secretly sent to the neighbour princes "not to join with the bishop, and to do all that was in their power to hinder his levies;" and prevailed with the elector of Brandenburg, who had given hopes to the bishop of a powerful assistance upon the expectation of the restoration of Wesel, and other towns then possessed by Holland, totally to decline any conjunction with him, upon promise "that he should find his own account better from the friendship of France." The dukes of Lunenburg, who had made the bishop believe that they would join with him, and had made levies of soldiers to that purpose, having abundant argument of quarrel with Holland, were now persuaded by the same way not only to desist from helping, but to declare themselves enemies to the bishop, if he would not desist, and "that they would serve the Dutch with their forces."

When all this could not discourage the bishop from prosecuting his intention, but that he still gathered troops, and gave new commissions to officers who had prepared for their levies further in Germany; the king of France sent an envoy expressly to the bishop himself, and offered his mediation and interposition with the Dutch, "that they should do him all the right that in justice he could demand from [them], and if [this] were not accepted by him, that he [must] expect what prejudice the arms of France could bring upon him;" and then sent to all those princes who had permitted levies to be made in their countries, "that they should not suffer those troops to march out of their country," but offered "to receive and entertain them in his own army." With this he sent to the other princes of Germany and to the emperor himself, "that if they did not prevent this incursion of the bishop of Munster," (to which they all wished well,) "they would involve the empire in a war."

When all this could not terrify the bishop, who defended himself by his engagement to the king of Great Britain, "that he could not enter into treaty nor give over his enterprise without his consent," and drew his forces together to a rendezvous, and had got permission from the marquis of Castelle Roderigo, then governor of Flanders, to make levies in those provinces without noise or avowing it, and marched with his army into the States' dominions, and took a place or two even in the sight of prince Maurice, (who drew as many of the States' troops together as could be spared out of their garrisons, but thought not fit to engage with them, after he had found in some light skirmishes that they were not firm;) so that the bishop, by the advantage of the situation of which he was possessed, began to fasten himself in full assurance of increasing his army, in spite of all discouragements, before the spring, (and he had already received some troops out of Flanders, and advertisement from other of his officers, that they were well advanced in their levies:) the king of France in this conjuncture, in the imperious style he customarily used in those cases, sent to the governor of Flanders for a license for such troops, as he had occasion to send into Germany, to pass through such a part of his government; which as he had no mind to grant, so he durst not deny, having orders from Spain to be very careful, that no disgusts might be given to France which might give any occasion, or pretence, or opportunity for a breach, which they well knew was desired and longed for.

Upon this permission the French troops marched into Flanders: and in the first place, whether in their way or out of their way, they fell upon the levies which were made for the bishop, and routed and dispersed them, or took them prisoners. In one place, by the strength of their quarter and a neighbour church, they defended themselves, imagining the country would relieve them, without suspecting that they had license and permission to march through: but they were so much inferior in number or strength, that after some of them were killed, the rest were glad to throw down their arms and become prisoners at mercy, the officers not comprehending what declared enemy could fall upon them in those quarters. With this triumph they marched, and joined with prince Maurice by the time the bishop had notice of the disaster, and speedily advanced upon his quarters, and beat some of his troops.

Upon which the poor bishop (who instead of the supplies and commissions and other countenance that he had reason to expect from those princes, who had been privy and with great promises encouraged his enterprise, received every day arguments from them against his proceeding further, with many conjurations, that he would entirely submit to the king of France's determination) found himself necessitated to comply, and even heart-broken signed a treaty with the French, who then were careful enough both of his honour and interest in the conditions with the Dutch, as for an ally of whom they meant to make more use in another conjuncture. Upon all which the bishop had been much more excusable, if he had not received some of the king's money, even after he saw that he should be obliged to sign the treaty; which he ought not to have done, though it had been due, and it may be expended, before he had any such intention, and to which, it cannot be denied, he had most forcible compulsions.

This was the most sensible blow, but the plague, that the king had felt from the beginning of the war, and was instance enough how terrible the king of France was to all the neighbour kings and princes, who had so suddenly departed from their own inclinations and resolutions, and from their own interest, only upon his insinuations, which became orders to them. And Spain, if they knew that which all the world besides discerned, could not but believe that France would break all treaties as soon as the other king should die, the news of which was expected and provided for every week. But the drowsy temper of that monarch, who had been so much disquieted throughout his whole reign, extended so far only as to prepare a stock of peace that would last during his own time, that he saw would be very short, and to leave his dominions and his infant son to shift for themselves when he was dead: and it was an unhappy maxim of that state, that it was the best husbandry to purchase present peace and present money at how dear interest soever for the future, which would be assisted with some new expedients, as Spain had always been.

All these disadvantages made the king the more solicitous to have but one enemy to struggle with, though it were France: and therefore he was very solicitous, by all ways he could devise, to make a peace with Holland, and to leave Denmark to their own inventions; and he had some encouragement to believe, that it was not impossible to separate Holland from France. They were sensible enough, that they had been upon the matter betrayed into the war, by the positive promise of assistance, and a firm conjunction from France in the instant that the war should be entered upon, without any mention of mediation or interposition for peace, which was against their desire; and that they had looked on very unconcernedly, or rather well pleased to see them beaten, and their own people ready to rise against the government. Then they knew that France did already provide for an expedition against Flanders, which could not long defend itself with its own forces; and that they depended upon this war between England and the Dutch, as what must hinder both those nations from giving it assistance: and they as well knew what their own portion must be, when that screen was removed, that was their best security against so mighty a neighbour. And this De Wit himself, who was the chief supporter of the war, frequently observed and confessed to those with whom he had most conversation, and in whom he was believed to have most trust: and all those advertisements were transmitted to the king by those whose integrity could not be suspected, and who did not dissemble, being of the States themselves, to be very desirous of peace and very jealous of France.

There was a gentleman, one monsieur Bewett, of a good family in France and born there, but long bred in Holland whilst the wars were there, and who had been captain in the last prince of Orange's horse-guards, and in very particular favour with him, by which he was married to a woman of Holland very rich, and very nearly allied to many of those who had the greatest influence upon the government; and was now looked upon rather as a Dutchman than a Frenchman, and conversed most familiarly amongst the burgo-masters, and other principal persons of the States. And by this interest, after the death of the prince of Orange, that troop was still preserved for a guard to the States, and was the only horse-troop that remained constantly in the Hague. And for the better pleasing the people, it was still called the Prince of Orange's Guard, and continued to wear the same livery it had always done: and the young prince took much delight to see them, and to hear himself called by them their captain; and the commander thereof, Bewett, professed and paid the same devotion to him that he had done to his father.

This gentleman was generally beloved, and held a man of great sincerity, brave in point of courage, and of good parts of wit and judgment, save that he was immoderately given to wine and to the excess of it, which, being the disease or rather the health of the country, made him not the worse thought of or less fit for business. He was well known to the king, and well thought of by him, and had great familiarity with some of the bed-chamber, and others near the king and trusted by him. He had made a journey once, since the king's return into England, only to kiss his hand, and profess the same affection and duty he had often done when his majesty was abroad, which had always made him acceptable to him.

He was a bold speaker, and from the time that the war was begun against England much inveighed against the counsel that persuaded it, as very pernicious to the affairs of that country; and in this argument used not more freedom with any than with De Wit himself, who loved his person and his spirit, and conversed very freely with him, though he knew his friendships were chiefly with the dependents upon the house of Orange, and with others of the States who were of his own opinion with reference to the war: and the publishing his opinion drew many of the greatest interest amongst the burgomasters to delight in his conversation, and to trust him much. With those he consulted freely what means should be used to procure a peace, and [prevent] the mischief that must attend the continuance [of the war], with good sense and judgment: but those consultations were always in the exercise of drinking, which never ended without the utmost excess, though without noise or disquiet or unkindness, which are never the effects of those excesses amongst that people.

After the first battle, when the Dutch were so much beaten, and the people in that consternation that they called aloud for peace, and reviled all those who were thought to be against it, and amongst those De Wit principally, who had the more enemies, and peace the more friends, for the differences which had arisen amongst the officers of the fleet upon the death of Opdam, and upon the disgrace which Trump had undergone by the power and injustice, as they said, of De Wit upon personal dislikes, and because he was known to have great affection for the prince of Orange, (and Van Trump himself, as hath been said, was not only of much interest amongst the seamen, but very popular in the government, and had his sisters married to burgomasters in some of the greatest towns; so that the disgrace of him increased the number of De Wit's enemies:) in this conjuncture Bewett cultivated the best he could all those ill humours, how mutinous soever, which grew most importunate for peace; yet without any reflection upon the person of De Wit, with whom he was known by the company he most kept to have much familiarity, and whom he did at that time really believe to be inclined to peace, and declared he did think so to those who knew the contrary, yet did not think the worse of him for being deceived, being assured he would never deceive them for want of integrity.

But he took advantage of this general distemper and of the prejudice the people had against him, to talk very frankly to De Wit of both; and admired, "since he did, as he professed, "desire peace, that he would not find some way "to undeceive the people, which was necessary "for his own security; and it might easily be "effected, by giving a beginning to such a consultation as might look towards an accommodation." De Wit had his spies in all places, and knew well what company Bewett most delighted in, though his acquaintance was universal and agreeable to all men: and he was informed too of his particular behaviour with reference to him, and that he did constantly and confidently vindicate him from many imputations, in the presence of those who were not pleased with his contradictions; so that he looked upon him as his friend, and one that might by his interest and credit divert some of that popular envy and malice, of which he had no contempt, but much apprehension.

He renewed his former professions of his desire of peace, and gave so good reasons for it as might naturally gain belief; amongst which one was always a vehement jealousy of France, "which," he said, "though it had at last declared war "against England, which they ought to have "done so long before, [had done it] only to draw "England into some conditions which might "facilitate their own enterprise upon Flanders, "which it concerned them to prevent by all the "ways possible; of which none would be so probable as a peace between England and them, "which would immediately make each solicitous "for their own interest. But how to set any "thing on foot that might contribute to this "he knew not; and the doing that which the "other had proposed, by declaring himself, was "the way only to slacken all the provisions for "war, the expediting of which would most advance a peace."

Bewett replied, "that he knew he had many "friends in the English court, whereof some were "of near trust about his majesty, for whose "secrecy he would be accountable;" and named the lord Arlington, who had lately married a lady of the Hague, the daughter of monsieur Beverwaert, a person in his quality and fortune in the first rank. He offered to him, "that he would "himself write such a letter to the lord Arlington "in his own name, which he should first see and "approve, without which he would not send it, "as should only testify his own good wishes for "a peace between the two nations, which were "not unknown to the king himself; and would "make no other mention of him, than that he "had reason to believe, that monsieur De Wit "(in whose good opinion he had the honour to "be known to have some place) would not be "unwilling to promote any good overture that "should be made." After some debate he was content that he should write, provided that he would promise to write nothing but what he should first see, and would still bring the answers to him which he should receive; to which the other consented.

Upon this encouragement he begun his correspondence with the lord Arlington, and acquainted his bosom-friends with it, to dispose them the more to hope for peace, and to look upon De Wit as not averse to it. But what he writ was with so much wariness, being dictated upon the matter by the pensioner, that it could draw no other answers from the secretary but of the same style, with expressions of his majesty's desire of peace and esteem of De Wit, and as if he expected some overtures to arise from thence. This intelligence had not been long on foot, but he begun to suspect the sincerity of De Wit, and that indeed he was not so well inclined to peace as he had pretended to be: his countenance was not so open, nor he so vacant when he came, as he used to be; he grew less jealous of the French, and more composed himself, and less apprehensive of the people, as he found them more composed, and a greater concurrence in the making all things ready for the fleet. All which observations he likewise imparted to his companions, who were glad to find him begin to be undeceived; and from that time he was apter to concur with them in the fiercer counsels, how to compass a peace in spite of him by a majority of votes in the States, with the help of the people, for the suppression of any accidental [insurrection] whereof, there were no other forces in view than those horse-guards that were commanded by him.

Hereupon he took a new resolution, but would not lose the advantage he had by the knowledge De Wit had of his correspondence, and therefore shewed him a letter that he had received from the lord Arlington, in which he pressed him "to inform him, what particulars would dispose the States to peace, and to separate from the French," and had sent him a cipher for the more free and safe communication; which cipher he deposited in the hands of De Wit, having received his directions and observed them by using the same cipher, which the other examined and kept, and hoped by the answer to put an end to that correspondence, of which he grew weary, and less confident of the person, because he heard that he was grown less zealous in his defence than he had been.

Bewett upon this grew more resolute one way and less apprehensive the other way, and sent a person with whom he had great friendship, and who was well known to the king and most about him, monsieur Silvius, a servant to the late princess royal, and a native of Orange, with a full account "of the state of the counsels at the Hague, and his discovery that De Wit did not in truth desire a peace, nor would consent to it, but upon very unreasonable terms," whereof some were mentioned in his letter in cipher which he had dictated; "but that he was most assured, that he should be compelled at the next assembly of the States to submit to more reasonable conditions." He gave the king an account of the ground of his confidence, and an information of the persons who were combined together to press it in the States, amongst which there were some of the greatest power: and by their advice he offered the substance of a message they wished the king should send to the States General at the time of their convening, in which there was nothing contained against which any thing could be objected on his majesty's behalf; and "upon the delivery thereof there would so few adhere to De Wit, that he should not be able to prevent a treaty, though France should protest against it." He sent likewise at the same time, and by the same person, another cipher to the lord Arlington, with direction "that in such letters as were intended for the view of the pensioner the former cipher should be used, and in the other letters, which were to be concealed from him, and which were for the most part to contain intelligence and advice against him, the latter cipher was only to be made use of."

Those informations by Silvius, who was a man of parts, and had dependance upon the duke of York, and meant not to return into Holland except upon a pressing occasion, when he durst adventure to go, being looked upon as an inhabitant of the Hague, having been always bred there, and his relation to the duke scarce yet taken notice of; I say, those informations the king thought to be worthy to be well considered, and conferred with the chancellor upon the whole, and appointed the lord Arlington to inform him of all that had passed from the beginning; and that Silvius, who was concealed, that they might have no advertisement in Holland of his having been in England, should likewise attend him in some evening; which he shortly after did, and made him an ample and clear relation of the state of the counsels at the Hague, and the several factions amongst them, and the distemper of the people. He had himself spoken with many of the burgomasters and others in authority, who were privy to his coming, and communicated the method they meant to proceed in towards the depressing De Wit, by mingling the proposition for peace with the interest of the prince of Orange, which the people thought to be inseparable.

In fine, he gave a perfect good account of all to which he was instructed, with great modesty: and when the chancellor, to whom Bewett and he were both well known, would have induced him to deliver somewhat of his own judgment, whether he thought that combination to be strong enough to overrule De Wit; he could draw no other answer from him than the magnifying the credit and interest of Bewett, which he seemed principally to rely upon, and the impossibility that he should fail in point of integrity or courage.

Silvius had settled a sure way of correspondence, and by every post received fresh intelligence of the preparations and progress Bewett and his friends made in their designs, of the success whereof they were every day more confident, and thought their party so much to increase, that as they did not apprehend any discovery like to be made by treachery, so they did not seem to fear it, if De Wit himself should know all that they intended: and they pressed very earnestly, "that the king's letter, in the manner they had proposed, might be at the Hague when the General States were to meet," the time whereof approached.

The king called those to him to whom the whole negotiation had been imparted, to advise what was to be done. On the king's part nothing was considerable, but whether he should write to the States at all, and what he should write: and against writing there seemed to be no objection, and as little against writing what they advised, which was no more than he had formerly writ, and always said to their ambassador, And that this might be a more favourable conjuncture for the good reception of it, and hearkening to it, his majesty was reasonably to believe those who meant to second and promote it with their own reasons: and therefore the time and the manner of the delivery of it was left to be resolved amongst themselves, the king having no minister there to present it.

The way that they had thought of was, that Bewett should at the proper time deliver it to De Wit, who durst not conceal it, and if he should, there would be ways enough to publish it to his reproach; nor could he take any advantage of Bewett for his correspondence with their enemies, because it had been entered into with his approbation. But for the better security in the sending it, and the better information of the persons engaged, of all the reflections which had been made by the king, and those with whom he had conferred by his majesty's order, it was thought best that Silvius should return; and if Bewett thought fit to decline the delivery of the king's letter, and no better way could be found for the delivery of it, he might present it in the manner his friends there should direct, and avow his having been at London to solicit his own pretences since the death of the princess royal his mistress, and that he had received the letter from the king's own hand. This being the concurrent opinion of all, and the gentleman himself willing to undertake it, Silvius was despatched.

In the debate of the matter, the king asked the chancellor "what he thought of the design, and whether he thought it would succeed;" who said, "he doubted it much, and that it would conclude in the loss of poor Bewett's head, who had not a talent for the managery of an affair of that weight, which would require great secrecy and great sobriety, and the consideration of more particulars at once than his comprehension could contain together." Then he did not like the method they proposed, of joining the demand of peace with the interest of the prince of Orange, which, though it might probably follow the peace and be an effect of it, would not be seasonable to be joined with it in regard of his infancy; and that many did heartily desire the peace, who had no mind that the prince should be restored to the offices of his father and family, or that there should be any debate of it, till the prince came to the age that was provided by the solemn act and declaration of the States: which had been the reason that his majesty (who had all the tenderness for his nephew that a parent could have) would never be persuaded to mention him (though it had been proposed by many, and even by the elector of Brandenburg and the princess dowager) in the conditions of the peace; the king foreseeing that De Wit would have been glad to have that advantage, as to observe to the people, that the king would prescribe to them what officers they should choose and admit into their government, and that they must have no peace, except they would take a general and a stadtholder and an admiral of his nomination, which was to make them subject to himself.

And this was the reason, that in all conferences with the French ambassadors, who sometimes would mention the prince of Orange with compassion for the ingratitude of the States towards him, and add, "that they doubted not their "master would be ready to join with his majesty in doing him all offices;" and sometimes when the Dutch ambassador (who was of that party that did really wish the restoration of the prince) in conference would seem to wish and to believe, that the restoring the prince of Orange would be the consequence of the peace: the king never gave other answer, than "that he should be very glad that the States would gratify his nephew;" but that it was a matter he had nothing to do to interpose in, it depending wholly upon their own good will and pleasure."

The rest who were present had much more esteem of Bewett than the chancellor had, (who thought as well of his courage and integrity as they did,) and believed he would have success in what he designed, his interest in the right of his wife being confessedly very great amongst the States, and his jolly course of living having rendered him very acceptable and grateful to men of the most different affections; and then of all the officers of the militia he was most esteemed, which was like to be of moment, if the dispute brought the matter to a struggle: but the event shewed the contrary.

After Silvius's departure, letters passed between them, as they had used to do, for two or three posts. And Bewett one day meeting De Wit when he came from his good fellows, and they walking a turn together in common discourse, De Wit asked him, "when he had any letter from England, and how affairs went there:" to which he suddenly answered, "that he came just then from receiving one, which he had not yet deciphered," and put his hand into his pocket, and took thence a letter; and casting his eyes (which were never good, and now worse by the company he had left) upon the superscription, he gave it to him, and said, "he would go with him that they might decipher it together according to custom."

De Wit presently found that it was not the accustomed cipher, (for he had delivered the wrong letter, that which he ought not to see,) and desired him "that he would walk before, and he would presently overtake him, after he had spoken a few words at a house in his way." And so leaving him, he took present order for the apprehending him and searching his pockets; and at the same time sent to his house, and caused his cabinet, where all his papers were, to be examined and sealed up. And so poor Bewett, whilst he stayed at the other's house that they might decipher the letter, was apprehended, and all his papers taken out of his pockets, and he sent to prison. The other cipher was quickly found, and many letters and other papers, which discovered many secrets. Whereupon a court of justice was speedily erected: and within three days, according to the expedition used there in such cases, a scaffold was erected, and the poor gentleman brought thither in the sight of all his friends; and there, with his known courage, and in few words declaring "that he had honest poses to the country," lost his head.

Silvius quickly heard of his imprisonment, and as soon thought it necessary to make his own escape, and arrived in England before he heard of his last misfortune, which he did not suspect, nor knew how the discovery had been made. The knot, thus broken, dispersed themselves: most of them got into Flanders; the burgomaster of Rotterdam, and two or three others of note, made all the haste they could into England; some thought themselves secure in Antwerp and other parts of Flanders; and some were seized upon in several places of the States' dominions, and imprisoned with all the circumstances of severity, though upon the want of clear proofs few of them were put to death. The troop of guards was reformed, or rather transformed, under new officers, and assigned for a constant guard to the States, without the least formal relation to the prince of Orange, or using his name or livery, or permission to pay any reverence to him. And so the prince was much lower than before, and all hopes of reviving almost extinguished or expired; De Wit stood firmer upon his own feet than ever, and directed all preparations for the war without control; and all the present expectation in England vanished: whilst the pensionary informed France of the dangers he had escaped for them, and what great matters had been offered to him if he would have departed from their interest; and made the plot to contain all that he fancied it might have done.

When the parliament at Oxford was prorogued, it was to a day in April: but the king had reason to believe that they would not so soon be in good humour enough to give more money, which was the principal end of calling them together. And the dregs of the plague still remaining, and venting its malignity in many burials every week, his majesty thought fit to dispense with their attendance at that time by a proclamation: and he caused it at the day to be prorogued to the twentieth of September following. In the mean time the court abounded in all its excesses. There had been some hope during the abode at Oxford, that the queen had been with child; and whilst that hope lasted, the king lived with more constraint and caution, and prepared to make himself worthy of that blessing: and there are many reasons to believe, besides his own natural good inclinations, that if God had vouchsafed to have given him a child, and the queen that blessing to have merited from him, he would have restrained all those inordinate appetites and delights; and that he would seriously have applied himself to his government, and cut off all those extravagant expenses of money and time, which disturbed and corrupted the evenness of his own nature and the sincerity of his intentions, and exposed him to the temptations of those who had all the traps and snares to catch and detain him.

The imagination of the queen's breeding was one cause of her stay there; and her stay there was the longer, because she miscarried when she intended to begin her journey. And though the doctors declared that it was a real miscarriage, ripe enough to make a judgment of the sex; yet some of the women who had more credit with the king assured him, "that it was only a false conception, and that she had not been at all with child:" insomuch that his majesty, who had been so confident upon a former [occasion], as to declare to the queen his mother and to others, "that upon his own knowledge her majesty had miscarried of a son," suffered himself now to be so totally convinced by those ladies and other women, that he did as positively believe that she never had, never could be, with child. And from that time he took little pleasure in her conversation, and more indulged to himself all liberties in the conversation of those, who used all their skill to supply him with divertisements, which might drive all that was serious out of his thoughts, and make him undervalue those whom he had used, and still did most trust and employ, in what he thought most important; though he sometimes thought many things not of importance, which in the consequence were of the highest.

The lady, who had never declined in favour, was now greater in power than ever: she was with child again, and well enough contented that his majesty should entertain an amour with another lady, and made a very strict friendship with her, it may be the more diligently out of confidence that he would never prevail with her, which many others believed too. But without doubt the king's passion was stronger towards that other lady, than ever it was to any other woman: and she carried it with that discretion and modesty, that she made no other use of it than for the convenience of her own fortune and subsistence, which was narrow enough; never seemed disposed to interpose in the least degree in business, nor to speak ill of any body; which kind of nature and temper the more inflamed the king's affection, who did not in his nature love a busy woman, and had an aversion from speaking with any woman, or hearing them speak, of any business but to that purpose he thought them all made for, however they broke in afterwards upon him to all other purposes.

The lady herself, who every day (as was said before) grew in power and credit, did not yet presume to interpose in any other business, than in giving all the imaginable countenance she could to those who desired to depend upon her, and, in their right as well as her own, in depressing the credit of those who she knew wished hers much less than it was; but in this last argument she was hitherto wary, and took only such opportunities as were offered, without going out of her way to find them. Her principal business was to get an estate for herself and her children, which she thought the king at least as much concerned to provide as she to solicit; which however she would not be wanting in, and so procured round sums of money out of the privy purse, (where she had placed Mr. May,) and other assignments in other names, and so the less taken notice of, though in great proportions: all which yet amounted to little more than to pay her debts, which she had in few years contracted to an unimaginable greatness, and to defray her constant expenses, which were very excessive in coaches and horses, clothes and jewels, without any thing of generosity, or gratifying any of her family, or so much as paying any of her father's debts, whereof some were very clamorous. Her name was not used in any suits for the grant of lands; for besides that there was no avowing or public mention of natural children, she did think the chancellor and treasurer willing to obstruct such grants, and desired not to have any occasion to try the kindness of either of them: and so all the suits she made of that kind were with reference to Ireland, where they had no title to obstruct, nor natural opportunity to know, what was granted; and in that kingdom she procured the grant of several great quantities of land, like to prove of great benefit and value to her or her children.

The chief design they now began to design, and the worst they could ever design, was to raise a jealousy in the king of his brother, to which his majesty was not in any degree inclined, and had in truth a just affection for him and confidence in him, without thinking better of his natural parts than he thought there was cause for; and yet, which made it the more wondered at, he did very often depart in matters of the highest moment from his own judgment to comply with his brother, who was instructed, by those who too well knew the king's nature, to adhere to any thing he once advised, and to be importunate in any thing he proposed; in which he prevailed the more easily, because he never used it in any thing that concerned himself or his own benefit.

The truth is, it was the unhappy fate and constitution of that family, that they trusted naturally the judgments of those, who were as much inferior to them in understanding as they were in quality, before their own, which was very good; and suffered even their natures, which disposed them to virtue and justice, to be prevailed upon and altered and corrupted by those, who knew how to make use of some one infirmity that they discovered in them; and by complying with that, and cherishing and serving it, they by degrees wrought upon the mass, and sacrificed all the other good inclinations to that single vice. They were too much inclined to like men at first sight, and did not love the conversation of men of many more years than themselves, and thought age not only troublesome but impertinent. They did not love to deny, and less to strangers than to their friends; not out of bounty or generosity, which was a flower that did never grow naturally in the heart of either of the families, that of Stuart or the other of Bourbon, but out of an unskilfulness and defect in the countenance: and when they prevailed with themselves to make some pause rather [than] to deny, importunity removed all resolution, which they knew neither how to shut out nor to defend themselves against, even when it was evident enough that they had much rather not consent; which often made that which would have looked like bounty lose all its grace and lustre.

If the duke seemed to be more firm and fixed in his resolutions, it was rather from an obstinacy in his will, which he defended by aversion from the debate, than by the constancy of his judgment, which was more subject to persons than to arguments, and so as changeable at least as the king's, which was in greatest danger by surprise: and from this want of steadiness and irresolution (whencesoever the infirmity proceeded) most of the misfortunes, which attended either of them or their servants who served them honestly, had [their] rise and growth; of which there will be shortly an occasion, and too frequently, to say much more. In the mean time it cannot be denied, and was observed and confessed by all, that never any prince had a more humble and dutiful condescension and submission to an elder brother, than the duke had towards the king: his whole demeanour and behaviour was so full of reverence, that [it] might have given example to be imitated by those, who ought but did not observe a greater distance. And the conscience and resentment he had within himself, for the sally he had made in Flanders, made him after so wary in his actions, and so abhorring to hear any thing that might lessen his awe for the king, that no man who had most credit with [him] durst approach towards any thing of that kind; so that there was never less ground of jealousy than of him. And (as was said before) the king (who was in his nature so far from any kind of jealousy, that he was too much inclined to make interpretations of many words and actions, which might reasonably harbour other apprehensions) was as incapable of any infusions which might lessen his confidence in his brother, as any noble and virtuous mind could be. And therefore those ill men, who began about this time to sow that cursed seed that grew up to bear a large crop of the worst and rankest jealousy in the succeeding time, did not presume to make any reflection upon the duke himself, but upon his wife, "upon the state she assumed, and "the height of the whole family, that lived in much "more plenty," they said, "than the king's, and "were more regarded abroad."

Such kind of people are never without some particular stories of the persons whom they desire to deprave: and so had many instances, which they used upon all occasions, of some levity or vanity, of some words affected by the duchess, or some outward carriage, true or false, which for the most part concluded in mirth and laughter, and seemed ridiculous; which was the method they used in all their approaches of that kind towards the highest acts of malice, first to make the person, whom they hoped to ruin in the end, less esteemed, by the acting and presentation of his words and gestures and motions; which commonly is attended with laughter. And this is the first breach they make upon any man's reputation; and the frequent custom of this kind of laughter and mirth, which is easily produced without any malice, doth in the end open a space large enough to let [in] calumny and scandal enough to weaken, if not to destroy, the best built reputation.

This was the course they held with reference to the duchess, whom the king had from the beginning treated with great grace and favour, and considered her as a woman of more than an ordinary wit and understanding: and the queen mother had from the reconciliation used her with that abundant affection and familiarity that was very wonderful; and the heights she assumed, and all that greatness which many thought too much, [were] not only inculcated, but enjoined by the queen as a duty due to her husband, of whose high degree she thought she could not be too tender and careful. And she had the happiness so well to behave herself towards the duke, that he was exceedingly pleased with her, and lived towards her with an affection so remarkable and notorious, that it grew to be the public discourse and commendation; and which made the liberties that were taken elsewhere the more spoken of and censured. It was very visible that he liked her company and conversation very well, and was believed to communicate all his counsels, and all he knew or thought, without reserve to her; which, being so contrary to the professed doctrine of the court, administered occasion to the men of mirth, in those seasons which took up a good part of every night, to be very pleasant upon the government of the duchess, and the submission [of the duke]; in which there were always some witty reflections upon the chancellor. And this kind of liberty, being first grateful to the king for the wit that accompanied it and the mirth that it produced, grew by the custom of it the more acceptable; and it may be the general and public observation of the disparity in the lives of the two brothers made it wished, that there were no more of that strictness in the one place than in the other, towards which there wanted not application and advice accordingly as well as example.

In the mean time the chancellor had a hard part to act, being neither able to do the good he constantly endeavoured on one side, nor remove the ill he disliked on the other side; for he saw well the mischief that would inevitably follow the great expenses of the duke, which exceeded all limits, and could never be provided for; and thought the duchess to be blamed for what she spent upon herself, and used all the credit he had with both to begin in time to reform what necessity would shortly do with more dishonour: but the disease had grown from the first ill digestion.

The lord Berkley had upon the king's first arrival formed a family without rule or precedent, and made the servants in a much better condition than the master, by assigning liberal pensions and allowances to them, who had paid him dear for their places, without considering from what fund they should arise: and now they all would have the duke believe, "that he spent not too much; but that he had too little provision assigned to him for his quality and relation, and this proceeded from the neglect in the chancellor, who was able, if he endeavoured it, to persuade the king to enlarge it to a just proportion." And this was as much urged to the duchess as to the duke, and it made in her a greater impression; and though she had in all other respects a very entire affection and even a duty and resignation to her father, yet in this he had no authority with her, nor did she think him a competent judge what expenses princes should make: and having seen the state and lustre in which the duke of Anjou lived in France, and having received many infusions from the queen, of the great defect in the customs of England, in providing either for the respect or for the support of the younger sons of the crown, [she thought] that the chancellor should rather use his credit for the enlarging that narrowness, which the king was enough disposed to, than to reform their expenses. But of this enough.

The plague had really swept away and destroyed so many seamen, (Stepney and the places adjacent, which were their common habitations, being almost depopulated,) that now, all other obstructions being removed, there seemed even an impossibility to procure sailors and mariners enough to set out the fleet; insomuch as they found it necessary to press many watermen, and to dis-furnish all merchant ships which were prepared to be set out to the plantations or to other places of trade: all which turned not so much to benefit one way, as it did to loss another way. But the best way to expedite all things was the two admirals going to the fleet themselves, that they who resolved to go might hasten thither, and that they who had no mind to go might, out of shame, likewise accompany them.

There appeared great unanimity and consent

between them. Only prince Rupert had a great desire to go in a ship apart, and that they might not be both [in one] ship: but upon debate it appeared to be unpracticable, and that in a time of action the orders could not be the same, if they who gave them were not together and in the same place; and so the prince was persuaded not to be positive in that particular. And so they both went together, and took leave of the king towards the end of April, and laboured so effectually, (as they were both men of great dexterity and indefatigable industry in such conjunctures,) that they carried the fleet out to sea, well fitted and provided, by the middle of May; with which they presently visited the coast of Holland, and took many prizes; and, by the intelligence they met with, concluded that the Dutch fleet would not be ready in a month, of which they gave the king advertisement, and returned into the Downs. And prince Rupert at the same time expressed an inclination to go himself with part of the fleet to meet the duke of Beaufort, who was reported to be under sail to join with the Dutch, and "that they would not put to sea till they foresaw that they were like to join about Calais."

At or near the same time the lord Arlington received intelligence, "that the Dutch were not yet well manned; and that the ships which were in the Texel, and were to join with the other under De Ruyter in the Wierings, were more unprovided:" though at the same time secretary Morrice (who had always better intelligence from Holland) was assured from thence, "that all the ships in both places were so ready that they would join within very few days." But the lord Arlington, who thought he ought to be more believed, received as positive advertisement from France, "that the duke of Beaufort set sail from Brest on such a day:" and though the wind had not been yet directly favourable for him, it was concluded that he must be well advanced in his way, and he had no port to friend till he came to the coast of France near Calais.

Upon this there seemed a great desire that prince Rupert might take the course he had proposed; for the convenience was agreed to be very great, if the French could be met with before the conjunction. However, the council was so wary that at that time attended the king at Worcester-house, the chancellor being affected with the gout, that they advised the king "not to send positive orders for the dividing the fleet, which by many accidents might produce inconveniences; but rather to send two of the council to the fleet, with an account of all the intelligence, and the reflections which occurred to the king upon it." And hereupon sir George Carteret and sir William Coventry were presently sent, and carried such orders with them, as would be necessary if the generals had not other intelligence, or did think that the division was not liable to more objections than had been in view. And this caution I set down more particularly, because the council underwent reproaches which it did not deserve.

The two counsellors used such expedition, and found so good conveniences by land and water, that they returned to the king the next day with an account, "that the state of the Dutch fleet was confirmed to be the same that his majesty had heard, and that they believed the other concern"ing the duke of Beaufort to be very probable; "whereupon they had concluded with a mutual consent and approbation, that prince Rupert should take twenty of the ships, which he had already chosen, to meet the French, though they were superior in number, whilst the general remained in the Downs with the rest: and in order to this, that the prince went aboard his ship before they came away, and the rather, because the wind was so much against him, that his majesty's orders, if he found cause to send any, would be sure for some days to find him upon the western coast; and the wind that was against him was so favourable to the duke of Beaufort, that it was probable they might speedily meet, and in a place to be wished." The king saw no cause yet to send orders to the contrary; and this was the reason, and all the circumstances, of the separation of the fleet, that proved unfortunate.

It appeared very soon after, which secretary had the better intelligence: for the very next day after the departure of the prince, the general, who remained in the Downs, had certain intelligence that the Dutch were come out of their harbours, having it seems received intelligence likewise of the French fleet's being at sea, and being obliged to meet them, and had been long ready to do so; which had deceived the court, they believing that they stayed because they were not ready to come out; whereas they were ready, and expected only the other advertisement.

As soon as the general was informed, he sent notice presently to the duke late in the same evening, who, informing the king of it, gave orders to sir William Coventry to prepare orders to prince Rupert immediately to return; and if those orders had been carefully despatched, they might have come to the prince before the morning. But sir William Coventry thought he had done his part when he got the order signed, which was about twelve of the clock at night, and then sent them by his servant to the lord Arlington, whose part he thought it was to charge a messenger with them: but he was gone to bed, and his servants durst not disquiet him, a tenderness not accustomed to be in the family of a secretary. But whether they did not wake him, as he pretended, or being awake he deferred it, it was not sent away till the next day, and never came to prince Rupert's hand till he had turned his sails upon the thunder of the cannon; and he no sooner endeavoured to return, but the wind chopped about to retard him, that he could make little way that day or the night following. Whose fault it was that these important orders were not sent with more expedition, whether sir William Coventry ought not to have taken care for the conveying them, at least to have given the lord Arlington notice what the contents of them were, of which he denied to have any notice, was disputed with some warmth between themselves, and so came to be published: but it was never examined any where else, though the negligence was very mischievous in its effect; but they were both too great men to be questioned in any judicatory.

The general, after the notice he had received of the motion of the Dutch, ordered the fleet to weigh anchor about three of the clock in the morning upon the first of June 1666, to sail to the Buoy of the Gunfleet to join with some other ships which lay there, to get more men, being then but ill manned: and about seven of the clock in the morning the scouts came in, and brought the general notice, that the Dutch fleet was to the leeward, and probably intended to decline fighting till they might join with the French. And it had been to be wished that the English had stood off too, upon confidence that prince Rupert, whom the wind had kept from being far off, as they could not but know, would receive direction from court to return. But the general (who was as impatient upon the sight of an enemy to engage with him as prince Rupert himself, and had a natural contempt of the Dutch) called his flag-officers to council, and quickly resolved, "that it was not convenient nor safe nor honourable to decline the battle, lest it might take off the pre-sent courage of the seamen." And truly in all those consultations, upon the like occasions, who-ever proposed any wary advice ran great hazard of being reputed a coward. And so they bore up with a full wind upon the enemy, notwithstanding the visible disadvantage they were in, in respect of the strength of the enemy, for in the absence of prince Rupert there remained little above fifty sail with the general; whereas De Ruyter's fleet consisted of above fourscore sail, who easily perceived his advantage, and that a great part of the English fleet was absent, and so willingly embraced the occasion, and made what sail he could to meet with them.

It was about two of the clock in the afternoon when the engagement began; and the English had got the wind, which was so high that they could not carry out their lower tiers. The admiral was so shattered in his rigging and masts, that he was compelled to get off and anchor, that he might mend what was amiss; and many of his squadron had their main-yards shot off, and received such damage in their tackling, which was the chief aim of the Dutch, that they could hardly govern their ships. And by this means the enemy got the wind; and the battle continued with great fierceness, and loss of many men on both sides, till nine or ten of the clock at night, when all were willing to have some rest.

That night was spent in repairing masts and rigging: and at six of the clock in the morning the battle began again with the same fierceness, and lasted till night. And that day the Dutch suffered much, and one of their vice-admirals was boarded and afterwards sunk, as many of their other ships likewise were; so that they began to fall off: when sixteen new great ships came to their aid, which gave them new courage; so that they renewed and maintained the fight with great resolution, and killed many men of the English, and disabled many of the ships, till the night again parted them.

Upon the account the general received that night, and the new access of force to the Dutch, he thought it necessary to retire; for though he had lost no ship, very many were so disabled, that there was reason to fear they would hardly hold out to recover the shore. And thereupon he caused all those ships to be put before and make all the sail they could, and himself with sixteen ships in a breadth went in the rear: which as soon as the enemy perceived, they pursued, but came not within reach of their guns till four of the clock in the afternoon ; and then, though they shot hard, they did very little harm, the stern-pieces of the English over-reaching their broad-sides, which made many of them get off as quickly as they could. But by this time the English descried about twenty sail of ships standing towards them, which they concluded to be prince Rupert, (as it proved :) and so being earnest to join, they edged up towards them, but so unfortunately, that many of the flag ships were on ground off the Galloper-sand. But with much ado they all got off safe, the Royal Prince only excepted, which for this last age, and till the late war, was held the best ship in the world. This brave ship stuck so fast, that no art or industry could move her ; so that the enemy, when they found they could not carry her off, set her on fire, and took the captain, sir George Ayscue, and all the company prisoners, and without distinction used all with great barbarity, in which they pretended only to use retaliation. That night prince Rupert joined : and then they bore to the northward, that they might get clear of the sands ; and thereby the enemy got the wind again.

The fourth day of the battle, which was the fourth of June, the enemy being to windward about three leagues, the generals in the morning made all sail towards them : and they lay with their sails to the masts to stay for them, which they would not have had the courage to have done, if they had not had intelligence from the prisoners of the Prince, in how tattered a condition the fleet was. The battle began about eight of the clock in the morning with extraordinary confidence on both sides, the Dutch continuing their old guard, to spend all their shot upon the rigging and masts, and to defend themselves from being boarded, which the English most intended and laboured to do. But the design of the others succeeded better : insomuch that one of the vice-admirals of a squadron, and other of the best ships, were so disabled that they bore off from the battle, that they might mend and repair ; which gave no small encouragement to the enemy. But the two generals were invincible, and continued the battle all the day in several forms, and by the advantage of the wind fired six or seven of their ships, and sunk others, and had two or three of their own likewise sunk. And between six and seven at night, as if by consent, (and no doubt both sides were very weary of the encounter,) they separated without looking after each other, and hastened to their several coasts ; many of the English being so hurt in yards, masts, rigging, and hulls, many of them wanting men to ply their guns, and their powder and shot near spent, that with very much difficulty they got into harbour : and so concluded that great action, wherein either side pretended to have advantage, and both lost very much.

The next day after the battle was spent in fitting their masts and repairing their rigging, that they might be able to reach the coast : and when they came near it, the generals called a council about disposing those ships which could not remain at sea, and sent them to such several places as they might be soonest repaired in ; and gave every captain very strict order, "that all possible diligence" and expedition should be used to get their ships "ready, and furnished with whatsoever was wanting ;" and the commissioners of the navy were required to be assistant in all places. And so wonderful diligence was used, (which appears almost incredible,) that the whole fleet was so well fitted, that by the seventeenth day of the same month, within a fortnight after so terrible a battle, it was gathered together to a rendezvous to the Buoy of the Nore. The enemy made as much haste, rather to meet with the French, who were every day still expected, than to fight with the English, and kept as near to their own coast as conveniently they could : so that how ready soever the generals were (who had never left their ships) with the fleet by the seventeenth of the month, the winds were so averse or so calm, that it was the four and twentieth day of that month before they could reach the sight of the enemy.

And the next day, which was the twenty-fifth, the English made all the sail they could, and by ten in the morning engaged in as hot an encounter as had hitherto been in any engagement : and though the Dutch seemed not to fight with the same spirit and mettle, yet the battle held till two in the afternoon, when by the advantage of the wind they bore away faster than the English could follow. However, here they took vice-admiral Banchart, and his ship of threescore guns and three hundred men was burned ; and another ship of seventy guns and three hundred men was likewise taken and burned ; which the generals thought better, than to undergo the possible inconvenience of keeping them : and so they kept up as close to the enemy in the night as they could do. The next morning they used all their sails, and designed to board De Ruyter ; which, the wind lessening, they could not effect, he fighting very well, but running faster : and so, though very well pursued, he got into his fastness at the Wierings, with those who were nearest to him. But the rest who were further off, and were like to have the benefit of the night, tacked about : which they who attacked De Ruyter perceiving, and that they could follow him no further, and that the rest were five and forty sail, they followed them, the generals doing all they could with their squadron to put themselves between them and the coast ; but the wind growing on a sudden calm, about midnight they dropped their anchors, that they might not be driven further than they had a mind to be. But in the morning, when they weighed anchor to pursue them, and made all the way they could with a little wind, the enemy got so close to their own shore, their ships drawing less water than the English, that there could be no further pursuit.

Another part of the fleet, which was separated when De Ruyter got into the Wierings, and which the generals looked upon as their own, was so unhappily pursued, though by men of very good name, that they escaped ; which raised a great distemper in the fleet, whilst some officers of the prime and most unquestionable courage charged and accused others, who had always given great testimony that they durst do any thing, "of base declining to fight when the enemy was in their power, and that they chose rather to suffer them to escape than to encounter them." And this dispute and expostulation, between men who had many seconds, divided the generals, one declaring himself on the one side and the other ; but they wisely laid aside the debate, till they should be at more leisure with less inconvenience to determine it.

The generals thereupon, having thus scattered the enemy, resolved to ply upon the Dutch coast to take all ships of trade, which they did; and off the Texel and the Flie took many rich prizes, both homeward and outward bound, of great value. And they having now nothing to do but to lie still, there was a Dutch captain, one Laurence Van Humakerke, who after the first battle, in the faction between Evertson and Van Trump, had given De Wit so great an advantage, that if he had not made his escape, he had been hanged, who from that time had always been on board with prince Rupert: this man, whilst the fleet lay in this posture, advised prince Rupert to attempt a place near the Flie, which was so locked in the land that it was always looked upon as very secure, (and where all ships laden at Amsterdam for the Straits and those parts, when they were outward bound, used to lie two or three days, as in a safe port, until all things which might be forgotten [were prepared], and all the company came together,) and had never been invaded in any war; and by it was a pretty large village, called Schelling, which had many good houses in it, besides others inhabited by, and for the entertainment of, seamen.

This enterprise was committed to sir Robert Holmes, a very bold and expert man; who, with a number of small vessels very well manned, besides a body of stout foot to land upon occasions, being assisted by the Dutchman, so vigorously assaulted it, that he burned all the Dutch ships lying there, being of inestimable value, all outward bound, and some of them worth above one hundred thousand pounds each ship. They burned likewise the whole town of Schelling; which conflagration, with that of the ships, appearing at the break of day so near Amsterdam, put that place into that consternation that they thought the day of judgment was come, not thinking of their ships there, as being out of the power or reach of any enemy: and no doubt it was the greatest loss that state sustained in the whole war, that is, greater than all the rest. And as this victory, if it can be called a victory when there is no resistance, occasioned great triumph in England, so it raised great thoughts of heart in De Wit, and a resolution of revenge before any peace should be consented to; which they effected to a good degree the next year.

There appeared no more likelihood of the Dutch coming out again: so about the fifteenth of August the generals returned to Southwold Bay, to receive a recruit of men, provisions, and ammunition, having left ships enough upon the coast of Holland to take prizes, and scouts upon the coast to get intelligence in what readiness the enemy's fleet was, and what was done within the land. And about the twenty-seventh a little pink, that waited upon the coast of Zealand, brought notice that the enemy, consisting of about four-score sail of ships, were ready to come out from the Wierings; and the next day they were assured that they were come out and bound westward, by which they concluded that they had hope to join the French fleet. Whereupon the generals gave present orders to unmoor the fleet; and weighing anchor about seven of the clock in the morning stood to sea, and about noon discovered the Dutch fleet about four leagues to the leeward. The generals made all sail towards them: but the enemy stood away for the coast of Flanders, whilst the English were so entangled upon the Galloper-sands, that they could not stand after the enemy till late in the afternoon; so that it was night before they came near each other, and then several guns were fired to little purpose.

The next morning, being the first of September, the season when the winds begin to grow boisterous, they had, upon the breaking of the day, lost the sight of the enemy, and believed that they had bore up in the night for them: but when it was light, they found that they were to the leeward, as far as they could discover, near St. John's Bay beyond Calais. The English pursued them, and making some stay for the fireships, which could not make haste by reason of the blustering weather, it was four in the afternoon before the fleet came up together to them; when De Ruyter made a show as if he would draw off from the shore towards them. But when he saw the English stand with him and advance with their usual resolution, he tacked back again, and stood close in to the shore, where the rest of the fleet was, in the Bay of Staples. And then the night came, and the wind blew so violently, that the English were forced to tack, and many of the ships were forced to the leeward, the night being so foul, that neither the generals nor the chief flags could be discerned. And though the storm continued very violent the next day, a good part of the fleet got again together, and stood to the Bay of Staples, where the Dutch still remained close under the shore at anchor, but could not be invited to come out. So the English found it necessary to stand further out to the sea; and then they discovered the rest of the fleet at a great distance to the leeward, and so bore after them, and at night they all arrived at St. Helen's Point. And though the tempest still increased, a squadron went every day out to the coast of France.

In this tempest the French fleet had a very narrow escape, by a providence they are seldom without. A gentleman of good quality of that nation returned at this time out of England, (whither they repaired with as much liberty and were as kindly treated as if there were no war, whilst no Englishman could be safe there;) and landing at Calais, and finding that the duke of Beaufort was every day expected, he despatched two or three barks to find him, with information how and where the English lay; one of which came so luckily to him towards the evening, that he changed his course, and by the darkness of the night got into the road of Dieppe, where he dropped his anchors. But his vice-admiral, being the biggest and the best ship but one in the fleet, and carrying seventy pieces of cannon, pursuing the course he was directed, in the dark of the night fell amongst the English, as the rest had done if it had not been for that advertisement; and after a little defending himself, which he saw was to no purpose, was taken prisoner, and desired to be brought to prince Rupert, who knew him well, and treated him as a gallant person ought to be, and caused many things which belonged to his own person to be restored to him; and when he was brought into England, he found another kind of reception (though he was prisoner in the Tower) than any of the English, though of the same quality, met with abroad. By this accident the French fleet made a happy state: and the continuance of the storm for many days kept the English and the Dutch from any further engagement. But the same winds, and at the same time, did much more mischief at land than at sea.

It was upon the first day of that September, in the dismal year of 1666, (in which many prodigies were expected, and so many really fell out,) that that memorable and terrible fire brake out in London, which begun about midnight, or nearer the morning of Sunday, in a baker's house at the end of Thames-street next the Tower, there being many little narrow alleys and very poor houses about the place where it first appeared; and then finding such store of combustible materials, as that street is always furnished with in timber-houses, the fire prevailed so powerfully, that that whole street and the neighbourhood was in so short a time turned to ashes, that few persons had time to save and preserve any of their goods; but were a heap of people almost as dead with the sudden distraction, as the ruins were which they sustained. The magistrates of the city assembled quickly together, and with the usual remedies of buckets, which they were provided with: but the fire was too ravenous to be extinguished with such quantities of water as those instruments could apply to it, and fastened still upon new materials before it had destroyed the old. And though it raged furiously all that day, to that degree that all men stood amazed, as spectators only, no man knowing what remedy to apply, nor the magistrates what orders to give; yet it kept within some compass, burned what was next, and laid hold only on both sides; and the greatest apprehension was of the Tower, and all considerations entered upon how to secure that place.

But in the night the wind changed, and carried the danger from thence, but with so great and irresistible violence, that as it kept the English and Dutch fleets from grappling when they were so near each other, so it scattered the fire from pursuing the line it was in with all force, and spread it over the city: so that they, who went late to bed at a great distance from any place where the fire prevailed, were awakened before morning with their own houses being in a flame; and whilst endeavour was used to quench that, other houses were discovered to be burning, which were near no place from whence they could imagine the fire could come; all which kindled another fire in the breasts of men, almost as dangerous as that within their houses.

Monday morning produced first a jealousy, and then an universal conclusion, that this fire came not by chance, nor did they care where it began; but the breaking out in several places at so great distance from each other made it evident, that it was by conspiracy and combination. And this determination could not hold long without discovery of the wicked authors, who were concluded to be all the Dutch and all the French in the town, though they had inhabited the same places above twenty years. All of that kind, or, if they were strangers, of what nation soever, were laid hold of; and after all the ill usage that can consist in words, and some blows and kicks, they were thrown into prison. And shortly after, the same conclusion comprehended all the Roman catholics, the papists, who were in the same predicament of guilt and danger, and quickly found that their only safety consisted in keeping within doors; and yet some of them, and of quality, were taken by force out of their houses, and carried to prison.

When this rage spread as far as the fire, and every hour brought reports of some bloody effects of it, worse than in truth there were, the king distributed many of the privy-council into several quarters of the city, to prevent, by their authorities, those inhumanities which he heard were committed. In the mean time, even they or any other person thought it [not] safe to declare, "that they believed that the fire came by accident, or that it was not a plot of the Dutch and the French and papists to burn the city;" which was so generally believed, and in the best company, that he who said the contrary was suspected for a conspirator, or at best a favourer of them. It could not be conceived, how a house that was distant a mile from any part of the fire could suddenly be in a flame, without some particular malice; and this case fell out every hour. When a man at the furthest end of Bread-street had made a shift to get out of his house his best and most portable goods, because the fire had approached near them; he no sooner had secured them, as he thought, in some friend's house in Holborn, which was believed a safe distance, but he saw that very house, and none else near it, in a sudden flame. Nor did there want, in this woful distemper, the testimony of witnesses who saw this villany committed, and apprehended men who they were ready to swear threw fire-balls into houses, which were presently burning.

The lord Hollis and lord Ashley, who had their quarters assigned about Newgate-market and the streets adjacent, had many brought to them in custody for crimes of this nature; and saw, within a very little distance from the place where they were, the people gathered together in great disorder; and as they came nearer saw a man in the middle of them without a hat or cloak, pulled and hauled and very ill used, whom they knew to be a servant to the Portugal ambassador, who was presently brought to them. And a substantial citizen was ready to take his oath, "that he saw that man put his hand in his pocket, and throw into a shop a fireball; upon which he saw the house immediately on fire: whereupon, being on the other side of the way, and seeing this, he cried out to the people to stop that gentleman, and made all the haste he could himself;" but the people had first seized upon him, and taken away his sword, which he was ready to draw; and he not speaking nor understanding English, they had used him in the manner set down before. The lord Hollis told him what he was accused of, and "that he was seen to have thrown somewhat out of his pocket, which they thought to be a fireball, into a house which was now on fire:" and the people had diligently searched his pockets to find more of the same commodities, but found nothing that they meant to accuse him of. The man standing in great amazement to hear he was so charged, the lord Hollis asked him, "what it was that he pulled out of his pocket, and what it was he threw into the house:" to which he answered, "that he did "not think that he had put his hand into his pocket; but he remembered very well, that as he walked in the street, he saw a piece of bread upon the ground, which he took up, and laid upon a shelf in the next house;" which is a custom or superstition so natural to the Portuguese, that if the king of Portugal were walking, and saw a piece of bread upon the ground, he would take it up with his own hand, and keep it till he saw a fit place to lay it down.

The house being in view, the lords with many of the people walked to it, and found the piece of bread just within the door upon a board, where he said he laid it; and the house on fire was two doors beyond it, which the man who was on the other side of the way, and saw this man put his hand into the house without staying, and presently after the fire break out, concluded to be the same house; which was very natural in the fright that all men were in: nor did the lords, though they were satisfied, set the poor man at liberty; but, as if there remained ground enough of suspicion, committed him to the constable, to be kept by him in his own house for some hours, when they pretended they would examine him again. Nor were any persons who were seized upon in the same manner, as multitudes were in all the parts of the town, especially if they were strangers or papists, presently discharged, when there was no reasonable ground to suspect; but all sent to prison, where they were in much more security than they could have been in full liberty, after they were once known to have been suspected; and most of them understood their commitment to be upon that ground, and were glad of it.

The fire and the wind continued in the same excess all Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday till afternoon, and flung and scattered brands burning into all quarters; the nights more terrible than the days, and the light the same, the light of the fire supplying that of the sun. And indeed whoever was an eyewitness of that terrible prospect, can never have so lively an image of the last conflagration till he beholds it; the faces of all people in a wonderful dejection and discomposure, not knowing where they could repose themselves for one hour's sleep, and no distance thought secure from the fire, which suddenly started up before it was suspected; so that people left their houses and carried away their goods from many places which received no hurt, and whither they afterwards returned again; all the fields full of women and children, who had made a shift to bring thither some goods and conveniences to rest upon, as safer than any houses, where yet they felt such intolerable heat and drought, as if they had been in the middle of the fire. The king and the duke, who rode from one place to another, and put themselves into great dangers amongst the burning and falling houses, to give advice and direction what was to be done, underwent as much fatigue as the meanest, and had as little sleep or rest; and the faces of all men appeared ghastly and in the highest confusion. The country sent in carts to help those miserable people who had saved any goods: and by this means, and the help of coaches, all the neighbour villages were filled with more people than they could contain, and more goods than they could find room for; so that those fields became likewise as full as the other about London and Westminster.

It was observed that where the fire prevailed most, when it met with brick buildings; if it was not repulsed, it was so well resisted that it made a much slower progress; and when it had done its worst, that the timber and all the combustible matter fell, it fell down to the bottom within the house, and the walls stood and enclosed the fire, and it was burned out without making a further progress in many of those places; and then the vacancy so interrupted the fury of it, that many times the two or three next houses stood without much damage. Besides the spreading, inasmuch as all London seemed but one fire in the breadth of it, it seemed to continue in its full fury a direct line to the Thames side, all Cheapside from beyond the Exchange, through Fleet-street; inasmuch as for that breadth, taking in both sides as far as the Thames, there was scarce a house or church standing from the bridge to Dorset-house, which was burned on Tuesday night after Baynard's-castle.

On Wednesday morning, when the king saw that neither the fire decreased nor the wind lessened, he even despaired of preserving Whitehall, but was more afraid of Westminster-abbey. But having observed by his having visited all places, that where there were any vacant places between the houses, by which the progress of the fire was interrupted, it changed its course and went to the other side; he gave order for pulling down many houses about Whitehall, some whereof were newly built and hardly finished, and sent many of his choice goods by water to Hampton-Court; as most of the persons of quality in the Strand, who had the benefit of the river, got barges and other vessels, and sent their furniture for their houses to some houses some miles out of the town. And very many on both sides the Strand, who knew not whither to go, and scarce what they did, fled with their families out of their houses into the streets, that they might not be within when the fire fell upon their houses.

But it pleased God, contrary to all expectation, that on Wednesday, about four or five of the clock in the afternoon, the wind fell: and as in an instant the fire decreased, having burned all on the Thames side to the new buildings of the Inner Temple next to White-friars, and having consumed them, was stopped by that vacancy from proceeding further into that house; but laid hold on some old buildings which joined to Ram-alley, and swept all those into Fleet-street. And the other side being likewise destroyed to Fetter-lane, it advanced no further; but left the other part of Fleet-street to the Temple-bar, and all the Strand, unhurt, but what damage the owners of the houses had done to themselves by endeavouring to remove; and it ceased in all other parts of the town near the same time: so that the greatest care then was, to keep good guards to watch the fire that was upon the ground, that it might not break out again. And this was the better performed, because they who had yet their houses standing had not the courage to sleep, but watched with much less distraction; though the same distemper still remained in the utmost extent, "that all this had fallen out by the conspiracy of the French and Dutch with the papists;" and all gaols were filled with those who were every hour apprehended upon that jealousy; or rather upon some evidence that they were guilty of the crime.

And the people were so sottish, that they believed that all the French in the town (which no doubt were a very great number) were drawn into a body, to prosecute those by the sword who were preserved from the fire: and the inhabitants of a whole street have ran in a great tumult one way, upon the rumour that the French were marching at the other end of it; so terrified men were with their own apprehensions.

When the night, though far from being a quiet one, had somewhat lessened the consternation, the first care the king took was, that the country might speedily supply markets in all places, that they who had saved themselves from burning might not be in danger of starving; and if there had not been extraordinary care and diligence used, many would have perished that way. The vast destruction of corn, and all other sorts of provisions, in those parts where the fire had prevailed, had not only left all that people destitute of all that was to be eat or drank; but the bakers and brewers, which inhabited the other parts which were unhurt, had forsaken their houses, and carried away all that was portable: insomuch as many days passed, before they were enough in their wits and in their houses to fall to their occupations; and those parts of the town which God had spared and preserved were many hours without any thing to eat, as well as they who were in the fields. And yet it can hardly be conceived, how great a supply of all kinds was brought from all places within four and twenty hours. And which was more miraculous, in four days, in all the fields about the town, which had seemed covered with those whose habitations were burned, and with the goods which they had saved, there was scarce a man to be seen: all found shelter in so short a time, either in those parts which remained of the city and in the suburbs, or in the neighbour villages; all kind of people expressing a marvellous charity towards those who appeared to be undone. And very many, with more expedition than can be conceived, set up little sheds of brick and timber upon the ruins of their own houses, where they chose rather to inhabit than in more convenient places, though they knew they could not long reside in those new buildings.

The king was not more troubled at any particular, than at the imagination which possessed the hearts of so many, that all this mischief had fallen out by a real and formed conspiracy; which, albeit he saw no colour to believe, he found very many intelligent men, and even some of his own council, who did really believe it. Whereupon he appointed the privy-council to sit both morning and evening, to examine all evidence of that kind that should be brought before them, and to send for any persons who had been committed to prison upon some evidence that made the greatest noise; and sent for the lord chief justice, who was in the country, to come to the town for the better examination of all suggestions and allegations of that kind, there having been some malicious report scattered about the town, "that the court had so great a prejudice against any kind of testimony of such a conspiracy, that they discountenanced all witnesses who came before them to testify what they knew;" which was without any colour of truth. Yet many, who were produced as if their testimony would remove all doubts, made such senseless relations of what they had been told, without knowing the condition of the persons who told them, or where to find them, that it was a hard matter to forbear smiling at their evidence. Some Frenchmen's houses had been searched, in which had been found many of those shells for squibs and other fireworks, frequently used in nights of joy and triumph; and the men were well known, and had lived many years there by that trade, and had no other: and one of these was the king's servant, and employed by the office of ordnance for making grenades of all kinds, as well for the hand as for mortarpieces. Yet these men were looked upon as in the number of the conspirators, and remained still in prison till their neighbours solicited for their liberty. And it cannot be enough wondered at, that in this general rage of the people no mischief was done to the strangers, that no one of them was assassinated outright, though many were sorely beaten and bruised.

There was a very odd accident that confirmed many in what they were inclined to believe, and startled others, who thought the conspiracy impossible, since no combination not very discernible and discovered could have effected that mischief, in which the immediate hand of God was so visible. Amongst many Frenchmen who had been sent to Newgate, there was one Hubert, a young man of five or six and twenty years of age, the son of a famous watchmaker in the city of Roan; and this fellow had wrought in the same profession with several men in London, and had for many years, both in Roan and in London, been looked upon as distracted. This man confessed "that he had set the first house on fire, and that he had been hired in Paris a year before to do it: that there were three more combined with him to do the same thing; and that they came over together into England to put it in execution in the time of the plague: but when they were in London, he and two of his companions went into Sweden, and returned from thence in the latter end of August, and he resolved to undertake it; and that the two others went away into France."

The whole examination was so senseless, that the chief justice, who was not looked upon as a man who wanted rigour, did not believe any thing he said. He was asked, "who it was in Paris that suborned him to this action?" to which he answered, "that he did not know, having never seen him before;" and in the enlarging upon that point he contradicted himself in many particulars. Being asked "what money he had received to perform a service of so much hazard," he said, "he had received but a pistole, but was promised five pistoles more when he should have done his work;" and many such unreasonable things, that nobody present credited any thing he said. However, they durst not slight the evidence, but put him to a particular, in which he so fully confirmed all that he had said before, that they were surprised with wonder, and knew not afterwards what to say or think. They asked him, "if he knew the place where he first put fire?" he answered, "that he knew it very well, and would shew it to any body." Upon this the chief justice, and many aldermen who sat with him, sent a guard of substantial citizens with the prisoner, that he might shew them the house; and they first led him to a place at some distance from it, and asked him "if that were it:" to which he answered presently, "No, it was lower, nearer to 'the Thames.'" The house and all which were near it were so covered and buried in ruins, that the owners themselves, without some infallible mark, could very hardly have said where his own house had stood: but this man led them directly to the place, described how it stood, the shape of the little yard, the fashion of the door and windows, and where he first put the fire; and all this with such exactness, that they who had dwelt long near it could not so perfectly have described all particulars.

This silenced all further doubts. And though the chief justice told the king, "that all his discourse was so disjointed that he did not believe 'him guilty,'" nor was there one man who prosecuted or accused him: yet upon his own confession, and so sensible a relation of all that he had done, accompanied with so many circumstances, (without the least show of compunction or sorrow for what he said he had done, nor yet seeming to justify or to take delight in it; but being asked whether he was not sorry for the wickedness, and whether he intended to do so much, he gave no answer at all, or made reply to what was said; and with the same temper died,) the jury found him guilty, and he was executed accordingly. And though no man could imagine any reason why a man should so desperately throw away his life, which he might have saved though he had been guilty, since he was only accused upon his own confession; yet neither the judges nor any present at the trial did believe him guilty, but that he was a poor distracted wretch, weary of his life, and chose to part with it this way. Certain it is, that upon the strictest examination that could be afterwards made by the king's command, and then by the diligence of the house, that upon the general jealousy and rumour made a committee, that was very diligent and solicitous to make that discovery, there was never any probable evidence (that poor creature's only excepted) that there was any other cause of that woful fire, than the displeasure of God Almighty: the first accident of the beginning in a baker's house, where there was so great a stock of fagots, and the neighbourhood of much combustible matter, of pitch and rosin and the like, that led it in an instant from house to house through Thames-street, with the agitation of so terrible a wind to scatter and disperse it.

Let the cause be what it would, the effect was very terrible; for above two parts of three of that great city were burned to ashes, and those the most rich and wealthy parts of the city, where the greatest warehouses and the best shops stood. The Royal Exchange, with all the streets about it, Lombard-street, Cheapside, Paternoster-row, St. Paul's church, and almost all the other churches in the city, with the Old Bailey, Ludgate, all Paul's churchyard even to the Thames, and the greatest part of Fleet-street, all which were places the best inhabited, were all burned without one house remaining.

The value or estimate of what that devouring fire consumed, over and above the houses, could never be computed in any degree: for besides that the first night (which in a moment swept away the vast wealth of Thames-street) there was [not] anything that could be preserved in respect of the suddenness and amazement, (all people being in their beds till the fire was in their houses, and so could save nothing but themselves,) the next day with the violence of the wind increased the distraction; nor did many believe that the fire was near them, or that they had reason to remove their goods, till it was upon them, and rendered it impossible. Then it fell out at a season in the year, the beginning of September, when very many of the substantial citizens and other wealthy men were in the country, whereof many had not left a servant in their houses, thinking themselves upon all ordinary accidents more secure in the goodness and kindness of their neighbours, than they could be in the fidelity of a servant; and whatsoever was in such houses was entirely consumed by the fire, or lost as to the owners. And of this classis of absent men, when the fire came where the lawyers had houses, as they had in many places, especially Sergeants-Inn in Fleet-street, with that part of the Inner Temple that was next it and White-friars, there was scarce a man to whom those lodgings appertained who was in Town: so that whatsoever was there, their money, books, and papers, besides the evidences of many men's estates deposited in their hands, were all burned or lost, to a very great value. But of particular men's losses could never be made any computation.

It was an incredible damage that was and might rationally be computed to be sustained by one small company, the company of stationers, in books, paper, and the other lesser commodities which are vendible in that corporation, which amounted to no less than two hundred thousand pounds: in which prodigious loss there was one circumstance very lamentable. All those who dwelt near Paul's carried their goods, books, paper, and the like, as others of greater trades did their commodities, into the large vaults which were under St. Paul's church, before the fire came thither: which vaults, though all the church above the ground was afterwards burned, with all the houses round about, still stood firm and supported the foundation, and preserved all that was within them; until the impatience of those who had lost their houses, and whatsoever they had else, in the fire, made them very desirous to see what they had [saved], upon which all their hopes were founded to repair the rest.

It was the fourth day after the fire ceased to flame, though it still burned in the ruins, from whence there was still an intolerable heat, when the booksellers especially, and some other tradesmen, who had deposited all they had preserved in the greatest and most spacious vault, came to behold all their wealth, which to that moment was safe: but the doors were no sooner opened, and the air from without fanned the strong heat within, but first the driest and most combustible matters broke into a flame, which consumed all, of what kind soever, that till then had been unhurt there. Yet they who had committed their goods to some lesser vaults, at a distance from that greater, had better fortune; and having learned from the second ruin of their friends to have more patience, attended till the rain fell, and extinguished the fire in all places, and cooled the air: and then they securely opened the doors, and received all from thence that they had there.

If so vast a damage as two hundred thousand pounds befell that little company of stationers in books and paper and the like, what shall we conceive was lost in cloth, (of which the country clothiers lost all that they had brought up to Blackwell-hall against Michaelmas, which was all burned with that fair structure,) in silks of all kinds, in linen, and those richer manufactures? Not to speak of money, plate, and jewels, whereof some were recovered out of the ruins of those houses which the owners took care to watch, as containing somewhat that was worth the looking for, and in which deluge there were men ready enough to fish.

The lord mayor, though a very honest man, was much blamed for want of sagacity in the first night of the fire, before the wind gave it much advancement: for though he came with great diligence as soon as he had notice of it, and was present with the first, yet having never been used to such spectacles, his consternation was equal to that of other men, nor did he know how to apply his authority to the remedying the present distress; and when men who were less terrified with the object pressed him very earnestly, "that he would give order for the present pulling down those houses which were nearest, and by which the fire climbed to go further," (the doing whereof at that time might probably have prevented much of the mischief that succeeded,) he thought it not safe counsel, and made no other answer, "than that he durst not do it without the consent of the owners." His want of skill was the less wondered at, when it was known afterwards, that some gentlemen of the Inner Temple would not endeavour to preserve the goods which were in the lodgings of absent persons, nor suffer others to do it, "because," they said, "it was against the law to break up any man's chamber."

The so sudden repair of those formidable ruins, and the giving so great beauty to all deformity, (a beauty and a lustre that city had never before been acquainted with,) is little less wonderful than the fire that consumed it.

It was hoped and expected that this prodigious and universal calamity, for the effects of it covered the whole kingdom, would have made impression, and produced some reformation in the license of the court: for as the pains the king had taken night and day during the fire, and the dangers he had exposed himself to, even for the saving the citizens' goods, had been very notorious, and in the mouths of all men, with good wishes and prayers for him; so his majesty had been heard during that time to speak with great piety and devotion of the displeasure that God was provoked to. And no doubt the deep sense of it did raise many good thoughts and purposes in his royal breast. But he was narrowly watched and looked to, that such melancholic [thoughts] might not long possess him, the consequence and effect whereof was like to be more grievous than that of the fire itself; of which that loose company that was too much cherished, even before it was extinguished, discoursed as of an argument for mirth and wit to describe the wildness of the confusion all people were in; in which the scripture itself was used with equal liberty, when they could apply it to their profane purposes. And Mr. May presumed to assure the king, "that this was the greatest blessing that God had "ever conferred upon him, his restoration only excepted: for the walls and gates being now burned and thrown down of that rebellious city, which was always an enemy to the crown, his majesty would never suffer them to repair and build them up again, to be a bit in his mouth and a bridle upon his neck; but would keep all open, that his troops might enter upon them whenever he thought necessary for his service, there being no other way to govern that rude multitude but by force."

This kind of discourse did not please the king, but was highly approved by the company; and for the wit and pleasantness of it was repeated in all companies, infinitely to the king's disservice, and corrupted the affections of the citizens and of the country, who used and assumed the same liberty to publish the profaneness and atheism of the court. And as nothing was done there in private, so it was made more public in pasquils and libels, which were as bold with reflections of the broadest nature upon the king himself, and upon those in whose company he was most delighted, as upon the meanest person.

All men of virtue and sobriety, of which there were very many in the king's family, were grieved and heartbroken with hearing what they could not choose but hear, and seeing many things which they could not avoid the seeing. There were few of the council that did not to one another lament the excesses, which must in time be attended with fatal consequences, and for the present did apparently lessen the reverence to the king, that is the best support of his royalty: but few of them had the courage to say that to his majesty, which was not so fit to be said to any body else. Nor can it be denied, that his majesty did, upon all occasions, receive those advertisements from those who presented them to him, with patience and benignity, and without the least show of displeasure; though the persons concerned endeavoured no one thing more than to persuade him, "that it was the highest presumption imaginable in the privy-council to believe, that they had any jurisdiction in the court, or ought to censure the manners of it."

Nor were all those endeavours without making some impression upon his majesty, who rather esteemed some particular members of it, than was inclined to believe that the body of it ought to receive a reverence from the people, or be looked upon as a vital part of the government: in which his majesty (as hath been often said before) by the ill principles he had received in France, and the accustomed liberty of his bedchamber, was exceedingly and unhappily mistaken. For by the constitution of the kingdom, and the very laws and customs of the nation, as the privy-council and every member of it is of the king's sole choice and election of him to that trust, (for the greatest office in the state, though conferred likewise by the king himself, doth not qualify the officer to be of the privy-council, or to be present in it, before by a new assignation that honour is bestowed on him, and that he be sworn of the council;) so the body of it is the most sacred, and hath the greatest authority in the government of the state, next the person of the king himself, to whom all other powers are equally subject: and no king of England can so well secure his own just prerogative, or preserve it from violation, as by a strict defending and supporting the dignity of his privy-council.

When it was too much taken notice of, that the king himself had not that esteem or consideration of the council that was due to it, what they did or ordered to be done was less valued by the people; and that disrespect every day improved by the want of gravity and justice and constancy in the proceedings there, the resolutions of one day being reversed or altered the next, either upon some whispers in the king's ear, or some new fancy in some of those counsellors, who were always of one mind against all former orders and precedents; the pride and insolent humour of sir William Coventry taking not so much delight in any thing, as to cross and oppose whatsoever the chancellor or the treasurer advised, and to reverse what had been ordered upon that ground. And though he had sucked his milk at the charge of the law, no man was so professed an enemy to it and to the professors of it, and shewed so little respect to any thing passed and granted under the great seal of England, but spake against it with the same confidence as if it had been a common scroll of no signification; which kind of behaviour in a person unqualified by any office to speak much in such an assembly, as it had never been accustomed, so it would have found much reprehension there, if it had not been for respect to the duke, and if the king himself had not very often declared himself to be of his opinion, even in particulars which himself had caused to be proposed to a contrary purpose.

One day his majesty called the chancellor to him, and complained very much of the license that was assumed in the coffeehouses, which were the places where the boldest calumnies and scandals were raised, and discoursed amongst a people who knew not each other, and came together only for that communication, and from thence were propagated over the kingdom; and mentioned some particular rumours which had been lately dispersed from those fountains, which on his own behalf he was enough displeased with, and asked him what was to be done in it.

The chancellor concurred with him in the sense of the scandal, and the mischief that must attend the impunity of such places, where the foulest imputations were laid upon the government, which were held lawful to be reported and divulged to every body but to the magistrates, who might examine and punish them; of which there having yet been no precedent, people generally believed that those houses had a charter of privilege to speak what they would, without being in danger to be called in question: and "that it was high time for his majesty to apply some remedy to such a growing disease, and to reform the understanding of those who believed that no remedy could be applied to it. That it would be fit, either by a proclamation to forbid all persons to resort to those houses, and so totally to suppress them; or to employ some spies, who, being present in the conversation, might be ready to charge and accuse the persons who had talked with most license in a subject that would bear a complaint; upon which the proceedings might be in such a manner, as would put an end to the confidence that was only mischievous in those meetings." The king liked both the expedients, and thought that the last could not justly be made use of till the former should give fair warning; and commanded him to propose it that same day in council, that some order might be given in it.

The chancellor proposed it, as he was required, with such arguments as were like to move with men who knew the inconveniences which arose from those places; and the king himself mentioned it with passion, as derogatory to the government, and directed that the attorney might prepare a proclamation for the suppression of those houses, in which the board seemed to agree: when sir William Coventry, who had been heard within few days before to inveigh with much fierceness against the permission of so much seditious prattle in the impunity of those houses, stood up and said, "that coffee was a commodity that yielded the king a good revenue, and therefore it would not be just to receive the duties and inhibit the sale of it, which many men found to be very good for their health," as if it might not be bought and drank but in those licentious meetings. "That it had been permitted in Cromwell's time, and that the king's friends had used more liberty of speech in those places than they durst do in any other; and that he thought it would be better to leave them as they were, without running the hazard of ill being continued, notwithstanding his command to the contrary." And upon these reasons his majesty was converted, and declined any further debate; which put the chancellor very much out of countenance, nor knew he how to behave himself.

The truth is, he had a very hard province, and found his credit every day to decay with the king; whilst they who prevailed against him used all the skill and cunning they had to make it believed, "that his power with his majesty was as great as it had ever been, and that all those things which he most opposed were acted by his advice." And whilst they procured all those for whom he had kindness, or who professed any respect towards him, to be discountenanced and undervalued, and preferred none but such who were known to have an aversion for him upon somewhat that he had, or they had been told that he had, obstructed their pretences in; they persuaded men, "that nobody had any credit with the king to dispose of any place but he."

Those very men would often profess to him, "that they were so much afflicted at the king's course of life, that they even despaired that he would be able to master those difficulties which would still press him;" and would then tell him some particulars which he himself had said or done, or had been said or done lately in his own presence, and of which he had never heard before; which gave him occasion often to blame them, "that they, having the opportunity to see and know many things which he had no notice of or could not take any, and foresaw the consequence that did attend them, did yet forbear to use the credit they had with his majesty, in advertising him what they thought and heard all others say;" and he offered "to go with them to his majesty, and make a lively representation to him of the great decay of his reputation with the people upon his exorbitant excesses, which God could never bless:" to all which they were not ashamed to confess, "that "they never had nor durst speak to his majesty "to that purpose, or in such a dialect." Indeed they were the honestest men in not doing it, for it had been gross hypocrisy to have found fault with those actions, upon the pursuing whereof they most depended; and the reformation which they would have been glad to have seen, had no relation to those inordinate and unlawful appetites, which were the root from whence all the other mischiefs had their birth. They did not wish that the lady's authority and power should be lessened, much less extinguished; and that which would have been the most universal blessing to the whole kingdom, would have been received by them as the greatest curse that could befall them.

One day the chancellor and the lord Arlington were together alone, and the secretary, according to his custom, was speaking soberly of many great miscarriages by the license of the court, and how much his majesty suffered thereby; when the king suddenly came into the room to them, and after he was sat asked them what they were talking of: to which the chancellor answered, "that he would tell him honestly and truly, "and was not sorry for the opportunity." And the other looking with a very troubled countenance, he proceeded and said, "that they were "speaking of his majesty, and, as they did frequently, were bewailing the unhappy life he "lived, both with respect to himself, who, by the "excess of pleasures which he indulged to himself, was indeed without the true delight and "relish of any; and in respect to his government, which he totally neglected, and of which "the kingdom was so sensible, that it could not "be long before he felt the ill effects of it. That "the people were well prepared and well inclined "to obey; but if they found that he either would "not or could not command, their temper would "quickly be changed, and he would find less "obedience in all places, than was necessary for "his affairs: and that it was too evident and "visible, that he had already lost very much of "the affection and reverence the nation had for "him."

He said, "that this was the subject they two "were discoursing upon when his majesty entered; and that it is the argument, upon which "all those of his council with whom he had any "conversation did every day enlarge, when they "were together, with grief of heart, and even "with tears; and that he hoped that some of "them did, with that duty that became them, "represent to his majesty their own sense, and "the sense his good subjects had, of his condition of living, both with reference to God, who "had wrought such miracles for him, and expected some proportionable return; and with "reference to his people, who were in the highest "discontent. He doubted all men did not discharge their duty this way; and some had confessed to him that they durst not do it, lest they might offend him, which he had assured them often that they would not do, having had "so often experience himself of his goodness; "and that he had the rather taken this opportunity to make this representation to him in "the presence of another, which he had never used to do:" and concluded "with beseeching "his majesty to believe that which he had often "said to him, that no prince could be more "miserable, nor could have more reason to fear "his own ruin, than he who hath no servants "who dare contradict him in his opinions, or "advise him against his inclinations, how natural "soever."

The king heard all this and more to the same effect with his usual temper, (for he was a patient hearer,) and spake sensibly, as if he thought that much that had been said was with too much reason; when the other, who wished not such an effect from the discourse, instead of seconding any thing that had been said, made use of the warmth the chancellor was in, and of some expressions he had used, to fall into railery, which was his best faculty; with which he diverted the king from any further serious reflections; and both of them grew very merry with the other, and reproached his overmuch severity, now he grew old, and considered not the infirmities of younger men: which increased the passion he was in, and provoked him to say, "that it was "observed abroad, that it was a faculty very "much improved of late in the court, to laugh "at those arguments they could not answer, and "which would always be requited with the same "mirth amongst those who were enemies to it, "and therefore it was pity that it should be so "much embraced by those who pretended to be "friends;" and to use some other, too plain, expressions, which it may be were not warily enough used, and which the good lord forgot not to put the king in mind of, and to descend upon the presumption, in a season that was more ripe for such reflections, which at the present he forbore to do, and for some time after remembered only in merry occasions.

Though the king did not yet, nor in a good time after, appear to dislike the liberty the chancellor presumed to take with him, (who often told him, "that he knew he made himself grievous to "him, and gave his enemies too great advantages "against him; but that the conscience of having "done his duty, and having never failed to inform his majesty of any thing that was fit for "him to know and to believe, was the only support he had to bear the present trouble of his "mind, and to prepare him for those distresses "which he foresaw he was to undergo:" which his majesty heard with great goodness and condescension, and vouchsafed still to tell him, "that "it was in nobody's power to divert his kindness "from him:") yet he found every day that some arguments grew less acceptable to him, and that the constant conversation with men of great profaneness, whose wit consisted in abusing scripture, and in repeating and acting what the preachers said in their sermons, and turning it into ridicule, (a faculty in which the duke of Buckingham excelled,) did much lessen the natural esteem and reverence he had for the clergy, as a rank of men that compounded a religion for their own advantage, and to serve their own turns. Nor was all he could say to him of weight enough to make impression to the contrary.

And then he seemed to think, "that men were "bolder in the examining his actions and censuring them than they ought to be:" and once he told him, "that he thought he was more severe "against common infirmities than he should be; "and that his wife was not courteous in return"ing visits and civilities to those who paid her respect; and that he expected that all his friends should be very kind to those who they knew were much loved by him, and that he thought so much justice was due to him."

The chancellor, who had never dissembled with him, but on the contrary had always endeavoured to persuade him to believe, that dissimulation was the most dishonest and ungentelemanly quality that could be affected, answered him very roundly, "that he might seem not to understand his meaning, and so make no reply to the discourse he had made: but that he understood it all, and the meaning of every word of it; and therefore that it would not become him to suffer his majesty to depart with an opinion, that what he had said would produce any alteration in his behaviour towards him, or reformation of his manners towards any other persons."

"That for the first part, the liberty men took to speak of him and to censure his actions, he was of the opinion that it was a very great presumption, and a crime very fit to be punished: for let it be true or false, men had been always severely chastised for that license, because it tended to sedition. However, he put his majesty in mind of the example of Philip of Macedon, who, when one of his servants accused a person of condition to him of having spoken ill of him, and offered to go himself to the magistrate and make proof of it, answered him; that the person he accused was a man of the greatest reputation of wisdom and integrity in the kingdom, and therefore it would be fit in the first place to examine, whether himself, the king, had not done somewhat by which he had deserved to be so spoken of: indeed this way the best men would often receive benefit from their worst enemies. For the matter itself," he said, "he need make no apology: for that it was notoriously known, that he had constantly given it in charge to all the judges, to make diligent inquiry into misdemeanours and transgressions of that magnitude, and to punish those who were guilty in the most exemplary manner; and that he took not more pains any way, than to preserve in the hearts of the people that veneration for his person that is due to his dignity, and to persuade many who appeared afflicted with the reports they heard, that they heard more than was true; and that the suppressing all reports of that kind was the duty of every good subject, and would contribute more towards the reforming any thing that in truth is amiss, than the propagating the scandal by spreading it in discourses could do. However, that all this, which was his duty, and but his duty, did not make it unfit for him, or any other under his obligations, in fit seasons to make a lively representation to his majesty of what is done, and how secretly soever, that cannot be justified or excused; and of the untruths and scandals which spring from thence to his irreparable dishonour and prejudice."

"For the other part, of want of ceremony and respect to those who were loved and esteemed by his majesty, he might likewise avoid enlarging upon that subject, by putting his majesty in mind, that he had the honour to serve him in a province that excused him from making visits, and exempted him from all ceremonies

"of that kind. But he would not shelter himself under such a general defence, when he perceived that his majesty had in the reprehension a particular intention: and therefore he confessed ingenuously to his majesty, that he did deny himself many liberties, which in themselves might be innocent enough and agreeable to his person, because they would not be decent or agreeable to the office he held, which obliged him, for his majesty's honour, and to preserve him from the reproach of having put a light person into a grave place, to have the more care of his own carriage and behaviour. And that, as it would reflect upon his majesty himself, if his chancellor was known or thought to be of dissolute and debauched manners, which would make him as incapable as unworthy to do him service; so it would be a blemish and taint upon him to give any countenance, or to pay more than ordinary, cursory, and unavoidable civilities, to persons infamous for any vice, for which by the laws of God and man they ought to be odious, and to be exposed to the judgment of the church and state. And that he would not for his own sake and for his own dignity, to how low a condition soever he might be reduced, stoop to such a condescension as to have the least commerce, or to make the application of a visit, to any such person, for any benefit or advantage that it might bring to him. He did beseech his majesty not to believe, that he hath a prerogative to declare vice virtue; or to qualify any person who lives in a sin and avows it, against which God himself hath pronounced damnation, for the company and conversation of innocent and worthy persons. And that whatever low obedience, which was in truth gross flattery, some people might pay to what they believed would be grateful to his majesty, they had in their hearts a perfect detestation of the persons they made address to: and that for his part he was long resolved that his wife should not be one of those courtiers; and that he would himself much less like her company, if she put herself into theirs who had not the same innocence."

The king was not the more pleased for the defence he made, and did not dissemble his dislike of it, without any other sharpness, than by telling him "that he was in the wrong, and had an understanding different from all other men who had experience in the world." And it is most certain, it was an avowed doctrine, and with great address daily insinuated to the king, "that princes had many liberties which private persons have not; and that a lady of honour who dedicates herself only to please a king, and continues faithful to him, ought not to be branded with any name or mark of infamy, but hath been always looked upon by all persons well-bred as worthy of respect:" and to this purpose the history of all the amours of his grandfather were carefully presented to him, and with what indignation he suffered any disrespect towards any of his mistresses.

But of all these artifices the chancellor had no apprehension, out of the confidence he had in the integrity of the king's nature; and that though he might be swayed to sacrifice his present affections to his appetite, he could never be prevailed upon to entertain a real suspicion of his very passionate affection and duty to his person. That which gave him most trouble, and many times made him wish himself in any private condition separated from the court, was that unfixedness and irresolution of judgment that was natural to all his family of the male line, which often exposed them all to the importunities of bold, and to the snares of crafty, men.

One day the king and the duke came to the chancellor together; and the king told him with a very visible trouble in his countenance, "that they were come to confer and advise with him upon an affair of importance, which exceedingly disquieted them both. That Dick Talbot" (which was the familiar appellation, according to the ill custom of the court, that most men gave him) "had a resolution to assassinate the duke of Ormond. That he had sworn in the presence of two or three persons of honour, that he would do it in the revenge of some injuries which, he pretended, he had done his majesty: that he had much rather fight with him, which he knew the duke would be willing enough to do; but that he should never be able to bring to pass; and therefore he would take his revenge in any way that should offer itself. And every body knew that the man had courage and wickedness enough to attempt any think like it. That the duke of Ormond knew well enough that the fellow threatened it, and was like enough to act it; but that he thought it below him to apprehend it; and that his majesty came to the notice of it by the earl of Clancarty, to whom sir Robert Talbot, the elder brother of the other, told it, to the end that the earl might give the duke notice of it, and find some way to prevent it; and the earl had that day informed the king of it, as the best way he could think of to prevent it." His majesty said, "there remained no doubt to be made of the truth of it; for there were two or three more of unquestionable credit who had heard him use the same expressions: and that he had first spoken with his brother, whose servant he was, whom he found equally incensed as himself; and that they came immediately together to consult with him what was to be done."

The chancellor knew all the brothers well, and was believed to have too much prejudice to them all. They were all of an Irish family, but of ancient English extraction, which had always inhabited within that circle that was called the Pale; which, being originally an English plantation, was in so many hundred years for the most part degenerated into the manners of the Irish, and rose and mingled with them in the late rebellion: and of this family there were two distinct families, who had competent estates, and lived in many descents in the rank of gentlemen of quality; and those brothers were all the sons, or the grandsons, of one who was a judge in Ireland, and esteemed a learned man. The eldest was sir Robert Talbot, who was by much the best; that is, the rest were much worse men: a man, whom the duke of Ormond most esteemed of those who had been in rebellion, as one who had less malice than most of the rest, and had recommended to the king as a person fit for his favour. But because he did not ask all on his behalf, which he must have done for a man entirely innocent, this refusal was looked upon as the highest disobligation.

The second brother was a Jesuit, who had been very troublesome to the king abroad, and had behaved himself in so insolent a manner, that his majesty had forbidden him his court; after which he went into England, and applied himself to the ruling power there, and was by that sent into Spain, at the time when the treaty was at Fuentarabia between the two crowns, to procure that England might be included in that peace, and the king excluded, and not to be suffered to remain in Flanders. Of all which his majesty having advertisement, sent positive orders to sir Harry Bennet his resident then in Madrid to complain of him, and to desire don Lewis de Haro, that he might receive no countenance in that court. But the Jesuit had better and more powerful recommendation; and was not only welcome there, but (which was very strange, considering his talent of understanding) in a short time got so much interest in the resident, that he received him into all kind of familiarity and trust, and undertook to reconcile the king to him, and was as good as his word: and from the time of his majesty's return, or rather from the return of sir Harry Bennet, he was as much and as busy in the court as if he were a domestic servant. And after the queen came to Whitehall, he was admitted one of her almoners; and walked with the same or more freedom in the king's house (and in clergy habit) than any of his majesty's chaplains did; who did not presume to be seen in the galleries and other reserved rooms, where he was conversant with the same confidence as if he were of the bedchamber.

The third brother was Gilbert, who was [called] Colonel Talbot, from some command he had with the rebels against the king. And he had likewise been with the king in Flanders, that is, had lived in Antwerp and Brussels whilst the king was there; and being a half-witted fellow did not meddle with any thing nor angered any body, but found a way to get good clothes and to play, and was looked upon as a man of courage, having fought a duel or two with stout men.

The fourth brother was a Franciscan friar, of wit enough, but of so notorious debauchery, that he was frequently under severe discipline by the superiors of his order for his scandalous life, which made him hate his habit, and take all opportunities to make journeys into England and Ireland: but not being able to live there, he was forced to return and put on his abhorred habit, which he always called his "fool's coat," and came seldom into those places where he was known, and so wandered into Germany and Flanders, and took all opportunities to be in the places where the king was; and so he came to Cologne and Brussels and Bruges, and being a merry fellow, was the more made of for laughing at and contemning his brother the Jesuit, who had not so good natural parts, though by his education he had more sobriety, and lived without scandal in his manners. He went by the name of Tom Talbot, and after the king's return was in London in his man's clothes, (as he called them,) with the natural license of an Irish friar, (which are a people, for the most part, of the whole creation the most sottish and the most brutal,) and against his obedience, and all orders of his superiors, who interdicted him to say mass.

The fifth brother was this Dick Talbot, who gave the king and the duke the trouble mentioned before. He was brought into Flanders first by Daniel O'Neile, as one who was willing to assassinate Cromwell; and he made a journey into England with that resolution not long before his death, and after it returned into Flanders ready to do all that he should be required. He was a very handsome young man, wore good clothes, and [was] without doubt of a clear, ready courage, which was virtue enough to recommend a man to the duke's good opinion; which, with more expedition than could be expected, he got to that degree, that he was made of his bedchamber; and, from that qualification, embarked himself after the king's return in the pretences of the Irish, with such an unusual confidence, and upon private contracts with very scandalous circumstances, that the chancellor had sometimes at the council-table been obliged to give him severe reprehensions, and often desired the duke to withdraw his countenance from him. He had likewise declared very loudly against the Jesuit, and, though he had made many addresses unto him by letters and by some friends who had credit with him, would never, from the time of the king's return, be persuaded to speak with him, and had once prevailed with the king so far, that he was forbid to come to the court; but he had a friend, who after some time got that restraint off again. The chancellor had likewise observed the friar to be too frequently in the galleries, and sometimes drunk there, and caused him to be forbid to come into the court: and the eldest brother, towards whom he had rather kindness than prejudice, finding many obstructions in his pretences, was persuaded to think him not his friend. And so he got the reproach of being an enemy to the whole family.

This consideration did really affect the chancellor, so that he appeared more reserved and more wary in this particular proposed by the king and by the duke, than he used to be. He said, "that in many respects he was not so fit to advise in this particular as other men were. Though this man's behaviour was so scandalous that it deserved exemplary punishment, yet he did not conceive any present danger from it: that he would deny it and repent it, and give any other satisfaction that would be required or assigned; and then his majesty and the duke would be prevailed with to take off their displeasure; and therefore not to make such a matter public, which, considering the person and the circumstances, would make a deep impression upon the minds of all wise men; than, after the world takes notice of it, to pass it over with a light and ordinary punishment." The king interrupted him as he was going on, and told him, "there was no danger of that, and that he would deal freely with him. That as the offence was in itself unpardonable, so he and his brother were resolved to take this opportunity and occasion to free themselves from the importunity of the whole family: that all the brothers were naughty fellows, and had no good meaning." And thereupon his majesty enlarged with much sharpness upon the Jesuit and friar, with charges upon both very weighty and unanswerable; and the duke upon this man who was the subject of the debate: and both concluded, "that they should be in great ease by the absence of all "of them, which should be enjoined as soon as a resolution should be taken in this particular."

The chancellor knew that there was somewhat else, which was not so fit to be mentioned, that had offended them both as much; and thought he had reason to believe that they would be both resolute in the punishment, and that they had deliberated it too long to depart from the prosecution. He therefore advised, "that the gentleman should be presently apprehended and examined upon the words, which some witness should be ready to affirm: and that thereupon he should be sent to the Tower, and the next day that his majesty should inform the privy-council of the whole, which without question would give direction to his attorney general to prosecute this foul misdemeanour in such a manner, that should put this gentleman in such a condition, that he should not trouble the court with his attendance; and other men should by his example find, that their tongues are not their own, to be employed according to their own malicious pleasures."

The person was the same night sent to the Tower; and both the king and the duke declared themselves, in the presence of their servants and many others, to be as highly offended, and as positively resolved to take as much vengeance upon the impudent presumption of the offender as the rigour of the law would inflict, as [ever] they had done upon any occurrence and accident in their lives: and if they had had persons enough about them, who out of a just sense of their honour would have confirmed them in the judgment they were of, it would have been in nobody's power to have shaken them. But as from the first day of his commitment, the servants near the person both of the king and duke presumed, against all ancient order, (which made it a crime in any to perform those civilities to persons declared to be under his majesty's displeasure,) to visit Mr. Talbot, and to censure those who had advised his commitment; and after some few days, when they thought the duke's passion in some degree abated, the lord Berkley confidently told the duke, "that he suffered much in the opinion of the world, in permitting a servant of so near relation to his person to be committed to prison for a few hasty and unadvised words to which he had been provoked; and that it was well enough known that it was by the contrivement and advice of the chancellor, who was taken notice of to be an enemy to that whole family, nor any great friend to any of his highness's servants; and if he had that credit to remove any of them from his person, there would in a short time be few of them found in his court."

This was seconded by all the standers by; and though it did not suddenly work its effect, yet the continual pressing it by degrees weakened the resolution: and the same offices being with equal importunity performed towards the king, and with the more zeal after it was published that the whole was done by the chancellor's procurement; both his majesty and his highness grew weary of their severity, and, upon conference together, resolved to interpose with the duke for his remission, who disdained to make himself a prosecutor in such a transgression. And so the prisoner returned to Whitehall, with the advantage which men who have been unjustly imprisoned usually receive:

and all men thought he triumphed over the chancellor, who, how unconcerned soever, knew every day the less how to behave himself. And this unhappy constitution grew so notorious, (for there were too many instances of it,) that all men grew less resolute in matters which concerned the king and drew the displeasure of others upon them, which was like to prove unprofitable to them.

According to their last prorogation the parliament convened again upon the one and twentieth of September; when the king told them, "that he was very glad to meet so many of them together again, and thanked God for their meeting together again in that place." He said, "little time had passed since they were almost in despair of having that place left to meet in. They saw the dismal ruins the fire had made; and nothing but a miracle of God's mercy could have preserved what was left from the same destruction."

His majesty told them, "he need make no excuse to them for having dispensed with their attendance in April; he was confident they all thanked him for it: the truth is, he desired to put them to as little trouble as he could; and he could tell them truly, he desired to put them to as little cost as was possible. He wished with all his heart that he could bear the whole charge of the war himself, and that his subjects should reap the whole benefit of it to themselves. But he had two great and powerful enemies, who used all the ways they could, fair and foul, to make all the world to concur with them; and the war was more chargeable by that conjunction, than any body thought it would have been. He needed not tell them the success of the summer, in which God had given them great success; and no question the enemy had undergone great losses; and if it had pleased God to have withheld his late judgment by fire, he had been in no ill condition." His majesty confessed, "that they had given him very large supplies for the carrying on the war: and yet," he told them, "that if he had not, by anticipating his own revenue, raised a very great sum of money, he had not been able to have set out the fleet the last spring; and he had some hope upon the same credit to be able to pay off the great ships as they should come in. They would consider what was to be done next, when they were well informed of the expense: and he would leave it to their wisdoms, to find out the best expedients for the carrying on the war with as little burden to the people as was possible." He said, "he would add no more than to put them in mind, that their enemies were very insolent; and if they were able the last year to persuade their miserable people whom they misled, that the contagion had so wasted the nation, and impoverished the king, that he would not be able to set out any fleet; how would they be exalted with this last impoverishment of the city, and condemn all reasonable conditions of peace? And therefore he could not doubt but that they would provide accordingly."

Indeed the king did not till now understand the damage he had sustained by the plague, much less what he must sustain from the fire. Monies could neither be collected nor borrowed where the plague had prevailed, which was over all the city and over a great part of the country; the collectors durst not go to require it or receive it. Yet the fountains remained yet clear, and the waters would run again: but this late conflagration had dried up or so stopped the very fountains, that there was no prospect when they would flow again. The two great branches of the revenue, the customs and excise, which was the great and almost inexhaustible security to borrow money upon, were now bankrupt, and would neither bring in money nor supply credit: all the measures by which computations had been made were so broken, that they could not be brought to meet again. By a medium of the constant receipts it had been depended upon, that what had been borrowed upon that fund would by this time have been fully satisfied with all the interest, whereby the money would have been replaced in the hands to which it was due, which would have been glad to have laid it out again; and the security remained still in vigour to be applied to any other urgent occasions: but now the plague had routed all those receipts, especially in London, where the great conduits of those receipts still ran. The plague and the war had so totally broken and distracted those receipts, that the farmers of either had not received enough to discharge the constant burden of the officers, and were so far from paying any part of the principal that was secured upon it, that it left the interest unpaid to swell the principal. And now this deluge by fire had dissipated the persons, and destroyed the houses, which were liable to the reimbursement of all arrears; and the very stocks were consumed which should carry on and revive the trade. And the third next considerable branch of the revenue, the chimney-money, was determined; and the city must be rebuilt before any body could be required to pay for his chimneys.

This was the true state of the crown, if all other inconveniences and casual expenses had been away, and all application to things serious had been made by all persons concerned. And this woful prospect was in view when the parliament met again; which came not together with the better countenance by seeing all hopes abroad with so sad an aspect, and all things at home (that troubled them much more) appear so desperate in many respects. Yet within few days after the king had spoken to them, the house of commons being most filled with the king's servants, the gentlemen of the country being not yet come, there was a faint vote procured, "that they would give a supply to the king proportionable to his wants," without mentioning any sum, or which way it should be raised: nor from that minute did they make the least reflection upon that engagement in many months after. Whilst the enemies, much more exalted than ever, believed, as they had good cause, that they should reap a much greater benefit by the burning of London than they had from the contagion.

When the numbers of the members increased, the parliament appeared much more chagrined than it had hitherto done; and though they made the same professions of affection and duty to the king they had ever done, they did not conceal the very ill opinion they had of the court and the continual riotings there: and the very idle discourses of some (who were much countenanced) upon the miserable event of the fire made them even believe, that the former jealousies of the city, when they saw their houses burning at such a distance from each other, were not without some foundation, nor without just apprehension of a conspiracy, and that it had not been diligently enough examined; and therefore they appointed a committee, with large authority to send for and examine all persons who could give any information concerning it.

When any mention was made of the declaration they had so lately passed, for giving the king supply, and "that it was high time to despatch it," "that all necessary provisions might be made for the setting out a fleet against the spring;" it was answered with passion, "that the king's wants must be made first to appear before any supply must be discoursed of: that there were already such vast sums of money given to the king, that there was none left in the country; nor could any commodities there, upon which they should raise wherewith to pay their taxes, be sold for want of money, which was all brought to London in specie, and none left to carry on the commerce and trade in the country, where they could not sell their corn or their cattle or their wool for half the value."

They who had not sat in the parliament at Oxford were exceedingly vexed, that there had been so much given there, so soon after the two millions and a half had been granted; and said, "if the king wanted again already, that he must have been abominably cheated, which was fit to be examined. That the number of the ships, which had been set out by the king in several fleets since the beginning of this war, was no secret; and that there are men enough who are acquainted with the charge of setting out and manning and victualling ships, and can make thereby a reasonable computation what this vast expense can amount to: and that they cannot but conclude, that if his majesty hath been honestly dealt with, there must remain still a very great proportion of money to carry on the war, without need of imposing more upon the people, till they are better able to bear it. And therefore that it was absolutely necessary, that all those, through whose hands the money had passed, should first give an exact account of what they had received, and what and how they had disbursed it: and when that should appear, it would be seasonable to demand an addition of supply, which would be cheerfully granted."

And for the better expedition of this (for every body confessed that the time pressed) it was proposed, "that forthwith a bill should be prepared, which should pass into an act of parliament, in which such commissioners should be appointed as the houses should think fit, to examine all accounts of those who had received or issued out any monies for this war; and where they found any persons faulty, and who had broken their trust, they should be liable to such punishment as the parliament should think fit:" and a committee was presently named to prepare such a bill accordingly. This proposition found such a concurrence in the house, that none of the court thought fit to oppose it; and others who knew the method to be new, and liable to just exceptions, thought it to as little purpose to endeavour to divert it: and so all motions for present supply were to be laid aside till a more favourable conjuncture; and the overture had been contrived and put on by many who seemed not to like it, which is an artifice not unusual in courts or parliaments.

The persons, who were principally aimed at, (for no doubt they believed that others would be comprehended,) were sir George Carteret, the treasurer of the navy, through whom all that expense had passed, who had many enemies upon the opinion that his office was too great, and the more by the ill offices sir William Coventry was always ready to do him; and the lord Ashley, who was treasurer of all the money that had been raised upon prizes, which could not but be a great proportion. The former was a punctual officer and a good accountant, and had already passed his account in the exchequer for two years, upon which he had his "quietus est;" which was the only lawful way known and practised by all accountants to the crown, who can receive a good discharge no other way: and he was ready to make another year's account. But what method commissioners extraordinary by act of parliament would put it into, he could not imagine, nor be well satisfied with. The other, the lord Ashley, had more reason to be troubled, for he was by his commission exempted from giving any other account but to the king himself, which exemption was the only reason that made him so solicitous for the office; and he well knew that there were great sums issued, which could not be put into any public account: so that his perplexity in several respects was not small. And they both applied themselves to the king for his protection in the point.

His majesty was no less troubled, [knowing] that both had issued out many sums upon his warrants, which he would not suffer to be produced; and called that committee of the privy-council with which he used to advise, and complained of this unusual way of proceeding in the house of commons, which would terrify all men from serving his majesty in any receipts; to which employment men submitted because they knew what they were to do, and what they were to suffer. If they made their account according to the known rules of the exchequer, their discharge could not be denied; and if they failed, they knew what process would be awarded against them. But to account by such orders as the parliament should prescribe, and to be liable to such punishment as the parliament would inflict, was such an uncertainty as would deprive them of all rest and quiet of mind; and was in itself so unjust, that his majesty declared "that he would never suffer it: that he hoped it would never find a consent in the house of commons; if it should, that the house of peers would reject it; but if it should be brought to him, he was resolved never to give his royal assent." There was no man present, who did not seem fully to concur with his majesty that he should never consent to it: "how-ever, that the best care and diligence should be used, that it might never be presented to him, but stopped in the houses; and to that purpose, that the members should be prepared by giving them notice of his pleasure."

The chancellor upon this argument, in which he discerned no opposition, enlarged himself upon what he had often before put his majesty in mind of; "that he could not be too indulgent in the defence of the privileges of parliament; that he "hoped he would never violate any of them:" but he desired him "to be equally solicitous to prevent the excesses in parliament, and not to suffer them to extend their jurisdiction to cases they have nothing to do with; and that to restrain them within their proper bounds and limits is as necessary, as it is to preserve them from being invaded. That this was such a new encroachment as had no bottom; and the scars were yet too fresh and green of those wounds which had been inflicted upon the kingdom from such usurpation." And therefore he desired his majesty "to be firm in the resolution he had taken, and not to depart from it; and if such a bill should be brought up to the house of peers, he would not fail in doing his duty, and speaking freely his opinion against such innovations, how many soever it might offend." All which discourse of his was in a short time after communicated to those, who would not fail to make use of it to his disadvantage.

There was a correspondence by this time begun and warmly pursued between some discontented members of the house of peers, who thought their parts not enough valued, (and the duke of Buckingham was in the head of them,) and some members of the house of commons, who made themselves remarkable by opposing all things which were proposed in that house for the king's service, or which were like to be grateful to him, as sir Richard Temple, Mr. Seymour, and Mr. Garraway, and sir Robert Howard; who were all bold speakers, and meant to make themselves considerable by saying, upon all occasions, what wiser men would [not], whatever they thought.

The duke [of Buckingham] took more pains than was agreeable to his constitution to get an interest in all such persons, invited them to his table, pretended to have a great esteem of their parts, asked counsel of them, lamented the king's neglecting his business, and committing it to other people who were not fit for it; and then reported all the license and debauchery of the court in the most lively [colours], being himself a frequent eye and earwitness of it. He had a mortal quarrel with the lady, and was at this time so much in the king's displeasure, (as he was very frequently,) that he forbore going to the court, and revenged himself upon it by all the merry tales he could tell of what was done there.

It cannot be imagined, considering the loose life he led (which was a life more by night than by day) in all the liberties that nature could desire or wit invent, how great an interest he had in both houses of parliament; that is, how many in both would follow his advice, and concur in what he proposed. His quality and condescensions, the pleasantness of his humour and conversation, the extravagance and sharpness of his wit, unrestrained by any modesty or religion, drew persons of all affections and inclinations to like his company; and to believe that the levities and the vanities would be wrought off by age, and there would enough of good be left to become a great man, and make him useful to his country, for which he pretended to have a wonderful affection and reverence; and that all his displeasure against the court proceeded from their declared malignity against the liberty of the subject, and their desire that the king should govern by the example of France. He had always held intelligence with the principal persons of the levelling party, and professed to desire that liberty of conscience might be granted to all; and exercised his wit with most licence against the church, the law, and the court.

The king had constant intelligence of all his behaviour, and the liberty he took in his discourses of him, for which he had indignation enough; but of this new stratagem to make himself great in parliament, and to have a faction there to disturb his business, his majesty had no apprehension, believing it impossible for the duke to keep his mind long bent upon any particular design, or to keep and observe those hours and orders of sleeping and eating, as men who pretend to business are obliged to; and that it was more impossible, for him to make and preserve a friendship with any serious persons, whom he could never restrain himself from abusing and making ridiculous, as soon as he was out of their company. Yet, with all these infirmities and vices, he found a respect and concurrence from men of different tempers and talents, and had an incredible opinion with the people.

The great object of his dislike, displeasure, and hatred, was the duke of Ormond, who being his equal in title, and superior in credit with the king, and at least equal to him in all other respects, he looked upon him as his rival; and that his constant attendance upon the king through all his fortunes, was a reproach to him for not having performed his duty that way, and gave him a general reputation in the kingdom with all men who had been faithful to the crown. The duke of Ormond's younger son had married his niece, who was the heir apparent of his house; to which, though he had given his consent when he saw it was not in his power to contradict it, yet he pretended that the duke had made many promises of friendship to him which he had not made good; whereas in truth the other did really desire, and had heartily endeavoured, to do him all the good offices he could with the king, which some other new extravagance of his own disappointed and made uneffectual. Let the ground and reason be what they will, he did not dissemble to hate the duke of Ormond heartily, and to be willing to undertake the prosecution of any complaint against him; of which, in that distempered and disjointed condition of Ireland, there could not be [occasion] wanting, as soon as it was known that such a patron was ready to undertake their defence. And it cannot be denied, (the spirit of envy is so powerful,) that there were too many, who had no affection for the duke of Buckingham, who were yet willing that any thing should be done to the prejudice of the duke of Ormond, who they thought eclipsed the nobility of England.

There had been for many months a great murmur, rather than complaint, "of the great damage the kingdom in general sustained by the importation of such great quantities of Irish cattle, which were bred there for nothing, and transported for little, that they might well undersell all the cattle here; and from hence the breed of cattle in the kingdom was totally given over, and thereby the land would yield no rent proportionably to what it had ever done: and that this was a principal cause of the want of money in the country, which could only be remedied by a very strict act of parliament, to forbid the "importation of any sort of cattle out of Ireland into this kingdom." And some of them who had most thought of the matter had prepared a bill, and brought it into the house of commons, where it was read. At first it underwent very calm and reasonable debates. Very many members of several counties desired, "that their counties might not undergo any damage for the benefit of other individual places." They professed "that their counties had no land bad enough to breed: but that their great traffick consisted in buying lean cattle, and making them fat, and upon this they paid their rent; and if the bringing over Irish cattle should be restrained, their counties must be undone." And this appeared to be the case of very many counties in England. And the complaint was of so new a nature, that it had never been heard of in England till some few months before this meeting in parliament; only it had been mentioned in the parliament at Oxford, as a grievance to the northern counties, which complained no less of the Scots than of the Irish cattle; and the bill that was at this time brought into the house of commons provided as well against the one as the other.

Whether this complaint originally proceeded from the damage which the people of some counties sustained, or thought they sustained, which made their members in parliament press the restraint with much earnestness, (and it cannot be denied that many worthy men were passionate in it, who were not like to be engaged in particular and factious contests, to comply with the humours of other men,) is not easy to other men to judge of than those who sat in the houses, and observed the manner and the passion in which those debates were carried. And it cannot be denied but that, how innocently soever the grievance first came to be mentioned, and to be recommended to the consideration and wisdom of the house, the carrying it on was with unusual heat and passion, different from what appeared in the transaction of any other business, that had an aspect only to the public: and it was observed, that the cabal that is mentioned before, between some of the house of peers and of the house of commons, began at this time to meet more frequently, and were united in the driving on this affair; which suddenly grew to be insisted on as of that importance, that there could be no debate begun with reference to the giving money to the king, till this bill were first passed.

In the mean time the council of Ireland had the alarm of what was intended before the parliament, and did not only write to the king himself, but a large letter to the lords of the privy-council, in which they represented the present distracted condition of that kingdom, "that there were more than one hundred thousand persons who had nothing else to live upon but their droves of cattle; out of which they twice a year sent as many as they could spare into England, which enabled them to pay their rents, and return such goods and merchandise from thence as the kingdom [stood] in need of;" for no money in specie was returned upon that commerce. "That if this liberty of trade, which they had enjoyed in all ages, should be taken from them, the king's army could not be supported, nor the government maintained, but the kingdom must necessarily be ruined; and probably a "new rebellion, in so general a discontent as this restraint would administer, might be again entered into: and therefore they desired, that at least some years might be allowed to that traffick which had been always enjoyed; to the end that some other husbandry might be introduced into the kingdom, by which the people might live, and which the government would endeavour to plant with all possible diligence and encouragement."

The king himself was so much moved with those letters, that he declared, "that he could neither in justice nor in conscience consent to such a bill, which upon pretence of benefit to one of his kingdoms might and must be so mischievous to the other two," (for Scotland, as is said, was yet comprehended as well as Ireland :) "that he was equally king of all, and obliged to have an equal care of all; and never to consent to any thing that might be prejudicial to either of the other, especially if the benefit to the one were not proportionable to, and as evident as, the damage was to the other." And upon these grounds he recommended to them, "to give such a stop to this bill, that it might never be presented to him; for if it were, he must positively reject it:" and without doubt his majesty at that time did not resolve any thing more within himself, than never to give his royal assent to that bill.

The letters from Ireland did not make the same impressions upon the lords of the council, who were very much divided in their opinions, even they whose zeal for the king's service was most unquestionable. Some were, upon the sole consideration of the injustice of it, and the mischief that it would produce in Ireland, positively against ever consenting to it, and as positive that it might be stopped in the house of commons, or thrown out of the lords' house, that it should never come to the king: others did as much believe that it was a real grievance, in which the subject should have relief; and insisted much, "that in a point evidently for the benefit and advantage of England, Ireland ought not to be put into the scale, because it would be some inconvenience there." Some did in truth think that the king was too much inclined to favour the Irish, and in that respect were well content that this bill should be a mortification to them: and there wanted not others, who in dark expressions (which grew clearer when the matter came into the house of peers) seemed to think, "that the estates in Ireland were more valuable than they were in England; and that some noblemen of that kingdom lived in a higher garb, and made greater expenses, than the noblemen in England were able to do; which had not been in former times." But they never considered, that those noblemen had nothing but what descended to them from their ancestors; and that they had faithfully adhered to the king, and undergone as much damage for doing so, as any men had done.

The house of commons seemed much more more and obstinate than it had formerly appeared to be, and solicitous to grasp as much power and authority as any of their predecessors had done, though no doubt with no ill intention: and it may be this would not have so much appeared, if there had been the same vigour in those who had used to conduct the king's business in that house, as there had used to be. But that spirit was much fallen. The chief men of the court, upon whose example other men looked, were much more humble than they had used to be, and took more pains to ingratiate themselves than to advance the interest of their master: and instead of pressing what was desirable upon the strength of reason and policy, as they had used to do, and by which the major part of the house had usually concurred with them, they now applied themselves with address to those, who had always frowardly opposed whatsoever they thought would be grateful to the king; and desired rather to buy their votes and concurrence by promises of reward and preferment, (which is the most dishonourable and unthrifty brokery that can be practised in a parliament, which from this time was much practised, and brought many ill things to pass,) than to prevail upon those weighty and important arguments which would bear the light. Which low artifice raised the insolence of those, which would, as easily as it had been, have been still overruled and suppressed; and was quickly discerned by those others, who, upon the principles of honour and wisdom, had hitherto swayed the house in all matters of public concernment, and who now concluded by those new condescensions that the former sober spirit and resolution was laid aside, and that peevish men would be compounded with; and so resolved to sit still or look on, till the success of this stratagem might be discerned.

And by this means the bill for Irish cattle was driven on with more fury, and the other concerning accounts more passionately spoken of; whilst every day not only many of those, who had constantly observed the advice that had been given them on the behalf of the king, fell off to the other party, but many of his household servants concurred in the bill for Ireland; whilst the rest, who did not yet think fit to do so, applied themselves to the king for his leave that they might do the same. And sir William Coventry, who had now by his insinuations and communication made himself very grateful to the refractory party, persuaded the king, "that the house had taken the Irish bill so much to heart, that they would never enter upon the debate of money, till that had passed the house and was sent to the lords, who no doubt, upon the knowledge of his majesty's mind and resolution, would easily throw it out. That if his servants continued obstinate in opposing it below, they should but provoke and anger the house, and render themselves useless to other parts of his majesty's more important business: whereas if they did now gratify the house by concurring with them in this matter, they should make themselves acceptable, have credit enough to divert the bill of accounts, and presently to dispose every body to enter upon the matter of supply."

The king was not pleased with the counsel, but had a very good opinion of the counsellor, who he believed could not but judge aright of the temper of those with whom he had sat and conversed so long: and so his majesty told him, "he was contented he should follow the dictates of his own judgment and conscience;" and the same answer he gave to all such members of the house of commons who came to receive his orders. And after all this, the bill was carried with great difficulty, and long opposition given to it by those members of several counties, which professed,

"that the bringing over the Irish cattle was so much for their benefit, that they could not live well without it," and were exceedingly perplexed that it should pass; which yet they hoped would be prevented in the house of peers: and so the bill was in great triumph, and by all the members, (as in cases they much delight in is usual,) presented to the house of peers.

And the commons no sooner repaired to their own house, than they assumed the debate upon the accounts, with the same fervour they had pursued the other bill of Ireland, and with the same declaration, "that they would not enter upon the subject of money, till they saw what success that bill would likewise have;" and appearing every day more out of humour, expressed less reverence towards the court. And some expressions were frequently used, which seemed to glance at the license and disorders and extravagant expense of that place, not without some reflections which aimed at the lady, and at the exorbitant power exercised by her. And this imperious way of proceeding confirmed those in their wariness, who had no mind to oppose or contradict the party that they would and meant should prevail: but they the more endeavoured to render themselves gracious to the leaders, as being willing to administer fuel to the fire the others intended to kindle; and, so they might preserve themselves, were very willing to expose other ministers to the jealousy of them, who they thought would not be quiet without some sacrifice. And thus they alarmed the king with the new apprehensions, "that the house, which had yet dutiful intentions, if they were crossed in what they designed for his service, might be provoked to be bolder with his majesty than they had been yet, and to mention the prevalence of the lady," which every body knew the duke of Buckingham would have been glad to have contributed to. And with these continued representations, but especially with their old argument of casting it out by the house of peers, where his power could not be doubted, they at last prevailed with the king to leave all men to themselves in the business of the accounts, (where there was a greater concurrence,) as he had done in the Irish bill: and so that bill likewise was transmitted to the lords.

And at this time many wise men thought, that it would have been very happy for the king if he would have dissolved the parliament, and presently after called another; which would have discovered many combinations, when the actors had found themselves excluded from entering again upon the stage; and it would have appeared, that all the storms had been raised by those winds which had their birth in the king's own house. And such a dissolution (to which the king himself was enough inclined) would have been very popular throughout the kingdom, which naturally doth not love long parliaments, and exceedingly detested this for having only given away their money, and raised a war of which they saw no end nor possible benefit, without passing any good laws for the advancement of the peace and happiness of the kingdom. And very few of those, who had gotten credit in the house to obstruct what the king desired, were men of any interest or reputation with the people.

But as nobody was forward publicly to own and avow this counsel, the consequence whereof they knew if it were not consented to; so they who meant to do themselves more good by the present indisposition and distemper, than they could propose from a new convention of men utterly unknown, and who were like enough to bring prejudice against their own particulars, used all the means they could devise to divert the king from that inclination. They told him, "that he would never have such another parliament, where he had near one hundred members of his own menial servants and their near relations, who were all at his disposal; by which they had incurred so much prejudice in the country, that very few of them would ever be elected again. That the present distemper was contracted by accidents and mistakes, and would vanish upon very reasonable condescensions, and in another prorogation: whereas if it should be dissolved and new writs sent out, the people would return none but presbyterians and known enemies to the church, and such who were most notoriously disaffected to the court." And this argument, pressed by men who had no more affection for the church than the Quakers had, prevailed with most of the bishops to dissuade the king from kearking to any such advice; when they had much more reason to expect a stronger party in a new parliament, and might have observed that their friends fell from them every day in both houses, and that the court was not propitious to them, of which they had afterwards a sad experience, and which they might then have well foreseen.

The house of peers was no sooner possessed of the bill against Irish cattle, but it was read, and a marvellous keen resolution appeared in many to use all expedition in the passing it; though if the matter itself had been without exception, there were so many clauses and provisos in it so derogatory to the king's honour and prerogative, that many thought it a high disrespect to his majesty to admit them into debate. But of these anon. The duke of Buckingham appeared in the head of those who favoured the bill, with a marvellous concernment: and at the times appointed for the debate of it, contrary to his custom of coming into the house, indeed of not rising till eleven of the clock, and seldom staying above a quarter of an hour, except upon some affair which he concerned himself in, he was now always present with the first in a morning, and stayed till the last at night; for the debate often held from the morning till four of the clock in the afternoon, and sometimes till candles were brought in.

And it grew quickly evident, that there were other reasons which caused so earnest a prosecution of it, above the encouragement of the breed of cattle in England: insomuch as the lord Ashley, who next the duke of Buckingham appeared the most violent supporter of the bill, could not forbear to urge it as an argument for the prosecuting it, "that if this bill did not pass, all the rents in Ireland would rise in a vast proportion, and those in England fall as much; so that in a year or two the duke of Ormond would have a greater revenue than the earl of Northumberland;" which made a visible impression in many, as a thing not to be endured. Whereas the duke had indeed at least four times the proportion of land in Ireland that descended to him from his ancestors, that the earl had in England; and the revenue of it before the rebellion was not inferior to the other's. But nothing was more manifest, than that the warmth of that prosecution in the house of peers in many lords did proceed from the envy they had of the duke's station in one kingdom, and of his fortune in the other.

And the whole debate upon the bill was so disorderly and unparliamentary, that the like had never been known: no rules or orders of the house for the course and method of debate were observed. And there being, amongst those who advanced the bill, fewer speakers than there were of those who were against it, those few took upon them to speak oftener than they ought to do, and to reply to every man who declared himself to be of another opinion: and when they were put in mind of the rule of the house, "that no man should speak above once upon the same question," they called presently to have the house resolved into a committee, which any single member may require, and then every man may speak as often as he please; and so the time was spent unprofitably without the business being advanced. In the mean time the house of commons proceeded as irregularly, in sending frequent messages to hasten the despatch of the bill, when they knew well the debate of every day: and it was frequently urged as an argument, "that the house of commons was the fittest judge of the necessities and grievances of the people; and they having passed this bill, the lords ought to conform to their opinion." In fine, there grew so great a license of words in this debate, and so many personal reflections, that every day some quarrels arose, to the great scandal and dishonour of a court that was the supreme judicatory of the kingdom.

The duke of Buckingham, who assumed a liberty of speaking when and what he would in a dialect unusual and ungrave, his similes and other expressions giving occasion of much mirth and laughter, one day said in the debate, "that whoever was against that bill had either an Irish interest or an Irish understanding:" which so much offended the lord Ossory, who was eldest son to the duke of Ormond, (who had very narrowly escaped the censure of the house lately, for reproaching the lord Ashley with having been a counsellor to Cromwell, and would not therefore trust himself with giving a present answer,) [that] meeting him afterwards in the court, [he] desired the duke "that he would walk into the next room with him;" and there told him, "that he had taken the liberty to use many loose and unworthy expressions which reflected upon the whole Irish nation, and which he himself resented so much that he expected satisfaction, and to find him with his sword in his hand;" which the duke endeavoured to avoid by all the fair words and shifts he could use, but was so far pressed by the other, whose courage was never doubted, that he could not avoid appointing a place where they would presently meet, which he found the other would exact to prevent discovery, and therefore had chosen rather to urge it himself than to send a message to him. And so he named a known place in Chelsea Fields, and to be there within less than an hour.

The lord Ossory made haste thither, and expected him much beyond the time; and then seeing some persons come out of the way towards the place where he was, and concluding they were sent out to prevent any action between them, he avoided speaking with them, but got to the place where his horse was, and so retired to London. The duke was found by himself in another place on the other side of the water, which was never known by the name of Chelsea Fields, which he said was the place he had appointed to meet.

Finding that night that the lord Ossory was not in custody, and so he was sure he should quickly hear from him, and upon conference with his friends, that the mistake of the place would be imputed to him; he took a strange resolution, that every body wondered at, and his friends dissuaded him from. And the next morning, as soon as the house was sat, the lord Ossory being likewise present that he might find some opportunity to speak with him, the duke told the house, "that he must inform them of somewhat that concerned himself; and being sure that it would come to their notice some other way, he had therefore chose to acquaint them with it himself;" and thereupon related "how the lord Ossory had the day before found him in the court, and desired him to walk into the next room, where he charged him with many particulars which he had spoken in that place, and in few words told him he should fight with him; which though he did not hold himself obliged to do in maintenance of anything he had said or done in the parliament, yet that it being suitable and agreeable to his nature, to fight with any man who had a mind to fight with him," (upon which he enlarged with a little vanity, as if duelling were his daily exercise and inclination,) "he appointed the place in Chelsea Fields, which he understood to be the fields over against Chelsea; whither, having only gone to his lodging to change his sword, he hastened, by presently crossing the water in a pair of oars, and stayed there in expectation of the lord Ossory, until such gentlemen," whom he named, "found him there, and said, they were sent to prevent his and the lord Ossory's meeting, whom others were likewise sent to find for the same prevention. Whereupon, concluding that for the present there would be no meeting together, he returned with those gentlemen to his lodging, being always ready to give any gentleman satisfaction that should require it of him."

Every body was exceedingly surprised with the oddness and unseasonableness of the discourse, which consisted, with some confusion, between aggravating the presumption of the lord Ossory, and making the offence as heinous as the violating all the privileges of parliament could amount unto; and magnifying his own courage and readiness to fight upon any opportunity, when it was clear enough that he had declined it by a gross shift: and it was wondered at, that he had not chosen rather that some other person might inform the house of a quarrel between two members, that it might be examined and the mischief prevented. But he believed that way would not so well represent and manifest the lustre of his courage, and might leave him under an examination that would not be so advantageous to him as his own information: and therefore no persuasion and importunity of his friends could prevail with him to decline that method.

The lord Ossory seemed out of countenance, and troubled that the contest was like to be only in that place, and cared not to deny any thing that the duke had accused him of; only "wondered, that he should say he had challenged him for words spoken in the house, when he had expressly declared to him, when his grace insisted much upon the privilege of parliament to decline giving him any satisfaction, that he did not question him for any words spoken in parliament, but for words spoken in other places, and for affronts, which he had at other times chosen to bear rather than to disturb the company." He confessed, "he had attended in the very place where the duke had done him the honour to promise to meet him;" and mentioned some expressions which he had used in designing it, which left the certainty of it not to be doubted.

When they had both said as much as they had a mind to, they were both required, as is the custom, to withdraw to several rooms near the house: and then the lords entered upon debate of the transgression; many insisting "upon the magnitude of the offence, which concerned the honour and safety of the highest tribunal in the kingdom, and the liberty and security of every member of the house. That if in any debate any lord exceeded the modest limits prescribed, in any offensive expressions, the house had the power and the practice to restrain and reprehend and imprison the person, according to the quality and degree of the offence; and that no other remedy or examination could be applied to it, even by the king himself. But if it should be in any private man to take exceptions against any words which the house finds no fault with, and to require men to justify with their swords all that they say in discharge of their conscience, and for the good and benefit of their country; there is an end of the privilege of parliament and the freedom of speech: and therefore that there could not be too great a punishment inflicted upon this notorious and monstrous offence of the lord Ossory, which concerned every lord in particular, as much as it did the duke of Buckingham; who had carried himself as well as the ill custom and iniquity of the age would admit, and had given no offence to the house, towards which he had always paid all possible respect and reverence."

They who considered the honour and dignity only of the house, and the ill consequence of such violations as these, which way soever their affections were inclined with reference to their persons, were all of opinion, "that their offences were so near equal that their punishment ought to be equal: for that besides the lord Ossory's denial that he had [made] any reflection upon any words spoken in parliament, which was the aggravation of his offence, there was some testimony given to the house by some lords present, that the lord Ossory had complained of the duke's comportment towards him before those words used in the house by him, of the Irish interest or Irish understanding, and resolved to expostulate with him upon it; so that those words could not be the ground of the quarrel. And it was evident by the duke's own confession and declaration, that he was as ready to fight, and went to the place appointed by himself for encounter; which made the offence equal." And therefore they moved, "that

"they might be both brought to the bar, and upon their knees receive the sentence of the house for their commitment to the Tower."

Some, who would shew their kindness to the duke, were not willing that he should undergo the same punishment with the other, until some lords, who were known not to be his friends, were very earnest "that the duke might receive no punishment, because he had committed no fault; for that it was very evident that he never intended to fight, and had, when no other tergiversation would serve his turn, prudently mistaken the place that was appointed by himself;" which was pressed by two or three lords in such a pleasant manner, with reflection upon some expressions used by himself, that his better friends thought it would be more for his honour to undergo the censure of the house than the penalty of such a vindication: and so they were both sent to the Tower.

And during the time they remained there, the bill against Ireland remained in suspense, and uncalled for by those, who would not hazard their cause in the absence of their strongest champion. But the same spirit was kept up in all other arguments, the displeasure, that had arisen against each other in that, venting itself in contradictions and sharp replies in all other occasions; a mischief that is always contracted from the agitation of private affairs, where different interests are pursued; from whence personal animosities arise, which are not quickly laid aside, after the affair itself that produced those passions is composed and ended. And this kind of distemper never more appeared, nor ever lasted longer, than from the debate and contestation upon this bill.

Those two lords were no sooner at liberty, and their displeasure towards each other suppressed or silenced by the king's command, but another more untoward outrage happened, that continued the same disturbance. It happened that upon the debate of the same affair, the Irish bill, there was a conference appointed with the house of commons, in which the duke of Buckingham was a manager; and as they were sitting down in the painted chamber, which is seldom done in good order, it chanced that the marquis of Dorchester sat next the duke of Buckingham, between whom there was no good correspondence. The one changing his posture for his own ease, which made the station of the other the more uneasy, they first endeavoured by jostling to recover what they had dispossessed each other of, and afterwards fell to direct blows; in which the marquis, who was the lower of the two in stature, and was less active in his limbs, lost his periwig, and received some rudeness, which nobody imputed to his want of courage, which was ever less questioned than that of the other.

The misdemeanour, greater than had ever happened, in that place and upon such an occasion, in any age when the least reverence to government was preserved, could not be concealed; but as soon as the conference was ended, was reported to the house, and both parties heard, who both confessed enough to make them undergo the censure of the house. The duke's friends would fain have justified him, as being provoked by the other; and it was evident their mutual undervaluing each other always disposed them to affect any opportunity to manifest it. But the house sent them both to the Tower; from whence after a few days they were again released together, and such a reconciliation made as after such rencounters is usual, where either party thinks himself beforehand with the other, as the marquis had much of the duke's hair in his hands to recompense for the pulling off his periwig, which he could not reach high enough to do to the other.

When all things were thus far quieted, the bill was again entered upon with no less passion for the stock that had been wasted. The arguments which were urged against the bill for the injustice of it [were], "that they should, without any cause or demerit on their part, or any visible evidence of a benefit that would accrue from it to this kingdom, deprive his majesty's two other kingdoms of a privilege they had ever been possessed of: that they might as reasonably take away the trade from any one county in England, because it produced some inconvenience to another county more in their favour: that the large counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Kent, and other provinces, would lose as much by the passing of this act, as the northern and any other counties would gain by it: that those two kingdoms might with the same justice press his majesty's concurrence, that they might have no trade with England, which would bring more damage to England by much, than it would gain by this act of restraint: and that it was against all the maxims of prudence, to run the danger of a present mischief and damage, as this would produce in Ireland by the testimony of the lord lieutenant and council of that kingdom, only upon the speculation of a future benefit that might accrue, though it were yet only in speculation."

These, and many other arguments of this kind, which for the most part were offered by men who had not the least relation to Ireland, made no other impression, than that they were content to leave Scotland out of the bill; which increased their party against Ireland, and gave little satisfaction to the other, who did not so much value the commerce with the other kingdom. And this alteration the house of commons likewise consented to, but with great opposition, since in truth that concession destroyed the foundation upon which the whole fabric of the bill was supported.

Then the debate fell upon some derogatory clauses and provisos very contrary to his majesty's just prerogative and power, (for they made his majesty's own license and warrant of no effect or authority, but liable to be controlled by a constable; nor would permit the importation of three thousand beeves, which, by an act of parliament in Ireland, were every year to be delivered at Chester and another port for the provision of the king's house;) which in many respects the house generally disliked, and desired "that it might have no other style than had been accustomed in all the penal acts of parliament which were in force, it being to be presumed, that the king would never dispense with any violation of it, except in such cases as the benefit and good of the kingdom required it; which might naturally fall out, if there should happen such a murrain amongst the beasts of that species, as had been these late years amongst horses, which had destroyed so many thousand, that good horses "were now hard to be procured. And if the same or the like destruction should fall upon the other cattle, we should have then more cause to complain of the scarcity and the dearth of meat, than we have now of the plenty and cheapness, which was the only grievance now felt, and which kingdoms seldom complained of: and in such a case it would be very great pity, that the king should not have power enough to provide for the supply of his subjects, and to prevent a common dearth."

But this was again opposed with as much passion and violence as had fallen out in any part of the debate; and such rude arguments used against such a power in the king, as if the question were upon reposing some new trust in him, whereas it was upon divesting him of a trust that was inherent in him from all antiquity: and "that it was the same thing to be without the bill, and not to provide against the king's dispensing with the not obeying it, whose inclinations were well known in this particular; and therefore the effect of them, and of the importunity of the courtiers, must be provided against." And throughout this discourse there was such a liberty of language made use of, as reflected more upon the king's honour, and indeed upon his whole council and court, as had not been heard in that house, but in a time of rebellion, without very severe reprehension: and it so much offended the house now, that, notwithstanding all the sturdy opposition, it was resolved that those clauses and provisos should be amended in some places, and totally left out in others. And with the alteration and amendments it was sent down to the house of commons.

At this time the public affairs and necessities were little looked after or considered. The fleet was come into the ports, but [there was] no money to pay off the men: and what was equally mischievous, there was no way to make the provisions for the next spring, that the fleet might be ready for the sea by the time the enemy would assuredly be out. If the victualler were not supplied, who had much money due to him, the season would be past in which he was to buy the cattle that he must kill; and he complained how much he should suffer by this bill of Ireland, which already raised the price of all meats. And the yards wanted all those tacklings and rigging and masts, without which another fleet could not be sent out, and which could no otherwise be provided than by ready money. The king had anticipated all his own revenue, and was ready to expose that for further security, but nobody would trust. The new provisos in the bill of supply at Oxford gave no new credit, but were found as mischievous as any body had apprehended they would be: and the bankers, who in all such occasions were a sure refuge, wanted now credit themselves; which that they might not recover, the parliament had treated them as ill since they came together, that is, with reproaches and threats, as they had done at Oxford. In which kind of persecution sir William Coventry, and some who followed him, led the van, very much to the king's prejudice and against his command; but they excused themselves, upon the credit it gave them in the house to do him service.

All this was well enough understood: and it was as visible, that they intended to make it a forcible argument for the passing the Irish bill which, though from different motives, was now become the sacrifice, without which they would not be appeased; and therefore, when the bill was sent to them with those alterations and amendments, they rejected them all, and voted, "that they would adhere to their own bill without departing from a word of it, except with reference to Scotland," from which they had receded. And if upon this very unusual return the house of peers had likewise voted, "that they too would adhere," which they might regularly have done, and would have been consented to by the major part of the house if the question had been then put; there had been an end of that bill. But that must not be suffered: the party that cherished it was too much concerned to let it expire in a deep silence, and were numerous enough to obstruct and defer what they liked not, though not to establish what they desired. Some of them, that is, some who desired that the bill should pass, though uncorrupted by their passions, did not like the obstinacy of the house of commons in not departing from some unusual clauses and pretences; yet were not willing to have the like vote for adhering to pass in that house, which it might do when all other remedies should fail; and therefore moved, "that a conference might be required, in which such reasons might be given as might satisfy them." Many conferences, and free conferences, were held, in which the commons still maintained their adherence with a wonderful petulance: and those members, who were appointed to manage the conferences, took the liberty to use all those arguments, and the very expressions, which had been used in the house of peers, against leaving any power in the king to dispense; and added such other of their own as more reflected upon his majesty's honour; and yet concluded as if they could say more if they were provoked, upon which every man might make what glosses he pleased, and the king himself was left to his own imaginations.

There need be no other instance given of the unheard of and incredible passion that was shewed in the transaction of that bill, than a particular that related to the city of London. Upon the news of the great fire in London, and the devastation that it made there, there was so general a lamentation in Ireland as might be expected from a neighbour province, that had so great a commerce with and dependance upon it. And the consent in this lamentation was so digested, that the several provinces had made a computation and division between themselves, and presented a declaration to the lord lieutenant and council, "that they had so tender a sense of that calamity, that if they were able to raise money to administer some assistance to the city towards the reparation of their great loss, they would willingly offer and present it: but that not being in their power or possession, the great scarcity and want of money throughout that kingdom being notoriously known, but there being somewhat in their power to offer, which might at least testify their good-will, and not be wholly useless towards the end they designed it; they had agreed between themselves to give unto the lord mayor and city of London, and to be disposed of by them to such particular uses as "they should judge most convenient, the number of thirty thousand Irish beasts, which should be delivered within such a time and at such ports," which were named, "to any such persons as should be appointed to receive them." And of this they desired the lord lieutenant and council to advertise the king, and likewise give notice to the city of London: both which were done accordingly; and the advertisement arrived in the city in the time when this bill was depending in the lords' house. Whereupon the lord mayor and aldermen presented a petition to the lords, with a proviso that they desired might be inserted in the bill that was before them, by which it was provided, "that nothing contained in that bill should hinder the city of London from enjoying the charitable donative of the thirty thousand cattle, but that they might have liberty to import the same."

It can hardly be believed with what passion and indignation this petition was received by the house, what invectives were made against the city, "for their presumption in interposing their own particular interest to obstruct the public affairs of the kingdom;" and then the reflections which were "made upon the council of Ireland, for giving countenance to such an address, and becoming instruments themselves to promote and advance it:" which they would not allow to be an offering of charity, but a cheat and a cozenage by combination to elude an act of parliament, which they could not choose but hear of, and could not but believe that it was passed by this time. Which if it had been, and that power left in the king as had been proposed, they might now see how it would have been applied: for they could not doubt, but there would enough have advised the king, that he should gratify the city of London with a license for this importation; which could not or would not have been so warily drawn, but that, under the license for thirty thousand, there would be three hundred thousand imported into England; and this the great charity aimed at and was assured of." And so, after much bitterness, they desired "that the petition and the proviso might be both rejected."

But this passion did not cover the whole house, which neither commended nor approved it, and were much less transported with it. They believed it was a very seasonable intention of charity, and would not take upon them to frustrate it; and so prevailed, that it was passed in that house, and transmitted with approbation to the other. But it had the same fate there with the other provisos, and was thrown out with that bitterness and observation which had been offered against it by some lords. Nor could any expedients alter or remove their obstinacy, though many were offered upon conferences, and particularly "that all the beasts should be killed in Ireland and powdered there, and then sent over in barrels or other casks;" but they found cozenage in that too, and were as angry with the cattle when they were dead, as when they were alive, [as if it would] for a time keep down the price of meat in England, which they desired to advance: so that there was nothing gotten in all those conferences, but the discovery of new jealousies of the king and the court, and new insinuations of the discontents and murmurs in the country, that this bill was so long obstructed. Which being still represented to the king with the most ghastly aspects towards what effects it might produce, his majesty in the end was prevailed upon, notwithstanding very earnest advice to the contrary, not only to be willing to give his royal assent when it should be offered to him, but to take very great pains to remove those obstructions which hindered it from being offered to him, and to solicit particularly very many lords to depart from their own sense, and conform to what he thought convenient to his service; which gave those who loved him not great argument of triumph, and to those who loved him very passionately much matter of mortification. Yet after all this, and when his majesty had changed some men's resolutions, and prevailed with others to withdraw and to be absent when the bill should come again to be discussed, it was carried with great difficulty and with great opposition, and against the protestation of many of the lords.

In all the debate upon this bill, and upon the other of accounts, the chancellor had the misfortune to lose much credit in the house of commons, not only by a very [strong] and cordial opposition to what they desired, but by taking all occasions, which were offered by the frequent arguments which were urged "of the opinion and the authority of the house of commons, and that it was fit and necessary to concur with them," to mention them with less reverence than they expected. It is very true: he had always used in such provocations to desire the lords, "to be more solicitous in preserving their own unquestionable rights and most important privileges, and less tender in restraining the excess and new encroachments of the house of commons, which extended their jurisdiction beyond their limits." He put them often in mind "of the mischiefs which had their original from the liberties the house of commons assumed, and the compliance the house of peers had descended to, in the late ill times, and which produced the rebellion; and were carried so far, till, after all the multiplied affronts, they had wrested the whole authority out of the hands of the house of peers, and at last declared them useless members of the commonwealth, and shut up the door of their house with a padlock, which they had never power to unfasten till the king's return." And in those occasions his expressions were many times so lively, that they offended many of the lords who were present, and had too much contributed to those extravagancies, as much as it could do any of the commons.

The truth is, he did never dissemble from the time of his return with the king, whom he had likewise prepared and disposed to the same sentiments whilst his majesty was abroad, that his opinion was, "that the late rebellion could never be extirpated and pulled up by the roots, till the king's regal and inherent power and prerogative should be fully avowed and vindicated; and till the usurpations in both houses of parliament since the year 1640 were disclaimed and made odious; and many other excesses, which had been affected by both before that time under the name of privileges, should be restrained or explained;" for all which reformation the kingdom in general was very well disposed, when it pleased God to restore the king to it. Nor did the convention, which proclaimed the king and invited him to return, exercise after his return any exorbitant power, but what was of necessity upon former irregularities, and contributed to the present ends and desires of the king.

And this parliament, that was upon the dissolution of the former quickly summoned by the king's writ, willingly inclined to that method, as appears by those many excellent acts which vindicated the king's sovereign power over parliaments, and declared the nullity of all acts done by one or both houses without the king's assent; declared and settled the absolute power of the crown over the militia; repealed that act of parliament that had excluded the bishops from being members of the house of peers, and restored them to their session there; and repealed that other infamous act for triennial parliaments, which had clauses in it to have led the people into rebellion; and would willingly have prosecuted the same method, if they had had the same advice and encouragement.

But they had continued to sit too long together, and were invited to meddle and interpose in matters out of their own sphere, to give their advice with reference to peace and war, to hold conferences with the king, and to offer their advices to him, and to receive orders from himself; when his majesty was persuaded by very unskilful men, "that they were so absolutely at his disposal, that he need never doubt their undertaking any thing that would be ingratul to him, and that whilst he preserved that entire interest he had in the lower house, (which he might easily do,) he need not care what the other house did or had a mind to do;" and so induced his majesty to undervalue his house of peers as of little power to do him good or harm, and prevailed with him too far to countenance that false doctrine; towards which the house of peers themselves contributed too much, by not inquiring into or considering the public state of the kingdom, or providing remedies for growing evils, or indeed meddling with any thing in the government till they were invited to it by some message or overture from the house of commons: insomuch as they sat not early in the morning, according to the former custom of parliaments, but came not together till ten of the clock; and very often adjourned as soon as they met, because that nothing was brought from the house of commons that administered cause of consultation; and upon that ground often adjourned for one or two days together, whilst the other house sat, and drew the eyes of the kingdom upon them, as the only vigilant people for their good.

Then when any thing fell in their way, that they could draw a consequence from that might relate to their privileges, they were so jealous of an invasion, that they neither considered former precedents, nor rules of honour or justice; and were not only solicitous for that freedom which belonged to themselves and their menial servants, who ought not to be disquieted by private suits and prosecutions in law, whilst they are obliged to attend upon the service of their country in parliament, but gave their protections "ad libitum," and which were commonly sold by their servants to bankrupt citizens, and to such who were able but refused to pay their just debts. And when their creditors knew that they could have no relation of attendance to any man, and thereupon caused them to be arrested, they produced some protection granted to them by some lord; whereupon they were not only discharged, but their creditors, and all who bore any part in the prosecution, were punished with great rigour, and to their great loss and damage, and to the great prejudice of the city, and interruption of the whole course of the justice of the kingdom.

When the house of commons sent up a bill for the suppression or reformation of many irregularities and misdemeanours, which had grown up in the late times of disorder and confusion, as conventicles and other riotous assemblies, wherein there was a necessity of some clauses of power to inferior officers, whereby they were qualified to discover those transgressions which would otherwise be concealed; the lords would be sure always to insert some proviso to save their privileges, even in acts which provided for the punishment of such crimes as no person of quality could be supposed to be guilty of, as stealing of wood, and such vile trespasses: which took up much time in debate, and incensed the house of commons, and produced many froward debates, in which the king thought the peers in the wrong.

This kind of temper or distemper upon very trivial and light occasions, in seasons which required gravity and despatch, provoked the house of commons to take more upon them, to enter upon contests sometimes unreasonably with the lords, and to assume to themselves an authority in matters in which they ought not to interpose; and then were encouraged and indeed induced by those who had near relation to the king and were trusted in his service, to affect novelties both in the form and substance of their proceedings, which those persons concurred in, much out of ignorance what was to be done, and more out of affectation to compass some crooked end of their own, to the prejudice of another person who was in their disfavour. And when these sallies out of the old trodden path were taken notice of, and his majesty had [been] advised to prevent them in time, he was persuaded, either "that the exceptions were in matters of little moment, and made only by formal men who liked nothing that was out of the old common road; or that the liberty would be applied to his service, and in many useful occasions would mollify or subdue the inconvenient morosity of the lords; or, when it should exceed, it would be still in his majesty's power to restrain it, when he found it necessary." And these discourses prevailed too much with his majesty, till he now found the humour was grown too sturdy for him to contend with; and the same men, who had persuaded him to condemn it, were now more importunate with him that he would comply with it.

The chancellor had always as earnestly opposed the over-captious insisting upon privilege in the lords' house, either when in truth there was not a just ground for it, or when they would extend it further than it would regularly reach; and oftentimes put them in mind "of many exorbitant acts which stood still mentioned in their journals, books, of their proceedings in the late rebellious times, which might be looked upon as precedents by posterity, and in which the house of commons had really invaded their greatest privileges, and trampled upon their highest "jurisdiction; which was worthy of their most strict [proceedings] to vindicate by protestation, and by expunging the memorial thereof out of all their books and records, that there might be no footsteps left to mislead the succeeding ages;" and often desired them "to preserve a power in themselves to put the house of commons in mind of their exceeding their limits, for which they often gave them occasion, and particularly as often as they sent to quicken them in any debate, which was a very modern presumption, and derogatory from that respect which a house of commons had always paid to the house of lords. And this they could not reasonably or effectually do, till they declined all unjust or unnecessary pretences to privileges which were not their due, and especially to a power of calling private cases of right and justice, which ought to be determined by the law and in courts of justice, to be heard and adjudged before themselves in parliament; of which there were too frequent occasions to oppose and contradict their jurisdiction."

This free way of discourse offended many of the lords, who thought him not jealous enough of nor zealous for the privilege of the peerage: and they were now very glad that he used so much more freedom against the proceedings of the house of commons, which they were sure would be resented below, more than it had been above. And many of his friends informed him "how ill it was taken; and how carefully all that he said, and much that he did not say, was transmitted by some of the lords to them, who would not fail in some season to remember and apply it to his highest disadvantage;" and therefore desired him "to use less fervour in those argumentations." But he was in that, as in many things of that kind that related to the offending other men, for his own sake uncounsellable: not that he did not know that it exposed him to the censure of some men who lay in wait to do him hurt, but because he neglected those censures, nor valued the persons who promoted them; being confident that he would be liable to no charge that he should be ashamed of, and well knowing that he had, and being well known to have, a higher esteem of parliament, and a greater desire to preserve the just privileges of both houses, than they had who seemed to be angry with him on that behalf; and that the extending [them] beyond their due length would in the end endanger the destruction of parliaments.

But he shortly after found, that this guard was not secure enough to defend him. What he said in parliament was the sense of more who would not speak it, than there were of those who disliked it; and how much soever it offended them, they could not out of it find a crime to accuse him of. But they who were more concerned to remove him from a post, where he too narrowly watched and too often obstructed the liberties they took, resolved to sacrifice all their oaths and obligations, which obliged them to the contrary, to the satisfaction of their envy and their malice: and so whatsoever he said or advised in the most secret council to the king himself with reference to things or persons, they communicated all to those who had most reason to be angry, yet could not own the information. Of all which he had advertisement, and that a storm would be shortly raised to shake him, of which he had little apprehension; never suspecting that it would arise out of that quarter, from whence he soon after discerned it to proceed.

There was another particular and private accident that fell out at this time, that administered more occasion of faction and dissension in the houses, which always obstructed and perplexed all public business. The marquis of Dorchester had some years before married one of his daughters to the lord Roos, eldest son to the earl of Rutland; both families very noble in themselves, and of great fortunes, and allied to all the great families of the kingdom. The lady being of a humour not very agreeable, and not finding the satisfaction she expected where she ought to have received it, looked for it abroad where she ought not to find it. And her husband, as men conscious to themselves of any notable defect used to be, was indulgent enough, not strictly inquiring how she behaved herself, and she as little dissembling or concealing the contempt she had of her husband; until his friends, especially the mother, (who was a lady of a very great spirit and most exalted passion,) took notice of her frequent absence from her husband, and of her little kindness towards him when she was present with him. And the young lady, who with her other defects had want of wit to bear a reprehension she deserved, instead of excusing, avowed her no esteem of her husband; charged him with debauchery, and being always in drink, which was too true; and reproached him with folly, as a man not worthy to be beloved. And the passion swelling to a great height on both sides, the marquis came to be engaged on the behalf of his daughter, and challenged her husband to fight with him, who in many respects was not capable, nor did understand those encounters.

In the end, after many acts of passion, which administered too much cause of mirth and scandal to the world, yet by the advice and mediation of friends, as good a reconciliation as in such cases is usual was made, and the young couple brought to live again together. And the lady having the ascendant over the lord, who was very desirous to live quietly upon any conditions, that he might enjoy himself though he could not enjoy her, he was contented that she made a journey to London upon pretence to see some friends: and the time being expired which she had prescribed for her absence, he sent to her to return, which she deferred from time to time. But at last, after many months, she returned to him in so gross a manner, that it appeared that she had kept company too much, which she never endeavoured to conceal; and when her husband told her "that she was with child," and asked "who got it;" she answered him confidently, "that whoever got it, if it proved a boy, as she believed it would, he should be earl of Rutland."

This was more than the young man could bear without informing his mother, (the good earl not loving to engage himself in so much noise,) who presently took care that the great-bellied lady was made a prisoner in her chamber, strictly guarded, that she could not go out of those lodgings which were assigned her; all her own servants removed from her, and others appointed to attend; and all other things supplied that she could stand in need of or require, liberty only excepted. Yet in this close restraint she found means to advertise her father of the condition she was in, and made it much worse than it was, seeming to apprehend the safety of her life threatened by the malice of the countess, mother to her husband, "who," she said, "did all she could to "alienate his affection from her; and now that she "found she was with child, would persuade him that "it was not his; and took all this extreme course, "either to make her miscarry and so endanger "her life, or to put an end to mother and child "when she should miscarry:" and therefore besought her father, "that he would find some way "to procure her liberty, and to remove her from "that place, as the only means to save her life."

The marquis, with the passion of a father, and confidence of his daughter's virtue, and having no reverence for the countess, thought it an act of great barbarity, and consulted whether he could have any remedy at law to recover his daughter's liberty; and finding little hope from thence, (the restraint of a wife by the jealousy of her husband in his own house being not a crime the law had provided a remedy against,) he resorted then to the king, who as little knew how to meddle in it. In the mean time he sent women to see and attend his daughter, who were admitted to see and confer with her, but not to stay with her; the countess declaring, "that she should want nothing; but "that since it was impossible that the child could "be of kin to her son, who had not seen her in "so many months before the child must have "been got, she would provide that there should "be no more foul play, when she should be delivered; and after that time she should have no "more restraint or residence in that house, but "be at liberty to go whither she would."

The conclusion was, the lady was delivered, and a son born, who was quickly christened by the name of Ignoto, and committed to a poor woman, who lived near, to be nursed; and as soon as the lady recovered strength enough, she was dismissed and sent to a house of her father, who received her with the affection he thought was due to her. And having conferred and examined her with all the strictness he could, he remained satisfied in her innocence, and consequently of the barbarous treatment she had received, and the injury and indignity, both to him and her, that was done to the son; for which he was resolved to leave no way untried in which he might receive a vindication. In order to which he first desired the king to hear all parties, who was prevailed with to appoint a day for the doing it, being attended by some bishops and other lords of his council; when the marquis and his daughter, and the lord Roos and his mother, [appeared,] with more ladies than could have the patience to stay till the end of the examination, where there were so many indecent and uncleanly particulars mentioned, that made all the auditors very weary. Nor was there any room for his majesty to interpose towards a reconciliation, which was in view impossible; nor could the lady be excused for a great delight she took in making her husband jealous of her, and in expressing a contempt of him, whatever else she was guilty of: and so the king left it as he found it. And the marquis, who had heard many things he did not expect to have heard, took his daughter to his own house, that by her own strict behaviour she might best vindicate herself from the scandal she lay under: but she quickly freed him from that hope and expectation; for within a short time after, she, not being able to submit to the strict order and discipline of her father's house, which would not permit those wanderings she desired to make, nor the visits she desired to receive, made an escape from thence, and lodged herself at more liberty, and lived in that manner as gave too much evidence against her with reference to the time that was past.

The marquis, who was a man of great honour, and most punctual in all things relating to justice, gave a noble instance of both, and how much he detested the base and unworthy behaviour of his own child, when it was manifest to him. He went to the other noble family, asked their pardon "for his incredulity, and for any offence he "had committed against them, or reproach he "laid upon [them], for the vindication of an unworthy woman, who he believed now had deserved all and more aspersions than had been laid on her: and therefore he was ready to join "with them to free the family, as much as was "possible, from the infamy she had brought to "them and him, and that her base issue might not "be an eternal reproach in their family." Upon this she was first, upon the complaint of her husband, cited into the court of the arches before the ecclesiastical judges: where, after a full examination of witnesses on both sides, and hearing what she could allege in her own defence, her crime was declared to be proved sufficiently; and thereupon a judgment was pronounced "of a full and "entire separation a toro et a mensa pro causa "adulterii," in such a form, and with such circumstances, as are of course in those cases.

But all this was not remedy enough against the bastard's title to the honour of that illustrious family: and therefore there was a bill prepared, wherein all the foul carriage of the lady was set out, the birth and christening of Ignoto, the declaration and judgment of the court of the arches, and separation of the parties for the adultery proved; and thereupon a desire that it might be declared by act of parliament, "that the son, Ignoto "by name, is a bastard and incapable to inherit any "part of the title, honour, or estate of or belonging to the house of Rutland; and the same incapacity to attend all other children, which from "that time, the birth of Ignoto, had or might be "born from the body of that lady." And this bill being presented to the house of peers by a lord nearly allied to that family, the earl of Rutland being present with the marquis, as soon as it was read the marquis stood up, and "with expressions of trouble, and of the justice that was "due to the greatness of a noble house, that had "received a foul blemish by a woman of too near "a relation to him, of whom he was ashamed," gave his free consent to the bill, and desired that it might pass: and the earl likewise besought the house, "that so infamous a branch might not be "ingrafted into his family, of which his son, the "lord Roos, was the sole heir male, with whom "the honour must expire."

It was a case of general concernment as well as compassion, that an impudent woman should have the power to give an heir to inherit a noble title and fortune by descent, when it was so notoriously known and adjudged to be illegitimate, and a mere stranger to the blood of the house. Yet there were some very good lords, and who detested the woman and the wickedness, made such scruple of making a new precedent in a particular case, that undermined a foundation of law, and opened a door to let in an unjust declaration, upon pretences not so well proved, to the disinherison of one that should not be illegitimate. But though it was a rare case, it was found not to be a new one, there having been one or two declarations of bastardy in parliament in the reign of king Henry VII. and Henry VIII.

However, it was as just that she should be heard, to defend both herself and her son; and therefore the bill being read the second time, it was committed, with direction "that the lady" "should have personal [notice] to attend, before" "the committee entered upon it:" and after long inquiry at the places where she used to be, it was found that she had transported herself into Ireland, in the company of the person whom she had preferred before her husband; and there was reason to believe, that it was after she had notice of the bill. However, all proceedings were respite till there was full proof given to the house, by the person himself who had spoken with her in Ireland, and given her the warrant that required her attendance upon the committee: and then, after many days longer delay, it was read and debated, and by the committee reported to the house to be engrossed.

And then, and not till then, the duke of Buckingham opposed the passing of it, upon pretence, "that in the bill [the lord Roos] had assumed a" "title that belonged to him by his mother, who" "had been heir female to Francis earl of Rutland;" when that title, now challenged, had descended to George the brother of Francis, and had been enjoyed by two earls of Rutland since. It was generally thought a strange exception: nor was it known, whether the duke was disposed to it as a revenge upon the marquis, or to shew his own power, (for he had many who concurred with him in both houses upon many occasions,) or whether he did in truth desire to support the lady in her infamy, he not being over-tender in cases of that nature. However, it was necessary to recommit the bill, that some expedient might be there found to remove the obstruction, which though he was obstinate in till the house was tired with many days debate upon it, in which most of his adherents upon the unreasonableness left him, he persisted still and maintained the debate almost alone, till the time of the session approached; when the lord Roos was compelled to humour him in leaving out a title that all the world gave him. And then, after intolerable vexation to the house and loss of time, he desisted to appear against it; and the act passed the royal assent.

The ill humour of the house of commons was not abated; and though they knew well that their Irish bill could never have passed the upper house but by the king's powerful interposition, they remained still jealous, or pretended to be so, that he would not give his assent; which till he should do, they would admit no debate of money: so that as soon as the bill was presented to him, his majesty came to the house of peers, and sent for the commons to attend him upon the 18th day of January; when, after he had given his consent to that and another private bill which they had presented, he told them, "that he had now" "passed their bills, and that he had been in hope" "to have had other bills ready to have passed" "too." He said, "that he could not forget, that" "within few days after their coming together in" "September, both houses had presented to him" "their vote and declaration, that they would give" "him a supply proportionable to his occasions;" "and the confidence of that had made him anticipate that small part of his revenue which was" "unanticipated, for the payment of the seamen;" "and his credit had gone further than he had" "reason to think it would, but it was now at an" "end."

"This was the first day," he said, "he had" "heard of a supply, being the 18th of January," "and what it would amount unto, God only knew;" "and what time he had to make such preparations as were necessary to meet three such" "enemies as he had, they could well enough" "judge. And he must tell them, what discourses soever were abroad, he was not in any" "treaty; but by the grace of God he would not" "give over himself and them, but would do what" "was in his power for defence of both. It was" "high time for them to make good their promise; and it was high time for them to be in" "the country, as well for the raising of money, as" "that the lords lieutenants and deputy lieutenants" "might watch those seditious spirits which were" "at work to disturb the public peace. And" "therefore he was resolved to put an end to that" "session on Monday next come sennight, before" "which time he desired that all things might be" "made ready that he was to despatch." His majesty said, "he was not willing to complain" "that they had dealt unkindly with him in a" "bill he had then passed, in which they had" "manifested a greater distrust of him than he" "had deserved. He did not pretend to be without infirmities, but he had never broken his word to them; and if he did not flatter himself, the nation had never less cause to complain of grievances, or the least injustice or oppression, than it had had in those seven years since it had pleased God to restore him to them: he would," he said, "be glad to be used accordingly."

This little quickness in his majesty prevailed more upon them, than all the former application had done: and now they saw that they should not be suffered to continue longer together, they resolved to leave some relish of their former duty and compliance. Not that the humour was at all reformed or abated in those who had shewed so much frowardness, who still continued as perverse as ever; but they were overruled by the major part of the house, as they would have been sooner, if it had not been that a contrary course had been pursued to what had been formerly. Nor were they, who had advised that change, willing that his majesty should decline the same method, and were much troubled that he had not caressed the house more in his late discourse. And as they had before advised his majesty freely and without any condition to offer the repeal, and release the act that had granted the chimney-money to him, which was a very good and a growing revenue, but they observed to be unpopular; upon a presumption (which they assured him could not fail) that so generous an action in his majesty towards his people would be immediately requited by a grant of much greater value, (and they had prevailed in this counsel, if the chancellor and the treasurer had not with great resolution opposed it, and made evident to his majesty, "that he ought never to propose it himself though with conditions, because it would make the grace undervalued, and the conditions to be esteemed unreasonable; nor to hearken to any general proposition, or consent to the repeal of that act, without having a full and equivalent recompense (which ought to be very well weighed) granted in the same act of parliament; for he had now sufficient evidence, that the constant good-humour of the house was not to be depended upon:" which confirmed his majesty to resolve never to hearken to the one without the other, and so that mischief was prevented:) yet were now as desirous that the house of commons would still press the despatch of the bill of accounts, which rested in the lords' house; and assured them, "that if they would embrace the same positiveness they had done, the chancellor would be no more able to hinder the passing of that act, than he had been to keep his majesty from consenting to the Irish bill so much against his resolution." But they and their friends could not keep up the same spirit of stubbornness in the house, nor prevail with the king to recede from his purpose: so that the bill for accounts remained still in the house of lords not fully discussed. And such a progress was made in the house of commons, notwithstanding all opposition, that a bill for supply was prepared within the time prescribed, though in respect of the proportion not equal to the occasions, and entangled still with the same inconvenient clauses and provisos which had so unwarily been admitted at Oxford, and which made what was granted unapplicable to the procuring ready money; of which his majesty was now fully convinced. But the time was too short to labour in the alteration. And so the bill, as it was, was sent up to the lords, who, after the short formality that cannot be avoided, gave it a passage through that house: so that it was now ready for the king.

The eighth of February the king came to the parliament, and the speaker of the house presented the bill to the king, who gave his royal assent to it, and thanked them for it, with his assurance, "that the money should be laid out for the ends it was given: however," he said, "he hoped he should live to have bills of this nature in the old style, with fewer provisos." He took notice, "that the bill of accounts for the money that had been already raised since the war was not offered to him: but," his majesty said, "that he would take care (after so much noise) that the same should not be stifled; but that he would issue out his commission in the manner he had formerly promised the house of peers; and the commissioners should have very much to answer, if they should not discover all matters of fraud and cozenage." He told them, "the season of the year was very far spent, in which the enemy had got great advantage; but by the help of God, he would make all the preparations he could, and as fast as he could: and yet he would tell them, that if any good overtures were made for an honourable peace, he would not reject "them; and he believed all sober men would be glad to see it brought to pass.

"He would now prorogue them till towards winter, that they might in their several places intend the peace and security of their several countries, where there were unquiet spirits still working. He did pray them," and said, "he did expect it from them, that they would use their utmost endeavours to remove all those false imaginations out of the hearts of the people, which the malice of ill men had industriously infused into them, of he knew not what jealousies and grievances: for he must tell them again, and he was sure he was in the right, that the people had never so little cause to complain of oppression and grievances, as they had since his return to them. If the taxes and impositions were grievous and heavy upon them, they would put them in mind, that a war with such powerful enemies could not be maintained without taxes; and he was sure the money raised thereby came not into his purse." He concluded with promising himself good effects from their affections and wisdoms, wherever they were: and he did hope they should all meet again of one mind, for his honour, and the good of the kingdom." And so they were prorogued to the tenth day of October next.

And now the king had very much to do, more than he had time or tools to despatch. Yet he began first where the parliament left off, that when they came again together, they might have no cause to say, that he had not performed what he had promised, and so with the same passion renew their clamour upon the accounts, which was made now a very popular complaint; and whoever was accused of obstructing that examination, was presently concluded to have had a share in the prey. Yet he was not willing that such a strict account or examination should be made, especially into the receipt of the lord Ashley for the prizes, that all the world should know what money had been issued out by his own immediate orders, and to whom. Hereupon he commanded his attorney and solicitor general to prepare a commission, with all necessary clauses, to call all persons to account who had received any such monies, and to examine and take any exception to the same.

And that there might be no just exception to the commission, which he knew would be strictly looked into, they were required "to advise with all or any of the judges, that it might have their approbation; and that there should be a clause in the commission, whereby the commissioners should be authorized to call any of the judges to their assistance, when upon any matters of difficulty they should think it necessary." And that there might be no exception to any of the commissioners, as like to be partial in respect of friendship or alliance to any of those who were to be called before them, his majesty appointed all those persons, who were nominated for commissioners in the bill sent to the house of lords by the commons, to be inserted into this commission; and likewise made choice of such a number of the peers as was fit, to be joined to the others, and named those who had upon all debates in the house appeared most solicitous, that a very exact account should be required, and of such others who had no relation to the court, and were looked upon with the most esteem by the house of commons: all which was prepared with the expedition that was possible, and the commission sealed; and notice given to all the commissioners, that they should meet at a place appointed; upon a day named, presently after Easter, by which time the judges would be returned out of their circuits; and they were then at liberty to adjourn to what place they pleased.

We are now to enter upon the occurrences of the year 1667, a year little more prosperous to the public than the year preceding, and fatal in respect of many calamitous accidents to the chancellor, and which put a period to his greatness; the circumstances whereof, very notorious, were so interwoven with the public transactions of state, that it is not easy to make a distinct and clear relation of the one without the other.

The temper the parliament had been in, and the delay they had used in giving the king any supply towards the carrying on the war, made the king discern that he had been too confident of their generosity, and that they had already departed from that spirit with which they first had persuaded him to enter into that war: and it was as evident (which had been often foretold to him) that the Dutch could endure being beaten longer than he could endure to beat them. They were now relieved and supplied with the money of France, and the governing party had subdued all contradictions; and whatever their affections were, all compliance and submission appeared to the commands of the state; and there wanted nothing but the season of the year to carry their fleet again to sea, as great and as well provided as it had ever been. All murmuring was transplanted from thence into England, where it grew up plentifully: and the king was, upon the credit of an act of parliament that was passed on the eighth of February, to provide a fleet ready to encounter with the potent enemies in the spring. There was no trade by sea, and therefore could not be much by land, that could bring any benefit to the king; and the seamen ran all to the privateers, who adventured for booty, which they preferred before serving in the royal navy.

The king in these straits called that council together with whom he used to consult his most secret affairs; and the chief officers at sea, and the commissioners of the navy, attended to give such information as was necessary before any resolution could be taken. There the whole state of the navy [was inquired into]; what was in the stores, and what the defects or deficiencies were, and what hopes there were of supplying them; what ships were ready, and what would be made ready in three months. The victualler was sent for, to give an account what provision of victuals was ready, and what could be provided and put on board in the same time, which was the utmost that could be limited. Every officer protested, "that there could not be the least [attempt] towards any preparations without a good sum of ready money:" and the yards were in that necessity by reason of the great arrear of wages that was due to them, that they were near a mutiny, and could not be kept to their work, being necessitated to do any work abroad to get victual for their families. The inferior officers, which belonged to the stores, lived by stealing and selling what they were intrusted to keep. In short, all things were presented to be in that confusion, that there appeared no probability of being able to set out any fleet before the enemy would be so strong upon the coast, that it would be very difficult to make a conjunction between those ships which were in the river, and the other which were at Portsmouth and in other ports.

This desperate representation did not make the king take a sudden resolution: but the same council met many days morning and evening. All ways were thought upon which might administer hope to get any money; and considerations were entered upon what was to be done in case a fleet could not be provided fit to engage the enemy, and which way a defensive war was to be made at sea, and how the trade should be secured, and the coast and harbours be so preserved, that the enemy might do no affront at land; for every day brought loose and ungrounded intelligence of bodies of horse and foot, drawn in France to the sea-side in many places upon that large coast, and likewise in Holland, and great provision of flatbottoms, as if they intended to make some descent; which kind of rumours exceedingly discomposed the common people, though they who understood the expeditions of that nature, and with what difficulty land armies were transported, were not moved by those reports. After all expedients were considered and well weighed, his majesty found cause to despair of being able to set out in any time a fleet equal to the occasion, and so contracted his thoughts to the other part, for the defensive.

There is a point of land on the Kentish coast that extends itself into the sea, and at the very entrance of the river, where the king had often thought and discoursed of erecting a royal fort, that would both preserve the coast, and likewise be a great security to the river: and the prosecuting this design was in this consultation thought of great importance, and the erecting another fort in another place, and repairing and strengthening Landguard Point upon the coast of Essex and Suffolk.

For preparations for the sea, it was thought fit and enough, "that a good squadron of light frigates should ride on the coast of Scotland, and another of the same strength lie off Plymouth, both which should intercept the trade of Holland both outward and inward, if they did not maintain it with strong convoys, which would break their fleet; and in those cases the frigates would easily retire to their harbours. That some frigates should be always in the Downs, to chase picaroons from infesting the coast, and to observe and get intelligence of the enemies' motion, and upon occasion should retire up the river. That there should be some of the greatest ships at Chatham, Portsmouth, and other places, prepared and put in readiness against the end of summer, before which time money might be provided: and then the enemies' fleet being weary and foul, it might be presumed the French would return early into their own ports, which were so far off; and then the frigates from the west and the north might find the way to join with the great ships, which should be ready against that time, and

"either fight the Dutch if they should choose it, or infest their coast more than they had done this, and take all their ships homeward bound from all places, which, upon the fame of their being masters of the sea all the summer, would repair home without apprehension of an enemy." And there were some officers of great experience at sea, who, being called by the king to advise upon this project, declared with confidence, "that the Dutch would be greater losers by the war thus conducted the next summer, than they had been in any year since the war begun."

For the security of trade, it was declared, "that there was no possible way to secure it but by restraining it, and not suffering any merchants' ships to go to sea, and by giving them advice to send to all their factors and correspondents, that they should send no goods home till they received new orders:" which restraint some were against, "both because it would have an ill reception with the people, when they should find that a war, which had been entered into for the enlargement and advancement of trade, had produced a cessation of all trade; and it would appear very hard that men, who had laid out their own stocks and were willing to venture them, should be forbid and hindered from sending them to those markets for which they had provided them, and which would turn to little less loss to them than they should incur by their being taken by the enemy. Then it would be, not a discouragement but a dissipation of the seamen, who, if they could have no employment in the king's ships or in the merchant ships, would be scattered abroad to seek their fortune, that they would not be brought together when the king had occasion for their service. In the last [place]; that the giving this order for restraint, and advice to the merchants to inform their factors and correspondents, would be, and could not choose but be, an absolute publication of this resolution of the king to send out no fleet in the spring; which was yet agreed to be the highest secret."

All these reasons were temperately weighed and answered, "that it could not be unreasonable or unjust to hinder men from doing themselves harm: the king could not take their goods from them to his own use; but he might lawfully hinder them from spoiling or destroying the goods that were their own. That their being taken by the enemy (which would be unavoidable) concerned the king and the kingdom little less than it did the private owners: it would increase the insolence and the wealth of the enemy, and reflect upon his majesty's honour as well as impoverish his subjects; and the difference would be very great between losing their goods, and keeping them upon their hands for a better market. For the dissipation of the seamen, there would no great danger be of that: the squadrons on the western and the northern coasts, which must be very well manned, would entertain good numbers; and the rest would put themselves on board the privateers, who should be all bound to come home against the time the king would have occasion for their service, and then the privateers should be restrained as now the merchants. For the keeping the present resolution

"secret, which would by this means be published, it were to be desired that it might remain a secret as long as should be possible: but as discerning men would easily discover it, and could not but already know that it was impossible for the king in time to set out a ship, so it would quickly be evident to all the world; and the secret was not to be affected longer than it could be concealed."

There was another inconvenience or mischief that was in view, that would come like an armed man upon the city, which was want of fuel, especially the want of coals from Newcastle, of which there had been a vast quantity consumed in the late fire, which had likewise consumed those houses and chimneys which should be supplied; yet the people remained still, and were not like to be much the warmer for being crowded closer together. But to that there could be no other remedy applied, but the sending both orders to Newcastle to employ all their ships, and all they could procure, in sending as much coal as was possible to London and the towns adjacent, before the enemy's fleet could put to sea: and convoys were assigned too strong for their privateers or small parties of their men [of war]: and the king gave two or three vessels of his own, and likewise money, to fetch coals, that the poor might have them at the rates they cost; and directed the city to do the same. All which produced some good effect.

Upon the whole matter, and thorough examination of the whole, the king concluded upon all the particulars mentioned before, assigning proper persons to supervise every particular, that all should be executed in time that was agreed upon. The duke issued out all his orders to the ships, with which sir William Coventry was charged, whose office it was: and the king would charge himself with that which was most important, the fortification at Sheerness; whither his majesty made a journey in the cold and depth of winter, and took an engineer and some officers of the ordnance with him, that all things might be supplied from thence which belonged to that office. He caused master-workmen to be sent from London, and drew common labourers enough out of the country, having provided money to pay them. And after all things were in this order, and he had seen the work begun, he left the master-engineer, whom he designed to be the governor of the fort, for which he was very equal, upon the place; and committed the overlooking of the whole, that all possible expedition might be used, to one of the commissioners of the ordnance, who promised to look carefully to it: and his majesty returned to London, when in the opinion of all his servants he had stayed too long in such a season, and such an air, to the danger of his health. How all those resolutions and orders were executed afterwards, or complied with, must unavoidably be mentioned in its place.

It cannot be imagined by any man who in any degree knew him, that the chancellor, though he was present, could have any part in these resolutions but the submitting to them; every particular being so much [out] of his sphere, that he never pretended to understand what was fit and reasonable to be done: nor throughout the whole conduct of the war was he ever known to presume to give an advice; but presuming that all whose profession it was advised what was fit, he readily concurred. And he did always declare, "that in this last consultation all points were so fully debated; and that there was so concurrent an opinion in the commanders of the ships, and the officers of the navy, with the approbation of the duke of York, prince Rupert, and the general, that it was not possible to set out a fleet in time equal to that of the enemy, to engage with it; and that the next best would be to stand upon the defensive in the manner proposed: [that] it did not appear to him, that there was any election left but to pursue that course," which he did believe very reasonably proposed and resolved upon; nor did any thing occur to him, why very much good might not be hoped from it, he being so totally unskilful in the knowledge of the coast and the river, that he knew not where Sheerness was, nor had ever heard of the name of such a place till this last discourse, nor had ever been upon any part of the river with any other thought about him, than to get on shore as soon as could be possible.

The king had not himself thought of this defensive way, but approved it very much when he heard it so fully discussed, and in which himself had proposed all his doubts, which no man raised more pertinently in arguments of that nature than his majesty; and it may be he liked it the better, because at that time, as he was heartily weary of the war, so he was not without a reasonable hope of peace, which he resolved to cherish, as he told the parliament at parting he would do. The grounds of which hope, and the progress thereupon, the entering upon a treaty, and the conclusion thereof, will be the discourse and relation we shall next enter upon.

How ill success soever had attended the negotiation of Denmark by the irresolution and unsteadiness of that court, Mr. Coventry had conducted what had been committed to him with very good effect in Sweden. And after he had disposed that court (where he had rendered himself extremely acceptable) to a just esteem of the king's friendship, and an equal aversion to the Hollander, and concluded such articles as were for the present and joint convenience and benefit of both nations, and prepared them to be willing to enter into a stricter and nearer alliance, and to that purpose to send ambassadors into England, where they had an agent; he returned to give his majesty an account and information of the constitution and temper of that court, and of the nature and disposition of the two ambassadors who were to attend his majesty, who were chosen before he left Stockholm, and resolved to embark within ten days: which they did, and arrived about the time, or soon after, that the city was so miserably destroyed by fire; which was the less favourable conjuncture, not so much by the influence that dreadful distraction and damage was like to have upon the vigorous carrying on the war, as by the ill humour which the parliament shortly after appeared to be in, and their manifest obstinacy against the king's desires; which was a temper very different from what they expected to have found, and what they had been informed had possessed them from the time of his majesty's return. Nor was this manifest indisposition without some unhappy impression upon the spirits of the ambassadors, and that alacrity they brought with them presently to enter into a treaty, and conjunction of forces against the common enemy.

It was manifest enough, that the crown of Sweden was weary of the obligations they had been long bound in to France, which had superciliously neglected of late to comply with what was on their part to be performed; and rather endeavoured to make alliances with Denmark, and the lesser neighbour princes, as those of the house of Brunswick and Lunenburg, to their disadvantage, than to consider that crown which had been so useful to them, as if their friendship was so considerable to them. Nor was this out of a real disesteem of them; but that they might bind them to a faster dependance upon them, and that they might not be severed from their interest, whatsoever they should declare it to be. And therefore, when it was first suspected that they might be inclined to England, and that Holland apprehended that they might be induced to make a conjunction with the bishop of Munster, France (as hath been touched before) sent their ambassador Pomponne into Sweden, with a full year's salary of what was in arrear, much more still remaining due, and to incline that crown to a neutrality between the English and the Dutch; in which he found Mr. Coventry had prevented him, and though he had not then the character of ambassador, he was much better respected there than he was. And as they would have joined with the bishop of Munster, if he had advanced according to his pretence, or had not been absolutely taken off by France; so, when he was diverted from his purpose, they were the more inclined to make a firm alliance with England, and thereby such a further conjunction with other princes, protestant or catholic, that might give some check to the impetuous humour of France, which they now were as jealous of, and of their overflowing all the banks which belonged to their neighbours, as they had been formerly of the house of Austria; and for the same reason were as desirous to retire from any dependance upon or relation to that crown, as they had been formerly of its protection; and were very well prepared to change their alliance, and, if they might not be losers by it, to make a conjunction with Germany and the house of Austria, into which it was reasonable to be presumed that the United Provinces would be glad to be received upon moderate conditions when a peace should be made with England.

And this was the prospect that had been presented to them by Mr. Coventry, and upon view of which they now sent their ambassadors, without being terrified by the declaration of France on the behalf of the Dutch; and with a resolution, if they could not persuade Holland to separate from that conjunction, and make a peace apart with the king, (which they laboured by their ambassador the count of Dhona to the States,) to join their interest frankly to that of his majesty, and to run the hazard and expect the issue and event of the war.

The two ambassadors were Flemming and Coyet, both senators in the great council of Sweden, and men of prime authority there: the former of the greater place and esteem, being a nobleman of an ancient and noble extraction of a family in Scotland, that had lived through many descents in Sweden in great employment and lustre; and this man never dissembled a particular devotion to the king, and for that reason principally was designed to this negociation. The other was not so well born or bred, or of so cheerful a complexion, but a more thinking and melancholic man, more conversant in books, and more versed in the course and forms of business; and by his own virtue and humble industry had from a mean and low birth, which in those northern kingdoms is the highest disadvantage, by degrees ascended to the degree of a senator, which is the chiefest qualification; and had gotten his first credit and reputation by a negociation he was intrusted with in Holland, and a treaty well managed by him there: which made him liable in that court to be much inclined to the Dutch, and to have some particular friendship with De Wit, they having studied together in Leyden when they were young; and their familiarity after was improved to a good correspondence in that negociation in Holland.

This being well known and commonly spoken of there, Mr. Coventry endeavoured to prevent his designation to that employment, by speaking to the chancellor of that kingdom, who always received him with open arms, and gave good testimony of his hearty and passionate desire of a firm conjunction between the two crowns; and, though he was of a French extraction, had a full jealousy of the want of sincerity and justice of that nation. When he discovered the apprehension Mr. Coventry had, he persuaded him to acquiesce in his judgment rather than to credit common rumour: "that he well knew both, and had contributed to the election of both, who were very fit to be joined together in an employment of this nature, the gaiety and warmth of the one standing in need sometimes of the phlegm of the other, who would yet pay that reverence to him that was due to his superior quality; and that he was too good a Swede to have inclinations to the Dutch, how much conversation soever he had with them. In a word, he would pass his word;" which put an end to all further doubts: and it was well enough known, that he had been raised by and was a creature of the chancellor.

And in truth, from the time of their arrival in England he carried himself very fairly, and without any visible inclination to the Dutch, and much less to the French; and they both very frankly declared to those of the king's ministers with whom they conferred with intimacy, "that that crown would gladly be separated from them, if a good expedient might be found to make them no losers by it." Yet it is as true, that after they had been some months in England, and saw in how ill a posture the king was for the carrying on the war, and how far the parliament was from giving money, or from any reasonable compliance with his majesty's desires, Coyet did not concur with the same warmth in his despatches, with Flemming, into Sweden; but writ apart to the ministers there, "that they must take new measures, and not depend upon a conjunction with England, to which, how well soever the king was inclined, he would not be able to bear the part they expected, by reason that he had no power with the parliament;" which letters his majesty's agent then in Sweden had a sight of: which produced no other effect there, but, that if they saw that either the king was inclined to a peace, or would be reduced to a necessity to treat, the ambassadors should offer in the name of their master his interposition, which their ministers in France and Holland should then likewise make proffer of, upon advertisement first from them, but with a secret assurance to the king, "that if a treaty should not take effect," (which it could hardly be believed it would do), "the crown of Sweden would firmly unite itself to his majesty's interest, and engage in the war with him;" which it was evident they were more inclined to, than to a peace in which France might be comprehended. But that which they most desired was, that a peace might be made with the Dutch without comprehending France, in which they would willingly enter, which would draw Spain and all the princes of Germany to desire to be admitted for their own security.

The Conde of Molina was ambassador from Spain, near the king, a man rather sincere than subtle, and so had the more need of the advice and assistance of the baron of Isola, who was, under the title of envoy from the emperor, entirely trusted and supported (as most of the emperor's ministers were) by the king of Spain; who being a Burgundian, born in those parts which remain subject to Spain, had an implacable hatred to the French; and by the employments he had undergone in Italy and other places, where he had been ambassador, had made himself so considerable, that he was become notoriously odious to the French, and was a man of great experience and very subtle parts. Both those ministers did heartily wish a peace between England and Holland, with the exclusion of France: but if that could not be, they had much rather the war should continue as it was, than that France should be comprehended in the peace; for which they had some reason. For at this time the king of Spain died, which they had too many reasons to believe would put an end to the quiet of Flanders; and therefore would be glad that they might have the assistance of England for their defence, and in which Holland could not think itself unconcerned. The probability of this, and the constant intelligence they received from the Hague, "that there were already jealousies grown up between the French and the Dutch," persuaded them, and they endeavoured to persuade the king, "that Holland might be now induced to treat by themselves; or if they could not do that, but must proceed jointly with France, they would upon assurance of the king's affection sever themselves from them, if they insisted upon any thing that was not for the joint benefit of all." The king left them to do what they thought fit towards it, without undertaking any thing on his part until their fair intentions were discerned, and then to assure them of his majesty's inclinations to peace upon just and honourable conditions.

There is no doubt, there was a real jealousy and dissatisfaction between France and Holland at this time. The Dutch complained, "that the French had broken their promise with them no less this year than they had done the last: they had indeed declared and proclaimed a war, but they had done no acts of hostility; and whereas they were engaged that their fleet should have joined with theirs in the month of May, they had never been in view but at a great distance, and suffered the Dutch to fight so "many days together without any help from them. And upon their renewed promise, they had again carried out their fleet to meet with them in August; when they failed again, and left them exposed to the whole English fleet: so that they were compelled with some loss to get again into their harbours." And now they had a real apprehension, that they might treat with England apart, and leave them to support the war at sea by themselves, whilst they pursued their expedition against Flanders upon the death of the king of Spain.

On the other side, France as much complained of the proceedings of the Dutch: "that after they had received a great sum of money from them, without which they could not have set out their fleet, they no more cared for a conjunction with their ships, nor went to that length at sea which they were bound to; to join with them; which they might have done, if they had continued their course when they put to sea in the beginning of June. Instead of which they went over to the coast of England to find the English, confessing thereby, that they had no need of the assistance of the French ships; but leaving [them] to shift for themselves. And afterwards, in the end of August, they came not to the place they had promised to have done; by reason of which neglect and breach of faith, if a singular act of Providence had not prevented it, their whole fleet had fallen into the hands of the English, as some part of it did." But that which made them likewise willing that this war should be at an end was, that now, the king of Spain being dead, they might enter upon a war with Spain; towards which they prepared manifestos to publish upon the matter of their right, and already prepared levies of men, of which they could pretend no other use: yet they professed to the Spanish ambassador to have no such design in their purposes. However, they would not enter upon any treaty apart without the Dutch: nor would De Wit, who entirely governed the councils of Holland, be induced to consent to any overtures made to separate, before or in the treaty, from France; but informed me of whatsoever was proposed by the baron of Isola, or the Spaniard, or any other person, to that purpose, and enlarged upon that information more than was true, to endear his own punctuality.

The mother of the king was then at Paris, having chosen rather to reside there than in England, since she saw the resolution of a war between them, and desired nothing more than to be an instrument in the composing those differences, which she thought were not good for either of the crowns; and found now another style in that court than it had used to discourse in, and from the time of the news of the death of the king of Spain, that the French king had spoken as if he wished a peace with England: whereupon, about the time when the parliament was prorogued, the earl of St. Alban's came to London, as to look to the queen's affairs, of which he was the great intendant. He informed the king "of the good temper the French court was in, and that he was confident, if his majesty would make any advance towards it, the queen would be able to dispose that king to hearken to it, and to be a mediator between England and Holland; and

"either to draw them to consent to what was just, or to separate from them: and he thought it very reasonable, that the conditions should be referred to the king of France, who he was sure, upon such a trust, would be very careful of the king's honour and interest." He professed "to have no authority for any thing he proposed, from the French king or any of his ministers, but from the queen's conjectures and his own observation: and if the king would give him a commission, he would presently return, and would not be known to have any powers, till he should find such a conjuncture to own it, as [that] the peace should be concluded before there should be any discourse of a treaty, (which he knew the French most desired,) lest Spain might interpose to perplex or delay it." And therefore he proposed, "that he might carry instructions with him, upon what conditions the king would be willing that a peace should be established." His majesty was resolved never to make the French king arbitrator of the conditions of the peace, nor that it should be treated at Paris; and most of all, that the earl of St. Alban's should not have any power to treat, "who," the king always used to say, "was more a French than an English man:" and he likewise resolved, "that no overture should be made towards peace in his name."

Whilst this was in suspense, the earl received letters from Paris, in which he was advised "to return thither with power to treat, and with information what conditions the king expected; for that his most Christian majesty had so prepared the Dutch, that he should have present power to treat and conclude; and so all things might be settled before the formality of a treaty should be entered into or heard of." This did not alter the king's resolution against authorizing the earl to treat, or making Paris the place of the treaty. But because the letters were written by monsieur Ruvigny, who was a person well known to the king, and of whom he had a good opinion, and whom he well knew to be too wary a man to write in that manner without having good authority to do so; his majesty was contented "that the earl should make haste to Paris; and if he found by Ruvigny that what they proposed was really desired, he should undertake to know that the king was very well inclined to peace, and that himself would willingly confer with any body he would carry him to; and whatsoever should be proposed, he would with all possible expedition transmit it to the king:" with this further direction, "that if he were satisfied that their intentions were real, which the alterations in their own affairs made probable, he should endeavour, by the queen or Ruvigny, to discover whether it would not be possible to persuade that king to treat apart and exclude Holland; and if it appeared to him that was not to be hoped, that at least his majesty would think it reasonable, that the Dutch should restore whatsoever fort or other place they had taken upon the coast of Guinea, and likewise pay a good sum of money to the king towards the charge of the war."

The earl of St. Alban's had no mind to return with no larger a commission, and pretended to know "that this was not the way to advance a treaty, and that he could as well write what the "king directed, and know again by letter what they thought of it; and therefore he would stay and despatch the business which the queen sent him about, before he would return." But when he saw the king was contented he should stay, rather than have nothing to do in the treaty, he chose to be at the beginning of it, and thought he should not be afterwards left out; and so offered the king to depart without further delay.

The king had from the beginning informed the chancellor of all that the earl had said to him from his arrival: and when he had received those letters from Ruvigny, he sent him to shew them to him; and himself came presently whilst the earl was there, and directed him to prepare the instructions for him, which the earl likewise desired he might do. The chancellor very well knew, that his credit with the king was much lessened, and that of the lord Arlington much increased, who did not like that he should meddle in the affairs proper to his office: besides he had no mind to be intrusted in the transactions with France, of whose want of faith he had too much experience; which would neither be grateful to the queen mother nor to the earl. And therefore he very earnestly besought the king, "that, it being the lord Arlington's province, all those despatches might pass through his hands." The king said, "that he knew the lord Arlington desired his help, and that he should prepare all those despatches," which he required him to do: and the earl of St. Alban's seemed very much to desire, "that not only his instructions might be prepared by him, but that he might always receive his majesty's pleasure signified by him, upon any material point that should arise;" which the king promised him he should do. Upon which the other, who durst not decline those commands he was so unwilling to obey, humbly desired his majesty, "that the whole matter might be first communicated to that committee of the council, with which he consulted his most secret affairs; and that the earl of St. Alban's might be present at the debate; and that whatever he should be appointed to put into writing might be perused at that board, and if it required his majesty's signature, it should be presented to him by the secretary:" all which his majesty consented to. And all being done according to what is mentioned before, the earl departed for France.

It is very true, there was yet no visible alteration in the king's confidence towards the chancellor with reference to his business, in which his majesty had no reserve, and spent as much time with him, and vouchsafed as often to go to his house, as he had ever used to do. But when he offered to speak to him of other matters, as he could not forbear to do, which he thought concerned him more than his most public transactions; he found his countenance presently shut, no attention, and no answer, or such a one as shewed he was not pleased: and he took all occasions to make others see, that he was advised only by him in what immediately related to his business, and not more in that than by other men.

When the earl came to Paris, he found the French less upon their guard than he expected: and the king himself frankly expressed himself "to wish an end of this war, and that he might be possessed of the king's friendship, which he "valued exceedingly;" and referred to monsieur Lionne, "who," his majesty said, "was prepared to speak to him." Monsieur de Lionne kept himself within generals, "of the benefit that England would receive by a peace, which made his Christian majesty desire to promote it, and never more to depart from his friendship. That he was obliged in honour now not to quit the Dutch, having entered into a treaty with them when he had no imagination that there would be a war between them and England; that he had been often sorry for it, and had given them just occasion to complain, that he forbore longer than he ought to have done to give them help: and therefore he could not now leave them to themselves, except they were obstinate, and refused to make peace upon just conditions; and then he would renounce them." But when he found that the earl had no power, and that he talked of money to be given for the charge of the war, and expected to have particular overtures to send to the king; he brake off the discourse till he could confer with his master.

Within two or three days monsieur de Lionne visited the earl, and told him, "that if any thing were to be done towards a peace, there must be no time lost: it was yet in the power of the most Christian king to bring it to pass upon just and honourable terms; but he knew not how long it would continue in his power; for he confessed the Dutch took themselves to be so much behindhand, that they had no mind to peace, believing they had now advantage. That it was never heard of, that after a war between two nations, upon the making peace, either side consented to pay the charge of the war: therefore any expectation of that, or but mention of it, would shut the door against any treaty." He gave two papers to him to send to the king, both under his own hand, which his majesty had the choice of, and which the Dutch would consent to; "but if [that] should be required, the treaty was at an end before it was begun, and the sword must determine it."

One of the papers contained an equivalent, of which his majesty might make his choice; whether "all things should continue in the state and posture in which they were at present, either side enjoying what they had got, and sustaining what they had lost, and so all things to remain as they were before the war;" or, "that a true and just computation should be made of the losses on both sides, and they who were found to have received most damage should be repaid at the charge of the other." The other paper was, "that if his majesty approved of either of these expedients, he should himself make choice of the place where the treaty should be, whither all parties should send their ambassadors:" but then the French king desired, "that his majesty would not make choice of any place in the king of Spain's dominions;" and the Dutch ambassador there had nominated Cologne or Francfort or Hamburg. And the earl of St. Alban's immediately sent away an express with those two papers to the king, upon receipt whereof the council were summoned.

There was no hope of money, which some, not reasonably, had expected should be paid whenever a peace should be made; and it had been mentioned in Holland as a thing they expected should be propounded, it may be, that it might be propounded and rejected. Then the despatch of whatsoever should be agreed concerned the king very much, that the Dutch might not put to sea, nor discover that the king had no fleet to set out; for the spring was not yet come, though approaching. There appeared little difficulty in the choice of the equivalent, for the English had taken much more from the Dutch than they had taken from England; and the other computation would be endless, and liable to very difficult examinations: so that by an unanimous advice the king resolved to choose the first equivalent.

But then the place for the treaty was not so easy to be chosen. The most natural had been Brussels, Antwerp, or some other large city in Flanders, which were all neutral places, and to which all parties might repair with the same ease and security. Whereas all the places mentioned in Germany were at so great a distance, that the summer would be far entered into, and so, many acts of hostility pass, before the ambassadors could meet; and the English must pass through the enemy's country thither: therefore there could be no thought of any of those places. Then the king of France had taken upon him to exclude Flanders, which he had no power to do, and it was as desirable to the Dutch as to the king: and therefore it was thought reasonable, that the king should insist upon some good town there, of which there was choice enough; and if Holland should approve it, France could not reject it. But on the other hand it was clearly discerned, that France would never send ambassadors into a country which he meant at the same time to invade; and that his majesty knew very well to be the intention, and the ground of that king's desiring the peace, which it was plain enough the Dutch did not desire, and were only drawn to consent to a treaty by the positive demand of France, which they durst not contradict: and therefore it concerned the king to preserve that good disposition, and that the French ambassadors might come fully instructed to concur with the English in what should be just, and prevent any insolent carriage of the Dutch, or the Dane, who was likewise to have his ambassadors upon the place.

Upon those reasons the express returned with his majesty's consent and election of the first equivalent, and "that as soon as he should know that the Dutch had consented to it, his majesty would propose some equal place for the treaty." And as soon as the express was despatched, his majesty entered upon the debate of a fit place for the treaty; and said, "that he had a proposition then made to him by sir William Coventry, that was of such a nature as much surprised him, as he believed it would the lords; yet he had not thought enough to dislike or condemn it:" and so bade the other to propose it. He, with some short apology which he did not use to make, said, "that he perceived there would be little less difficulty in agreeing upon a place for the treaty than upon any doubts which might arise in it; for if the king of France was to be gratified in the exclusion of Flanders, it would be very inconvenient to oblige the king to send into Germany, which by the great delay would deprive the king of the greatest benefit he expected from the treaty; the speedy despatch whereof would be attended with the greatest conveniences: therefore he had proposed to the king, that he would immediately write to the States General without acquainting France with it, and offer to send his ambassadors to treat the peace at the Hague, that it might be speedily concluded, which would otherwise take up much time in sending for any resolution to the States upon what should arise. If they consented to it, it would probably be attended with success, the general affection of the people being well known to desire peace: and if they refused it, the world would conclude that they would have no peace, when they would not treat about it; and that his majesty would never have done them the honour to have sent his ambassadors home to them, if he had intended to deny any thing that was reasonable to them."

It was very new, and thought of by nobody but the lord Arlington [and sir William Coventry], who had communicated it together; and the objection of the condescension that it would seem to most men, as if the king sent to beg a peace at their own doors, was obvious to all men: but that would have been an objection against admitting it to have been at Paris. But the States not [being] upon any level that pretended to an equality, the probable convenience or benefit that might attend it was only to be considered; and the affection and desire of the people generally to peace was so notorious, that there was reason to believe that they would not be willing that a treaty begun amongst them should end but with effect: and therefore it was unanimously agreed, that the advice should be pursued. But then it was a new doubt, how the message or overture or letter, for the form was not yet thought of, should be conveyed; for the sending a trumpet or express had much more of application than the thing itself: and it was to be wished, that it might be gone out of the king's hands before the answer could come from Paris, lest new instance should be made for a particular place.

It was at last resolved, that the Swedes ambassadors (both France and Holland having accepted the mediation of that crown) should be consulted with, to engage their minister at the Hague to deliver [it] to the States General; for there was some apprehension, that if De Wit knew of it, it might be considered only by that committee which was deputed for that affair, and never be brought to the States: and the adjusting all that was commended to the chancellor, who presently sent for the ambassadors, and found them very ready to perform any office which might bring them upon the stage in the treaty. And upon communication together, they were willing to send a servant of their own to the Hague, who should deliver to their ambassador the king's message to the States General, as an effect of their mediation and credit with the king. And so it was delivered, not in the form of a letter, but of a message in the third person to the States General, signed by the king and under the signet; and the ambassadors sent a gentleman in post with it.

But within two days a new alarm comes from France; and all that was done proved to be to no purpose. When they received the king's answer, they could not but acknowledge that it was as fair as they could expect; and monsieur de Lionne shewed it as such to the Dutch ambassador, who finding that he was satisfied with it, and by him, that the king was so too, fell into much passion, and declared, "that it was not according to the consent he had given to the king and to monsieur de Lionne; and that he must protest against any treaty to be entered into upon this declaration." He put him then in mind, "that he had informed the king, in his presence, that there was an article in the late treaty between England and Holland, by which they were obliged to deliver up the island of Poleroone in the East Indies to the East India company of London, which they had formerly consented to with Cromwell, but had neither delivered it then nor yet, and were resolved rather to continue the war than to part with it; which he had declared, when with reference to all other things he consented to the alternative: and if the king would [not] release that article of the former treaty, his masters would not enter upon any new."

Whether this was true or no cannot be known. But monsieur de Lionne came in great disorder to the lord of St. Alban's, and told him all that the ambassador had said, and confessed it "to be very true, and that the king remembered it well, and promised that article should be released: but that he, not clearly understanding the delivery of it to be contained in a former treaty, and knowing it had been many years in the possession of the Dutch, and that it still remained so, thought it had been comprehended in the alternative, and forgot to insert it in the paper that was sent to the king, for which he asked a thousand pardons; and made it his suit to the king that he would yield to it, and that a treaty that was so necessary to the good of Christendom might not be extinguished upon his negligence and want of memory;" which was a strange excuse for a minister of his known sagacity.

The earl of St. Alban's refused to transmit any such tergiversation to the king, and said, "he knew the king would never consent to it; and that this manner of proceeding, after that his majesty had consented to what themselves proposed, would shut out all future confidence of their sincerity." Monsieur de Lionne was exceedingly troubled and out of countenance, as a man conscious to himself of a great oversight, and desired him, "that he would meet the Dutch ambassador at his lodging, that they might together endeavour to remove him from the obstinacy he professed;" which the earl was contented to do, and the ambassador, how unwillingly soever, was prevailed with to meet at the time appointed: but they were no sooner met, and monsieur de Lionne entered upon the argument of Poleroone, but the ambassador fell into a rude passion, and said, "the war should determine it." And when the earl of St. Alban's began to speak of the unreasonableness of the demand, and entered upon the foul manner in which they had first taken that island from the English, who were in possession of it; he told him, "that he had nothing to say to him," and used much other language unfit for the other to hear, and [which] he had returned with interest, if monsieur de Lionne had not interposed, and being very desirous the conference should end, the ambassador's insolence being not to be endured. And so they parted, Lionne seeming very much offended; and he complained to the king, and the earl gave the account of all to his majesty.

The French king was no less surprised and offended when he heard what message the king had sent to the States, (which he was advertised of by an express from Holland,) than De Wit had been at the delivery of it, who presently knew the drift of it, and could not forbear to tell the States, "that the design was only to stir up the people against the magistrates, and indeed to make them the judges of the conditions of the peace:" and he knew well that the people generally were no friends to the East India company, (where himself had a great stock, and therefore would never consent that a treaty entered into should break only upon their interest; which likewise was the reason, why they had provided that that particular should be first consented to, before any treaty should be agreed upon. And hereupon he prevailed upon the States General forthwith to declare in the negative, "that the treaty should not be at the Hague." But at the same time, after the naming again of Cologne and Francfort, they added, "that if the king desired to do them the honour to appoint it in any place of their dominions, which they did not presume to propose, they should consent that it might be at Breda, or Maestricht," or a place or two that they named: and this was resolved before the people heard that the king had named the Hague, and wondered and murmured at their refusal.

The king of France took it ill, that at a time when he proceeded with so much openness, and had given the first rise to a treaty, and opened the door which the Hollander peevishly shut against it, by his own offering the alternative, which the king had so far approved as to make his election; he should at the same time, without communicating it to him, send this overture to the Hague: which troubled him the more, that it gave him matter of jealousy to apprehend, that there was some other underhand treaty that was concealed from him, and contrived by the baron of Isola, who he knew had been privately at the Hague, and had conference with De Wit. And the same imagination did more perplex the queen mother and the earl of St. Alban's, who looked upon this as a device to exclude them from having any share in the peace; the earl having digested the conclusion in his own breast, that in what place soever the treaty should be held, he should without doubt be intrusted in the managery of it. However the king could not own his part of the dislike, since his majesty might without any violation of friendship make the overture by message to the Hague, as well as to or by him: therefore he seemed to take no exception to it, and only sent the king word, "that he believed the Dutch would quickly discern, that this condescension in his majesty proceeded from some expectation of a party amongst the people to second it; and therefore he was confident they would never consent to treat at the Hague." But he proposed, "as the best way for expedition, that it might be at Dover," which he advised his majesty not to reject: "for if it were once begun there, it might possibly, and he would further it all he could, quickly be removed to Canterbury, and probably might be concluded in London."

But before this message arrived, the other new demand of Poleroone, with monsieur de Lionne's acknowledgment of the defect of his memory, and that he ought to have inserted it in the paper that contained the alternative, with all the excuses he made for it, was received; which seemed to put an end to all hopes of peace. The king was highly incensed, and looked upon it as an affront contrived by both parties to amuse him. Every body concluded, that there could be no safety in depending upon any thing that could be offered from France, when they could never be without as reasonable a pretence as they had at present, to disclaim or avoid any concession they had made in writing:—that the particular demanded could never be consented to by his majesty, without swerving from the common rules of justice, and the violation of his own honour:—that though it did not immediately concern his majesty in his own interest and the interest of the crown, which was an argument used in France for his majesty's not insisting upon it, it was however an unquestionable and a very considerable interest of his subjects, which he was in justice bound to maintain, and which in justice he had no power to release. It was an interest so valuable, that Cromwell had insisted upon it so resolutely, that they had consented to it as a principal article of the peace he made with them; by which he gained great reputation with the people. And his majesty had thought himself so much concerned in honour not to suffer his subjects to be deprived of that right which Cromwell had vindicated, (though by his death it came not to be executed,) that he would never consent to the treaty that had been concluded since his happy return, until they consented to and renewed the same article, and promised the redelivery of the said island to the English by such a day: and their having broken their faith in not delivering it according to the last treaty, and with very offensive circumstances, his majesty had declared to be a principal cause of the war, and made them unquestionably to appear the first aggressor. And in that respect, his honour could not receive a more mortal wound than in releasing that article, which concerned the estates of other men, and would in the opinion of the world draw the guilt of the war upon himself, or, which would be as bad, the reproach of having purchased a peace upon very dishonourable conditions to himself, at the charge and with the estates of his subjects.

Upon the whole, the king resolved rather to undergo the hazard of the war, upon what disadvantage soever, than to consent to a proposition so dishonourable: and a despatch was presently sent to the earl of St. Alban's, with a very lively resentment "of the indignity offered to the king "in receding from what was offered by themselves, and in asking what he was resolved "never to grant." And all were enjoined to review all that had been resolved for the war, and to give the utmost advancement to it that could be possible: and without doubt, if Spain had yet put itself into any posture to defend itself against the power that was even ready to invade it, and to act any part towards the support of a common interest, the king would hardly have been persuaded to have hearkened more to any propositions from France.

Notwithstanding all this, new overtures and new importunities were sent from France. "It "was true, that the Dutch had always protested "against making a peace or consenting to a treaty "without the release of Poleroone; which his "Christian majesty had consented to, and could "not recede from it without their consent, though "the mention of it had been unfortunately "omitted by monsieur de Lionne: but his majesty promised and engaged his royal word, "that when the treaty should be entered into, he "would use all his credit and authority to persuade the States General to recede from their "obstinacy, and to make no alteration in the last "treaty; but that all things [should] remain as "had been settled by it. And if he could not "prevail with them to satisfy him therein, as he "did fear that there was upon their particular interest some peremptory resolution fixed, from "whence they would not be removed as to the "main; yet in that case he did in no degree despair of obliging them to give a considerable "sum of money for recompense thereof, which he "desired might satisfy the king, who would find "himself at much ease by it. And if the commissioners once met and the treaty was begun, "it would not be dissolved before a peace should be "concluded; and that the French ambassadors, as "soon as they met, should propose a cessation "from all acts of hostility, which he expected "should be as soon yielded to as proposed; and "that already they had promised that their fleet "should remain in their harbours till the middle "of May, before which time the treaty might well "begin." And from the present time the French king promised, "that no hostile act should be "done by him, and that his own fleet should not "stir out of their port; and that his ambassadors "should in all things behave themselves as his "majesty could wish, that particular only of "Poleroone [excepted], in which they should do "as he had promised."

The king had by this time had recourse to all the inventions and devices, which might yet enable him to set out a fleet that might be able to fight the enemy; but in vain. He found all men of the same opinion they had been, that he must be upon the defensive in the manner expressed before, and expect the end of the summer before he could draw his ships together; and that there was an universal impatience for peace: so that when the warmth of his indignation was a little remitted, he was very willing to hear any thing that might revive the hope of a treaty, when this last overture from Paris arrived; upon which he presently convened the council, that he might take a speedy resolution what he was to do, for he saw many conveniences might be lost by the not speedily entering upon the treaty, if it were to be entered upon at all. The protestation and promise of France to assist in all things, that particular only excepted, for his majesty's service, and his promise even in that, made him willing to believe that they might be real: the hope of recompense for it seemed little inferior to the redelivery of the island, and was an equal satisfaction to his majesty's honour. And it seemed the more probable to be compassed, in that De Wit in his private conference with the baron of Isola, in all his passion, in which he would not endure the mention of the delivery of Poleroone, and said, "that the States would perish before they would

"part with it," concluded, "that he would not say, that they might not be persuaded to give some recompense for it."

And many believed that the East India company, which was only concerned in the interest of it, would choose rather to receive a good recompense than the island itself, which was a barren, sandy soil, which yielded no fruit, but only nutmegs, which was the sole commodity it bore, and is a commodity of great value. But when they were bound to give it up to Cromwell, there had been immediate order sent to cut down all the trees upon the island; which order would be now again repeated: and so no less than seven years must expire before any fruit could be expected from thence. And it was so far from any English factory, and so near to the Dutch, that they would easily possess themselves of it again when they had a mind to it. And therefore if the company might have money, or such a quantity of nutmegs delivered to them, as might, besides being enough for the expense of England, bear a part in the foreign trade, (which had been mentioned by some merchants of that company,) it might be reasonably preferable to the island.

Whatsoever resolution should in the end be taken, this expedient of recompense gave a hint to a counsel that had not been yet thought of, which was to leave the business of Poleroone to the sole managery of the East India company, who should be advised to choose some members of their own, who should go over with the ambassadors, and receive all advice and assistance from them in the conduct of their pretences: and they would be the witnesses of what the king insisted upon on their behalf; and would likewise judge, if nothing prevented the peace but that interest, how far it should be insisted on.

The East India company was sent for, and were told "that the king had hope of a treaty for peace, which he presumed would be welcome to them: he heard that the greatest difficulty and obstruction that was like to arise would be concerning their interest in the island of Poleroone, which he was resolved never to abandon. But because he heard likewise that the Dutch did intend to offer a recompense rather than to restore the place, and that the recompense might be such as might be as agreeable to them, (of which he would not take upon him to judge, but leave it entirely to themselves,) he had given them this timely notice of it, that they might bethink themselves what was fit for them to do, upon a prospect of all that might probably occur; and that they might make choice of such persons amongst themselves, who best understood their affairs, to the end that when the treaty should be agreed upon and the place appointed, and his majesty had resolved what ambassadors he would send, (of all which they should have seasonable notice,) those persons elected by them as their commissioners [might] go over with the ambassadors; that when that point came into debate, and the Dutch should call some of their East India company to inform them, they likewise might be ready to advertise his ambassadors of whatsoever might advance their pretences: and if a recompense was to be considered, they might enter into that consultation with the other deputies; and that they should be sure to receive all the advice and assistance from his ambassadors, that they could require or stand in need of." The company received this information from his majesty with all demonstration of duty and submission, giving humble thanks for his majesty's bounty and care of their interest; and said, "they would not fail to make choice of a committee to attend the ambassadors, when they should know it would be seasonable."

The king thought it now time to receive the advice of his whole council-board upon this affair, which had been hitherto only debated before the committee for foreign affairs: and so being assembled, an account was given of all that had passed, with all its circumstances, in France and in Holland, by the baron of Isola and by the Swedes ambassadors. And his majesty said thereupon, "that he had yet taken no resolution, and had been so provoked by the miscarriage of France, that he would have been glad to have put himself into a better posture, and not thought further of a treaty, till there should appear a more favourable conjuncture: but they now understood as much as he did, with reference to the state he was in both at home and abroad, and that he was resolved to follow their advice."

All the objections which had been foreseen before, and the considerations thereupon, were renewed and again debated: and in the end there was a general concurrence, "that his majesty should embrace the opportunity of a treaty; and if a reasonable peace could be obtained, it would be very grateful to the whole kingdom, that was weary of the war; and that his majesty should lose no time in returning such a despatch to Paris, as might bring on the treaty." And some of the lords proceeded so far as to declare, "that the consideration of Poleroone was not of that importance, nor could be thought so by the East India company themselves, as that the insisting upon it should deprive the kingdom of a peace that was so necessary for it." But the king thought the entering upon that argument was not yet seasonable: but he gave order for the despatch to be prepared for France.

There were two material points not yet determined, the first of which was fit to be inserted into the present despatch; which was the nomination of the place where the treaty should be. Some were of opinion, "that his majesty should [lay] hold of the overture that had been made from France, which was since likewise confirmed by Holland, that the treaty should be at Dover:" but they changed their minds, when they well considered that the same objections would be naturally made against Dover on the king's behalf, that had been made by the Dutch against the Hague; and that the people there, and less at Canterbury, were not incapable of any impressions, which the numerous trains of the French and the Dutch would be ready to imprint in them. In a word, there was much more fit to be considered upon that point, than is fit to be remembered. The conclusion was, "that Breda, which had been offered by the Dutch, should be the place the king would accept;" which was added to the despatch for Paris, and presently sent away.

The other matter undetermined of was the choice of ambassadors, which had been never entered upon. The king had spoken with the chancellor, what persons would be fit to be employed in that negotiation, when the time should be ripe for it; and took notice, as he did frequently, of the small choice he had of men well acquainted with business of that nature: upon which he had named to the king the lord Hollis, who had been lately ambassador in France, and was in all respects equal to any business, and Mr. Henry Coventry of his bedchamber, who had shewed so great abilities in his late negotiation in Sweden. Upon the naming of whom his majesty said, "they were both very fit, and that he would think of no other:" so that when all other particulars were adjusted with reference to the treaty, the king, without further consulting it, declared, "that he intended to send those two his ambassadors for the treaty," before either of them knew or thought of the employment. And when his majesty told them of it, he bade them repair to the chancellor for their instructions. And this gave new thoughts of heart to the lord Arlington, who had designed himself and sir Thomas Clifford, who was newly made a privy counsellor and controller of the household upon the death of sir Hugh Pollard, for the performance of that service; and thought himself the better qualified for it by his late alliance in Holland, by his marriage with the daughter of monsieur Beverwaert, a natural son of prince Maurice. And this disappointment went very near him; though the other had not the least thought that he had any such thing in his heart, but advised it purely as the fittest persons who could be thought of; and their abilities, which were well thought of before, were very notorious in this negotiation.

The Swedish ambassadors, who were the only mediators, prepared likewise to go to the treaty, having agreed with the king, "that if the treaty should not produce a peace," of which they who hoped most were not confident, "that crown would immediately declare for the king, and unite itself to his interest both against the Dutch and the French;" their army at that time, being held the best in Europe, under the command of their general Wrangel, being near the States' dominions. And for the better confirming them in that disposition, the chancellor had brought the baron of Isola to a conference with the Swedes ambassadors, and begun that treaty between them which was shortly after finished, and known by the style of the Triple Alliance, that was the first act that detached the Swede from France: and for the present the king himself found means to supply the crown of Sweden with a sum of money for the support of their army.

All things being thus adjusted, and the place of the treaty being on all hands agreed to be Breda, and notice being sent from Paris, "that their ambassadors were departed from thence;" the king thought himself as much concerned in the expedition in respect of the cessation, which the French promised to obtain in the very entrance into the treaty; and it was now the month of May. And so his ambassadors were despatched, and arrived there before the middle of that month, with an equipage worthy their master who sent them.

There happened at this time an accident that made a fatal breach into the chancellor's fortune, with a gap wide enough to let in all that ruin which soon after was poured upon him. The earl of Southampton, the treasurer, with whom he had an entire fast friendship, and who, when they were together, had credit enough with the king and at the board to prevent, at least to defer, any very unreasonable resolution, was now ready to expire with the stone; a disease that had kept him in great pain many months, and for which he had sent to Paris for a surgeon to be cut, but had deferred it too long by the physicians not agreeing what the disease was: so that at last he grew too weak to apply that remedy. They who had with so much industry, and as they thought certainty, prevailed with the king at Oxford to have removed him from that office, had never since intermitted the pursuing the design, and persuaded his majesty, "that his service had suffered exceedingly by his receding from his purpose;" and did not think their triumph notorious enough, if they suffered him to die in the office: insomuch as when he grew so weak, that it is true he could not sign any orders with his hand, which was four or five days before his death, they had again persuaded the king to send for the staff. But the chancellor again prevailed with him not to do so ungracious an act to a servant who had served him and his father so long and so eminently, to so little purpose as the ravishing an office unseasonably, which must within five or six days fall into his hands, as it did within less time, by his death.

He was a person of extraordinary parts, of faculties very discerning and a judgment very profound, great eloquence in his delivery, without the least affectation of words, for he always spake beat on the sudden. In the beginning of the troubles, he was looked upon amongst those lords who were least inclined to the court, and so most acceptable to the people: he was in truth not obliged by the court, and thought himself oppressed by it, which his great spirit could not bear; and so he had for some years forbore to be much seen there, which was imputed to a habit of melancholy, to which he was naturally inclined, though it appeared more in his countenance than in his conversation, which to those with whom he was acquainted was very cheerful.

The great friendship that had been between their fathers made many believe, that there was a confidence between the earl of Essex and him; which was true to that degree as could be between men of so different natures and understandings. And when they came to the parliament in the year 1640, they appeared both unsatisfied with the prudence and politics of the court, and were not reserved in declaring it, when the great officers were called in question for great transgressions in their several administrations: but in the prosecution there was great difference in their passions and their ends. The earl of Essex was a great lover of justice, and could not have been tempted to consent to the oppression of an innocent man: but in the discerning the several species of guilt, and in the proportioning the degrees of punishment to the degree of guilt, he had no faculties or measure of judging; nor was above the temptation of general prejudice, and it may be of particular disobligations and resentments, which proceeded from the weakness of his judgment, not the malice of his nature. The earl of Southampton was not only an exact observer of justice, but so clear-sighted a discernor of all the circumstances which might disguise it, that no false or fraudulent colour could impose upon him; and of so sincere and impartial a judgment, that no prejudice to the person of any man made him less awake to his cause; but believed that there is "aliquid et in hostem nefas," and that a very ill man might be very unjustly dealt with.

This difference of faculties divided them quickly in the progress of those businesses, in the beginning whereof they were both of one mind. They both thought the crown had committed great excesses in the exercise of its power, which the one thought could not be otherwise prevented, than by being deprived of it: the consequence whereof the other too well understood, and that the absolute taking away that power that might do hurt, would likewise take away some of that which was necessary for the doing good; and that a monarch cannot be deprived of a fundamental right, without such a lasting wound to monarchy itself, that they who have most shelter from it and stand nearest to it, the nobility, could [not] continue long in their native strength, if the crown received a maim. Which if the earl of Essex had comprehended, who set as great a price upon nobility as any man living did, he could never have been wrought upon to have contributed to his own undoing; which the other knew was unavoidable, if the king were undone. So they were both satisfied that the earl of Strafford had countenanced some high proceedings, which could not be supported by any rules of justice, though the policy of Ireland, and the constant course observed in the government of Ireland, might have excused and justified many of the high proceedings with which he was reproached: and they who had now the advantage-ground, by being thought to be most solicitous for the liberty of the subject, and most vigilant that the same outrages might not be transplanted out of the other kingdom into this, looked upon him as having the strongest influence upon the counsels of England as well as governor of Ireland. Then he had declared himself so averse and irreconcilable to the sedition and rebellion of the Scots, that the whole nation had contracted so great an animosity against him, that less than his life could not secure them from the fears they had conceived of him: and this fury of theirs met with a full concurrence from those of the English, who could not compass their own ends without their help. And this combination too soon drew the earl of Essex, who had none of their ends, into their party, to satisfy his pride and his passion, in removing a man who seemed to have no regard for him; for the stories, which were then made of disobligations from the earl of Strafford towards the earl of Clanrickard, were without any foundation of truth.

The earl of Southampton, who had nothing of obligation, and somewhat of prejudice to some high acts of power which had been exercised by the earl of Strafford, was not unwilling that they should be so far looked into and examined, as might raise more caution and apprehension in men of great authority of the consequence of such excesses. But when he discerned irregular ways entered into to punish those irregularities, and which might be attended with as ill consequences, and that they intended to compound one great crime out of several smaller trespasses, and, to use their own style, to complicate a treason out of misdemeanours, and so to take away his life for what he might be fined and imprisoned; he first dissuaded and then abhorred that exorbitance, and more abhorred it, when he found it passionately and maliciously resolved by a direct combination.

From this time he and the earl of Essex were perfectly divided and separated, and seldom afterwards concurred in the same opinion: but as he worthily and bravely stood in the gap in the defence of that great man's life, so he did afterwards oppose all those invasions, which were every day made by the house of commons upon the rights of the crown, or the privileges of the peers, which the lords were willing to sacrifice to the useful humour of the other. And by this means, whilst most of the king's servants listed themselves with the conspirators in promoting all things which were ingrateful to him, this lord, who had no relation to his service, was looked upon as a courtier; and by the strength of his reason gave such a check to their proceedings, that he became little less odious to them than the court itself; and so much the more odious, because as he was superior to their temptations, so his unquestionable integrity was out of their reach, and made him condemn their power as much as their malice.

He had all the detestation imaginable of the civil war, and discerned the dismal effects it would produce, more than most other men, which made him do all he could to prevent it. But when it could not be avoided, he made no scruple how to dispose of himself, but frankly declared for the king, who had a just sense of the service he had done him, and made him then both of his privy-council and gentleman of his bedchamber, without the least application or desire of his, and when most of those who were under both those relations had chosen, as the much stronger, the rebels' side: and his receiving those obligations at that present was known to proceed more from his duty than his ambition. He had all the fidelity that God requires, and all the affection to the person of the king that his duty suggested to him was due, without any reverence for or compliance with his infirmities or weakness; which made him many times uneasy to the king, especially in all consultations towards peace, in which he was always desirous that his majesty should yield more than he was inclined to do.

He was in his nature melancholic, and reserved in his conversation, except towards those with whom he was very well acquainted; with whom he was not only cheerful, but upon occasion light and pleasant. He was naturally lazy, and indulged overmuch ease to himself: yet as no man had a quicker apprehension or solid judgment in business of all kinds, so, when it had a hopeful prospect, no man could keep his mind longer bent, and take more pains in it. In the treaty at Uxbridge, which was a continued fatigue of twenty days, he never slept four hours in a night, who had never used to allow himself less than ten, and at the end of the treaty was much more vigorous than in the beginning; which made the chancellor to tell the king when they returned to Oxford, "that if he would have the earl of Southampton in good health and good humour, he must give him good store of business to do."

His person was of a small stature; his courage, as all his other faculties, very great; having no sign of fear or sense of danger, when he was in a place where he ought to be found. When the king had withdrawn himself from Oxford in order to his escape to the Scotch army, and Fairfax had brought his army before the town; in some debate at the council-board, there being some mention of prince Rupert with reference to his dignity in a large degree above all of the nobility, the earl of Southampton, who never used to speak indecently, used some expressions, which, being unfaithfully reported to the prince, his highness interpreted to be disrespectful towards him: whereupon he sent the lord Gerard to expostulate with him. To whom the earl without any apology related the words he had used; which being reported by him again to the prince, though they were not the same which he had been informed, yet he was not so well satisfied with them, but that he sent the same lord to him again, to tell him, "that his highness expected other satisfaction from him, and expected to meet him with his sword in his hand, and desired it might be as soon as he could, lest it might be prevented."

The earl appointed the next morning, at a place well known; and being asked "what weapon he chose," he said, "that he had no horse fit for such a service, nor knew where suddenly to get one; and that he knew himself too weak to close with the prince: and therefore he hoped his highness would excuse him, if he made choice of such weapons as he could best use; and therefore he resolved to fight on foot with a case of pistols only;" which the prince willingly consented to. And without doubt they had met the next morning, the earl having chosen sir George Villiers for his second; but that the lord Gerard's coming to the earl so often, with whom he had no acquaintance, had been so much observed, that some of the lords who had been present at the debate at the board, and heard some replies which had been made, and thence concluded that ill offices had been done, watched them both so narrowly, and caused the town-gates to be shut, [that they] discovered enough, notwithstanding the denial of both parties, to prevent their meeting; and afterwards interposed till a reconciliation was made: and the prince ever afterwards had a good respect for the earl.

After the murder of the king, the earl of Southampton remained in his own house, without the least application to those powers which had made themselves so terrible, and which seemed to resolve to root out the whole party as well as the royal family; and would not receive a civility from any of them: and when Cromwell was near his house in the country, upon the marriage of his son in those parts, and had a purpose to have made a visit to him; upon a private notice thereof, he immediately removed to another house at a greater distance. He sent frequently some trusty person to the king with such presents of money, as he could receive out of the fortune they had left to him, which was scarce enough to support him in that retirement: and after the battle of Worcester, when the rebels had set a price upon the king's head, and denounced the most terrible judgment upon whomsoever, and his posterity, that should presume to give any shelter or assistance to Charles Stuart towards his escape; he sent a faithful servant to all those persons, who in respect of their fidelity and activity were most like to be trusted upon such an occasion, that they should advertise the king, "that he would most willingly receive him into his house, and provide a ship for his escape." And his majesty received this advertisement from him the day before he was ready to embark in a small vessel prepared for him in Sussex; which his majesty always remembered as a worthy testimony of his affection and courage in so general a consternation. And the earl was used to say, "that after that miraculous escape, how dismal soever the prospect was, he had still a confidence of his majesty's restoration."

His own natural disposition inclined to melancholic; and his retirement from all conversation, in which he might have given some vent to his own thoughts, with the discontinuance of all those bodily exercises and recreations to which he had been accustomed, brought many diseases upon him, which made his life less pleasant to him; so that from the time of the king's return, between the gout and the stone, he underwent great affliction. Yet upon the happy return of his majesty he seemed to recover great vigour of mind, and undertook the charge of high treasurer with much alacrity and industry, as long as he had any hope to get a revenue settled proportionable to the expense of the crown, (towards which his interest and authority and counsel contributed very much,) or to reduce the expense of the court within the limits of the revenue. But when he discerned that the last did and would still make the former impossible, (upon which he made as frequent and lively representations as he thought himself obliged to do,) and when he saw irregularities and excesses to abound, and to overflow all the banks which should restrain them; he grew more dispirited, and weary of that province, which exposed him to the reproaches which others ought to undergo, and which supplied him not with authority to prevent them. And he had then withdrawn from the burden, which he infinitely desired to be eased of, but out of conscience of his duty to the king, who he knew would suffer in it; and that the people who knew his affections very well, and already opened their mouths wide against the license of the court, would believe it worse and incurable if he quitted the station he was in. This, and this only, prevailed with him still to undergo that burden, even when he knew that they who enjoyed the benefit of it were as weary that he should be disquieted with it.

He was a man of great and exemplary virtue and piety, and very regular in his devotions; yet was not generally believed by the bishops to have an affection keen enough for the government of the church, because he was willing and desirous, that somewhat more might have been done to gratify the presbyterians than they thought just. But the truth is; he had a perfect detestation of all the presbyterian principles, nor had ever had any conversation with their persons, having during all those wicked times strictly observed the devotions prescribed by the church of England; in the performance whereof he had always an orthodox chaplain, [one of those] deprived of their estates by that government, which disposed of the church as well as of the state. But it is very true, that upon the observation of the great power and authority which the presbyterians usurped and were possessed of, even when Cromwell did all he could to divest them of it, and applied all his interest to oppress or suppress them, inasmuch as they did often give a check to and divert many of his designs; he did believe that their numbers and their credit had been much greater than in truth it was. And then some persons, who had credit with him by being thought to have an equal aversion from them, persuaded him to believe, that they would be satisfied with very easy concessions, which would bring no prejudice or inconvenience to the church. And this imagination prevailed with him, and more with others who loved them not, to wish that there might be some indulgence towards them. But that which had the strongest influence upon him, and which made him less apprehensive of the venom of any other sect, was the extreme jealousy he had of the power and malignity of the Roman catholics; whose behaviour from the time of the suppression of the regal power, and more scandalously at and from the time of the murder of the king, had very much irreconciled him towards them: and he did believe, that the king and the duke of York had a better opinion of their fidelity, and less jealousy of their affections, than they deserved; and so thought there could not be too great an union of all other interests to control the exorbitance of that. And upon this argument, with his private friends, he was more passionate than in any other.

He had a marvellous zeal and affection for the royal family; inasmuch as the two sons of the duke of York falling both into distempers, (of which they both shortly after died,) very few days before his death, he was so marvellously affected with it, that many believed the trouble of it, or a presage what might befall the kingdom by it, hastened his death some hours: and in the agony of death, the very morning he died, he sent to know how they did; and seemed to receive some relief, when the messenger returned with the news, that they were both alive and in some degree mended.

The next day after his death, which was about the end of May, the king called the chancellor into his closet; and, the duke of York being only present, told him, "that he could think of no man fit to be treasurer, and therefore resolved, as he had long done, to put that office into commission;" and then asked, "who should be commissioners?" to which he answered, "the business would be much better done by a single officer, if he could think of a fit one; for commissioners never had, never would do, that business well." The duke of York said, "that he believed it would be best done by commission; it had been so managed during all the ill times," (for from the beginning of the troubles there had been no treasurer:) "and he had observed, (and the king found the benefit of it,) that though sir William Compton was an extraordinary person, and better qualified than most men for that charge, yet since his decease, that his majesty had put the office of the ordnance under the government of commissioners, it was in much better order, and the king was better served there than he had ever been; and he believed he would be so likewise in the office of the treasury, if fit persons were chosen for it, who might have nothing else to do." And the king seemed to be of the same mind.

The chancellor replied, "that he was very sorry, that they were both so much delighted with the function of commissioners, which were more suitable to the modelling a commonwealth, than for the support of monarchy: that during the late troubles, whilst the parliament exercised the government, they reduced it as fast as they could to the form of a commonwealth; and then no question the putting the treasury into the hands of commissioners was much more suitable to the rest of the model, than it could be under a single person. Besides, having no revenue of their own, but being to raise one according to their inventions and proportionable to their own occasions, it could never be well collected or ordered by old officers, who were obliged to forms which would not be agreeable to their necessary transactions: so that new ministers were to be made for new employments, who might be obliged punctually to observe their new orders, without any superiority over each other, but a joint obedience to the supreme authority. But when Cromwell assumed the entire government into his own hands, he cancelled all those republican rules and forms, and appointed inferior persons to several functions, and reserved the whole disposition to himself, and was his own high treasurer: and it was well known that he resolved, as soon as he should be able to reduce things to the forms he intended, to cancel all those commissions, and invest single persons in the government of those provinces."

He said, "he would not take upon him to say any thing of the office of the ordnance, where the commissioners were his friends; only he might say, that that kind of administration had not been yet long enough known to have a good judgment made of it: however, that it was of so different a nature from the office of the treasury, that no observation of the one could be applied to the other. The ordnance was conversant only with smiths and carpenters, and other artificers and handicraftsmen, with whom all their transactions were: whereas the treasury had much to do with the nobility and chief gentry of the kingdom; must have often recourse to the king himself for his particular directions, to the privy-council for their assistance and advice, to the judges for their resolutions in matters of difficulty; and if the ministers of it were not of that quality and degree, that they might have free recourse to all those, and find respect from them, his majesty's service would notoriously suffer. And that the white staff itself, in the hands of a person esteemed, did more to the bringing in several branches of the revenue, by the obedience and reverence all officers paid to it, than any orders from commissioners could do: and that how mean an opinion soever some men had of the faculties of the late excellent officer for that administration, his majesty would find by experience, that the vast sums of money, which he had borrowed in these late years, had been in a great measure procured upon the general confidence all men had in the honour and justice of the treasurer; and that the credit of commissioners would never be able to supply such necessities."

The king said, "he was not at all of his opinion, and doubted not his business would be much "better done by commissioners; and therefore he should speak to the nomination of those, since he was sure he could propose no single person fit for it." To which the chancellor answered, "that he thought it much harder to find a worthy man, who would be persuaded to accept it in the disorder in which his affairs were, than a man who might be very fit for it: and that if that subject who had the greatest fortune in England and the most general reputation would receive it, his majesty would be no loser in conferring it on such a one; and till such a one might be found, he might put it into commission. But," he said, "he perceived well, that he would not approve the old course in the choice of commissioners; who had always been the keeper of the great seal, and the two secretaries of state, and two other of the principal persons of the council, besides the chancellor of the exchequer, who used to be the sole person of the quorum."

[Neither] the king nor duke seemed to like any of those; and the chancellor plainly discerned from the beginning that they were resolved upon the persons, though his opinion was asked: and the king said, "he would choose such persons, whether privy counsellors or not, who might have nothing else to do, and were rough and ill-natured men, not to be moved with civilities or importunities in the payment of money; but [would] apply it all to his present necessities, till some new supplies might be gotten for the payment of those debts, which were first necessary to be paid. That he, the chancellor, had so much business already upon his hands, that he could not attend this other; and the secretaries had enough to do: so he would have none of those." And then he named sir Thomas Clifford, who was newly of the council and controller of the house, and sir William Coventry; and said, "he did not think there should be many;" and the duke then named sir John Duncombe, as a man of whom he had heard well, and every body knew he was intimate with sir William Coventry. The king said, "he thought they three would be enough, and that a greater number would but make the despatch of all business the more slow."

The chancellor said, "he doubted those persons would not have credit and authority enough to go through the necessary affairs of that province; that for his own part, he was not desirous to meddle in it; he had indeed too much business to do: that he had no exception to the three persons named, but that he thought them not known and esteemed enough for that employment; and that it would be very incongruous to bring sir John Duncombe, who was a private country gentleman, and utterly unacquainted with business of that nature, to sit in equal authority with privy counsellors, and in affairs which would be often debated at the council-table, where he could not be present." And he put his majesty [in mind], that "he must put the lord Ashley out of his office of chancellor of the exchequer, if he did not make him commissioner of the treasury, and of the quorum:" and concluded, "that if he did not name the general, and some other person that might give some lustre to the others, the work would not be done as it ought to be; for many "persons would be sometimes obliged to attend upon the treasury, who would not think those gentlemen enough superior to them, how qualified soever."

The king said, "he could easily provide against the exception to sir John Duncombe, by making him a privy counsellor; and he did not care if he added the general to them." The lord Ashley gave him some trouble, and he said enough to make it manifest that he thought him not fit to be amongst them: yet he knew not how to put him out of his place; but gave direction for preparing the commission for the treasury to the persons named before, and made the lord Ashley only one of the commissioners, and a major part to make a quorum; which would quickly bring the government of the whole business into the hands of those three who were designed for it. And Ashley rather chose to be degraded, than to dispute it.

The king expected, that as soon as the ambassadors should meet at the Hague, a cessation would be the first thing that would be agreed upon: and the French ambassadors did in the first place propose it, and in such a manner, as made it evident that they depended upon it as a thing resolved upon; and their master had with their consent dismissed his own fleet, and theirs was yet in their ports. Nor did the Dutch seem to refuse it; but answered, "that the adjusting all things in order to a cessation would require as much time as would serve to finish the treaty, considering all material points were upon the matter already stated and agreed upon, the king having already chosen the alternative:" and notwithstanding all the earnestness used by the French ambassadors, no other answer could be obtained as to a cessation; which, together with the supercilious behaviour of the commissioners from Holland, made it apparent, that they had no other mind at that time to peace, than as they were compelled to it by France, that was impatient to have it concluded. They would not hear any mention for the redelivery of Poleroone, "which," they said, "the king of France had promised should not be demanded;" and as little for any recompense in money; nor would suffer the merchant-deputies from the English company to go to Amsterdam, to confer with the East India company there for any composition. It quickly appeared, that they had revenge in their hearts for their last year's affront and damage at the Flie; and De Wit had often said, "that before any peace they would leave some such mark of their having been upon the English coast, as the English had left of their having been upon that of Holland."

After the treaty was entered into, about the beginning of June, De Ruyter came with the fleet out of the Wierings, and joining with the rest from the Texel sailed for the coast of England: and having a fair wind, stood for the river of Thames; which put the county of Kent into such an alarm, that all near the sea left their houses and fled into the country: The earl of Winchelsea, who was lord lieutenant of that county, was at that time ambassador at Constantinople, and the deputy lieutenants had all equal authority: so that no man had power to command in that large county in so general a distraction. Hereupon the king sent down lieutenant general Middleton with commission to draw all the train bands together, and to command all the forces that could be raised : and he immediately went thither, and was very well obeyed, and quickly drew all the train bands of horse and foot to Rochester ; and other troops resorted to him from the neighbour counties, all the people expressing a great alacrity in being commanded by him.

There had been enough discourse all that year of erecting a fort at Sheerness for the defence of the river : and the king had made two journeys thither in the winter, and had given such orders to the commissioners of the ordnance for the overseeing and finishing the fortifications, that every body believed that work done ; it having been the principal defence and provision directed and depended upon, (as hath been said before,) when the resolution had been taken for the standing only upon the defence for this summer. But whatever had been thought or directed, very little had been done. There were a company or two of very good soldiers there under excellent officers ; but the fortifications [were] so weak and unfinished, and all other provisions so entirely wanting, that the Dutch fleet no sooner approached within a distance, but with their cannon they beat all the works flat, and drove all the men from the ground : which as soon as they had done, with their boats they landed men, and seemed resolved to fortify and keep it.

This put the country into a flame, and the news of it exceedingly disturbed the king. He knew the consequence of the place, and how easily it might have been secured, and was the more troubled that it had been neglected : and with what loss soever, it must be presently recovered out of those hands. The general was immediately ordered to march to Chatham, for the security of the navy, with such troops of horse and foot as could be presently drawn together out of the guards and from the neighbour counties ; and the city appeared very forward to send such regiments of their train bands as should be required. When the general came to Chatham, he found Middleton in so good a posture, and so good a body of men, that he had no apprehension of any attempt the Dutch could make at land ; and he writ very cheerful and confident letters to the king and the duke, " that if the enemy should make any attempt, which he believed they durst not do, they would repent it. That he had put a chain over the river, which would hinder them from coming up : and if they should adventure to land any where, he would quickly beat them to their ships ;" as no doubt he had been very well able to have done.

There was indeed no danger of their landing, and they were too wise to think of it : their business was in an element they had more confidence in and more power upon. They had good intelligence how loosely all things were left in the river : and therefore, as soon as the tide came to help them, they stood full [up] the river, without any consideration of the chain, which their ships immediately brake in pieces, and passed without the least pause ; their being either no such device to be made that can obstruct such an enterprise, or that which was made was so weak, that it was of no signification, but to raise an unseasonable confidence in unskilful men, that being disappointed must increase the confusion, as it did.

For all men were so confounded to see the Dutch fleet advance over the chain, which they looked upon as a wall of brass, that they knew not what they were to do.

The general was of a constitution and temper so void of fear, that there could appear no signs of distraction in him : yet it was plain enough that he knew not what orders to give. There were two or three ships of the royal navy negligently, if not treacherously, left in the river, which might have been very easily drawn into safety, and could be of no imaginable use in the place where they then were : into one of those the general put himself, and invited the young gentlemen who were volunteers to accompany him ; which they readily did in great numbers, only with pikes in their hands. But some of his friends whispered to him, " how unadvised that resolution was, and how desperate, without possibility of success, the whole fleet of the enemy approaching as fast as the tide would enable them." And so he was prevailed with to put himself again on shore : which except he had done, both himself and two or three hundred gentlemen of the nobility and prime gentry of the kingdom had inevitably perished ; for all those ships, and some merchantmen laden and ready to put to sea, were presently in a flame ; the Dutch, knowing that they could not carry them off, giving order to burn them, the general standing upon the shore, and not knowing what remedy to apply to all this mischief. The people of Chatham, which is naturally an army of seamen and officers of the navy, who might and ought to have secured all those ships, which they had time enough to have done, were in distraction ; their chief officers having applied all those boats and lighter vessels which should have towed up the ships, to carry away their own goods and household stuff, and gave what they left behind for lost. And without doubt, if the Dutch had prosecuted the present advantage they had, with that circumspection and courage that was necessary, they might have fired the royal navy at Chatham, and taken or destroyed all the ships which lay higher in the river, and so fully revenged themselves for what they had suffered at the Flie : but they thought they had done enough, and so made use of the ebb to carry them back again.

But the noise of this, and the flame of the ships which were burned, made it easily believed in the city of London, that the enemy had done all that they conceived they might have done : they thought that they were landed in many places, and that their fleet was come up as far as Greenwich. Nor was the confusion there greater than it was in the court itself : where they who had most advanced the war, and reproached all them who had been or were thought to be against it, " as men who had no public spirits, and were not solicitous for the honour and glory of the nation ;" and who had never spoken of the Dutch but with scorn and contempt, as a nation rather worthy to be cudgelled than fought with ; were now the most dejected men that can be imagined, railed very bitterly at those who had advised the king to enter into that war, " which had already consumed so many gallant men, and would probably ruin the kingdom," and wished " that a peace, as the only hope, were made upon any terms." In a word, the distraction and consternation was so great in court and city, as if the Dutch had not been only masters of the river, but had really landed an army of one hundred thousand men.

They who remember that conjuncture, and were then present in the galleries and privy lodgings at Whitehall, whither all the world flocked with equal liberty, can easily call to mind many instances of such wild despair and even ridiculous apprehensions, that I am willing to forget, and would not that the least mention of them should remain: and if the king's and duke's personal composure had not restrained men from expressing their fears, there wanted not some who would have advised them to have left the city. And there was a lord, who would be thought one of the greatest soldiers in Europe, to whom the custody of the Tower was committed, who lodging there only one night, declared, "that it was not "tenable," and desired not to be charged with it: and thereupon many, who had carried their money and goods thither, removed them from thence that they might be further from the river. Nor did this unreasonable distemper pass away, when it was known that the Dutch fleet had not only left the river, but had taken away all their men from Sheerness, which was a manifestation very sufficient that they had no design upon the land: but there remained still such a chagrin in the minds of many, as if they would return again; in which they were confirmed, when they heard that they were still upon the coasts, and gave the same alarm now to Essex and Suffolk, as they had done to Kent, not without making a show as if they meant to attempt Harwich and Landguard Point; which drew all the train bands of those counties to the sea-side, and the duke of York went thither to conduct them, if there should be occasion.

In this perplexity the king was not at ease, and the less that every man took upon him to discourse to him of the distemper of the people generally over the kingdom, and to give him counsel what was to be done: and some men had advised him to call the parliament, which at the last session had been prorogued to the 20th of October; and it was now the middle of June. And surely most discerning men thought such a conjuncture so unseasonable for the council of a parliament, that if it had been then sitting, the most wholesome advice that could be given would be to separate them, till that occasion should be over, which could be best provided for by a more contracted council: however, not knowing else what to do disposed the king to incline to that remedy. And it being a current opinion, or rather an unquestioned certainty, that upon a prorogation a parliament cannot be convened before the day, though upon an adjournment it may; they had brought Mr. Prynne privately to the king to satisfy him, "that upon an extraordinary occasion "he might do it;" and his judgment, which in all other cases he did enough undervalue, very much confirmed him in what he had a mind to.

In the beginning of the summer, when he had resolved to have no fleet at sea, there were many reasons which induced him to increase his forces at land. And that he might do it without jealousy of the people, he gave commission to three or four persons of the nobility, of great fortunes and good names, to raise regiments of foot, and to others for troops of horse; which was done at their own charge, and with wonderful expedition: and upon their first musters they all received one month's pay. Of these levies some were sent to repossess Sheerness, and extraordinary care was taken for the better advancement of those fortifications; and others were disposed to other posts upon the coast: but it was in view, that upon the expiration of that month, there must be new pay provided for those regiments and troops. Then the train bands, which had been drawn together, had continued for one month, which was as long as the law required: and now they required, or were said to require, to be relieved or dismissed, or that they might receive pay. There were discontents and emulations upon command; and they who had usually professed, "that they would *"willingly serve the king in the offices of corporals or sergeants, whatever command they "formerly had," now disputed all the punctilios, and would not receive orders from any who had been formerly in inferior offices. And all these waywardnesses were brought to the king, as matters of the highest consequence, who found difficulty enough in determining points of more importance.*

They who for their own private designs desired that the parliament might meet, and cared not in what humour they met, urged the king very importunately, "that he would issue out a proclamation to summon them, as the only expedient to *"give himself ease, and to provide for all that "was to be done:" and his majesty was most inclined to it, and in truth resolved it; though knowing that it was contrary to the sense of many, he resolved to debate it at the council. And there he told them, "that they all saw the straits that *"he was in, the insolence of the enemy, and the *"general distemper of the nation, which made it *"manifest that it was necessary for him to have *"an army, that might be ready against any thing *"that might fall out. That he had no money, *"nor knew where to get any; nor could imagine *"any other way to provide against the mischiefs *"which were in view, than by calling the parliament to come together, of which or any other "expedient he was willing to receive their advice;" expressing so much of his own sense, that it was plain enough that he thought that remedy the best that could be applied. Three or four of those who sat at the lower end of the board, and who were well enough known to have given the counsel, and to be industrious that it might be followed, enlarged themselves in the debate, "that *"the soldiers could not be kept together without *"money; and they could not advise any other *"way to get money but by the convening the *"parliament, which they were confident might "justly and regularly be done:" and they desired, "that they who were of another opinion *"would propose some other way how the king *"might get money."************

The chancellor discerned that the matter was already concluded, what advice soever should be given; and that the three new commissioners of the treasury, since they could find no way to procure money, had been very importunate with the king to try that expedient, and the more, because they well knew that he was against it, he having not been at all reserved upon several occasions in private discourses, when they were present, to give many reasons against it: and he knew as well, that they would gladly make any use of any expressions which might fall from [him], when the remembrance might be applied to his prejudice. Yet his natural unwariness in such cases with reference to himself, when he thought his majesty's service concerned, to which he did really believe the present advice would produce much prejudice, prevailed with him to dissuade it.

He said, "he knew well upon what disadvantage he spake, and how unpopular a thing it was to speak against the convening the parliament in those straits, which seemed to be capable of no other remedy: yet since he thought the remedy neither proper to the disease, nor that it could be applied in time, he could not concur with those who advised it. That most men who had any knowledge in the law did confess, that when the parliament stood prorogued to a certain day, the convening them upon a sooner day was very doubtful; and to him, upon all the disquisition he could make, it was very clear that it could not be done: and therefore he desired the judges might be consulted in that point, before any resolution should be taken. That the temper of both houses was well known; and that it could not but be presumed, that when they came together, the first debate they would fall upon would be of the manner of their coming together, and whether they were in a capacity to act: and he doubted there would be very few who would be forward to pass an act in a season, when the validity of it might be questioned by those who had no mind to pay any obedience to it. And then if their meeting were only to confer together upon all occurrences, and they might presume of liberty to say what they had a mind to say, without power to conclude any thing; it was well worth the considering, whether, in so general a distemper such an assembly might not interrupt all other consultations and expedients, and yet propose none, and so increase the confusion. If the necessities were so urgent, that it was absolutely necessary that a parliament should be convened, and that which stood prorogued could not lawfully reassemble till the 20th of October, as he was confident it could not; there was no question to be made, but that the king might lawfully by his proclamation presently dissolve the prorogued parliament, and send out his writs to have a new parliament, which might regularly meet a month before the prorogued parliament could come together." And many of the council were of opinion, that it would most conduce to his majesty's service to dissolve the one, and to call another parliament.

This was an advice they believed no man had the courage to make, and were sorry to find so many of the opinion, which they had rather should have appeared to be single. Many very warmly opposed this expedient, magnified the affections and inclinations of both houses: "and though there appeared some ill humour in them at their last being together, and aversion to give any money for the present; yet in the main their affections were very right for church and state. And that the king was never to hope to see a parliament better constituted for his service, or so many of the members at his disposal: but that "he must expect that the presbyterians would be chosen in all places, and that they who were most eminent now for opposing all that he desired would be chosen, and all they who were most zealous for his service would be carefully excluded;" which was a fancy that sunk very deep in the minds of the bishops, though their best friends thought them like to find more friends and a stronger support in any, than they would have in that parliament. But the king quickly declared his confidence in the parliament that was prorogued, and his resolution not to dissolve it; which put an end to that debate. And the other was again resumed, "what the king was to do towards the raising money; or how he should be able to maintain his army, if he should defer calling the parliament till the day upon which they were to assemble by the prorogation:" and all men were to restrain their discourse to that point.

The old argument, "that there could be no other way found out," was renewed, and urged with more earnestness and confidence; and that they who were against it might be obliged to offer their advice what other course should be taken: and this was often demanded, in a manner not usual in that place, as a reproach to the persons. His majesty himself with some quickness was pleased to ask the chancellor, "what he did advise." To which he replied, "that if in truth what was proposed was in the nature of it not practicable, or being practised could not attain the effect proposed, it ought to be laid aside, that men might unbiassed apply their thoughts to find out some other expedient. That he thought it very clear that the parliament could not assemble, though the proclamation should issue out that very hour, within less than twenty days; and that if they were met, and believed themselves lawfully qualified to grant a supply of money, all men knew the formality of that transaction would require so much time, that money could not be raised time enough to raise an army, or to maintain that part of it that was raised, to prevent the landing of an enemy that was already upon the coast, and (as many thought or seemed to think) ready every day to make their descent: and yet the sending out a proclamation for reassembling the parliament would inevitably put an end to all other counsels. That for his part he did believe, that the Dutch had already satisfied themselves in the affront they had already given, and could not be in any condition to pursue it, or have men enough on board to make a descent, without the king's having notice of it; and that the Dutch, without a conjunction with the French, had not strength for such an undertaking: and that the French had no such purpose his majesty had all the assurance possible, and that their fleet was gone far from the coast of England. And his majesty had reason to believe, that the present treaty would put an end to this war in a short time, though the power and artifice of De Wit had prevented a cessation.

"However, for the present support of those troops which were necessary to guard the coasts, since money could not be found for their present constant pay, without which free quarter could not be avoided; the only way that appeared to him to be practicable, and to avoid

"the last evil, would be, to write letters to the lieutenants and deputy lieutenants of those counties where the troops were obliged to remain, that they would cause provisions of all kinds to be brought into those quarters, that so the soldiers might not be compelled to straggle abroad to provide their own victual, which would end in the worst kind of free quarter: and that the like letters might be written to the neighbour counties, wherein no soldiers were quartered, to raise money by way of contribution or loan, which should be abated out of the next impositions, that so the troops might be enabled to stay and continue in [their] posts where they were, for defence of the kingdom; in which those other counties had their share in the benefit, and without which they must themselves be exposed to the disorder of the soldiers, and possibly to the invasion of the enemy."

It is very probable, that in the earnestness of this debate, and the frequent interruptions which were given, he might use that expression, (which was afterwards objected against him,) "of raising contribution as had been in the late civil war." Whatever it was he said, it was evident at the time that some men were well pleased with it, as somewhat they meant to make use of hereafter, in which his innocence made him little concerned.

The conclusion was, though many of the lords spake against it, and much the major part thought it not counsellable; that a proclamation should forthwith issue out, to require all the members of parliament to meet upon a day appointed in the beginning of August, to consult upon the great affairs of the kingdom: and this proclamation was presently issued accordingly.

All this time the treaty proceeded at Breda, as fast as the insolent humour of the Dutch would suffer it. The French king declared himself much offended with their proceedings at sea: and his ambassadors spake so loud, that the States gave order to their deputies to bring the treaty to a conclusion; and sent such orders to De Ruyter, that there was no more hostility of any moment; only the fleet remained at sea, that it might appear they were masters of it. It cannot be denied that the French ambassadors, except in what referred to Poleroone, behaved themselves as candidly as could be wished: and it is probable, that the same reason which moved the French to use all possible diligence to bring the treaty to an end, prevailed likewise with the Dutch to use all the delays they could, that it might be prolonged.

Though there was no war declared, it had been long notorious that Flanders would be invaded: and it was as notorious, that there was no provision made there towards a resistance or defence; the marquis of Castelle Roderigo, who came governor thither with a great reputation, not making good the expectation in the sagacity he was famed for, nor offering at any levies of men, or mending fortifications, until the French army was upon the borders. Then he sent into England to press the king to assist him with an army of horse and foot; and it easily appeared the nation would gladly have engaged in that war, not being willing that Flanders should be in the possession of France: but the king was engaged not to give any assistance to the enemies of France until the treaty should be ended, which yet it was not.

However, he suffered the earl of Castlehaven, under pretence of recruiting a regiment in Flanders which he had formerly, to raise a body of one thousand foot, which he quickly transported to Ostend.

The king [of France] was impatient to march, and yet desired the treaty might be first concluded, that both himself and the king of England might be at liberty to enter into such an alliance as they should think proper for their interest: and the Dutch, who had no mind that the expedition should be prosecuted, and as much feared the consequence of such an alliance, though they were not wise enough to consider the right means to prevent it, desired that the treaty might not be concluded till the winter drew nearer. But the French quickly put an end to that their hope by marching into the heart of Flanders, and so giving them new matter for their present consultations; not without intimation, "that if they would not finish the treaty, that king might conclude for what concerned himself:" and this put an end to it. Yet there were some alterations of small importance in some articles of the former treaty, besides that of Poleroone, which the ambassadors would not consent to without further knowledge of the king's pleasure: and so one of them (Mr. Henry Coventry) came to attend his majesty, to give him an account of all particulars, and receive his own final determination.

The king in the first place sent for the East India company, and let them know, "that the Dutch would not consent to the former article for the redelivery of Poleroone, nor give any recompense for it; and that he was resolved not to depart from [them], and so release their right without their consent: and therefore that they should consider what would be for their good." They answered, "that they thought a peace to be so necessary for the kingdom, that they would not that any particular interest of theirs should give any interruption to it:" and they acknowledged, "that if the war continued, they should in many respects be greater losers, than the redelivery of Poleroone would repair; and that they would gladly sacrifice that pretence to the public peace."

Upon which answer the ambassador made his report of all the particulars which were consented to on both sides in the treaty, and what remained yet in suspense; and made answer to all questions which any of the council thought fit to ask. And the king requiring him to deliver his own opinion upon his observation, and "whether he believed, that if his majesty should positively insist upon what they had hitherto refused to consent to, the Dutch would choose to continue the war; and whether the French would join with them in it:" he answered, "that it was very evident that the Dutch did not at present desire the peace, otherwise than to comply with France and for fear of it; and that France was obliged not to abandon them in the point of Poleroone, which the other would never part with, nor give any recompense for, though the French ambassadors had used all the arguments to persuade them to it. But if that were agreed, he was confident they would be compelled to consent to whatsoever was else of moment. And that the French had used some threatening expressions, upon some insolent propositions made by "the Dane, which they thought proceeded from the instigation of Holland. And that at his coming away, the French ambassadors had used great freedom with him, and advised in what particulars which were yet unagreed they wished his majesty would not consent, and in which they could not serve him, but believed a time would come, in which he would be repaired for those condescensions: in other particulars he should positively insist, at least with some little variation of expression; in which he expressed both his own and the opinion of the other ambassador."

And the whole being in this manner clearly stated, the king required all the lords severally to deliver their judgment what he was to do; and every man did deliver his opinion in more or fewer words. And it may be truly said, that, though one or two adorned their passion with some expressions of indignation against the Dutch for their presumption, and as if he did believe that the parliament would concur with the king in all things which might vindicate his honour from their insolent demands, the advice was upon the matter unanimous, "that the ambassador should immediately return, and conclude the peace upon those conditions which were stated at the board." And he did presently return: and all matters were, within few days after his arrival, adjusted, and put into proper ministerial hands for engrossment, and all forms and circumstances agreed upon for the proclamation of the peace, and the day appointed for the proclaiming thereof; and such forms of passes as should be given on all sides to merchants' ships, (which would be impatient for trade before the days could be expired,) in which all ships of war should be obliged to take notice that the peace was proclaimed.

All this was done before the day of the parliament's convening upon the king's proclamation: so that there being now no use of an army, and reason enough to disband those regiments which had been raised towards it, his majesty thought it not reasonable that they should enter upon the debate of any business, but be continued under the former prorogation to the day appointed; and in this there appeared not one person of a different opinion. And so, upon the day, the king went to the house, and told them, "that since the condition of his affairs was not so full of difficulty as it had been when he sent out his proclamation, and since many were of opinion, that there might be doubts arise upon the regularity of their meeting; he was content to dismiss them till the 20th of October:" and so they separated without any debate.

The public no sooner entered into this repose, than the storm began to arise that destroyed all the prosperity, ruined the fortune, and shipwrecked all the hopes, of the chancellor, who had been the principal instrument in the providing that repose. The parliament, that had been so unseasonably called together from their business and recreations, in a season of the year that they most desired to be vacant, were not pleased to be so soon dismissed: and very great pains were taken by those, who were thought to be able to do him the least harm, because they were known to be his enemies, to persuade the members of parliament, "that it was the chancellor only who had hindered their continuing together, and that he "had advised the king to dissolve them;" which exceedingly inflamed them.

And sir William Coventry was so far from being reserved in his malice, that the very day that the parliament was dismissed, after he had incensed them against the chancellor, in the presence of six or seven of the members, who were not all of the same mind, he declared, "that if at their next meeting, which would be within little more than two months, they had a mind to remove the chancellor from the court, they should easily bring it to pass:" of all which he had quickly information, and had several other advertisements from persons of honour, "that there was a strong combination entered into against him;" and [they] mentioned some particulars to have been told the king concerning him, which had exceedingly offended his majesty. All which particulars, being without any colour or ground of truth, he believed were inventions (though not from those who informed him) only to amuse him.

Yet he took an opportunity to acquaint the king with it, who, with the same openness he had always used, conferred with him about his present business, but only of the business. He besought his majesty to let him know, "whether he had received any information that he had done or said such and such things," which he made appear to him to be in themselves so incredible and improbable, that it could hardly be in his majesty's power to believe [them]; to which the king answered, "that nobody had told him any such thing." To which the other replied, "that he did really think they had not, though he knew that they had bragged they had done so, and thereby incensed his majesty against him; which they desired should be generally believed."

The truth is; the chancellor was guilty of that himself which he had used to accuse the archbishop Laud of, that he was too proud of a good conscience. He knew his own innocence, and had no kind of apprehension of being publicly charged with any crime. He knew well he had many enemies who had credit with the king, and that they did him all the ill offices they could: and he knew that the lady's power and credit increased, and that she desired nothing more than to remove him from his majesty's confidence; in which he never thought her to blame, since she well knew that he employed all the credit he had to remove her from the court. But he thought himself very secure in the king's justice: and though his kindness was much lessened, he was confident his majesty would protect him from being oppressed, since he knew his integrity; and never suspected that he would consent to his ruin. He was in truth weary of the condition he was in, and had in the last year undergone much mortification; and desired nothing more, than to be divested of all other trusts and employments than what concerned the chancery only, in which he could have no rival, and in the administration whereof he had not heard of any complaint: and this he thought might have satisfied all parties; and had sometimes desired the king, "that he might retire from all other business, than that of the judicatory," for he plainly discerned he was not able to contend with other struggles.

I cannot avoid in this place mentioning an accident that fell out in this time, and enlarge upon all the circumstances thereof, which might otherwise be passed over, but that it had an immediate influence on the fate of the person who is so near his fall. The king had been very much offended with the duke of Buckingham, who had behaved himself much worse towards him than could be expected from his obligations and discretion, and had been in truth the original cause of all the ill humour which had been in both houses of parliament in the last session; after the end of which he went into the country without taking his leave of the king, and in several places spake with greater license of the court and government, and of the person of the king, than any other person presumed to do; of all which his majesty had intelligence and information, and was at that time without doubt more offended with him than with any man in England, and had really great provocation to jealousy of his fidelity, as well as of his respect and affection. The lord Arlington, as secretary of state, had received several informations of dangerous words spoken by him against the king, and of his correspondencies with persons the most suspected for seditious inclinations, the duke having made himself very popular amongst the levellers, and amongst them who clamoured for liberty of conscience, which pretence he seemed very much to cherish.

The king was very much awakened to be jealous of him, besides his behaviour in the parliament, by some informations he received from his own servants. There was one Braythwaite, a citizen, who had been a great confidant of Cromwell and of the council of state, a man of parts, and looked upon as having a greater interest with the discontented party than any man of the city. Upon the king's return this man fled beyond the seas, and after near a year's stay there came again to London, but remained there as incognito, came not upon the exchange, nor was seen in public, and returned again into Holland; and so made frequent journeys backward and forward for several months, and then came and resided publicly in the city. This being taken notice of by sir Richard Browne, who was major general of the city, upon whose vigilance the king very much and very justly depended, and the man being well known to him, he had long endeavoured to apprehend him, till he understood that he was a servant to the duke of Buckingham, and in great trust with him, as he was; for the duke had committed the whole managery of his estate to him, and upon his recommendation had received many other inferior servants to be employed under him, all of the same leaven with him, and all notorious for their disaffection to the church and state. The major general, being one day to give the king an account of some business, told him likewise of this man, "as one as worthy to be suspected for all disloyal purposes, and as like to bring them to pass, as any man of that condition in England;" and seemed to wonder, "that the duke would entertain such a person in his service."

At that time the duke had by his diligence, and those faculties towards mirth in which he excelled, made himself very acceptable to the king; though many wondered that he could be so, considering what the king himself knew of him: insomuch that his majesty told him what he had been informed of his steward, and how much he suffered in his reputation for entertaining such servants. The duke received the animadversion with all possible submission and acknowledgment of the obligation, and then enlarged upon the commendation of the man, "of his great abilities, and the benefit he received by his service;" and besought his majesty, "that he would vouchsafe to hear him, for he believed he would give an account of the state of the city, and of many particulars which related to his majesty's service, better than most men could do." And the king shortly after supping at the duke's house, he found an opportunity to present Mr. Braythwaite to him, who was a man of a very good aspect, which that people used not to have, and of notable insinuation. He made the king a narration of the whole course of his life, in which he did not endeavour to make himself appear a better man than he had been reported to be; which kind of ingenuity, as men call it, is a wonderful approach towards being believed. He related "by what degrees, and in what method of conviction, he had explicated himself from all those ill principles in which he had been entangled: and that it had been a principal motive to him to embrace the opportunity of serving the duke, that he might totally retire from that company and conversation to which he had been most accustomed. And yet he thought he had so much credit with the chief of them, that they could never enter into any active combination, but he should have notice of it: and assured his majesty that nothing should pass of moment amongst that people, but his majesty should have very seasonable information of it, and that he would always serve him with great fidelity." In fine, the king was well satisfied with his discourse, and often afterwards upon the like opportunities conferred with him, and believed him to be well disposed to do him any service.

During the last session of parliament, in which the duke carried himself so disrespectfully to the king, this man found an opportunity to get access to his majesty, which he was willing to give him; when he said, "that he thought it his duty, and according to his obligation, to give his majesty an account of what he had lately observed, and of his own resolutions." He told him, "that his lord was of late very much altered, and was fallen into the acquaintance and conversation of some men of very mean condition, but of very desperate intentions; with whom he used to meet at unseasonable hours, and in obscure places, where persons of quality did not use to resort; and that he frequently received letters from them: all which made him apprehend that there was a design on foot, which, how unreasonable soever, the duke might be engaged in. And for these and other reasons, and the irregular course of his life, he was resolved to withdraw himself from his service: and that he hoped, into what extravagancies soever the duke should cast himself, his majesty would retain a good opinion of him, who would never swerve from his affection and duty."

The information and testimony, which the lord Arlington brought to the king shortly after this advertisement, made the greater impression; and there were many particulars in the informations that could not be suspected to be forged. And it appeared that there was a poor fellow, who had a poorer lodging about Tower-hill, and professed skill in horoscopes, to whom the duke often repaired in disguise in the night : and the lord Arlington had caused that fellow to be apprehended, and his pockets and his chamber to be searched ; where were found several letters to the duke of Buckingham, one or two whereof were in his pocket sealed and not sent, and the rest copies, and one original letter from the duke to him, in all which there were many unusual expressions, which were capable of a very ill interpretation, and could not bear a good one. This man and some others were sent close prisoners to the Tower, where the lord Arlington and two other privy counsellors, by the king's order, took their several examinations, and confronted them with those witnesses, who accused them and justified their accusations ; all which were brought to the king.

And then his majesty was pleased to acquaint the chancellor with all that had passed, who to that minute had not the least imagination of any particular relating to it : nor had he any other prejudice to the person of the duke, (for he behaved himself towards him with more than ordinary civility,) than what was necessary for any man to have upon account of the extravagancy of his life ; and which he could not be without, upon what he had often received from the duke himself upon his own knowledge. The king now shewed him all those examinations and depositions which had been taken ; and that letter to the fellow, " which," his majesty said, " he knew to be every word the duke's own hand ;" and the letters to the duke from the fellow, which still gave him the style of prince, and mentioned what great things his stars promised to him, and that he was the darling of the people, who had set their hearts and affections and all their hopes upon his highness, with many other foolish and some fustian expressions. His majesty told him in what places the duke had been since he left London ; " that he " stayed few days in any place ; and that he inclined on such a day, that was to come, to be " in Staffordshire at the house of sir Charles " Wolsely," a gentleman who had been of great eminency in Cromwell's council, and one of those who had been sent by the house of commons to persuade him to accept the crown with the title of king. Upon the whole matter his majesty asked him, " what way he was to proceed against him : " to which he answered, " that he was first to be " apprehended ; and when he should be in custody and examined, his majesty would better " judge which way he was to proceed against " him."

Upon further consideration with the chancellor and lord Arlington and others of the council, the king sent a sergeant at arms, with a warrant under his sign manual, " to apprehend the duke " of Buckingham, and to bring him before one of " the secretaries of state, to answer to such crimes " as should be objected against him ;" or to that purpose. The sergeant made a journey into Northamptonshire, where he was informed the duke [was] : but still, when he came to the house where he was said to be, it was pretended that he was gone from thence some hours before ; by which he found that he had notice of his business.

And therefore he concealed himself, and appointed some men to watch and inform themselves of his motions, it being generally reported that he would be at the house of the earl of Exeter at such a time. And notice was given him, that he was then in a coach with ladies going to that house : upon which he made so good haste, that he was in view of the coach, and saw the duke alight out of the coach, and lead a lady into the house ; upon which the door of the court was shut before he could get to it. He knocked loudly at that and other doors that were all shut ; so that he could not get into the house, though it were some hours before sunset in the month of May. After some hours' attendance, one Mr. Fairfax, who waited upon the duke of Buckingham, came to the door, and without opening it asked him, " what he " would have : " and he answered, " that he had " a message to the duke from the king, and that " he must speak with him ;" to which he replied, " that he was not there, and that he should seek " for him in some other place." The sergeant told him, " that he saw him go into the house ; " and that if he might not be admitted to speak " with him, he would require the sheriff of the " county to give him his assistance : " upon which the gentleman went away, and about half an hour after returned again, and threatened the sergeant so much, after he had opened the door, that the poor man had not the courage to stay longer ; but returned to the court, and gave a full relation in writing to the secretary of the endeavours he had used, and the affronts he had received.

Why all the particular circumstances of this affair are so punctually related will appear anon. The king was so exceedingly offended at this carriage and behaviour of the duke, that he made relation of it to the council-board, and publicly declared, " that he was no longer of that number," and caused his name to be left out in the list of the counsellors, " and that he was no longer a " gentleman of his bedchamber," and put the earl of Rochester to wait in his place. His majesty likewise revoked that commission by which he was constituted lord lieutenant of the east riding in Yorkshire, and granted that commission to the earl of Burlington : so that it was not possible for his majesty to give more lively instances of his displeasure against any man, than he had done against the duke. And at the same time, with the advice of the board, a proclamation issued out for his apprehension, and inhibiting all persons to entertain, receive, or conceal him. Upon which he thought it fit to leave the country, and that he should be less discovered in London, whither he resorted, and had many lodgings in several quarters of the city. And though his majesty had frequent intelligence where he was ; and continued advertisements of the liberty he took in his discourses of his own person, and of some others, of which he was no less sensible ; yet when the sergeant at arms, and others employed for his apprehension, came where he was known to have been but an hour before, he was gone from thence, or so concealed there that he could not be found : and in this manner he continued sleeping all the day, and walking from place to place in the night, for the space of some months.

At last, being advertised of renewed instances of the king's displeasure, and that it every day increased upon new intelligence that he received of his behaviour, he grew weary of the posture he was in, and employed several persons to move the king on his behalf; for he was informed that the king resolved to proceed against him for his life, and that his estate was begged and given. Upon this one night he sent his secretary, Mr. Clifford, to the chancellor, with whom he had never entered into any dispute, with some compliments and expressions of confidence in his friendship. He professed "great innocence and integrity in all his actions with reference to the king, though he might have been passionate and indiscreet in his words; that there was a conspiracy against his life, and that his estate was granted or promised to persons who had begged it:" and in conclusion he desired "that he would send him his advice what he should do, but rather, that he would permit him to come to him in the evening to his house, that he might confer with him."

The chancellor answered his secretary, who was well known to him, "that he might not confer with him till he rendered himself to the king; that he was confident, having seen testimony enough to convince him, that the duke was not innocent; and that he had much to answer for disrespectful mention of the king, which would require much acknowledgment and submission: but that he did not know that his crimes were of that magnitude as would put his life into danger; and that he was most confident that there was no conspiracy to take that from him, except his faults were of another nature than they yet appeared to be; and which no conspiracy, which he need not fear, could deprive him of. And he did not believe that there had been any attempt to beg his estate: but he was sure there had not been, nor could be, any grant of it to any man, which must have passed by the great seal." He did advise him, and desired him to follow his advice, "that if he did know himself innocent as to unlawful actions and designs, and that his fault consisted only in indiscreet words, as he seemed to confess; he would no longer aggravate his offence by contemning his warrants, which he would not be long able to avoid, but deliver himself into the custody of the lieutenant of the Tower, which he was at liberty by the proclamation to do, and send then a petition to the king, that he might be heard: and that when he had done this, he would be ready and willing to do him all the offices which would consist with his duty."

And the next day he gave his majesty a particular account of the message which he had received, and of the answer which he had returned; which his majesty approved, and shewed him a letter that he had received from the duke that morning, which seemed to have been written after his secretary had returned from the chancellor. The letter contained a large profession of his innocence, and complaint of the power of his enemies, and a very earnest desire "that his majesty would give him leave to speak with him, and then dispose of him as he pleased;" to which his majesty had answered to the person who brought the letter, who, as I remember, was sir Robert Howard, "that the duke need not fear the power of any enemies, but would be sure to have justice, if he would submit to it."

But his majesty in his discourse seemed to be as weary of the prosecution, as the duke was of the concealing himself to avoid it, and to have much apprehension of his interest and power in the parliament; and to be troubled that the principal witness, upon whose testimony he relied, was at [that] time sick of the smallpox, and in danger of death, and that another retracted part of that evidence that he had given. In a word, his majesty appeared less angry than he had been, and willing that an end should be put to the business without any public prosecution. To which the chancellor made no other answer, than "that no advice could be given with preservation of his majesty's dignity, till the duke rendered himself into the hand of justice:" which he was very unwilling to do, and sent again to the chancellor by sir Robert Howard, to press him, "that he might be admitted first to the king's presence, and then sent to the Tower." The other told him, "that if the king were inclined to admit him in that manner, he would dissuade him from it, as a thing dishonourable to him after so long a contest;" and repeated the same to him that he said formerly to Mr. Clifford: nor could he be persuaded by any others (for others did speak to him to the same purpose) to recede a tittle from what he had insisted upon, "that he should put himself in the Tower." Of all which he still gave the king a faithful account of every word that passed: for he knew well that the lord Arlington endeavoured to persuade the king, "that the chancellor favoured the duke, and desired that he should be at liberty;" when at the same time he used all the ways he could to have it insinuated to the duke's friends, "that he knew nothing of the business, but that the whole prosecution was made by the information and advice of the chancellor."

In the end, the duke was persuaded to render himself to the Tower: and from thence he sent a petition to the king, who presently appeared very inclined to give over any further prosecution; which alteration all men wondered at, nor could any man imagine the ground or reason of it. For though the principal witness was dead, as the lord Arlington declared he was, and that so much could not be proved as at the first discovery was reasonably suspected; yet the meanness and villainess of the persons with whom he kept so familiar correspondence, the letters between them which were ready to be produced, the disrespectful and scandalous discourses which he often held concerning the king's person, and many other particulars which had most inflamed the king, and which might fully have been proved, would have manifested so much vanity and presumption in the duke, as must have lessened his credit and reputation with all serious men, and made him worthy of severe censure. But whether the king thought not fit to proceed upon the words and scandalous discourses, which he thought would more disperse and publish the scandals; or whether he did really believe that it would disturb and obstruct all his business in parliament; or what other reason soever prevailed with his majesty, as without doubt some other there were: his majesty was very impatient to be rid of the business, and would have been easily persuaded to have given present order for setting the duke at liberty, and so to silence all further discourse.

But he was persuaded, "that that would most reflect upon his own honour, by making it believed, that there had been in truth a foul conspiracy against the person of the duke, which would give him more credit in the parliament and every where else;" for the king had not yet, with all his indulgence, a better opinion of his affection and fidelity than he had before.

In conclusion; it was resolved, "that the lieutenant of the Tower should bring the duke of Buckingham to the council chamber, his majesty being present; and there the attorney and solicitor general should open the charge that was against him, and read all the examinations which had been taken, and the letters which had passed between them;" all which was done. And the duke denying "that he had ever written to that fellow, though he knew him well, and used to make himself merry with him," the letter was produced (which the king and the lord Arlington, who both knew his hand well, made no doubt to be his hand) and delivered to the duke; who, as soon as he cast his eye upon it, said, "it was not his hand, but he well knew whose it was." And being asked whose hand it was, he said, "it was his sister's, the duchess of Richmond, with whom," he said, "it was known that he had no correspondence." Whereupon the king called for the letter, and, having looked upon it, he said, "he had been mistaken," and confessed "that it was the duchess's hand;" and seemed much out of countenance upon the mistake: though the letter gave still as much cause of suspicion, for it was as strange that she should write to such a fellow in a style very obliging, and being in answer to a letter; so that it seemed very reasonable still to believe, that she might have written it upon his desire and dictating.

The duke denied most of the particulars contained in the examinations: and for the other letters which had been written to him by the fellow who was in the Tower, (whereof one was found in his pocket sealed to be sent to the duke, and the others were copies of others which had been sent; and the witness who was dead had delivered one of them into the duke's own hand, and related at large the kindness he expressed towards the man, and the message he sent to him by him,) he denied that he had ever received those letters; but acknowledged, "that the man came often to him, and pretended skill in horoscopes, but more in distillations, in which the duke delighted and exercised himself, but looked upon the fellow as cracked in his brain, and fit only to be laughed at." When the duke was withdrawn, the king declared, "that he had been deceived in being confident that the letter had been written by the duke, which he now discerned not to be his hand, and he knew as well to have been written by the duchess;" and thereupon seemed to think that there was nothing else worth the examining: and so order was given to set the duke at liberty, who immediately went to his own house, and went not in some days afterwards to the court.

About this time, or in a few days afterwards, a great affliction befell the chancellor in his domestics, which prepared him to bear all the unexpected accidents that suddenly succeeded that more insupportable misfortune. His wife, the mother of all his children, and his companion in all his banishment, and who had made all his former calamities less grievous by her company and courage, having made a journey to Tunbridge for her health, returned from thence without the benefit she expected, yet without being thought by the physicians to be in any danger; and within less than three days died: which was so sudden, unexpected, and irreparable a loss, that he had not courage to support; which nobody wondered at who knew the mutual satisfaction and comfort they had in each other. And he might possibly have sunk under it, if his enemies had not found out a new kind of consolation to him, which his friends could never have thought of.

Within few days after his wife's death, the king vouchsafed to come to his house to condole with him, and used many gracious expressions to him: yet within less than a fortnight the duke (who was seldom a day without doing him the honour to see him) came to him, and with very much trouble told him, "that such a day, that was past, walking with the king in the park, his majesty asked him how the chancellor did: to which his highness had made answer, that he was the [most] disconsolate person he ever [saw]; and that he had lamented himself to him not only upon the loss of his wife, but out of apprehension that his majesty had of late withdrawn his countenance from him: to which his majesty replied, that he wondered he should think so, but that he would speak more to him of that subject the next day. And that that morning his majesty had held a long discourse with him, in which he told him, that he had received very particular and certain intelligence, that when the parliament should meet again, they were resolved to impeach the chancellor, who was grown very odious to them, not only for his having opposed them in all those things upon which they had set their hearts, but that they had been informed that he had proposed and advised their dissolution; which had enraged them to that degree, that they had taken a resolution as soon as they came together again to send up an impeachment against him; which would be a great dishonour to his majesty, and obstruct all his affairs, nor should he be able to protect him or divert them: and therefore that it would be necessary for his service, and likewise for the preservation of the chancellor, that he should deliver up the seal to him. All which he desired the duke" (who confessed that he had likewise received the same advertisement) "to inform him of: and that the chancellor himself should choose the way and the manner of delivering up the seal, whether he would wait upon the king and give it into his own hand, or whether the king should send a secretary or a privy counsellor for it." When the duke had said all that the king had given him in charge, he declared himself "to be much unsatisfied with the king's resolution; and though he had received the same advertisement, and believed that there was a real combination and conspiracy against him, yet he knew the chancellor's innocence would not be frightened with it."

The chancellor was indeed as much surprised with this relation, as he could have been at the sight of a warrant for his execution. He told the duke, "that he did not wonder that the king and "his highness had been informed of such a resolution; for that they who had contrived the "conspiracy, and done all they could to make it "prevalent, could best inform his majesty and "his highness of what would probably fall out." And thereupon he informed the duke "of what "had passed at the day of the last prorogation, "and the discourse and promise sir William "Coventry had made to them, if they had a mind "to be rid of the chancellor: but," he said, "that "which only afflicted him was, that the king "should have no better opinion of his innocence "and integrity, than to conclude that such a "combination must ruin him. And he was more "troubled to find, that the king himself had so "terrible an apprehension of their power and "their purposes, as if they might do any thing "they had a mind to do. He did not believe "that he was so odious to the parliament as he "was reported to be; if he were, it was only for "his zeal to his majesty's service, and his insisting upon what his majesty had resolved: but "he was confident that when his enemies had "done all that their malice could suggest against "him, it would appear that the parliament was "not of their mind. He wished that he might "have the honour to speak with the king, before "he returned any answer to his commands." The duke was pleased graciously to reply, "that "it was the advice he intended to give him, that "he should desire it; and that he doubted not "but that he should easily prevail with the king "to come to his house, whither he had used so "frequently to come, and where he had been so "few days before:" and at this time the chancellor was not only not well able to walk; besides that it was against the common rules of decency to go so soon out of his house. When the duke desired the king, that he would vouchsafe to go to Clarendon-house, his majesty very readily consented to it; and said, "he would go "thither the next day." But that and more days passed; and then he told the duke, "that since "he resolved to take the seal, it would not be so "fit for him to go thither; but he would send for "the chancellor to come to his own chamber in "Whitehall, and he would go thither to him."

In the mean time it began to be the discourse of the court: and the duchess, from whom the duke had yet concealed it, came to be informed of it; who presently went to the king with some passion; and the archbishop of Canterbury and the general accompanied her, who all besought the king not to take such a resolution. And many other of the privy-council, with none of whom the chancellor had spoken, taking notice of the rumour, attended the king with the same suit and advice. To all whom his majesty answered, "that what he intended was for his good, and "the only way to preserve him." He held longer discourse to the general, "that he did believe by "what his brother had told him, of the extreme "agony the chancellor was in upon the death of "his wife, that he had himself desired to be dismissed from his office;" and bade the general "go to him, and bid him come the next morning "to his own chamber at Whitehall, and the king "would come thither to him." And the general came to him with great professions of kindness, which he had well deserved from him, gave him a relation of all that had passed with the king, and concluded, "that what had been done had "been upon mistake; and he doubted not, but "that upon conference with his majesty all things "would be well settled again to his content;" which no doubt he did at that time believe as well as wish.

Upon Monday, the 26th of August, about ten of the clock in the morning, the chancellor went to his chamber in Whitehall, where he had not been many minutes, before the king and duke by themselves came into the room. His majesty looked very graciously upon him, and made him sit down; when the other acknowledged "the "honour his majesty had done him, in admitting "him into his presence before he executed a "resolution he had taken." He said, "that he "had no suit to make to him, nor the least "thought to dispute with him, or to divert him "from the resolution he had taken; but only to "receive his determination from himself, and "most humbly to beseech him to let him know "what fault he had committed, that had drawn "this severity upon him from his majesty." The king told him, "he had not any thing to object "against him; but must always acknowledge, "that he had always served him honestly and "faithfully, and that he did believe that never "king had a better servant, and that he had taken "this resolution for his good and preservation, "as well as for his own convenience and security; "and that he had verily believed that it had been "upon his consent and desire." And thereupon his majesty entered upon a relation of all that had passed between him and the duke, and "that he "really thought his brother had concurred with "him in his opinion, as the only way to preserve "him." In that discourse the duke sometimes positively denied to have said somewhat, and explained other things as not said to the purpose his majesty understood, or that he ever implied that himself though it fit.

The sum of what his majesty said was, "that "he was most assured by information that could "not deceive him, that the parliament was resolved, as soon as they should come together "again, to impeach the chancellor; and then "that his innocence would no more defend and "secure him against their power, than the earl "of Strafford had defended himself against them: "and," he said, "he was as sure, that his taking "the seal from him at this time would so well "please the parliament, that his majesty should "thereby be able to preserve him, and to provide "for the passage of his own business, and the "obtaining all that he desired." He said, "he "was sorry that the business had taken so much "air, and was so publicly spoken of, that he "knew not how to change his purpose;" which he seemed to impute to the passion of the duchess, that had divulged it.

The chancellor told him, "that he had not contributed to the noise, nor had imparted it to his "own children, till they with great trouble informed him, that they heard it from such and "such persons," whom they named, "with some "complaint that it was concealed from them: "nor did he then come in hope to divert him "from the resolution he had taken in the matter "itself." He said, "he had but two things to "trouble him with. The first, that he would by "no means suffer it to be believed that he himself was willing to deliver up the seal; and that he should not think himself a gentleman, if he were willing to depart and withdraw himself from the office, in a time when he thought his majesty would have need of all honest men, and in which he thought he might be able to do him some service. The second, that he could not acknowledge this deprivation to be done in his favour, or in order to do him good; but on the contrary, that he looked upon it as the greatest ruin he could undergo, by his majesty's own declaring his judgment upon him, which would amount to little less than a confirmation of those many libellous discourses which had been raised, and would upon the matter expose him to the rage and fury of the people, who had been with great artifice and industry persuaded to believe, that he had been the cause and the counsellor of all that they liked not. That he was so far from fearing the justice of the parliament, that he renounced his majesty's protection or interposition towards his preservation: and that though the earl of Strafford had undergone a sentence he did not deserve, yet he could not acknowledge their cases to be parallel. That though that great person had never committed any offence that could amount to treason, yet he had done many things which he could not justify, and which were transgressions against the law: whereas he was not guilty of any action, whereof he did not desire the law might be the judge. And if his majesty himself should discover all that he had said to him in secret, he feared not any censure that should attend it: if any body could charge him with any crime or offence, he would most willingly undergo the punishment that belonged to it.

"But," he said, "he doubted very much, that the throwing off an old servant, who had served the crown in some trust near thirty years, (who had the honour by the command of his blessed father, who had left good evidence of the esteem he had of his fidelity, to wait upon his majesty when he went out of the kingdom, and by the great blessing of God had the honour to return with him again; which no other counsellor alive could say,) on the sudden, without any suggestion of a crime, nay, with a declaration of innocence, would call his majesty's justice and good-nature into question; and men would not know how securely to serve him, when they should see it was in the power of three or four persons who had never done him any notable service, nor were in the opinion of those who knew them best like to do, to dispose him to so ungracious an act."

The king seemed very much troubled and irresolute; then repeated "the great power of the parliament, and the clear information he had of their purposes, which they were resolved to go through with, right or wrong; and that his own condition was such, that he could not dispute with them, but was upon the matter at their mercy."

The chancellor told him, "it was not possible for his majesty to have any probable assurance what the parliament would do. And though he knew he had offended some of the house of commons, in opposing their desires in such

"particulars as his majesty thought were prejudicial to his service; yet he did not doubt but his reputation was much greater in both houses, than either of theirs who were known to be his enemies, and to have this influence upon his majesty, who were all known to be guilty of some transgressions, which they would have been called in question for in parliament, if he had not very industriously, out of the tenderness he had for his majesty's honour and service, prevented it; somewhat whereof was not unknown to his majesty." He concluded "with beseeching him, whatever resolution he took in his particular, not to suffer his spirits to fall, nor himself to be dejected with the apprehension of the formidable power of the parliament, which was more or less or nothing, as he pleased to make it: that it was yet in his own power to govern them; but if they found it was in theirs to govern him, nobody knew what the end would be." And thereupon he made him a short relation of the method that was used in the time of Richard the Second, "when they terrified the king with the power and the purposes of the parliament, till they brought him to consent to that from which he could not redeem himself, and without which they could have done him no harm." And in the warmth of this relation he found a seasonable opportunity to mention the lady with some reflections and cautions, which he might more advisedly have declined.

After two hours' discourse, the king rose without saying any thing, but appeared not well pleased with all that had been said; and the duke of York found he was offended with the last part of it. The garden, that used to be private, had now many in it to observe the countenance of the king when he came out of the room: and when the chancellor returned, the lady, the lord Arlington, and Mr. May, looked together out of her open window with great gaiety and triumph, which all people observed.

Four or five days passed without any further proceedings, or the king's declaring his resolution: and in that time the chancellor's concern was the only argument of the court. Many of the council, and other persons of honour and interest, presumed to speak with the king, and to give a very good testimony of him, of his unquestionable integrity, and of his parts, and credit with the sober part of the nation: and to those his majesty always commended him, with professions of much kindness; but said, "he had made himself odious to the parliament, and so was no more capable to do him service." On the other side, the lady and lord Arlington, and sir William Coventry, exceedingly triumphed, the last of which openly and without reserve declared, "that he had given the king advice to remove him as a man odious to the parliament, and that the king would be ruined if he did it not; that he was so imperious, that he would endure no contradiction;" with many other reproaches to that purpose. But except those three, and Mr. May and Mr. Brouncker, there seemed none of name in the court who wished that the resolution should be pursued.

The duke of York concerned himself wonderfully on the chancellor's behalf, and with as much warmth as any private gentleman could express on the behalf of his friend. He had great indignation at the behaviour of sir William Coventry and Mr. Brounker, that being his servants they should presume to shew so much malice towards a person they knew he had kindness for. And the former had so much sense of it, that he resolved to quit the relation by which he had got vast wealth, and came to him, and told him, "that since he was commissioner for the treasury, he found he should not be able to attend his service so diligently as he ought to do; and therefore desired his highness's favour in his dismission, and that he would give him leave to commend an honest man to succeed him in his service:" to which his highness shortly answered, "that he might dispose himself as he would, with which he was well content; and that he would choose another secretary for himself without his recommendation." And his highness presently went to the chancellor, and informed him of it, with displeasure enough towards the man, and much satisfaction that he was rid of him; and asked him "whom he would recommend to him for a secretary." He told his highness, "that if he would trust his judgment, he would recommend a person to him, who he believed was not unknown to him, and for whose parts and fidelity he would pass his word, having had good experience of both in his having served him as a secretary for the space of above seven years;" and named Mr. Wren. The duke said, "he knew him well, being a member of the Royal Company, where he often heard him speak very intelligently, and discerned him to be a man of very good parts, and therefore he would very willingly receive him; and the rather, that he knew it would be looked upon as an evidence of his kindness to him, which he would always own and testify to all the world:" and within two days after, he received him into his service with the king's approbation, the gentleman's abilities being very well known, and his person much loved.

In this suspension, the common argument was, "that it was not now the question whether the chancellor was innocent; but whether, when the king had so long resolved to remove him, and had now proceeded so far towards it, he should retract his resolution, and be governed by his brother: it was enough that he was not beloved, and that the court wished him removed." And Mr. Brounker openly declared, "that the resolution had been taken above two months before; and that it would not consist with his majesty's honour to be hectorated out of it by his brother, who was wrought upon by his wife's crying." And this kind of argumentation was every moment inculcated by the lady and her party: insomuch as when the duke made his instances with all the importunity he could use, and put his majesty in mind "of many discourses his majesty had formerly held with him, of the chancellor's honesty and discretion, conjuring him to love and esteem him accordingly, when his highness had not so good an opinion of him;" and, "that now he had found by good experience that he deserved that character, his majesty would withdraw his kindness from him, and rather believe others, who he knew were in his enemies, than his own judgment;" the king gave no other answer, than "that he had proceeded too far to retire; and that he should be looked upon as a child, if he receded from his purpose."

And so being reconfirmed, upon the 30th of August in the year 1667 he sent secretary Morrice, who had no mind to the employment, with a warrant under the sign manual, to require and receive the great seal; which the chancellor immediately delivered to him with all the expressions of duty to the king. And as soon as the secretary had delivered it to the king in his closet, Mr. May went into the closet, and fell upon his knees, and kissed his majesty's hand, telling him "that he was now king, which he had never been before."

The chancellor believed that the storm had been now over; for he had not the least apprehension of the displeasure of the parliament, or of any thing they could say or do against him: yet he resolved to stay at his house till it should meet, (without going thither, which he was informed would be ill taken,) that he might not be thought to be afraid of being questioned; and then to retire into the country, and to live there very privately. And there was a report raised without any ground, that he intended to go to the house of peers, and take his precedence as chancellor, with which the king was much offended: but as soon as he heard of it, he desired the lord chamberlain to assure his majesty, "that he never intended any such thing, nor would ever do any thing that he believed would displease him;" with which he seemed well satisfied.

However, a new tempest was quickly raised against him. Many persons of honour and quality came every day to visit him with many expressions of affection and esteem; and most of the king's servants, except only those few who had declared themselves his enemies, still frequented his house with the same kindness they had always professed: but they were looked upon quickly with a very ill countenance by the other party, and were plainly told, "that the king would take it ill from all his servants who visited the chancellor;" though when some of them asked his majesty: "whether their visiting him, to whom they had been formerly much beholden, would offend his majesty;" he answered, "No, he had not forbid any man to visit him." Yet it appeared more every day, that they were best looked on who forbore going to him, and the other found themselves upon much disadvantage; by which however many were not discouraged.

The chief prosecutors behaved themselves with more insolence than was agreeable to their discretion: and the lord Arlington, who had long before behaved himself with very little courtesy towards all persons whom he believed to be well affected to the chancellor, even towards ambassadors and other foreign ministers, now when any of his friends came to him for the despatch of business in his office, asked them "when they saw the chancellor," and bade them "go to him to put their business into a method." The duke of Buckingham, who had after his enlargement visited the chancellor, and acknowledged the civilities he had received from him, came now again to the court, and was received with extraordinary grace by the king, and restored to all the honours and offices of which he was deprived; and was informed and assured, "that all the proceedings which had been against him were upon the information and advice of the chancellor:" and whatever he had spoken in council was told him in that manner (and without the true circumstances) that might make most impression on him.

One day whilst that matter was depending, (which is not mentioned before,) the lord Arlington, after he found the king had acquainted the chancellor with the business, and shewed him the information and examinations which had been taken, proposed, there being more or the same witnesses to be further examined, "that the chancellor might be present with the rest who had been formerly employed at their examining:" which the king seeming to consent to, the other desired to be excused, "for that the office he held never used to be subject to those employments;" and in the debate added, "that if the testimony of witnesses made good all that was suggested, and the duke should be brought to a trial, it might probably fall out, that the king might command him to execute the office of high steward, as he had lately done in the trial of the lord Morley; and in that respect it would be very incongruous for him to be present at the examinations." The duke was now informed, without any of the circumstances, that the chancellor had said that he was to be high steward at the trial of the duke.

The duke, who always believed, and could not but upon the matter know, that the lord Arlington (with whom he had enmity) had been very solicitous in his prosecution, had, after his having visited the chancellor, sent a friend, whom he thought he would trust, to him, "to desire him to deal freely with him concerning the lord Arlington, whom he knew to be an enemy to both of them; and that he must have him examined upon that conspiracy, which he hoped he would not take ill:" to which he answered, "that he neither would nor could be examined concerning any thing that had been said or done in council; but that he would, as his friend, and to prevent his exposing himself to any new inconvenience, very freely and faithfully assure him, that he did not believe that there had been any conspiracy against him, nor did know that the lord Arlington had done any thing in the prosecution, but what was according to the obligation and duty of his office; which testimony," he said, "could proceed only from justice, since he well knew that lord did not wish him well." This answer, it seems, or the despair of drawing any other from him to his purpose, disposed him to give entire credit to the other information; and the king took great pains to reconcile him to the lord Arlington, who made many vows to him of his future service, and desired his protection: and hereupon the duke openly professed his resolution of revenge, and frankly entered into the combination with the lord Arlington and sir William Coventry against the chancellor.

But the knowledge of all this did not give him much trouble, (so much confidence he had in his own innocence, and so little esteem of the credit and interest of his enemies,) until he heard that the king himself expressed great displeasure towards him, and declared, "that he had misbehaved himself towards his majesty, and that he was so imperious that he would endure no contradiction; that he had a faction in the house of commons, that opposed every thing that concerned his majesty's service, if it were not recommended to them by him; and that he had given him very ill advice concerning the parliament, which offended him most:" all which they to whom his majesty said it divulged to others, that they might thereby lessen the chancellor's credit and interest. It is very true, they who had taken all advantages to alienate the king's affections from him, had at first only proposed his removal, "as a person odious to the parliament, and whom they were resolved to impeach, which would put his majesty into a strait, either to renounce or desert an old servant, which would not be for his honour, or, by protecting him, to deprive himself of all those benefits which he expected from the parliament; whereas the removing him would so gratify the houses, that they would deny nothing that his majesty should demand of them;" and his majesty did believe it the only way to preserve him. But when they had prevailed so far, and rendered themselves more necessary to him, they prosecuted what they had begun with more visible animosity, and told him, "that if the parliament suspected that his majesty retained still any kindness towards him, they would not be satisfied with his removal, but apprehend that he would be again received into his favour; and he would in the mean time have so much credit in both houses, especially if he sat in the house of peers," which they undertook to know he intended to do, "that he would be able to obstruct whatsoever his majesty desired: and therefore it was necessary that his majesty should upon all occasions declare, and that it should be believed, that he had so full a prejudice against him, that nobody should have cause to fear, that he would ever again be received into any trust." And this disposed his majesty to discourse to many in that manner that is before set down.

And when the duke of York lamented to his majesty the reports which were generally spread abroad, of the discourses which he made to many persons of the chancellor's misbehaviour towards himself, and his own displeasure against him; the king denied many of the particulars, as that concerning his ill counsel against the parliament, which he denied to have spoken: but said withal, "that if the chancellor had done as he advised him, and delivered up the seal to him as of his own inclination, all would have been quiet. But since he insisted so much upon it, and compelled him to send for it in that manner, he was obliged in the vindication of his honour to give some reasons for what he had done, when other men took upon them so loudly to commend the chancellor, and to justify his innocence, not without some reflection upon his own honour and justice, which he could not but take very ill: but he should not suffer," he said, "for what other men did, and that he would use his two sons as kindly as ever he had done." And it must be always acknowledged, that though great importunity was used to his majesty, to discharge his two sons from his service, as a thing necessary by all the rules of policy, not to suffer the sons to remain so near his person, when their father lay under so notorious a brand of his displeasure, (in which they believed they had so far prevailed, that they took upon them to promise their places to other men :) but the king positively refused to yield to them, and continued his favour still to them both in the same manner he had done. And though he was long after persuaded to suspend his eldest son from waiting, under which cloud he continued for many months, yet at last he was restored to his place with circumstances of extraordinary favour and grace : nor did his majesty afterwards recede from his goodness towards either of them, notwithstanding all the attempts which were made.

The parliament met upon the 10th of October, when the king in a short speech told them, "that there had been some former miscarriages, which had occasioned some differences between him and them : but that he had now altered his counsels, and made no question but that they should henceforward agree, for he was resolved to give them all satisfaction ; and did not doubt but that they would supply his necessities, and provide for the payment of his debts ;" with an insinuation, "that what had been formerly done amiss had been by the advice of the person whom he had removed from his counsels, and with whom he should not hereafter advise."

When the house of commons came together, one Tomkins, a man of very contemptible parts and of worse manners, (who used to be encouraged by men of design to set some motion on foot, which they thought not fit to appear in themselves till they discerned how it would take,) moved the house, "that they might send a message of thanks to the king for his gracious expressions, and for the many good things which he had done, and particularly for his removing the chancellor ;" which was seconded by two or three, but rejected by the house as a thing unreasonable for them who knew not the motives which had disposed his majesty : and so a committee was appointed to prepare such a message as might be fit for them to send. And the house of lords the same day sent to the king, without consulting with the house of commons, to give his majesty thanks for the speech he had made to them in the morning, which commonly used to be done. The king declared himself very much offended that the proposition in the house of commons for returning thanks to him had not succeeded, and more that it had been opposed by many of his own servants ; and commanded them "to press and renew the motion : that his honour was concerned in it ; and therefore he would expect thanks, and would take it very ill of any of his own servants who refused to concur in it." Hereupon it was again moved : but notwithstanding all the labour that had been used contrary to all custom and privilege of parliament, the question held six hours' debate, very many speaking against the injustice and irregularity of it ; they on the other side urging the king's expectation of it. In the end, the question being put, it was believed the noes to be the greater number : but the division of the house was not urged for many reasons ; and so the vote was sent to the house of lords, who were desired to concur with them.

But it had there a greater contradiction. They had already returned their thanks to the king ; and now to send again, and to add any particular to it, would be very incongruous and without any precedent : and therefore they would not concur in it. This obstinacy very much displeased the king : and he was persuaded by those who had hitherto prevailed with him, to believe that this contradiction, if he did not master it, would run through all his business that should be brought into that house. Whereupon his majesty reproached many of the lords for presuming to oppose and cross what was so absolutely necessary for his service : and sent to the archbishop of Canterbury, "that he should in his majesty's name command all the bishops' bench to concur in it ; and if they should refuse it, he would make them repent it ;" with many other very severe reprehensions and animadversions. This being done in so extraordinary a manner, the duke of York told his majesty, "how much it was spoken of and wondered at : to which his majesty replied, "that his honour was engaged, and that he would not be satisfied, if thanks were not returned to him by both houses ; and that it should go the worse for the chancellor if his friends opposed it." And he commanded his royal highness that he should not cross it, but was contented to dispense with his attendance, and gave him leave to be absent from the debate ; which liberty many others likewise took : and so when it was again moved, though it was still confidently opposed, it was carried by a major part, many being absent.

And so both houses attended the king and gave him thanks, which his majesty graciously received as a boon he looked for, and said somewhat that implied that he was much displeased with the chancellor ; of which some men thought they were to make the best use they could. And therefore, after the king's answer was reported to the house of peers, as of course whatsoever the king says upon any message is always reported, it was proposed, "that the king's answer might be entered in the Journal Book ;" which was rejected, as not usual, even when the king himself spoke to both houses : nor was what he now said entered in the house of commons. However, when they had consulted together, they found that they had not yet so particular a record of the displeasure against the chancellor, as what he had said upon this message did amount unto ; they moved the house again, "that it might be entered in the book : and it was again rejected. All which would not serve the turn ; but the duke of Buckingham a third time moved it, as a thing the king expected : and thereupon it was entered.

And his majesty now declared to his brother and to many of the lords, "that he had now all he desired, and that there should be no more done to the chancellor." And without doubt the king had not at this time a purpose to give any further countenance to the animosity of his enemies, who thought that what was already done was too easy a composition, and told his majesty, "that, if he were not prosecuted further, he would gain reputation by it : for that the manner in which all votes had been yet carried was rather a vindication than censure of him ; and he would shortly come to the house with more credit to do mischief, and to obstruct whatsoever related to his service. But that such things

" would be found against him, as soon as men " were satisfied that his majesty had totally de" serted him, (which yet they were not,) that he " would have no more credit to do good or " harm." Hereupon there were several cabals entered into, who invited and sent for persons of all conditions, who had had any business depending before the chancellor, or charters passed the seal; and examined them whether he had not received money from them, or they were otherwise grieved by him, promising that they should receive ample reparation.

The duke of Buckingham, and some others with him, sent for sir Robert Harlow, who had the year before gone to the Barbadoes with the lord Willoughby, who had much friendship for him;
yet after they came thither, they grew unsatisfied with each other to that degree, that the lord Willoughby, who was governor of those islands, removed him from the office he had conferred on him, and sent him by the next shipping into England; where he arrived full of vexation for the treatment he had received, and willing to embrace any opportunity to be revenged on the governor. Him the duke of Buckingham sent for, who he knew was privy to all the lord Willoughby's counsels, and asked him, " what money
" the lord Willoughby had given the chancellor " for that government," (for it was well known that the chancellor had been his chief friend in procuring that government for him, and in discountenancing and suppressing those who in England or in the islands had complained of him,) " and what money he had received from " those islands; and that it was probable that he " had some influence upon the lord Willoughby " towards the disgrace himself had undergone:" and added, " that he would do the king a very " acceptable service, in discovering any thing of " the chancellor's miscarriages, of which his ma" jesty himself knew so much." To which the gentleman answered, " that he had no obligation " to the chancellor that would restrain him from " declaring any thing that might be to his prej-
" dice; but that he was not able to do it: nor " did he believe that he had ever received any " money from the lord Willoughby or from the " islands." And this kind of artifice and inquisition was used to examine all his actions; and they who were known to be any way offended with him, or disobliged by him, were most welcome to them.

After many days spent in such close contrivances and combinations, Mr. Seymour, a young man of great confidence and boldness, stood up in the house of commons, and spake long and with great bitterness against the chancellor, and
" of his great corruption in many particulars, by " which," he said, " he had gotten a vast estate.
" That he had received great sums of money from " Ireland, for making a settlement that every body " complained of, and that left that kingdom in as " great distraction as ever it had been. That he " had gotten great sums of money indirectly and
" corruptly from the plantations, the governments
" whereof he had disposed; by preferments in " the law and in the church; and for the passing " of charters: and that he had received four " thousand pounds from the Canary company for
" the establishing that company, which was so " great and general a grievance to the kingdom.

" And, which was above all this, that he had " traitorously persuaded, or endeavoured to per" suade, the king to dissolve the parliament, and " to govern by a standing army; and that he had " said, that four hundred country gentlemen were " only fit to give money, and did not understand " how an invasion was to be resisted." He mentioned many other odious particulars, " which," he said, " he would prove," and therefore proposed, " that they would presently send up to the " lords to accuse him of high treason, and require " that his person might be secured." Some others seconded him with very bitter invectives: and as many gave another kind of testimony, and many reasons which made it improbable that he could be guilty of so many heinous crimes; and " that " it would be unreasonable that he should be ac" cused of high treason by the house, before such
" proofs should be presented to them of crimes,
" that they had reason to believe him guilty." And so after many hours' debate, what they proposed for the present accusing him was rejected, and a committee appointed to consider of all particulars which should be presented against him;
" upon reporting whereof to the house, it would " give such further order as should be just."

The confident averment of so many particulars, and the so positively naming the particular sums of money which he had received, with circumstances not likely to be feigned; and especially the mentioning of many things spoken in council,
" which," they said, " would be proved by privy
" counsellors;" and other particular advices given in private to the king himself, " which," they implied, and confidently affirmed in private, " the " king himself would acknowledge;" made that impression upon many who had no ill opinion of the chancellor, and upon others who had always thought well of him, and had in truth kindness for him, that of both sorts several messages of advice were secretly sent to him, " that he would " preserve his life by making an escape, and " transporting himself into foreign parts; for that " it was not probable there could be so extreme " and violent a prosecution, if they had not " such evidence against him as would compass
" their ends." To all which he answered, " that " he would not give his enemies that advantage as " to fly from them: and in the mean time de" sired his friends to retain the good opinion they " had always had of him, until they heard some" what proved that would make him unworthy of " it; and then he would be well contented
" they should withdraw it." And it appeared afterwards, that though some of his good friends had advised that he should secure himself by flight, it proceeded from the advertisements that they had received through other hands, which came originally from his chiefest enemies, who desired that he might appear to be guilty by avoiding a trial; and who confidently informed many men, " that the impeachment was ready,
" and had been perused by the king, and that his " majesty had with his hand struck out an article " which related to the queen's marriage, and an" other that concerned the marriage of the duke;
" but that there was enough left to do the busi" ness; and that the duke of Buckingham should " be made high steward for the trial."

These reports, being spread abroad, wrought upon the duke to desire the king, " that he would

"let him know what he did intend; and whether he desired to have the chancellor's life, or that he should be condemned to perpetual imprisonment:" to which his majesty protested, "that he would have neither, but was well satisfied; and that he was resolved to stop all further prosecution against him," which his majesty likewise said to many others. The duke then asked the king, "whether the chancellor had ever given him council to govern by an army, or any thing like it; which," he said, "was so contrary to his humour, and to the professions which he had always made, and the advices he had given him, that if he were guilty of it, he should doubt his sincerity in all other things:" to which his majesty answered, "that he had never given him such counsel in his life; but, on the contrary, his fault was, that he always insisted too much upon the law." Whereupon his royal highness asked him, "whether he would give him leave to say so to others;" and his majesty replied, "with all his heart."

The duke then told it to his secretary Mr. Wren, and to many other persons, and wished them to publish it upon any occasion: upon which it was spread abroad, and Mr. Wren informed many of the members of the house of commons of all that had passed between the king and the duke in that discourse; which so much disheartened the violent prosecutors, that when the committee met that was to present the heads of a charge against him to the house, nobody appeared to give any evidence, so that they adjourned without doing any thing. Hereupon sir Thomas Osborne, a dependant and creature of the duke of Buckingham, and who had told many persons in the country before the parliament met, "that the chancellor would be accused of high treason; and if he were not hanged, he would be hanged himself:" this gentleman went to the king, and informed him what Mr. Wren confidently reported in all places, "which very much dissatisfied that party that desired to do him service; so that they knew not how to behave themselves:" to which his majesty answered, "that Wren was a lying fellow, and that he had never held any such discourse with his brother." This gave them new courage, and they resolved to call Mr. Wren to an account for traducing the king. And his majesty expostulated with the duke for what Mr. Wren had so publicly discoursed: and his highness declared, "that Mr. Wren had pursued his order, his majesty having not only said all that was reported, but had given him leave to divulge it;" to which the king made no other answer, "but that he should be hereafter more careful [of] what he said to him."

All this begat new pauses, and no advance [was] made in many days; so that it was generally believed that there would be no further prosecution: but the old argument, that they were gone too far to retire, had now more force, because many members of both houses were now joined to the party in declaring against the chancellor, who would think themselves to be betrayed and deserted, if no more should be done against him. And hereupon the committee was again revived, that was appointed to prepare heads for a charge, which sat many days, there being little debate upon the matter; for such of the committee, who knew him well, were so well pleased to find him accused of nothing but what all the world did believe him not guilty of, [that they] thought they could not do him more right, than to suffer all that was offered to pass, since there appeared no person that offered to make proof of any particular that was suggested. But three or four members of the house brought several papers, containing particulars, "which," they said, "would be proved:" all which they reported to the house.

The heads were;

I. "That the chancellor had traitorously, about the month of June last, advised the king to dissolve the parliament, and said there could be no further use of parliaments; that it was a foolish constitution, and not fit to govern by; and that it could not be imagined, that three or four hundred country gentlemen could be either prudent men or statesmen: and that it would be best for the king to raise a standing army, and to govern by that; whereupon it being demanded how that army should be maintained, he answered, by contribution and free quarter, as the last king maintained his army in the war.

II. "That he had, in the hearing of several persons, reported, that the king was a papist in his heart, or popishly affected, or had used words to that effect.

III. "That he had advised the king to grant a charter to the Canary company, for which he had received great sums of money.

IV. "That he had raised great sums of money by the sale of offices which ought not to be sold, and granted injunctions to stop proceedings at law, and dissolved them afterwards for money.

V. "That he had introduced an arbitrary government into his majesty's several plantations, and had caused such as had complained to his majesty and privy-council of it to be imprisoned long for their presumption; and that he had frustrated and rejected a proposition that had been made for the preservation of Nevis and St. Christopher's, and for the reducing the French plantations to his majesty's obedience.

VI. "That he had caused quo warrantos to be issued out against most corporations in England, although the charters were newly confirmed by act of parliament, till they paid him good sums of money, and then the quo warrantos were discharged.

VII. "That he had received great sums of money for the settlement of Ireland.

VIII. "That he had deluded the king and betrayed the nation in all foreign treaties and negotiations, especially concerning the late war.

IX. "That he had procured his majesty's customs to be farmed at underrates, knowing them to be so; and caused many pretended debts to be paid by his majesty, to the payment whereof his majesty was not in strictness bound; for all which he had received great sums of money.

X. "That he had received bribes from the company of vintners, that they might continue the prices of their wines, and might be freed from the penalties which they were liable to.

XI. "That he had raised in a short time a greater estate than could be lawfully got; and that he had gotten the grant of several of the crown lands contrary to his duty.

XII. "That he had advised and effected the sale of Dunkirk to the French king, for less money than the ammunition, artillery, and stores were worth.

XIII. "That he had caused the king's letters under the great seal to one Dr. Crowther to be altered, and the enrolment thereof to be rased.

XIV. "That he had in an arbitrary way examined and drawn into question divers of his majesty's subjects concerning their lands and properties, and determined thereof at the council-table, and stopped the proceedings at law, and threatened some that pleaded the statute of 17 Car.

XV. "That he was a principal author of that fatal counsel of dividing the fleet in June 1666."

The committee reported another article for his charge, which was, "that he had kept correspondence with Cromwell during the time of the king's being beyond the seas, and had sent over his secretary to him, who was shut up with him for many hours:" but there were many members of the house, who wished it had been true, knew well enough that foolish calumny had been examined at Paris during the time that his majesty resided there, when persons of the highest degree were very desirous to have kindled a jealousy in the king of the chancellor's fidelity; and that the scandal appeared so gross and impossible, that his majesty had then published a full vindication of his innocence; with a further declaration, "that when it should please God to restore him to his own dominions, he should receive such further justice and reparation, as the laws would enable him to procure." And it was well known to divers of the members present, that the persons who were suborned in that conspiracy had acknowledged it since the king's return; and the persons themselves who had suborned them had confessed it, and begged the chancellor's pardon: of all which his majesty had been particularly and fully informed. And that it might be no more ripped up or looked into, they seemed to reject it as being included under the act of indemnity, which they would have left him to have pleaded for the infamy of it, if they had not very well known the grossness of the scandal.

Though the fierceness of the malice that was contracted against him was enough known and taken notice of, yet the heads for the charge, which upon so much deliberation were prepared and offered to the house against him, were of such a nature, that all men present did in their own conscience acquit him: and therefore it was generally believed the prosecutors would rather have acquiesced with what they had done to blast his reputation, than have proceeded further, to bring him to answer for himself. But they had gone too far to retire. And they who had first wrought upon the king, only by persuading him, "that there was so universal a hatred against the chancellor, that the parliament would the first day accuse him of high treason; and that the removing him from his office was the only way to preserve him, except he would in such a conjuncture, and when he had so much need of the parliament, sacrifice all his interest for the protection of the chancellor," (and this was the sole motive that had prevailed with him, as his majesty not only assured him the last time he spake with him, with many gracious expressions, but at large expressed it to very many persons of honour, who endeavoured to dissuade him from pursuing that counsel, "that it was the only expedient for the chancellor's preservation," with as great a testimony of his integrity and the services he had done him as could be given:) the same men now importuned him, "to prosecute with all his power, and to let those of his servants and others who regarded his commands know, that they could not serve him and the chancellor together; and that he should look upon their adhering to him as the abandoning his majesty's service. That the chancellor had so great a faction in both houses, that no position on his majesty's behalf would have effect; and that he would shortly come to the house of peers, and obstruct all proceedings there."

This prevailed so far, that they resumed their former courage, and pressed "that he might be accused by the house of commons of high treason: upon which the lords would presently commit him to the Tower: and then nobody would have any longer apprehension of his power to do hurt." Hereupon they resolved again to consider the several heads of the charge they had provided, to see if they could find any one upon which they could ground an accusation of high treason. They spent a whole day upon the first head, which they thought contained enough to do their work, it containing the most unpopular and ungracious reproach that any man could lie under; "that he had designed a standing army to be raised, and to govern the kingdom thereby; he advised the king to dissolve the present parliament, to lay aside all thoughts of parliaments for the future, to govern by military power, and to maintain the same by free quarter and contribution."

The chancellor had been bred of the gown; and in the first war, in which the last king had been involved by a powerful rebellion, was known always to have advanced and embraced all overtures towards peace. Since the king's return he laboured nothing more, than that his majesty might enter into a firm peace with all his neighbours, as most necessary for the reducing his own dominions into that temper of subjection and obedience, as they ought to be in. It was notorious to all men, that he had most passionately dissuaded the war with Holland, with much disadvantage to himself; and that no man had taken so much pains as he to bring the present peace to pass, which at that time was grateful to all degrees of men: and, in a word, that he had no manner of interest or credit with the soldiers; but was looked upon by them all, as an enemy to the privileges which they required, of being exempted from the ordinary rules of justice, in which he always opposed them.

But let the improbability of this charge be what it would, there were persons of the house who pretended that it should be fully proved; and so the question was only, "whether upon it they should charge him with an accusation of treason:" and after a debate of eight hours, it was declared by all the lawyers of the house, "that how foul soever the charge seemed to be, yet it contained no high treason;" and in that conclusion they at last concurred who were most relied upon to support the accusation. But when the speaker directed the order to be drawn, "that the earl of Clarendon should not be accused of high treason," it was alleged, that the order was only to relate to that first head; some men declaring, "that though that article had missed him, yet there were others which would hit him;" and so the night being come, the farther debate was adjourned to another day.

When the day appointed came, (in which interval all imaginable pains and arts were used, by threats and promises, to allure and terrify as many as could be wrought upon, either to be against the chancellor, or to be absent at the next debate that concerned him,) upon reading the several other heads as they had been presented from the committee, it appeared to all men, that though all that was alleged were proved, the whole would not amount to make him guilty of high treason. And they got no ground by throwing aspersions upon him upon the several arguments, which they did with extraordinary license who were known to be his enemies; for thereby other men of much better reputations, and who had no relation to the chancellor, took occasion to answer and contradict their calumnies, and to give him such a testimony, as made him another man than they would have him understood to be; and their testimony had more credit: so that they declined the pursuit of that license, and intended wholly the discovery of the treason, since no other accusation would serve their turn.

When they had examined all their store, they pitched at last upon that head, "that he had deluded and betrayed his majesty and the nation in all foreign treaties and negotiations relating to the late war:" which when read and considered, it was said, "that in those general expressions there was not enough contained upon which they could accuse him of high treason, except it were added, that being a privy counsellor, he had discovered the king's secret counsels to the enemy." Which was no sooner said, than a young confident man, the lord Vaughan, son to the earl of Carbery, a person of as ill a face as fame, his looks and his manners both extreme bad, asked for the paper that had been presented from the committee, and with his own hand entered into that place those words, "that being a privy counsellor he had discovered the king's secrets to the enemy," which he said he would prove; whilst many others whispered into the ears of those who sat next to them, "that he had discovered all the secret resolutions to the king of France, which," they said, "was the ground of the king's displeasure towards him." [Upon] this confident insinuation from persons who were near the person of his majesty, and known to have much credit with him; and the positive averment by a member, "that the disclosing the king's secrets to the enemy," which nobody could deny to be treason, "would be positively and fully proved against him," and the rather because no man believed it to be true; it was voted, "that they should impeach him of high treason in the usual manner to the house of peers." Whereupon Mr. Seymour, who had appeared very violent against him, was sent up to the lords; and at the bar he accused Edward earl of Clarendon of high treason and other crimes and misdemeanours, and desired "that he might be sequestered from that house, and his person secured."

And as soon as he was withdrawn, some of the lords moved, "that he might be sent for:" and now the warmth that had been so long within the walls of the house of commons appeared in the house of peers. Many of the lords, who were not thought much inclined to the person of the chancellor, represented, "the consequence of such a proceeding would reflect to the prejudice of every one of the peers. If upon a general accusation from the house of commons of high treason, without mentioning any particular, they should be obliged to commit any peer; any member that house should be offended with, how unjustly soever, might be removed from the body: which would be a greater disadvantage than the members of the house of commons were liable to." And therefore they advised, "that they should for answer let the house of commons know, that they would not commit the earl of Clarendon until some particular charge was exhibited against him."

On the other side, it was urged with much passion, "that they ought to comply with the house of commons in satisfying their requests, according to former precedents:" and the case of the earl of Strafford, and some other cases in that parliament, were cited; which gave those who were of another mind opportunity to inveigh against that time, and the accused precedents thereof, which had produced so many and great mischiefs to the kingdom. They put them in mind, "that they had committed eleven bishops at one time for high treason, only that they might be removed from the house, whilst a bill passed against their having votes any more in that house, which was no sooner passed than they were set at liberty; which had brought great scandal and great reproach upon the honour and justice of the parliament: and that both those bills, for the attainder of the earl of Strafford and for the excluding the bishops out of the house of peers, stand at present repealed by the wisdom and authority of this parliament." In a word, after many hours' debate with much passion, either side adhering obstinately to their opinion, no resolution was taken; but the house adjourned, without so much as putting the question, to the next day.

From the time of the parliament's coming together, and after the king's displeasure was generally taken notice of, many of the chancellor's friends advised him to withdraw, and transport himself into foreign parts; and some very near the king, and who were witnesses of the very great displeasure his majesty every day expressed towards him, were of the same opinion: but he positively refused so to do, and resolved to trust to his innocence, which he was sure must appear.

The debate continued still between the two houses, which would entertain no other business: the house of commons in frequent conferences demanding the commitment of the chancellor; and the major part of the house of peers, notwithstanding all the indirect prosecution and interposition from the court, remaining as resolved not to commit him. In this unhappy conjuncture, the duke of York, who expressed great affection and concernment for the chancellor, fell sick of the smallpox; which proved of great disadvantage to him. For not only many of the peers who were before restrained by their respect to him, and supported by his countenance in the debates, either changed their minds, or absented themselves from the house; but the general, who had always professed great friendship to the chancellor, who had deserved very well from him, and had endeavoured to dissuade the king from withdrawing his favour from him with all possible importunity, was now changed by the unruly humour of his wife, and the frequent instances of the king; and made it his business to solicit and dispose the members of both houses, with many of whom he had great credit, "no longer to adhere to the chancellor, since the king resolved to ruin him, and would look upon all who were his friends as enemies to his majesty." Notwithstanding all which, the major part by much of the house of peers continued still firm against his commitment: with which the king was so offended, that there were secret consultations of sending a guard of soldiers, by the general's authority, to take the chancellor out of his house, and to send him to the Tower; whither directions were already sent what lodging he should have, and caution given to the lieutenant of the Tower, who was thought to have too much respect for the chancellor, "that he should not treat him with more civility than he did other prisoners."

He had many friends of the council and near the king, who advertised him of those and all other intrigues, and thereupon renewed their importunity that he would make his escape; and some of them undertook to know, and without question did believe, "that his withdrawing would be grateful to the king," who every day grew more incensed against him, for the obstinacy his friends in both houses expressed on his behalf. They urged "the ill condition he must in a short time be reduced to, wherein his innocence would not secure him; for it was evident that his enemies had no purpose or thought of bringing him to a trial, but to keep him always in prison, which they would in the end one way or other bring to pass: whereas he might now easily transport himself, and avoid all the other inconveniences." And they undertook to know, "that if he were gone, there would be no further proceeding against him."

There could not be a more terrifying or prevalent argument used towards his withdrawing, than that of a prison; the thought and apprehension whereof was more grievous to him than of death itself, which he was confident would quickly be the effect of the other. However, he very resolutely refused to follow their advice; and urged to them, "the advantage he should give his enemies, and the dishonour he should bring upon himself, by flying, in having his integrity condemned, if he had not the confidence to defend it." He said, "he could now appear, wherever he should be required, with an honest countenance, and the courage of an innocent man: but if he should be apprehended in a disguise running away, which he could not but expect by the vigilance of his enemies, (since he could not make any journey by land, being at that time very weak and infirm,) he should be very much out of countenance, and should be exposed to public scorn and contempt. And if he should make his escape into foreign parts, it would not be reasonable to expect or imagine that his enemies, who had so far aliened the king's affection from him, and in spite of his innocence prevailed thus far, would want power to prosecute the advantage they should get by his flight, which would be interpreted as a confession of his guilt; and thereupon they would procure such proceedings in the parliament, as might ruin both his fortune and his fame."

His friends, how unsatisfied soever with his resolution, acquiesced for the present, after having first prevailed with him to write himself to the king; which he did, though without any hope that it would make any impression upon him. He could not comprehend or imagine from what fountain, except the power of the great lady with the conjunction of his known enemies, which had been long without that effect, that fierceness of his majesty's displeasure could proceed. He had, before this storm fell upon him, been informed by a person of honour who knew the truth of it, "that some persons had persuaded the king, that the chancellor had a principal hand in the marriage of the duke of Richmond, with which his majesty was offended in the highest degree: and the lord Berkley had reported it with all confidence." Whereupon the chancellor had expostulated with the lord Berkley, whom he knew to be his secret enemy, though no man made more outward professions to him: but he denied he had reported any such thing. And then he took notice to the king himself of the discourse, and desired to know, "whether any such story had been represented to his majesty, since there was not the least shadow of truth in it:" to which the king answered with some dryness, "that no such thing had been told to him." Yet now he was assured, "that that business stuck most with his majesty, and that from that suggestion his enemies had gotten credit to do him the worst offices; and his majesty complained much of the insolence with which he used to treat him in the agitation and debate of business, if he differed from him in opinion." Upon these reasons he writ this letter in his own hand to the king, which was delivered to him by the lord keeper, who was willing to perform that office. The letter was in these words.

"May it please your majesty,

"I am so broken under the daily insupportable instances of your majesty's terrible displeasure, that I know not what to do, hardly what to wish. The crimes which are objected against me, how passionately soever pursued, and with circumstances very unusual, do not in the least degree fright me. God knows I am innocent in every particular as I ought to be; and I hope your majesty knows enough of me to believe that I had never a violent appetite for money, that could corrupt me. But, alas! your majesty's declared anger and indignation deprives me of the comfort and support even of my own innocence, and exposes me to the rage and fury of those who have some excuse for being my enemies; whom I have sometimes displeased, when (and only then) your majesty believed them not to be your friends. I hope they may be changed; I am sure I am not, but have the same duty, passion, and affection for you, that I had when you thought it most unquestionable, and which was and is as great as ever man had for any mortal creature. I should die

"in peace, (and truly I do heartily wish that God Almighty would free you from further trouble, by taking me to himself,) if I could know or guess at the ground of your displeasure, which I am sure must proceed from your believing, that I have said or done somewhat I have neither said nor done. If it be for any thing my lord Berkley hath reported, which I know he hath said to many, though being charged with it by me he did as positively disclaim it; I am as innocent in that whole affair, and gave no more advice or counsel or countenance in it, than the child that is now born: which your majesty seemed once to believe, when I took notice to you of the report, and when you considered how totally I was a stranger to the persons mentioned, to either of whom I never spake word, or received message from either in my life. And this I protest to your majesty is true, as I have hope in heaven: and that I have never wilfully offended your majesty in my life, and do upon my knees beg your pardon for any over-bold or saucy expressions I have ever used to you; which, being a natural disease in old servants who have received too much countenance, I am sure hath always proceeded from the zeal and warmth of the most sincere affection and duty.

"I hope your majesty believes, that the sharp chastisement I have received from the best-natured and most bountiful master in the world, and whose kindness alone made my condition these many years supportable, hath enough mortified me as to this world; and that I have not the presumption or the madness to imagine or desire ever to be admitted to any employment or trust again. But I do most humbly beseech your majesty, by the memory of your father, who recommended me to you with some testimony, and by your own gracious reflection upon some one service I may have performed in my life, that hath been acceptable to you; that you will by your royal power and interposition put a stop to this severe prosecution against me, and that my concernment may give no longer interruption to the great affairs of the kingdom; but that I may spend the small remainder of my life, which cannot hold long, in some parts beyond the seas, never to return; where I will pray for your majesty, and never suffer the least diminution in the duty and obedience of,

"May it please your majesty,

"Your majesty's

"Most humble and most "Obedient subject and servant,

"From my house

"CLARENDON."

"this 16th of November."

The king was in his cabinet when the letter was delivered to him; which as soon as he had read, he burned in a candle that was on the table, and only said, "that there was somewhat in it that he did not understand, but that he wondered that the chancellor did not withdraw himself;" of which the keeper presently advertised him, with his earnest advice that he would be gone.

The king's discourse was according to the persons with whom he conferred. To those who were engaged in the violent prosecution he spake with great bitterness of him, repeating many particular passages, in which he had shewed much passion because his majesty did not concur with him in what he advised. To those who he knew were his friends he mentioned him without any bitterness, and with some testimony of his having served him long and usefully, and as if he had pity and compassion for him: yet "that he wondered that he did not absent himself, since it could not but be very manifest to him and to all his friends, that it was not in his majesty's power to protect him against the prejudice that was against him in both houses; which," he said, "could not but be increased by the obstruction his particular concernment gave to all public affairs in this conjuncture; in which," he said, "he was sure he would prevail at last." All these advertisements could not prevail over the chancellor, for the reasons mentioned before; though he was very much afflicted at the division between the two houses, the evil consequence whereof he well understood, and could have been well content that the lords would have consented to his imprisonment.

The bishop of Hereford, who had been very much obliged to the chancellor, and throughout this whole affair had behaved himself with very signal ingratitude to him, and thereby got much credit in the court, went to the bishop of Winchester, who was known to be a fast and unshaken friend to the chancellor; and made him a long discourse of what the king had said to him, and desired him "that he would go with him to his house;" which he presently did, and, leaving him in a room, went himself to the chancellor, and told him what had passed from the bishop of Hereford, "who was in the next room to speak with him, but would not in direct words to him acknowledge that he spake by the king's order or approbation; but that he had confessed so much to him with many circumstances, and that the lord Arlington and Mr. Coventry had been present." The chancellor had no mind to see or speak with the bishop, who had carried himself so unworthily towards him, and might probably misreport any thing he should say: but he was overruled by the other bishop, and so they went both into the next room to him.

The bishop of Hereford in some disorder, as a man conscious to himself of some want of sincerity towards him, desired "that he would believe that he would not at that time have come to him, with whom he knew he was in some umbrage, if it were not with a desire to do him service, and if he had not a full authority for whatsoever he said to him." Then he enlarged himself in discourse more involved and perplexed, without any mention of the king, or the authority he had for what he should say; the care to avoid which was evidently the cause of the want of clearness in all he said. But the bishop of Winchester supplied it by relating all that he had said to him: with which though he was not pleased, because the king and others were named, yet he did not contradict it; but said, "he did not say that he was sent by the king or spake by his direction, only that he could not be so mad as to interpose in such an affair without full authority to make good all that he should promise." The sum of all was, "that if the chancellor would withdraw himself into any parts beyond the seas, to prevent the mischiefs that must befall the kingdom by the division and difference between the two houses; he "would undertake upon his salvation," which was the expression he used more than once, "that he should not be interrupted in his journey; and that after he should be gone, he should not be in any degree prosecuted, or suffer in his honour or fortune by his absence."

The chancellor told him, "that he well understood what he must suffer by withdrawing himself, and so declining the trial, in which his innocence would secure him, and in the mean time preserve him from being terrified with the threats and malice of his enemies: however, he would expose himself to that disadvantage, if he received his majesty's commands to that purpose, or if he had but a clear evidence that his majesty did wish it, as a thing that he thought might advance his service. But without that assurance, which he might receive many ways which could not be taken notice of, he could not with his honour or discretion give his implacable enemies that advantage against him, when his friends should be able to allege nothing in his defence."

The bishop replied, "that he was not allowed to say that his majesty required or wished it, but that he could not be so mad as to undertake what he had promised, without sufficient warrant;" and repeated again what he had formerly said. To which the other answered, "that the vigilance and power of his enemies was well known: and that though the king might in truth wish that he were safe on the other side of the sea, and give no direction to interrupt or trouble him in his journey; yet that it was liable to many accidents in respect of his weakness and infirmity," which was so great at that time, that he could not walk without being supported by one or two; so that he could not be disguised to any body that had ever known him. Besides that the pain he was already in, and the season of the year, made him apprehend, that the gout might so seize upon him within two or three days, that he might not be able to move: and so the malice of those who wished his destruction might very probably find an opportunity, without or against the king's consent, to apprehend and cast him into prison, as a fugitive from the hand of justice. For the prevention of all which, which no man could blame him for apprehending, he proposed, "that he might have a pass from the king, which he would not produce but in such an exigent: and would use all the providence he could, to proceed with that secrecy that his departure should not be taken notice of; but if it were, he must not be without such a protection, to preserve him from the present indignities to which he must be liable, though possibly it would not protect him from the displeasure of the parliament." The bishop thought this proposition to be reasonable, and seemed confident that he should procure the pass: and so that conference ended.

The next day the bishop sent word, "that the king could not grant the pass, because if it should be known, by what accident soever, it would much incense the parliament: but that he might as securely go as if he had a pass;" which moved no further with him, than his former undertaking had done. Nor could the importunity of his children, or the advice of his friends, persuade him to depart from his resolution.

About the time of the chancellor's disgrace, monsieur Ruvigny arrived at London as envoy extraordinary from the French king, and came the next day after the seal was taken from him. He was a person well known in the court, and particularly to the chancellor, with whom he had been formerly assigned to treat upon affairs of moment, being of the religion and very nearly allied to the late earl of Southampton. And as these considerations were the chief motives that he was made choice of for the present employment, so the chief part of his instructions was to apply himself to the chancellor, through whose hands it was known that the whole treaty that was now happily concluded, and all the preliminaries with France, had entirely passed. When he found that the conduct of affairs was quite changed, and that the chancellor came not to the court, he knew not what to do, but immediately despatched an express to France for further instructions. He desired to speak with the chancellor; which he refused, and likewise to receive the letters which he had brought for him and offered to send to him, all which he desired might be delivered to the king. When the proceedings in parliament went so high, Ruvigny, who had at all hours admission to the king, and intimate conversation with the lord Arlington, and so easily discovered the extreme prejudice and malice that was contracted against the chancellor, sent him frequent advertisements of what was necessary for him to know, and with all possible earnestness advised him, when the divisions grew so high in the houses, "that he would withdraw and retire into France, where," he assured him, "he would find himself very welcome." All which prevailed no more with him than the rest. And so another week passed after the bishop's proposition, with the same passion in the houses: and endeavours were used to incense the people, as if the lords obstructed the proceeding of justice against the chancellor by refusing to commit him; and Mr. Seymour told the lord Ashley, "that the people would pull down the chancellor's house first, and then those of all the lords who adhered to him."

By this time the duke of York recovered so fast, that the king, being assured by the physicians that there would be no danger of infection, went on Saturday morning, the 29th of November, to visit him: and being alone together, his majesty bade him "advise the chancellor to be gone," and blamed him that he had not given credit to what the bishop of Hereford had said to him. The king had no sooner left the duke, but his highness sent for the bishop of Winchester, and bade him tell the chancellor from him, "that it was absolutely necessary for him speedily to be gone, and that he had the king's word for all that had been undertaken by the bishop of Hereford."

As soon as the chancellor received this advice and command, he resolved with great reluctance to obey, and to be gone that very night: and having, by the friendship of sir John Wolstenholme, caused the farmers' boat to wait for him at Erith, as soon as it was dark he took coach at his house Saturday night, the 29th of November 1667, with two servants only. And being accompanied with his two sons and two or three other friends on horseback as far as Erith, he found the boat ready; and so embarked about eleven of the clock that night, the wind indifferently good: but before midnight it changed, and carried him back almost as far as he had advanced. And in this perplexity he remained three days and nights before he arrived at Calais, which was not a port chosen by him, all places out of England being indifferent, and France not being in his inclination, because of the reproach and calumny that was cast upon him: but since it was the first that offered itself, and it was not seasonable to affect another, he was very glad to disembark there, and to find himself safe on shore.

All these particulars, of which many may seem too trivial to be remembered, have been thought necessary to be related, it being a principal part of his vindication for going away, and not insisting upon his innocence; which at that time made a greater impression upon many worthy persons to his disadvantage, than any particular that was contained in the charge that had been offered to the house. And therefore though he forbore, when all the promises were broken which had been made to him, and his enemies' malice and insolence increased by his absence, to publish or in the least degree to communicate the true ground and reasons of absenting himself, to avoid any inconvenience that in so captious a season might thereby have befallen the king's service; yet it cannot be thought unreasonable to preserve this memorial of all the circumstances, as well as the substantial reasons, which disposed him to make that flight, for the clear information of those, who in a fit season may understand his innocence without any inconvenience to his majesty, of whose goodness and honour and justice it may be hoped, that his majesty himself will give his own testimony, both of this particular of his withdrawing, and a vindication of his innocence from all the other reproaches with which it was aspersed.

I will not omit one other particular, for the manifestation of the inequality that was between the nature of the chancellor and of his enemies, and upon what disadvantage he was to contend with them. Before the meeting of the parliament, when it was well known that the combination was entered into by the lord Arlington and sir William Coventry against the chancellor, several members of the house informed him of what they did and what they said, and told him, "that there was but one way to prevent the prejudice intended towards him, which was by falling first upon them; which they would cause to be done, if he would assist them with such information as it could not but be in his power to do." That they were both very odious generally: the one for his insolent carriage towards all men, and for the manner of his getting in to that office by dispossessing an old faithful servant, who was forced to part with it for a very good recompense of ten thousand pounds in money and other leases and grants, which was paid and made by the king to introduce a secretary of very mean parts, and without industry to improve them, and one who was generally suspected to be a papist, or without any religion at all; it being generally taken notice of, that he was rarely seen in a church, and never known to receive the communion. The other was known by his corrupt behaviour, and selling all the offices in "the fleet and navy for incredible sums of money, and thereby introducing men, who had been most employed and trusted by Cromwell, into the several offices; whilst loyal and faithful seamen who had always adhered to the king, and many of them continued in his service abroad and till his return into England, could not be admitted into any employment: the ill consequence of which to the king's service was very notorious, by the daily manifest stealing and embezzling the stores of ammunition, cordage, sails, and other tackling, which were commonly sold again to the king at great prices. And when the persons guilty of this were taken notice of and apprehended, they talked loudly of the sums they had paid for their offices, which obliged them to those frauds: and that it might not be more notorious, they were, by sir William Coventry's great power and interest, never proceeded against, or removed from their offices and employments."

They told him, "that he never said or did any thing in the most secret council, where they two were always present, and where there were frequent occasions of mentioning the proceedings of both houses, and the behaviour of several members in both, but those gentlemen declared the same, and all that he said or did, to those who would be most offended and incensed by it, and who were like in some conjuncture to be able to do him most mischief: and by those ill arts they had irreconciled many persons to him. And that if he would now, without its being possible to be taken notice of, give them such information and light into the proceedings of those gentlemen, they would undertake to divert the storm that threatened him, and cause it to fall upon the others." And this was with much earnestness pressed to him, not only before the meeting of the parliament, and when he was fully informed of the ill arts and ungentlemanly practice those two persons were engaged in to do him hurt, but after the house of commons was incensed against him; with a full assurance, "that they were much inclined to have accused the other two, if the least occasion was given for it."

But the chancellor would not be prevailed with, saying, "that [no] provocation or example should dispose him to do any thing that would not become him: that they were both privy counsellors, and trusted by the king in his most weighty affairs; and if he discerned any thing amiss in them, he could inform the king of it. But the aspersing or accusing them any where else was not his part to do, nor could it be done by any without some reflection upon the king and duke, who would be much offended at it: and therefore he advised them in no degree to make any such attempt on his behalf; but to leave him to the protection of his own innocence and of God's good pleasure, and those gentlemen to their own fate, which at some time would humble them." And it is known to many persons, and possibly to the king himself, for whose service only that office was performed, that one or both those persons had before that time been impeached, if the chancellor's sole industry and interest had not diverted and prevented it.

When the chancellor found it necessary, for the reasons aforesaid, to withdraw himself, he thought it as necessary to leave some address to the house of peers, and to make as good an excuse as he could for his absence without asking their leave; which should be delivered to them by some member of their body, (there being many of them ready to perform that civil office for him,) when his absence should be known, or some evidence that he was safely arrived on the other side of the sea. And that time being come, (for the packet boat was ready to depart when the chancellor landed at Calais,) the earl of Denbigh said, "he had an address to the house from the earl of Clarendon, which he desired might be read;" which contained these words.

"To the right honourable the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled; the humble petition and address of Edward earl of Clarendon.

"May it please your lordships,

"I cannot express the insupportable trouble and grief of mind I sustain, under the apprehension of being misrepresented to your lordships; and when I hear how much of your lordships' time hath been spent upon my poor concern, (though it be of no less than of my life and fortune,) and of the differences in opinion which have already or may probably arise between your lordships and the honourable house of commons; whereby the great and weighty affairs of the kingdom may be obstructed in a time of so general a dissatisfaction. "I am very unfortunate to find myself to suffer so much under two very disadvantageous reflections, which are in no degree applicable to me: the first, from the greatness of my estate and fortune, collected and made in so few years; which, if it be proportionable to what is reported, may very reasonably cause my integrity to be suspected. The second, that I have been the sole manager and chief minister in all the transactions of state since the king's return into England to August last; and therefore that all miscarriages and misfortunes ought to be imputed to me, and to my counsels.

"Concerning my estate, your lordships will not believe, that after malice and envy hath been so inquisitive, and is so sharp-sighted, I will offer any thing to your lordships but what is exactly true: and I do assure your lordships in the first place, that, excepting from the king's bounty, I have never received or taken one penny, but what was generally understood to be the just and lawful perquisites of my office by the constant practice of the best times, which I did in my own judgment conceive to be that of my lord Coventry and my lord Ellesmere, the practice of which I constantly observed; although the office in both their times was lawfully worth double to what it was to me, and I believe now is.

"That all the courtesies and favours, which I have been able to obtain from the king for other persons in church or state or in Westminster-hall, have never been worth me five pound: so that your lordships may be confident I am as innocent from corruption, as from any disloyal thought; which, after near thirty years' service of the crown in some difficulties and distresses,

"I did never suspect would have been objected to me in my age.

"That I am at present indebted about three or four and twenty thousand pounds, for which I pay interest; the particulars whereof I shall be ready to offer to your lordships, and for which I have assigned lands and leases to be sold, though at present nobody will buy or sell with me. That I am so far from having money, that from the time the seal was taken from me I have lived upon the coining some small parcels of plate, which have sustained me and my family, all my rents being withheld from me.

"That my estate, my debts being paid, will not yield me two thousand pounds per annum, for the support of myself, and providing for two young children, who have nothing: and that all I have is not worth what the king in his bounty hath bestowed upon me, his majesty having out of his royal bounty, within few months after his coming into England, at one time bestowed upon me twenty thousand pounds in ready money, without the least motion or imagination of mine; and, shortly after, another sum of money, amounting to six thousand pounds or thereabouts, out of Ireland, which ought to have amounted to a much greater proportion, and of which I never heard word, till notice was given me by the earl of Orrery that there was such a sum of money for me. His majesty likewise assigned me, after the first year of his return, an annual supply towards my support, which did but defray my expenses, the certain profits of my office not amounting to above two thousand pounds a year or thereabouts, and the perquisites not very considerable and very uncertain: so that the said several sums of money, and some parcels of land his majesty bestowed upon me, are worth more than all I have amounts to. So far I am from advancing my estate by any indirect means. And though this bounty of his majesty hath very far exceeded my merit or my expectation; yet some others have been as fortunate at least in the same bounty, who had as small pretences to it, and have no great reason to envy my good fortune.

"Concerning the other imputation, of the credit and power of being chief minister, and so causing all to be done that I had a mind to; I have no more to say, than that I had the good fortune to serve a master of a very great judgment and understanding, and to be always joined with persons of great ability and experience, without whose advice and concurrence never any thing hath been done. Before his majesty's coming into England, he was constantly attended by the then marquis of Ormond, the late lord Colepepper, and Mr. Secretary Nicholas; who were equally trusted with myself, and without whose joint advice and concurrence, when they were all present, (as some of them always were,) I never gave any counsel.

"As soon as it pleased God to bring his majesty into England, he established his privy-council, and shortly out of them a number of honourable persons of great reputation, who for the most part are still alive, as a committee for foreign affairs, and consideration of such things as in the nature of them required much secrecy; and with these persons he vouchsafed

"to join me. And I am confident this committee never transacted any thing of moment, his majesty being always present, without presenting the same first to the council-board: and I must appeal to them concerning my carriage, and whether we were not all of one mind in all matters of importance. For more than two years I never knew any difference in the councils, or that there were any complaints in the kingdom; which I wholly impute to his majesty's great wisdom, and the entire concurrence of his council, without the vanity of assuming any thing to myself: and therefore I hope I shall not be singly charged with any thing that hath since fallen out amiss. But from the time that Mr. Secretary Nicholas was removed from his place, there were great alterations; and whosoever knows any thing of the court or councils, knows well how much my credit since that time hath been diminished, though his majesty graciously vouchsafed still to hear my advice in most of his affairs. Nor hath there been, from that time to this, above one or two persons brought to the council, or preferred to any considerable office in the court, who have been of my intimate acquaintance, or suspected to have any kindness for me; and many of them notoriously known to have been very long my enemies, and of different judgment and principles from me both in church and state, and who have taken all opportunities to lessen my credit to the king, and with all other persons, by misrepresenting and misreporting all that I said or did, and persuading men that I had done them some prejudice with his majesty, or crossed them in some of their pretences; though his majesty's goodness and justice was such, that it made little impression upon him.

"In my humble opinion, the great misfortunes of the kingdom have proceeded from the war, to which it is notoriously known that I was always averse; and may without vanity say, I did not only foresee, but did declare the mischiefs we should run into, by entering into a war before any alliance made with the neighbour princes. And that it may not be imputed to his majesty's want of care, or the negligence of his counsellors, that no such alliances were entered into; I must take the boldness to say, that his majesty left nothing unattempted in order thereunto: and knowing very well, that France resolved to begin a war upon Spain, as soon as his catholic majesty should depart this world, (which being much sooner expected by them, they had two winters before been at great charge in providing plentiful magazines of all provisions upon the frontiers, that they might be ready for the war,) his majesty used all possible means to prepare and dispose the Spaniard to that apprehension, offering his friendship to that degree, as might be for the security and benefit of both crowns. But Spain flattering itself with an opinion that France would not break with them, at least, that they would not give them any cause by administering matter of jealousy to them, never made any real approach towards a friendship with his majesty; but both by their ambassador here, and to his majesty's ambassador at Madrid, always insisted, as preliminaries, upon the giving up of Dunkirk, Tangier, and Jamaica.

"Though France had an ambassador here, to whom a project for a treaty was offered, and the lord Hollis, his majesty's ambassador at Paris, used all endeavours to promote and prosecute the said treaty: yet it was quickly discerned, that the principal design of France was to draw his majesty into such a nearer alliance as might advance their designs; without which they had no mind to enter into the treaty proposed. And this was the state of affairs when the war was entered into with the Dutch, from which time neither crown much considered their making an alliance with England.

"As I did from my soul abhor the entering into this war, so I never presumed to give any advice or counsel for the way of managing it, but by opposing many propositions which seemed to the late lord treasurer and myself to be unreasonable; as the payment of the seamen by tickets, and many other particulars which added to the expense. My enemies took all occasions to inveigh against me: and making friendship with others out of the council of more licentious principles, and who knew well enough how much I disliked and complained of the liberty they took to themselves of reviling all councils and counsellors, and turning all things serious and sacred into ridicule; they took all ways imaginable to render me ingrateful to all sorts of men, (whom I shall be compelled to name in my own defence,) persuading those who miscarried in any of their designs, that it was the chancellor's doing; whereof I never knew any thing. However, they could not withdraw the king's favour from me, who was still pleased to use my service with others; nor was there ever any thing done but upon the joint advice of at least the major part of those who were consulted with. And as his majesty commanded my service in the late treaties, so I never gave the least advice in private, nor writ one letter to any person in either of those negotiations, but upon the advice of the council, and after it was read in council, or at least by the king himself and some others: and if I prepared any instructions or memorials, it was by the king's command, and the request of the secretaries, who desired my assistance. Nor was it any wish of my own, that any ambassadors should give me an account of the transactions, but to the secretaries, with whom I was always ready to advise; nor am I conscious to myself of having ever given advice that hath proved mischievous or inconvenient to his majesty. And I have been so far from being the sole manager of affairs, that I have not in the whole last year been above twice with his majesty in any room alone, and very seldom in the two or three years preceding. And since the parliament at Oxford, it hath been very visible that my credit hath been very little, and that very few things have been hearkened to which have been proposed by me, but contradicted eo nomine, because proposed by me.

"I most humbly beseech your lordships to remember the office and trust I had for seven years; in which, in discharge of my duty, I was obliged to stop and obstruct many men's pretences, and to refuse to set the seal to many pardons and other grants, which would have been profitable to those who procured them,

"and many whereof, upon my representation to his majesty, were for ever stopped; which naturally have raised many enemies to me. And my frequent concurring with the late lord treasurer, with whom I had the honour to have a long and a fast friendship to his death, in representing several excesses and exorbitances, (the yearly issues so far exceeding the revenue,) provoked many persons concerned, of great power and credit, to do me all the ill offices they could. And yet I may faithfully say, that I never meddled with any part of the revenue or the administration of it, but when I was desired by the late lord treasurer to give him my assistance and advice, (having had the honour formerly to serve the crown as chancellor of the exchequer,) which was for the most part in his majesty's presence: nor have I ever been in the least degree concerned in point of profit in the letting any part of his majesty's revenue, nor have ever treated or debated it but in his majesty's presence: in which, my opinion concurred always with the major part of the counsellors who were present. All which, upon examination, will be made manifest to your lordships, how much soever my integrity is blasted by the malice of those, who I am confident do not believe themselves. Nor have I in my life, upon all the treaties or otherwise, received the value of one shilling from all the king's and princes in the world, (except the books of the Louvre print sent me by the chancellor of France by that king's direction,) but from my own master; to whose entire service, and to the good and welfare of my country, no man's heart was ever more devoted.

"This being my present condition, I do most humbly beseech your lordships to retain a favourable opinion of me, and to believe me to be innocent from those foul aspersions, until the contrary shall be proved; which I am sure can never be by any man worthy to be believed. And since the distemper of the time, and the difference between the two houses in the present debate, with the power and malice of my enemies, who give out, that I shall prevail with his majesty to prorogue or dissolve this parliament in displeasure, and threaten to expose me to the rage and fury of the people, may make me looked upon as the cause which obstructs the king's service, and the unity and peace of the kingdom; I must humbly beseech your lordships, that I may not forfeit your lordships' favour and protection, by withdrawing myself from so powerful a persecution; in hopes I may be able, by such withdrawing, hereafter to appear, and make my defence; when his majesty's justice, to which I shall always submit, may not be obstructed nor controlled by the power and malice of those who have sworn my destruction."

The chancellor knew very well, that there were members enough in both houses who would be very glad to take any advantage of his words and expressions: and therefore as he weighed them the best he could himself in the short time from which he took his resolution to be gone; so he consulted with as many friends as that time would allow, to the end that their jealousy and wariness might better watch, that no expression might be liable to a sinister interpretation, than his own passion and indisposition could provide. And as they all thought it necessary that he should leave somewhat behind him, that might offer an excuse for his absence; so they did not conceive, that the words before mentioned could give any offence to equal judges. But the least variety or change of wind moved those waters to wonderful distempers and tempests.

This address was no sooner read, by which they perceived he was gone, but they who had contributed most to the absenting himself, and were privy to all the promises which had invited him to it, seemed much troubled that he had escaped their justice; and moved, "that orders might be forthwith sent to stop the ports, that so he might be apprehended;" when they well knew that he was landed at Calais. Others took exceptions at some expressions, "which," they said, "reflected upon the king's honour and justice:" others moved, "that it might be entered in their Journal Book, to the end that they might further consider of it when they should think fit;" and this was ordered.

The houses till this time had continued obstinate in their several resolutions; the commons every day pressing, "that he might be committed upon their general accusation of treason," (for though they had amongst themselves and from their committee offered those particulars which are mentioned before, yet they presented none to the house of peers;) and the lords as positively refusing to commit him, till some charge should be presented against him that amounted to treason. But now all that debate was at an end by his being out of their reach, so that they pursued that point no further; which, being matter of privilege, should have been determined as necessarily as before, for the prevention of the like disputes hereafter. But the commons wisely declined that contention, well knowing that their party in the house, that was very passionate for the commitment of the chancellor, would be as much against the general order as any of the rest had been: and the lords satisfied themselves with sending a message to the house of commons, "that they found by the address which they had received that morning, and which they likewise imparted to them, that the earl of Clarendon had withdrawn himself; and so there was no further occasion of debate upon that point."

The address was no sooner read in that house, but they who had industriously promoted the former [resolution] were inflamed, as if this very instrument would contribute enough to any thing that was wanting; and they severally arraigned it, and inveighed against the person who had sent it with all imaginable bitterness and insolence: whilst others, who could not in the hearing it read observe that malignity that it was accused of, sat still and silent, as if they suspected that somewhat had escaped their observations and discovery, that so much transported other men; or because they were well pleased that a person, against whom there was so much malice and fury professed, was got out of their reach. In conclusion, after long debate it was concluded, "that the paper contained much untruth and scandal and sedition in it, and that it should be publicly burned by the hand of the hangman;" which vote they presently sent to the lords for their concurrence, who, though they had not observed any such guilt in it before, would maintain no further contests with them, and so concurred in the sentence: and the poor paper was accordingly with solemnity executed by the appointed officer, which made the more people inquisitive into the contents of it; and having gotten copies of it, they took upon them to censure the thing and the person with much more clemency and compassion, and thought he had done well to decline such angry judges.

When the chancellor found himself at Calais, he was unresolved how to dispose of himself, only that he would not go to Paris, against which he was able to make many objections: and in this irresolution he knew not how to send any directions to his children in England, to what place they should send his servants and such other accommodations as he should want; and therefore stayed there till he might be better informed, and know somewhat of the temper of the parliament. In the mean time he writ letters to the earl of St. Alban's at Paris, from whose very late professions he had reason to expect civility, and that was all he did expect; never imagining that he should receive any grace from the queen, or that it was fit for him to cast himself at her feet, whilst he was in his majesty's displeasure. Only he desired to know, "whether there would be any objection against his coming to Roan," and desiring, "if there were no objection against it, that a coach might be hired to meet him on such a day at Abbeville." The lieutenant governor of Calais had, upon his first arrival there, given advertisement to the court of it: and by the same post that he received a very dry letter from the earl of St. Alban's, in which he said, "he thought that court would approve of his coming to Roan;" he received likewise a letter of great civility from the count de Louvois, secretary of state, in which he congratulated his safe arrival in France, and told him, "that his majesty was well pleased with it, and with his purpose of coming to Roan, where he should find himself very welcome." At the same time letters were sent to the lieutenant governor of Calais, Boulogne, and Montrevil, "to treat him as a person of whom the king had esteem, and to give him such an escort as might make his journey secure;" of all which he received advertisement, and, "that a coach would be ready at Abbeville to wait for him at the day he had appointed."

And now he thought he might well take his resolution; and thereupon gave direction, "that such of his family, whose attendance he could not be well without, might with all expedition be with him at Roan; and such monies might be likewise returned thither for him, as were necessary," for he had not brought with him supply enough for long time. And so he provided to leave Calais, that he might be warm in his winter-quarters as soon as might be, which both the season of the year, it being now within few days of Christmas, and his expectation of a speedy defluxion of the gout, made very requisite. When he came to Boulogne, he found orders from the marshal D'Aumont to his lieutenant for a guard to Montrevil, the Spanish garrisons making frequent incursions into those quarters: and at Montrevil the duke D'Elbœuf visited him, and invited him to supper, which the chancellor was so much tired with his journey that he accepted not; but was not suffered to refuse his coach the next day to Abbeville, where he found a coach from Paris ready to carry him to Roan.

It was Christmas-eve when he came to Dieppe, and it was a long journey the next day to Roan; which made him send to the governor, to desire that the ports might be open much sooner than their hour, which was granted: so that he came to a very ill inn, well known at Tostes, near the middle way to Roan, about noon. And when he was within view of that place, a gentleman, passing by in a good gallop with a couple of servants, asked, "whether the chancellor of England was in that coach;" and being answered, "that he was," he alighted at the coach-side, and gave him a letter from the king, which contained only credit to what that gentleman, monsieur le Fonde, his servant in ordinary, should say to him from his majesty. The gentleman, after some expressions of his majesty's grace and good opinion, told him, "that the king had lately received advertisement from his envoy in England, that the parliament there was so much incensed against him, the chancellor, that if he should be suffered to stay in France, it would be so prejudicial to the affairs of his Christian majesty, (to whom he was confident the chancellor wished well,) that it might make a breach between the two crowns; and therefore he desired him to make what speed he could out of his dominions; and that he might want no accommodation for his journey, that gentleman was to accompany him, till he saw him out of France."

He was marvellously struck with this encounter, which he looked not for, nor could resolve what to do, being at liberty to make his journey which way he would so he rested not, which was the only thing he desired: so he desired the gentleman (for all this conversation was in the highway) "to come into the coach, and to accompany him to Roan, where they would confer further." The gentleman, though he was a very civil person, seemed to think that it would be better to return to Dieppe, and so to Calais, as the shortest way out of France: but he had no commission to urge that, and so condescended to go that night to Roan; with a declaration, "that it was necessary for him to be the next day very early in the coach, which way soever he intended to make his journey."

It was late in the night before they reached Roan: and the coach was overthrown three times in the gentleman's sight, who chose to ride his horse; so that the chancellor was really hurt and bruised, and scarce able to set his foot to the ground. And therefore he told the gentleman plainly, "that he could not make any journey the next day: but that he would presently write to Paris to a friend, who should inform the king of the ill condition he was in, and desire some time of rest; and that as soon as he had finished his letter, he would send an express with it, who should make all possible haste in going and coming." Monsieur le Fonde assured him, "the matter was so fully resolved, that no writing would procure any time to stay in France; and therefore desired him to hasten his journey, which way soever he intended it." But when he saw there was no remedy, he likewise writ to the court, and the chancellor to the earl of St.

Alban's, from whom he thought he should receive offices of humanity, and to another friend, upon whose affection he more depended: and with those letters the express was despatched.

They who had prevailed so far against him in England were not yet satisfied, but contrived those ways to disquiet him as much in France, by telling monsieur Ruigny, (who was too easily disposed to believe them,) "that the parliament was so much offended with the chancellor, that it would never consent that the king should enter into a close and firm alliance with France," which it was his business to solicit, "whilst he should be permitted to stay within that kingdom:" when in truth all the malice against him was contained within the breasts of few men, who by incensing the king, and infusing many false and groundless relations into him, drew such a numerous party to contribute to their ends.

When he was now gone, they observed to the king, "what a great faction there was in both houses that adhered to the chancellor," who were called Clarendonians; and when any opposition was made to any thing that was proposed, as frequently there was, "it was always done by the Clarendonians:" whose condition they thought was not desperate enough, except they proceeded further than was yet done. They laboured with all their power, that he might be attainted of high treason by act of parliament, and that both his sons might be removed from the court: both which, notwithstanding all their importunity, his majesty positively refused to consent to. Then they told him, "that the chancellor only waited the season that the parliament should be confirmed in ill humour, to which they were inclined; and then he would return and sit in the house to disturb all their counsels, and obstruct all his service: and therefore they proposed, since he had fled from the hand of justice, that there could be no more prosecution for his guilt," (which was untrue, for they might as well have proceeded and proved the crimes objected against him if they could,) "a bill of banishment," which they had prepared, "might be brought in against him;" which his majesty consented to, notwithstanding all that the duke of York urged to the contrary upon the king's promise to him, and which had only betrayed the chancellor to making his escape. But the king alleged, "that the condescension was necessary for his good, and to compound with those who would else press that which would be more mischievous to him."

Whereupon a bill for his banishment was preferred, only upon his having declined the proceeding of justice by his flight, without so much as endeavouring to prove one of the crimes they had charged upon him: and this bill was passed by the two houses, and confirmed by the king; of whom they had yet so much jealousy, that they left it not in his power to pardon him without the consent of the two houses of parliament. And this act was to be absolute, "except by a day appointed," (which was so short, that it was hardly possible for him to comply with it, except he could have rode post,) "he should appear before one of the secretaries of state, or deliver himself to the lieutenant of the Tower, who was to "detain him in custody till he had acquainted the parliament with it: in the mean time no person was to presume to hold any correspondence with him, or to write to him, except his own children or his menial servants, who were obliged to shew the letters which they sent or received to one of the secretaries of state."

The express that had been sent to Paris returned with reiterated orders to monsieur le Fonde to hasten the chancellor's journey, and not to suffer him to remain there; who executed the commands he had received with great punctuality and importunity. The earl of St. Alban's did not vouchsafe to return any answer to his letter, or to interpose on his behalf, that he might rest till he might securely enter upon his journey: only abbot Mountague writ very obligingly to him, and offered all the offices could be in his power to perform, and excused the rigour of the court's proceedings, as the effect of such reason of state, as would not permit any alteration whilst they had that apprehension of the parliament; and therefore advised him "to comply with their wishes, and make no longer stay in Roan, which would not be permitted." But the general indisposition of his body, the fatigue of his journey, and the bruises he had received by the falls and overturnings of the coach, made him not able to rise out of his bed; and the physicians, who had taken much blood from him, exceedingly dissuaded it. All which, how visible soever, prevailed not with his French conductor to lessen his importunity that he would go, though it was evident he could not easily stand; of which no doubt he gave true and faithful advertisement to the court, though the jealousy of being not thought active enough in his trust made his behaviour much less civil, than is agreeable to the custom of that nation.

However, the chancellor, hardened by the inhumanity of his treatment, writ such a letter in Latin to monsieur de Lionne, by whose hand all the ungentle orders to monsieur le Fonde had been transmitted, as expressed the condition he was in, and his disability to comply with his majesty's commands, until he could recover more strength; not without complaint of the little civility he had received in France. And he writ likewise to the abbot Mountague, "to use his credit with monsieur de Tellier," upon whose humanity he more depended, "to interpose with his Christian majesty, that he might not be pressed beyond what his health would bear." And since at that time he resolved to make his journey to Avignon, that he might be out of the dominions of France, he desired, "that he might have liberty to rest some days at Orleans, until his servants who were upon the sea, and brought with them many things which he wanted, might come to him; and that he might afterwards, in so long a journey in the worst season of the year, have liberty to take such repose as his health would require; in which he could not affect unnecessary delay, for the great charge and expense it must be accompanied with."

The answer he received from monsieur de Lionne was the renewing the king's commands for his speedy departure, "as a thing absolutely necessary to his affairs, and which must not be disputed." But that which affected him the more tenderly, was the sight of a billet which abbot Mountague sent to him, that he had received from monsieur de Tellier, in which he said, "that he had, according to his desire, moved his Christian majesty concerning the chancellor of England; and that his majesty was much displeased that he made not more haste to comply with what was most necessary for his affairs, and that it must be no longer delayed; and that if he chose to pass to Avignon, he might rest one day in ten, which was all his majesty would allow."

This unexpected determination, without the least ceremony or circumstance of remorse, signified by a person who he was well assured was well inclined to have returned a more grateful answer, in the instant suppressed all hopes of finding any humanity in France, and raised a resolution in him to get out of those dominions with all the expedition that was possible: which his French conductor urged with new and importunate instance; insomuch as though there was sure information, that the ship, in which the chancellor's servants and goods were embarked, was arrived at the mouth of the river, and only kept by the cross wind from coming up to the town; he would by no means consent to the stay of one day in expectation of it, or that his servants might come to him by land, as he had sent to them to do.

At this very time arrived an express, a servant of his, sent by his children, with a particular account of all the transactions in parliament, and of the bill of banishment; of nothing of which he had before heard, and upon which the duke of York, who looked upon himself as ill used by that prosecution, was of opinion, "that the chancellor should make all possible haste, and appear by the day appointed, and undergo the trial, in which he knew his innocence would justify him." This advice, with a little indignation at the discourtesy of the court of France, diverted him from any further thought of Avignon. And though he did not imagine that his strength would be sufficient to perform the journey by the day assigned, (for the gout had already seized upon both his feet,) nor did the arguments for his return satisfy him; and the breach of all the promises which had been made was no sign that they meant speedily to bring him to trial, towards which they had not yet made any preparation: yet he resolved to make all possible haste to Calais, that it might be in his power to proceed according to such directions as he might reasonably expect to receive there from his friends from England, and from whence he might quickly remove into the Spanish dominions; though the climate of Flanders, well known to him, terrified him in respect of the season and his approaching gout. And with this resolution he despatched the express again for England; and left order with a merchant at Roan, "to receive his goods when the ship should arrive, and detain both them and his servants till he should send further orders from Calais;" and at the same time he writ to a friend in Flanders, to speak to the marquis of Carracena, with whom he had formerly held a fair correspondence, "to send him a pass to go through that country to what place he should think fit." And having thus provided for his journey, he departed from Roan, after he had remained there about twenty days.

In how ill a condition of health soever he was to travel, when the days were at shortest, he resolved to make no stay till he should reach Calais, to the end, that if he met with no advice there to the contrary, he might be at London by the day limited by the proclamation, which was the first of February that style: and it was the last of January the French style when he arrived at Calais, so broken with the fatigue of the journey and the defluxion of the gout, that he could not move but as he was carried, and was so put into a bed; and the next morning the physicians found him in a fever, and thought it necessary to open a vein, which they presently did. But the pains in all his limbs so increased, that he was not able to turn in his bed; nor for many nights closed his eyes. Many letters he found there from England, but was not in a condition to read them, nor in truth could speak and discourse with any body. Monsieur le Fonde, out of pure compassion, suffered him to remain some days without his vexation, until he received fresh orders from Paris, "that the chancellor might not, in what case soever, be suffered to remain in Calais;" and then he renewed his importunity, "that he would the next day leave the town, and either by sea or land, if he thought it not fit to pass for England, put himself into the Spanish dominions, which he might do in few hours."

He was so confounded with the barbarity, that he had no mind to give him any answer; nor could he suddenly find words, their conversation being in Latin, to express the passion he was in. At last he told him, "that he must bring orders from God Almighty as well as from the king, before he could obey: that he saw the condition he was in, and conferred every day with his physicians, by which he could not but know, that he could neither help himself, nor endure the being carried out of that chamber, if the house were in a flame; and therefore that he did not use him like a gentleman, in adding his unreasonable importunities to the vexation he suffered by pain and sickness. That he might be very confident, his treatment had not been so obliging to make him stay one hour in France, after he should be able to go out of it: but he would not willingly endanger himself by sea to fall into the hands of his enemies. That he knew" (for he had shewed him his letter) "that he had written into Flanders for a pass, which was not yet come: as soon as it did, if he could procure a litter and endure the motion of it, he would remove to St. Omer's or Newport, which were the nearest places under the Spanish government."

To all which he replied with no excess of courtesy, "that he must and would obey his orders as he had done; and that he had no power to judge of his disability to remove, or of the pain he underwent." And there is no doubt the gentleman, who was well bred, and in his nature very civil, was not pleased with his province, and much troubled that he could not avoid the delivery of the orders he received: and the conjuncture of their affairs was such, with reference to the designs then on foot, that every post brought reiterated commands for the chancellor's remove; which grew every day more impossible, by the access of new pain to the weakness he was in for want of sleep without any kind of sustenance.

Notwithstanding which, within few days after this last encounter, upon fresh letters from monsieur de Lionne, the gentleman came again to him, told him what orders he had received, and again proposed, "that he would either make use of a boat to Newport or Ostend, or a brancard to St. Omer's; either of which he would cause to be provided against the next morning, for the king's service was exceedingly concerned in the expedition." And when he saw the other was not moved with what he said, nor gave him any answer, he told him plainly, "that the king would be obeyed in his own dominions; and if he would not choose to do that which the king had required, he must go to the governor, who had authority and power to compel him, which he durst not but do." Upon which, with the supply of spirit that choler administered to him, he told him, "that though the king was a very great and powerful prince, he was not yet so omnipotent, as to make a dying man strong enough to undertake a journey. That he was at the king's mercy, and would endure what he should exact from him as well as he was able: it was in his majesty's power to send him a prisoner into England, or to cause him to be carried dead or alive into the Spanish territories; but he would not be felo de se, by willingly attempting to do what he and all who saw him knew was not possible for him to perform." And in this passion he added some words of reproach to le Fonde, which were more due to monsieur de Lionne, who in truth had not behaved himself with any civility: whereupon he withdrew in the like disorder, and for some days forbore so much as to see him, in which he had never before failed a day.

And the chancellor, who really did believe that some force and violence would be used towards him, presently sent to desire the chief magistrates of the town and the lieutenant governor to come to him; and then told them all the treatment he had received from monsieur le Fonde, and appealed to them, "whether they thought him in a condition to perform any journey." And the physicians being likewise present, he required them to sign such a certificate and testimony of his sickness as they thought their duty, which they readily performed; very fully declaring under their hands, "that he could not be removed out of the chamber in which he lay, without manifest danger of his life." And the lieutenant governor and the president of justice seemed much scandalized at what had been so much pressed, of which they had taken notice many days: and the one of them wrote to the count of Charron, governor of the town and then at court, and the other to monsieur de Lionne, what they thought fit; and the certificate of the physicians was enclosed to the abbot Mountague, with a full relation of what had passed. And it was never doubted, but that monsieur le Fonde himself made a very faithful relation of the impossibility that the chancellor could comply with what was required, in the state of sickness and pain that he was in at present.

By this time the French court discovered, that they were prevented of entering into that strait alliance they hoped with England, (and for obtaining whereof they had gratified the proud and malicious humours of the duke of Buckingham and lord Arlington in the treatment of the chancellor,) by the triple league, which they had used all those compliances to prevent: so that by the next post after the receipt of the certificate from the physicians, monsieur de Lionne writ a very civil letter to the chancellor, in which he protested, "that he had the same respect for him which he had always professed to have in his greatest fortune, and that it was never in the purpose of his Christian majesty to endanger his health by making any journey that he could not well endure; and therefore that it was left entirely to himself to remove from Calais when he thought fit, and to go to what place he would." And monsieur le Fonde came now again to visit him with another countenance, by which a man could not but discern, that he was much better pleased with the commission he had received last, than with the former; and told him, "that he was now to receive no orders but from himself, which he would gladly obey."

This gave him some little ease in the agony he was in, for his pains increased to an intolerable degree, insomuch that he could not rise out of his bed in six weeks. And it was the more welcome to him, because at the same time he received an account from his friend in Flanders, "that the marquis of Castille Roderigo, with as much regret as a civil man could express, protested, that the fear he had of offending the parliament at that time would not permit him to grant a pass: but if he would come to Newport, he should find the governor there well prepared and disposed to shew him all possible respect, and to accommodate him in his passage throughout the country, where it would not be convenient for him to make any stay: and that he looked upon it as a great misfortune to himself, that he might not wait upon him in his passage." This made it easy for him to discern, that his enemies would not give him any rest in any place where their malice could reach him: and since they were so terrible that the marquis of Castille Roderigo durst not grant him a pass, he thought it would be no hard matter for them to cause some affront to be put on him when he should be without any pass; though he had not the least suspicion of the marquis's failing in point of honour or courtesy.

At the same time he received advice from his friends in England, "that the storm from France was over, and that he might be permitted to stay in any part thereof; and for the present they wished that he would repair to the waters of Bourbon for his health, and then choose such a place to reside in, as upon inquiry he should judge most proper." But he was not yet so far reconciled to that court, though he liked the climate well, as to depend upon its protection: and therefore he resumed his former purpose of going to Avignon, and, if he could recover strength for the journey before the season should be expired for drinking the waters of Bourbon to pass that way. And to that purpose he sent to the court "for a pass to Avignon, with liberty to stay some days at Roan," where his goods and his monies were, (for his servants had come from thence to him to Calais,) "and to use the waters of Bourbon in his way:" all which was readily granted.

It was the third of April, before he recovered strength enough to endure a coach : and then, having bought a large and easy coach of the president of Calais, he hired horses there. And so he begun his journey for Roan, being still so lame and weak that he could not go without being supported : and the first day had a very ill omen by the negligence of the coachman, who passing upon the sands between Calais and Boulogne, when the sea was flowing, drove so unadvisedly, (which he might have avoided, as the horsemen and another coach did,) that the sea came over the boot of the coach, to the middle of all those who sat in it ; and a minute's pause more had inevitably overthrown the coach, (the weight whereof only then prevented it,) and they had been all covered with the sea. And two days after, by the change of the coachman for a worse, he was overthrown in a place almost as bad, into a deep and dirty water, from whence he was with difficulty and some hurt drawn out. Both which wonderful deliverances were comfortable instances that God would protect him, of which he had within few days a fresh and extraordinary evidence.

When he came to Roan, he received all those orders he had desired from the court. And a letter from abbot Mountague assured him, "that he need no more apprehend any discommodity from orders of the court, but might be confident of the contrary, and of all respect that could be shewed him from thence : that he might stay at Roan as long as his indisposition required ; and when he had made use of the waters of Bourbon, he might retire to any place he would choose to reside in." Monsieur le Fonde had orders, "after he had accompanied the chancellor two or three days' journey towards Bourbon, except he desired his company longer, to return to the court." Only monsieur de Lionne desired, "that he would not in his journey come nearer Paris than the direct way required him to do, because the emperor's agent at London, the baron of Isola, had confidently averred, that the king had one day gone incognito from the Bois de Vincennes to meet the chancellor, and had a long private conference with him."

When he had stayed as long at Roan as was necessary for the taking a little physic and recovering a little strength, the season required his making haste to Bourbon : and so on the 23d of April he began his journey from thence ; and that he might comply with the directions of monsieur de Lionne, he chose to go by the way of Eureux, and to lodge there that night. And because he was unable to go up a pair of stairs, he sent a servant before, as he had always done, to choose an inn where there was some ground-lodging, which often was attended with discommodity enough, and now (besides being forced to go through the city into the suburbs) was like to cost him very dear.

There happened to be at that time quartered there a foot company of English seamen, who had been raised and were entertained to serve the French in attending upon their artillery, some of them being gunners ; and none of them had the language, but were attended by a Dutch conductor, who spake ill English, for their interpreter. Their behaviour there was so rude and barbarous, in being always drunk, and quarrelling and fighting with the townsmen who would not give them any thing they demanded, that the city had sent to the court their complaints, and expected orders that night for their remove. They quickly heard of the chancellor's being come to the town ; and calling their company together declared, "that there were many months' pay due to them in England, and that they would make him pay it before he got out of the town."

He was scarce gotten into his ill ground-lodging, when many of them flocked about the house : upon which the gates of the inn were shut, they making a great noise, and swearing they would speak with the chancellor ; and, being about the number of fifty, they threatened to break open the gate or pull down the house. The mutiny was notorious to all the street ; but they had no courage to appear against them : the magistrates were sent to ; but there was a difference between them upon the point of jurisdiction, this uproar being in the suburbs. In short, they broke open the door of the inn : and when they were entered into the court, they quickly found which was the chancellor's chamber. And the door being barricadoed with such things as were in the room, they first discharged their pistols into the window, with which they hurt some of the servants, and monsieur le Fonde, who with his sword kept them from entering in at the window with great courage, until he was shot with a brace of bullets in the head, with which he fell : and then another of the servants being hurt, they entered in at the window, and opened the door for the rest of their company, which quickly filled the chamber.

The chancellor was in his gown, sitting upon the bed, being not able to stand ; upon whom they all came with their swords drawn : and one of them gave him a blow with a great broadsword upon the head, which if it had fallen upon the edge must have cleft his head ; but it turned in his hand, and so struck him with the flat, with which he fell backward on the bed. They gave him many ill words, called him "traitor," and swore, "before he should get out of their hands he should lay down all their arrears of pay." They differed amongst themselves what they should do with him, some crying, "that they would kill him," others, "that they would carry him into England ;" some had their hands in his pockets, and pillaged him of his money and some other things of value ; others broke up his trunks and plundered his goods. When himself recovered out of the trance in which he was stunned by the blow, they took him by the hand who spake of carrying him into England, and told him, "it was the wisest thing they could do to carry him thither, where they would be well rewarded ;" another swore, "that they should be better rewarded for killing him there." And in this confusion, the room being full, and all speaking together, the fellow who had given him the blow, whose name was Howard, a very lusty strong man, took him by the hand, and swore, "they should hurt one another if they killed him there ; and therefore they would take him into the court, and despatch him where there was more room." And thereupon others laid their hands upon him and pulled him to the ground, and then dragged him into the court, being in the same instant ready to run their swords into him together : when in the moment their ensign, and some of the magistrates with a guard, came into the court, the gate being broken; and so he was rescued out of their bloody hands, and carried back into his chamber.

Howard and many of the other, some whereof had been hurt with swords as they entered at the window, were taken and carried to prison, and the rest dispersed, vowing revenge when they should get the rest of their company together: and it cannot be expressed with how much fear the magistrates, and the poor guard that attended them, apprehended their coming upon them together again.

The chancellor himself had the hurt before mentioned in his head, which was a contusion, and already swollen to a great bigness; monsieur le Fonde was shot into the head with a brace of bullets, and bled much, but seemed not to think himself in danger; two of the chancellor's servants were hurt with swords, and lost much blood: so that they all desired to be in some secure place, that physicians and surgeons might visit them. And by this time many persons of quality of the town, both men and women, filled the little chamber; bitterly inveighing against the villany of the attempt, but renewing the dispute of their jurisdiction. And the provost, who out of the city was the greater officer, would provide an accommodation for them in his own house in the city, and appoint a guard for them; which the magistrates of the city would not consent to, nor he to the expedient proposed by them. And this dispute with animosity and very ill words continued in the chamber till twelve of the clock at night, the hurt persons being in the mean time without any remedy or ease: so that the magistrates, though they were not so dangerous, were as troublesome as the seamen, against whom they were not yet secure upon a second attempt.

In the end, monsieur le Fonde was forced to raise his voice louder than was agreeable to the state he was in, to threaten to complain of them to the king, for their neglect before and after the mischief was done: by which they were much moved, and presently sent to the governor of the duke of Bouillon's castle, (which is a good and noble house in the town,) "that he would receive the chancellor and monsieur le Fonde, "with such servants as were necessary for their attendance;" which he did with great courtesy, and gave them such accommodation as in an unfurnished house could on the sudden be expected. And so physicians and surgeons visited their wounds, and applied such present remedies as were necessary, till upon some repose they might make a better judgment.

The same night there were expresses despatched to the court to give advertisement of the outrage, and to Roan to inform the intendant in whose province it was committed: and he the next day with a good guard of horse arrived at Eureux. After he had visited the chancellor, with the just sense of the insolence he had undergone, and of the indignity that the king and his government had sustained; he proceeded in the court of justice to examine the whole proceedings, and much blamed the magistrates on all sides for their negligence and remissness. Upon the whole examination there appeared no cause to believe, that there was any formed design in which any others had concurred than they who appeared in the execution, who defended themselves by being drunk, which did not appear in any other thing than in the barbarity of the action. Yet it was confessed, that upon their first arrival at Dieppe, and whilst they were quartered there, the chancellor then passing by between Roan and Calais, they had a resolution to have robbed or killed him, if they had not been prevented by his getting the gates opened, and so going away before the usual hour.

The surgeons found monsieur le Fonde's wound to be more dangerous than they had apprehended, and that at least one of the bullets remained still in the wound, and doubted that it might have hurt the skull, in which case trepanning would be necessary; which made him resolve, though he was feverish, presently to have a brancard made, and to be put into it in his bed, and so with expedition to be carried to Paris, where he was sure to find better operators, besides the benefit and convenience of his own house and family. And so the third day after his misadventure, and after he had given his testimony to the intendant, he was in that manner, and attended by a surgeon, conveyed to Paris; and, by the blessing of God, recovered without the remedy that had been proposed.

The chancellor, after he had [been] bled once or twice, found himself only in pain with the blow, without any other symptoms which frequently attend great contusions; and therefore he positively rejected the proposition of trepanning, which had been likewise earnestly urged by the surgeons: and upon application of such plasters and ointments as were prescribed, he found both the pain and swelling lessen by degrees, though the memory of the blow lasted long; so that he thought himself fit enough for his journey, and was impatient to be out of that unlucky town; and his servants, having only flesh-hurts, could endure the coach as well as he. The intendant, who knew his desire, and was willing to defer his judgment till he was gone from thence, was very well content that he should proceed in his journey, and sent his sons with his own troop to convey him two or three leagues out of the town; and appointed the provost with his troop of horse to attend him to his lodging that night, and farther if he desired it. And the next day he condemned Howard and two others, an Englishman, a Scotchman, and an Irishman, (for the company consisted of the three nations,) to be broken upon the wheel; which was executed accordingly. And shortly after his arrival at Bourbon, monsieur de Lionne writ a very civil letter to the chancellor, "of the trouble the king sustained for the affront "and danger he had undergone; and that his "majesty was very ill satisfied, that so few as "three had been sacrificed to justice for so barbarous a crime."

When he had stayed as long at Bourbon in the use of the waters, as the physicians prescribed, (in which time he found a good recovery of his strength, save that the weakness of his feet still continued in an uneasy degree;) and [had] received great civilities during his abode there from all the French of quality, men and women, who came thither for the same remedies, and with whom the town then abounded; he prosecuted his journey to Avignon: and having stayed a week at Lyons, without any new ill accident he arrived about the middle of June there, by the pleasant passage of the Rhone.

Though he desired to make his journey as privately as he could, and had no more servants in his train than was necessary to the state of health he was in; yet he was known in most places by the presence of English, or by some other accident. And some friends at Paris had given such advertisement to Avignon, that when he arrived there, he had no sooner entered into a private lodging, which he procured the next day, but the vice-legate came to visit him in great state and with much civility, offering all the commodities of that place, if he would reside there. The archbishop, a very reverend and learned prelate, a Genoese, as the vice-legate likewise was, performed the same ceremony to him; and afterwards the consuls and magistrates of the city in a body, (who made a speech to him in Latin, as all the rest treated him in that language,) and all the principal officers of the court: so that he could not receive more civility and respect in any place; which, together with the cheapness and convenience of living, and the pleasantness of the country about it, might have inclined him to reside there. Yet the ill savour of the streets by the multitude of dyers and of the silk manufactures, and the worse smell of the Jews, made him doubt that it could be no pleasant place to make an abode in during the heat of summer: and therefore receiving new confirmation by letters from Paris, "that he was entirely at liberty to reside where he would in France," he resolved to take a view of some places before he would conclude where to fix; and the fame of Montpellier, that was within two little days' journey, invited him thither. And so after a week's stay at Avignon, and after having returned all the visits he had received, he went from thence, and came to Montpellier in the beginning of July.

It was his very good fortune, that an English lady of eminent virtue and merit, the lady viscountess Mordaunt, who had in the beginning of the winter before, in as great weakness of body as nature can subsist with, transported herself thither, remained still at Montpellier; where she had miraculously, by the benefit of that air, recovered a comfortable degree of health: and the news of her being still there was a great motive to his journey from Avignon thither. The chancellor had no mind to be taken notice of; but some relations which that lady made to his advantage, and the great esteem that city had of her, made his reception there more formal and ceremonious than he desired.

The marquis de Castro, governor of the city and castle, visited him, and welcomed him to the town, though he had not so much as a pass to come thither. The premier president, and all the other courts, and the consul and other magistrates of the city, visited him in their several bodies, and entertained him in Latin. It is true, that some days after, the intendant of the province (who was not then in the town) came thither; and he had received orders from the court, as soon as it was known that the chancellor was in Montpellier, "that he should be looked upon and treated as a person of whom the most Christian king had a good esteem:" and so, as soon as he came to the town, he visited him with much ceremony, and told him, "that he had received a particular command from the king to do him all the services he could in that city, and in the province "of Languedoc." And it must be confessed, that during his residence in Montpellier, which was not above one or two months less than three years, he did receive as much civility and formal courtesy from all persons of all conditions in that place, or who occasionally resorted thither, as could have been performed towards him, if he had been sent thither as a public person. And when the duke of Vernueil (who was governor of the province, and used to convene the States thither every year) came to Montpellier, as he did three times in those three years, he always visited the chancellor, and shewed a very great respect to him: which was as great a countenance as he could receive.

Yet he did always acknowledge, that he owed all the civilities which he received at his first coming thither, and which were upon the matter the first civilities he had received in France, purely to the friendship of the lady Mordaunt, and to the great credit she had there: and for which, and the consolation he received from her during the time of her stay there, he had ever a great respect for her and her husband; who, coming likewise thither, when he received information from England of a design to assassinate him by some Irish, manifested a noble affection for him, and stayed some months longer than he intended to have done, that he might see the issue of that design. Of which he had a just sense, and transmitted the information of it to his children, to the end that they and his friends might, upon all opportunities, acknowledge it to them both.

And in truth the great respect the place had for him was notorious, in that when any English came thither, and forbore to pay any respect to the chancellor; as only one gentleman did, sir Richard Temple, who publicly declared, "that he would not visit him," and dissuaded others from doing it, as a matter the parliament would punish them for, and shewed much vanity and insolence in his discourses concerning him: he found so little countenance from any person of condition, though he called himself "the premier president of the parliament of England," and such a general aversion towards him; that as they who came with him, and his other friends, deserted him and paid their civilities to the chancellor, so himself grew so ridiculous, that he left the town sooner than he intended, and left the reputation behind him of a very vain, humorous, and sordid person.

And having thus accompanied the chancellor through all his ill treatments and misadventures to Montpellier, where he resolved to stay, it will be to no purpose further to continue this relation; otherwise than as himself afterwards communicated his private thoughts and reflections to his friends.

When he found himself at this ease, and with those convenient accommodations, that he might reasonably believe he should be no more exposed to the troubles and distresses which he had passed through; he began to think of composing his mind to his fortune, and of regulating and governing his own thoughts and affections towards such a tranquillity, as the sickness of mind and body, and the continued sharp fatigue in the six or seven precedent months, had not suffered to enter into any formed deliberation. And it pleased

God in a short time, after some recollections, and upon his entire confidence in him, to restore him to that serenity of mind, and resignation of himself to the disposal and good pleasure of God, that they who conversed most with him could not discover the least murmur or impatience in him, or any unevenness in his conversations. He resolved to improve his understanding of the French language, not towards speaking it, the defect of which he found many conveniences in, but for the reading any books; and to learn the Italian: towards both which he made a competent progress, and had opportunity to buy or borrow any good books he desired to peruse.

But in the first place he thought he was indebted to his own reputation, and [obliged] for the information of his children and other friends, to vindicate himself from those aspersions and reproaches which the malice of his enemies had cast upon him in the parliament; which, though never reduced into any formal or legal charge, nor offered to be proved by any one witness, were yet maliciously scattered abroad and divulged to take away his credit. And the performance of this work, that was so necessarily incumbent to him, was the more difficult, by his constant and uninterrupted fidelity and zeal for the king's service, and his resolution to say nothing on his own behalf and for his own vindication, that might in the least degree reflect upon his majesty; which consideration had before kept him from charging those who persecuted him, with such indirect and naughty proceedings as might have put an end to their power. Nor did he think fit in that conjuncture, when his majesty had not yet met with that complaisance and submission from the parliament since the chancellor's remove, as had been promised to him as the effect of that counsel, to publish, that his coming away (which was the greatest blot upon his reputation) was with the king's privity, and at least with his approbation. However, he was resolved to commit into the custody of his children, who he knew could never commit a fault against his majesty, such a plain, particular defence of his innocence upon every one of the reproaches he had been charged with, that themselves might infallibly know his uprightness and integrity in all his ministry, which they observed and knew too much of to suspect; and might likewise manifestly convince other men, who were willing to be undeceived: but the manner of doing it, in respect of the former consideration, he left to their discretion. And having prepared this, and caused it to be fairly transcribed, before the lord and lady Mordaunt returned for England; he committed it to their care, who delivered it safely to the hands of his sons.

They were themselves upon that disadvantage under the reproach of their relation, that the eldest of them was removed from his attendance upon the queen for many months, without the allegation of any crime; and the other was retained only by the goodness of the king, against the greatest importunity that could be applied: and therefore it concerned them to be very wary in giving any offence, of which their adversaries might take any advantage. Besides, they observed that they, whose credit and interest had done all the mischief to their father, were now fallen out amongst themselves with equal animosity, and had all carried themselves so ill with reference to the public, and so loosely and licentiously in order to a good name, that their being enemies brought little prejudice to any man's reputation; and many of those, who had been made instruments to deprave the chancellor, were not scrupulous in declaring how they had been cozened, and how unjustly he had been traduced and accused: so that they made no other use of the answer and vindication they had received, than to be thereby enabled to make a perfect relation of some particular matters of fact which were variously reported, and could not be understood by any but those who had been conversant in the transactions.

It will be therefore necessary in this place, since there hath been before so methodical an account of all that the committee brought into the house of commons against him, and never after mentioned when they had once accused him, to insert such a short answer and defence to all that was alleged, out of that vindication which he sent from Montpelier, that nothing may remain in the possible thoughts of any worthy and uncorrupted man that may reflect upon his sincerity, or leave any taint upon his memory; the preservation of which from being sullied by the misfortunes which befell him, is the only end of this discourse, never to be communicated or perused by any but his nearest relations; who, by the blessing of God, can never but retain that affection and duty to the crown and for the royal family, that by the laws of God and man is due to it and them, and without which they can never expect God's blessing in this or the world to come. And in this I shall observe the order I used before in the mention of the several allegations, omitting upon any particular the repetition of what hath been at large already said in this discourse, which shall be referred to for answer.

To the first then, "That he had designed a standing army, and to govern the kingdom thereby; advised the king to dissolve the present parliament, and to lay aside all thoughts of future parliaments; to govern by military power, and to maintain the same by free quarter and contribution," (which, if true, whether it was treason or no, must worthily have made him odious to all honest men.)

The answer which he then made, and which was dated at Montpelier upon the 24th of July 1668, within few days after his arrival there and resolution to stay there, was in these words. He said, as nothing could be more surprising to him, nor he thought to any man else, than to find himself, after near thirty years' service of the crown in the highest trust; after having passed all the time of his majesty's exile with him beyond the seas and in his service, and in which the indefatigable pains he took was notorious to many nations; and after he had the honour and happiness to return again with his majesty into England, and to receive from him so many eminent marks of his favour, and to serve him near eight years after his return in the place of the greatest trust, without ever having discovered that his majesty was offended with him, or in truth that he had ever the least ill success from any counsel he had ever given him; or that any persons of honour and reputation, or interest in the nation, had ever made the least complaint against him, or had any thought that the miscarriages (for miscarriages were enough spoken of) had proceeded from him, or from any advice of his: he said, that as after all this he could not but be exceedingly surprised to find himself on a sudden, when he had not the least imagination of it, bereft of the king's favour, and fallen so far from his kindness, even within three or four days after his majesty had vouchsafed to condole with him in his house for the death of his wife, that he resolved to take the great seal from him; so it was no small comfort to him to see and know, that very few men of honour and reputation approved or liked what was done; but that the same was contrived, pursued, and brought to pass by men and women of no credit in the nation; by men, who had never served his majesty or his blessed father eminently or usefully, but most of them of trust and credit under Cromwell, or never of credit to do the king the least service; and who were only angry with him for not being pleased with their vicious and debauched lives, or for opposing and dissuading their loose and unreasonable counsels, which they were every day audaciously administering in matters of the highest moment, with great license and presumption.

But above all, he said, it was of the highest consolation to him, when it was publicly and industriously declared, "that the king was firmly resolved to destroy him, and would take it very well from all men who would contribute thereto, by bringing in any charge or accusation against him;" when the most notorious enemies he had were the only persons trusted in employment, men who had most eminently deserved and maliciously traduced the king, and had been to that time looked upon as such by his majesty; and when all, who were believed to have any kindness for the chancellor, were discountenanced and ill looked upon; when men of all conditions and degrees were daily solicited and importuned, by promises and threats, to declare themselves against him, at least if they would not be wrought over to do any thing against their conscience, that they would absent themselves from those debates: that all this malice and conspiracy, with so long deliberation and consultation, should not be able at last to produce and exhibit any other charge and accusation against him, but such a one as most men who knew him, or who had any trust or employment in the public affairs, were well able to vindicate him from the guilt of, and even his enemies themselves did not believe. The particulars whereof, he said, as far as he could take notice of them, they having not been to that day reduced into any form, so much as in the house of commons itself, he would then examine: and if he should appear too tedious in the examination and disquisition of them, and to say more than was necessary in his own defence, and to mention many particular persons in another manner than is usual upon occasions of this kind; he desired it might be remembered and considered, that this was not written as a formal answer to an impeachment, nor like to be published in his lifetime, a judgment of banishment being passed against him (without the least proof made or offered for the making good any one article of treason or misdemeanour) by act of parliament; but that it was a debt due to his children and posterity, that they might know (how much soever they were involved or might be in the effects of the sharp malice against him) how far he was from any guilt of those odious crimes which had been so odiously laid to his charge.

And that being his end, he might be excused if he did so far enlarge upon all particulars, that it might be manifest unto them how far he had been from treading in those paths, or having been accessory to those counsels, which had been the source from whence all those bitter waters had flowed, that had corrupted the taste even almost of the whole nation. And in order to that so necessary discourse and vindication of his integrity and honour, he could only take notice of the printed paper of those heads for a charge, that had been reported from the committee to the house; all correspondence and communication being so strictly inhibited to all kind of men to hold any kind of commerce with him, except his children and menial servants, who only had liberty to write unto him of his own domestic affairs; and the letters which they should write or receive were to be first communicated to one of the secretaries of state.

To the charge of the first article itself he said; it was no great vanity to believe, that there was not one person in England of any quality to whom he was in any degree known, who believed him guilty of that charge: and that he wanted not a cloud of witnesses (besides the testimony that he hoped his majesty himself would vouchsafe to give him in that particular) who, from all that they had heard him say in council and in conversation, could vindicate him from having that odious opinion. Having had the honour, by the special command of his late majesty of blessed memory, to attend the prince, his now majesty, into the parts beyond the seas, and to be always with him and in his service those many years of his exile, and till his happy return; he had always endeavoured to imprint in his majesty's mind an affection, esteem, and reverence for the laws of the land; "without the trampling of which under foot," he told him, "that himself could not have been oppressed; and that by the vindication and support of them, he could only hope and expect honour and security to the crown." Upon that foundation and declared judgment, he said, he came into the service of the king his father, by opposing all irregular and illegal proceedings in parliament; and that he had never swerved from that rule in any advice and counsel he had given to him or to his son.

From the time of his majesty's happy return from beyond the seas, he had taken nothing so much to heart, as the establishment of the due administration of justice throughout the kingdom according to the known laws of the land, as the best expedient he could think of for the composing the general distempers of the nation, and uniting the hearts of the people in a true obedience unto, and reverence for, his majesty's person and government. And with what success he had served his majesty in that province, (which he had been pleased principally to commit to his care and trust,) he did appeal to the whole nation; and whether the oldest man could remember, that in the best times justice was ever more equally administered, and with less complaint and murmur; which had been frequently acknowledged from all the parts of the kingdom, and had been often taken notice of by the king himself with great approbation, and confessed by most of the nobility upon several occasions. He said, he had often declared in parliament the king's affection and reverence for the laws, and his resolution neither to swerve from them himself, nor to suffer any body else to do so: and upon the public occasions of swearing the judges in any courts, he had always enjoined them "to be very strict and precise in the administration of justice according to law, with all equality, and without respect of persons, which the king expected from them; and that as his majesty resolved never to interpose by message or letter for the advancement or favour of any man's right or title, so he would take it very ill, if any subject (how great soever) should be able to pervert them." And he did believe there had never passed so many years together in any age, in which the crown had not in the least degree interposed in any cause or title depending in Westminster-hall, to incline the court to this or that side; or in which the crown itself hath had so many causes judged against it in several courts: at least in which former practice and usage on the behalf of the crown hath been less followed. And nothing is more known, than that from the time of the king's blessed return into England, even to the preparation of that charge against him, he had been reproached with nothing so much as his too much adhering to the law, and subjecting all persons to it: and this reproach had not been cast upon him so bitterly and so maliciously by any, and in places where they thought it might produce most prejudice to him, as by those who now contrived that charge, and who had been always great enemies to the law.

All this, and much more of the same kind, he said, was manifest to all the world: and therefore he needed not more to labour in that vindication. Yet he could not but observe, that there was not in all the king's forces, nor was when his forces were much greater than they were at that present, one officer recommended by him: and most of them were such who professed publicly a great animosity against him, having been, by the malice of some men, very unreasonably persuaded that the chancellor was their enemy; that he desired that they might be disbanded, or at least so obliged to the rules of the law, that they should be every day cast into prison. And they had indeed found, that in some insolencies which the soldiers had committed contrary to the law, and some pretences which they made to privileges against arrests, and the like, he had always opposed their desires with more warmth than other men had done; as believing it might be the cause of notable disorders, and more alienate the affection of the people from the soldiers: so that it could not be thought probable, that he should contribute his advice for the raising a standing army, and that the kingdom should be governed thereby; when there were very few men so like to be destroyed by that army as himself, who was so industriously rendered to be odious to it.

To the other part of that first article, "that he did advise the king to dissolve the present parliament, and to lay aside all thoughts of parliaments for the future," &c. which it was said two privy counsellors were ready to prove; he made a relation of all that had passed in that consternation when the Dutch fleet came into the river as far as Chatham, and when the debate was in council upon the reconvening the parliament in August, when it stood prorogued till October, which the chancellor affirmed could not legally be done; all which is more at large related in this discourse<sup>b</sup> of the time when those transactions passed, and so need not to be repeated in this place.

The second article was, "That he had, in the hearing of many of his majesty's subjects, falsely and maliciously said, that the king was in his heart a papist, popishly affected, or words to that effect."

He said, that he had occasion too often, throughout the whole charge, to acknowledge and magnify the great goodness of God Almighty, that, since he thought not fit (for his greater humiliation, and it may be to correct the pride of a good conscience) to preserve him entirely from those aspersions of infamy, and those flagella lingue, those strokes of the tongue, which always leave some mark or scar in the reputation they desire to wound; he had yet infused into the hearts of his enemies, who had suggested and contrived this persecution against him, to lay such crimes to his charge as his nature is known most to abhor, and which cannot only not be believed, but must be contradicted, and a vindication of him from that guilt must be made, by all men who know him to any degree, or who have been much in his company. And as justice would have required it, so the usual form in cases of this nature doth exact, that in so general a charge they should have named one single person of those many, in whose hearing he had laid that odious imputation upon the king: and every man will presume, that one such person would have been named, if he could have been found.

There was no man then alive, he said, who had had the honour to be so many years about or near the person of the king as he had been: no man, who knew more of the temptation his majesty had undergone, and the assaults he had sustained, in the matter of religion, during the whole time of his exile; when almost a total despair possessed the spirits of most men of his own religion, that he would recover his regality; and the hopes and promises and assurances were so pregnant of very many of all conditions, that he would suddenly recover it if he would change it. No man knew so well, with what Christian courage his majesty had repelled those assaults, or with what pious contempt and indignation he resisted and rejected those temptations. Nor had any man, he thought, held so many discourses with his majesty concerning religion as he had done; and sooner and more clearly discerned the reproaches he would undergo from that innate candour in his princely nature, which disposed him to receive any addresses, or to hear any discourses, which those of several factions in religion with great presumption have used to present to him: whilst his majesty hath, with equal temper and singular benignity, heard all; and, pitying their errors, dismissed them with evidence, that their arguments were too weak to make impression upon his judgment. Which though they knew well, yet either party, out of the vanity of their hearts, used all the endeavours they could to get it believed, that the king was propitious to them and their party. And the papists, being most presumptuous in particular, and in their dark walks in several counties making it a special argument to their proselytes, and those they endeavoured to make so, that the king favoured them, and was of their religion in his heart, (of which, and the great prejudice it brought upon his majesty, he frequently received advertisements from many persons of honour, and of warm affections to the government;) of which he had always informed the king, who was exceedingly offended at their folly and presumption, and wished "that some of them might be apprehended, and prosecuted with the utmost rigour; and that some such prosecution might be made against all the Roman catholics, and that they might be convicted;" which he always gave in charge to the judges accordingly. And upon that and the like occasions he had a just and necessary opportunity to enlarge, in the presence of many persons of honour and interest in the kingdom, upon the sincerity of the king's religion, and his constant exercise of it when he suffered by it; giving such instances of many particulars as were pertinent to the discourse: of which endeavours of his, and of some fruit thereof, he doubted not but that many of as considerable persons as are in England would be ready to give him their testimony. And, he said, he might without vanity say, that he had more than an ordinary part in the framing and promoting that act of parliament, that hath made those seditious discourses, "of the king's being a papist in his heart, or popishly affected," so very penal as it is: and therefore there would be need of an undoubted and uncontrollable evidence, that he had so soon run into that crime himself. Which was all he would for the present say upon that second article.

<sup>b</sup> See above, page 1225, &c.

The third article was, "That he had received great sums of money for passing the Canary patent, and other illegal patents; and granted several injunctions to stop proceedings at law against them, and other illegal patents formerly granted."

To which he said, that he had presumed in his humble address to the house of peers to assure their lordships, "that he had never received one penny over and above the just perquisites of his office, according to the precedents and practice of the best times, which he conceived to be those of the lord Coventry and the lord Ellesmere; and which he had made his rule in all that he had received, excepting only what he had from the immediate bounty of the king." And as he had always done all that was in his power to prevent and stop all illegal patents, so he did believe that there would be more patents then found in the office, which had been stopped by him, than by any of his predecessors in so short a time. He never granted any injunctions in the cases mentioned in the charge, nor in any case, where, by the course of the court and the rules of justice, it was not warranted. And for the Canary patent, and the original, and all the proceedings thereupon, so much is said in the body of this discourse, according to the time it was transacted in, that there needs no repetition of it in this place.

The fourth article was, "That he had advised and procured divers of his majesty's subjects to be imprisoned against law in remote islands, garrisons, and other places; thereby to prevent them from the benefit of the law, and to introduce precedents for imprisoning of other of his majesty's subjects in like manner."

To which he said, he knew not what answer to make to that article, it being so general, and no particular person being named: but, he said, it was generally known, that he had never taken it upon him to commit any man to prison, but such who, by the course of the chancery, for matters of contempt are justly and necessarily to be committed. It was probable that he had been present at the council-board, when many persons had been ordered to be committed, and whose commitment hath by the wisdom of that board been thought just and necessary; and therefore he was not to answer apart for any thing done by them. Only he might say, that he was frequently of opinion that the commitments were very necessary: and it was notoriously known, that by such commitments some rebellions or insurrections had been prevented; and that other persons, who were afterwards attainted and executed for high treason, had upon their examinations and at their death confessed, that their purpose had been to rise in arms at such and such times, if their friends upon whom they had principally relied had not been then committed to prison. And, he said, he did well remember, that it was thought fit that most of the persons who stand attainted for the murder of the late king, his majesty's royal father, should be removed out of the Tower, and dispersed into several islands and garrisons: and if any other persons had been likewise sent thither, he presumed it was upon such reasons, as upon a due examination thereof would make it appear to be very just.

The fifth article was, "That he had corruptly sold several offices contrary to law."

This he positively denied.

The sixth was, "That he had procured his majesty's customs to be farmed at underrates, knowing the same; and great pretended debts to be paid by his majesty, to the payment whereof his majesty was not in strictness bound; and that he had received great sums of money for procuring the same."

To this he said, he had never had any thing to do in the disposing his majesty's customs or any other part of his revenue, except for some short time after his majesty's first arrival in England; when he, amongst others of the lords of the council, was a commissioner for the treasury: during which time there was no farm let of any of the revenue, and the customs were put into the hand of commissioners, to the end that a computation might be made as near as was possible of the full value of them, before that it should be put into a farm, which every man conceived would be fit to be done as soon as might be. The white staff was shortly after given to the earl of Southampton, (to whom his majesty had designed it before he returned,) and the chancellorship of the exchequer to the lord Ashley, the lord chancellor having resigned it into his majesty's hands, which he had been possessed of for many years in the time of the late king, and retained it till after his majesty's return: and from the time that those two officers of the revenue were made, which determined the former commission, he never intermeddled in the customs, or in any other branch of the revenue; except when the king commanded him to be present in some consultations which he had with the lord treasurer, and when there were other lords of the council present. That excellent person, the lord treasurer, always resorted to the king for his direction, in all matters of the least difficulty which occurred to him in the administration of his office; and frequently did desire to confer with the chancellor (with whom he was known to have held a long and a fast friendship) upon many particulars of his office, believing that he was not altogether ignorant in that administration, with which he had been formerly so well acquainted. And that he conceived might be the reason, why he did oftentimes procure him to be joined with him in references from the king, upon matters wholly relating to his own office. But the chancellor did never then suffer any particular application to be made to him in those cases, nor had ever secret conferences with any persons who were concerned in those pretensions.

* See above, p. 1134. &c.

What was meant "by his having procured his majesty's customs to be farmed at underrates, "knowing the same; and great pretended debts "to be paid by his majesty, to the payment "whereof his majesty was not in strictness "bound;" he said, he could not imagine, except it did relate to the payment of a debt due from his late majesty to some of the farmers. In which though he had no more to do, than in giving information and his particular advice to his majesty, in the presence of the lord treasurer, the chancellor of the exchequer, and other of the lords, and so was not himself responsible for what his majesty did thereupon; yet he thought himself obliged upon this particular, which so much concerned the honour and justice of the late king and of his present majesty, to enlarge, and relate all he knew of what their majesties did, and what induced his present majesty to do his part in it.

He said, it was notoriously known, that before the late troubles, and in the very first entrance into them, his majesty was necessitated to borrow very great sums of money from his then farmers of his customs, and to oblige them to stand personally bound for many other great sums of money, which other men lent to his majesty upon their security. That thereupon, and for the repayment of those sums which the farmers had advanced, and for securing them from any damage for those monies which others had lent upon their obligations, his late majesty, with the advice of the then lord treasurer and the chancellor of the exchequer, had granted a further lease of his customs to those farmers for three or four years to come, after the expiration of their former lease; with a covenant on his majesty's part, to pay the just interest for all such monies as were advanced by them, or for which they stood bound; and likewise that they should, out of their growing rent, deduct such sums of money by the year, as they had lent or been bound for, according to such proportions yearly as was agreed upon. That it was as well known, that shortly after the beginning of the parliament in 1640, and before the commencement of the second lease, the house of commons did not only force the said farmers to pay a very great sum of money for their presumption in receiving customs and impositions upon merchandise in the former years, when they pretended such payments were not due; but took also from them their new lease granted to them by the king, and so left them without any capacity of reimbursing themselves of the money they had lent, and likewise at the mercy of their creditors to whom they stood bound; many of whom quickly began to exercise that severity towards them, that many of the poor gentlemen had their estates extended upon judgments and recognisances, and their persons taken in execution and committed to prison; where some of them who had been known to have great estates, as sir Paul Pindar and others, were forced to end their lives.

There were very few circumstances in the late king's misfortunes, which gave him more trouble, or so much afflicted him as the sense he had of the horrid and unjust sufferings those poor gentlemen underwent for him, and their affection for his service; which he often publicly mentioned, and as often declared, "that he held himself "obliged to make them full reparation as soon as "God should enable him." And he frequently spake to the chancellor, who was then chancellor of the exchequer, of that affair; of the good opinion he had of the men, and of the great services they had done for his majesty; and commanded him expressly, when it should fall within his power, he should do them all the right he could. And of this he had often informed his majesty during the time he was abroad, and after his return, without any other motive than his father's command and his own honour, having himself never had any degree of friendship with any of the persons concerned, and a very ordinary acquaintance with some of them. Upon his majesty's happy return, those gentlemen who were alive of the old farmers, who were sir John Jacob, sir Job Harby, sir Nicholas Cripe, and sir John Harrison, applied themselves to the king, having lain several years and at that time remaining in execution in several prisons, and having had their estates sold, upon the prosecution of those creditors to whom they were bound for money lent to his majesty.

As soon as measures were taken for collecting the revenue, those four gentlemen named before, and two others who had served his majesty very well, were appointed his commissioners for the collecting the customs and duties upon trade; in which collection they continued a year or thereabouts; during which time many of their creditors, who had generously forbore to prosecute them whilst they were in prison and undone, begun now to commence their actions against them, presuming they were then or would shortly be able to satisfy them. Whereupon the king commanded the lord treasurer and the chancellor, with some other lords, to send for those creditors, and to declare to them, "that his majesty would in "a short time enable his farmers to pay their just "debts, which he well knew were contracted for "his service; and that he would take it very well "from them, if they would for the present give no "obstruction to his service, by the prosecution of "those persons at law, whose time was solely "taken up in the necessary service of his majesty." Whereupon they willingly desisted from that prosecution; and many of them finding now, that by his majesty's favour they were like to recover their debts they before thought to be desperate, they frankly remitted the whole or part of the interest, that in strictness of law was still due to them.

His majesty shortly after, finding it best for his profit to determine the collection by commission, and to let the whole to farm, gave direction to the lord treasurer to confer and treat with any fit persons who desired to contract for the same. Many overtures were made by several persons, and some applied themselves directly to his majesty. Upon which, and after a competent time in considering all that had been proposed, the king appointed a day, when he would be attended by the lord treasurer and other of the lords, and when all the pretenders should likewise be present, and he would then and there declare his own judgment; having first declared to the commissioners, whereof four were the old farmers to whom so much money was due, "that whosoever should take the farm, they should be obliged to pay them their just debt at such times, and by such proportions, as their service could bear. But as to the letting the farm itself, he would neither consider the debt he owed them, nor the sufferings they had undergone, but only the rent they should offer; which if as much as any body else would give, he would prefer their persons before others; but if any other fit men would offer more than they thought fit to give, they should be his farmers: and therefore wished them well to consider what they would propose to him."

After two days spent by his majesty with the several pretenders apart, and finding that the propositions made to him by the old farmers, with whom the other two were to be joined who had served with them as commissioners, were at least as much if not more for his profit than any that had been made by any of the rest; he did declare, that the farm should be let to those who had been his commissioners: which at that time was understood to be so far from being a good bargain, that the two commissioners, who were not concerned in the great debt, utterly refused to meddle with the farm at so great a rent; the other four publicly declaring at the same time, "that they would not give the rent but in contemplation of their debt, which they thought they should sooner and better receive, when it should be assigned upon their own collections, than when it should be charged upon new farmers." But they were suitors to his majesty, "that he would oblige the other two (sir John Wolstenholme and sir John Shaw) to be joint farmers with them;" which his majesty did, by making a gracious promise to them, "that if they should be losers, he would repair them:" and thereupon directions were given to Mr. Attorney General to prepare a grant accordingly. And, he said, he did not know that there was one dissenting voice from what his majesty inclined to do upon the whole matter, the same appearing to every man to be most just and reasonable.

The farm being thus settled, the old farmers were directed "to bring their accounts to the lord treasurer and chancellor of the exchequer, by "which it should manifestly appear how much the king was justly and truly indebted to them, and how the debts were incurred; that so upon a just computation such satisfaction might be made to them, as was consistent with the present state of his majesty's affairs and occasions." Many months, if not a whole year, were spent in the examination of those accounts before the auditors: who, besides the exceptions they took for want of some formalities in the proof of some money paid, which after twenty years of license (in which all their books and papers had been taken, their houses plundered, and their persons imprisoned; and in which so many persons employed by the king to receive and by them to pay money were dead) could hardly be made with the usual exactness; made likewise several certificates of particular cases, which required further directions. And the lord treasurer would never take upon himself to give those directions, only declaring to them, as he had frequently done, "that in regard his majesty was not strictly bound in justice to pay that debt due from his father, but that his present majesty's generous and royal disposition had prevailed with him to pay that just debt, whereby they might be preserved from ruin, in which," he said, "he had fully concurred with his majesty; but that he would never advise him, on the contrary he would always dissuade his majesty from paying or allowing any interest, though paid by them, which would swell the debt to such a proportion, that his majesty could never undertake the payment of it." Which determination, how great soever their loss appeared to be, seemed to be so just, at least so necessary for the king, that they wholly referred it to his majesty; hoping that it might prevail with many of their creditors not to exact it from them, though the sale of their whole estates had made satisfaction to others for the whole interest, as well as for the principal.

When the auditors' certificate was ready, and all the doubts and questions that did arise thereupon were clearly stated, his majesty vouchsafed again to be present with the other lords, who had from the beginning assisted in the examination of that business: and then the lord treasurer declared to his majesty, what he had before said to the persons concerned, "[that] though he willingly approved his majesty's goodness in taking upon himself that great debt, yet that he would by no means give his advice or consent that he should pay or allow any interest for it."

Upon the whole matter, and upon all the doubts stated to his majesty, and after the rejection of several of the sums of money which were demanded by them, and for the payment whereof such direct proof is not made as is required by the course of the exchequer, (though, he said, he thought most persons who were present were in their private consciences well satisfied, that those sums had been in truth paid to his majesty's use, as had been alleged;) there appeared to his majesty to be justly due to them the sum of two hundred thousand pounds, principal-money, for almost twenty years, and for which they had paid the interest for many years out of their own estates. And his majesty thought it very just; and, with many gracious expressions of his purpose and resolution further to repair them as he should be able, gave order to the lord treasurer, "that the said

"debt of two hundred thousand pounds should be paid to them in five years, that is, by forty thousand pounds for every year, out of the rent of the farm; and that all instruments necessary for their satisfaction and security should be presently given to them, whereby they might be able to comply with their creditors, and avoid their importunity," wherewith his majesty begun to be troubled as much as themselves.

He did confess himself to have been present at those agitations, and to have contributed his humble advice and opinion to his majesty that he should pay this debt; which he thought himself obliged to do, as well as a faithful counsellor to his present majesty, as in discharge of his duty and obligation to his father. And, he said, he had very good reason to believe, that if that two hundred thousand pounds be paid according to his majesty's direction, and of which the heirs and executors of those farmers who are dead, as well as the four present farmers, have their equal proportions; the said persons have not at this day half the estates they had in the year 1640, when they entered into those engagements for his majesty. Nor was there any one person present at the agitation of this affair, who seemed in the least degree to differ in the opinion, or to dissuade his majesty from giving that satisfaction for that debt.

He said, he did likewise very willingly confess, that he had in the manner aforesaid, and being called to advise, given his opinion for the payment of many other considerable debts incurred by his late majesty, and for which many persons of honour, who adhered to him during that war, were personally bound for him, and whose estates had been extended and their persons imprisoned for the same; many of whom were in execution and in prison for the same when his majesty returned, and others were then sued in Westminster-hall, in his majesty's own courts. His late majesty having granted under his great seal of England, to several persons intrusted for the rest, many of his forests, parks, and other lands, for their security and indemnity who were or should stand bound for him, for money that was then borrowed for and applied to the necessary support of himself and his army, and to no other purpose; and in that grant he had been particularly trusted, as well by the desire of the persons particularly concerned, as by his majesty's command to be solicitous for their satisfaction. And he did not deny, that he was very glad, when he was able to procure satisfaction for those persons who were so bound and so secured; nor more troubled, than that he could do no more, than that there remained still so many unsatisfied, and almost undone, for those debts so contracted; of which number he believed there were still too many.

But having made those clear confessions of what was truth, and what he did do in those transactions, he said, he must as positively deny, that ever he procured or advised the letting his majesty's customs, or any other part of his revenue, at underrates: on the contrary, that he used all the ways he could to advance the rents, without respect of persons; and that he was never present at the letting any farm that any men would have given more for, than they did to whom it was let, what offers soever were made afterwards, when his majesty himself had made a contract, and when a grant was issued accordingly under the great seal of England. And he did as positively deny, that ever he received or expected the least sum of money, or money-worth, for any lease made by his majesty of his customs, or any other part of his revenue; or for the payment of any one debt made by his majesty, to which he was or was not bound: he having, he said, never had any other motive for the performance of those offices, but the pure and entire consideration of his majesty's honour, justice, and profit, and his own inclination to gratify worthy persons, who in justice ought to be or might with justice be gratified and obliged, and who had commonly been such persons to whom he had had no kind of obligation.

The seventh article was, "That he had received great sums of money from the company of vintners, or some of them or their agents, for enhancing the prices of wines, and for freeing them from the payment of legal penalties which they had incurred."

He said, if he had been in the least degree guilty of that charge, it would very easily have been proved; and the vintners would very gladly have helped them in it, being persons who never thought themselves beholden to him, and so not obliged to conceal any of his corruptions. They well knew, that he could never be prevailed with to consent to the enhancing the prices of their wines, and that he never had received from them the least sum of money, or other gratuity from them, in his life. He said, he did remember, that at a time when his majesty had refused to grant all their other petitions, the company of vintners did complain, "that there were so many informations against them prosecuted by informers in the exchequer, that they must give over their trades, and be likewise undone, if they should be severely pursued for what was past;" and therefore they besought his majesty in council, "that he would pardon what was past; and that for the future they would trespass no more." Whereupon his majesty thought it worthy of his mercy to shelter them for the present from that prosecution; and thereupon commanded his attorney general "to call the informers before him, and to appoint the vintners to pay them such reasonable rewards for their pains as he thought fit; and thereupon he should enter a noli prosequi;" but his majesty charged them "for the future not to run into the same danger." And as this grace from his majesty was not upon his promotion, but purely from his own bounty and goodness, from which nobody dissuaded him; so he never received the least profit from the same.

The eighth is, "That he had in a short time gained to himself a far greater estate than can be imagined to be lawfully gained in so short a time; and contrary to his oath he had procured several grants under the great seal from his majesty, to himself and to his relations, of several of his majesty's lands, hereditaments, and leases, to the disprofit of his majesty."

To this he said, that he wished with all his heart that the truth of that article (which he presumed had drawn on all the rest) were clearly known to all the world: and that they, who in truth do believe that he hath so great an estate, were well informed what it is; and they would then clearly discern that he needed not be ashamed of having gotten such an estate, nor that he needed to have any recourse to any ill arts or means for the obtaining thereof. They would know, that he had been so far from "procuring several grants" under the great seal of England from his majesty, to himself and his relations, of several of "his majesty's lands, hereditaments, and leases, to the disprofit of his majesty;" that he never moved his majesty in his life for any one grant to himself or any of his relations. If his majesty's royal bounty had disposed him to confer somewhat of benefit and advantage upon an old servant, who had waited upon his father and himself near thirty years in some trust and employment; he said, he hoped it should not be imputed as a crime in him to receive his favours. He was far from believing or imagining, that the poor services he had ever done, or could do, were in any degree proportionable to his majesty's bounty: yet since his majesty's goodness had thought him fit for it, he hoped many others would think so too; at least as fit as some men, who had received greater marks and proportions of it than he had done, and who, though they might serve much better, had not served so long.

He said, he forbore to enlarge upon that charge, because he conceived that it was now evident to many, who had been wrought upon by those who did not believe it themselves, to think his estate to be very great, that the information they received was without ground: and whoever considers, that the first year after the king's return yielded justly more profit to the great seal than he ever received in all the years following, and some particular acts of bounty conferred on him by his majesty, without the least suit from him, and unthought of by him, will believe that his fault was greater in having no better an estate, than that what he hath hath been gotten by corruption. He said, he hath none of his majesty's lands, but what he had bought, for as much as any body would pay for it, of those who had the same granted to them by his majesty's bounty, and that grant confirmed to them by act of parliament. And he presumed that it could not have fallen from his majesty's memory, and was sure was well known to some persons of honour yet alive, that when his majesty was graciously pleased, upon his first coming over, to offer him some land that had never yielded any thing to the crown, he absolutely refused to receive it, because it was generally thought to be of great value; and therefore he would not expose himself to the envy which naturally attends those donations, having in truth never had an immoderate appetite to make haste to be rich; and had as much apprehended the being accused of witchcraft or burglary, as of bribery and corruption.

In a word; he did declare, that his debts being discharged, for which he paid interest, all his estate was not worth, being sold, the money that he had received from his majesty's own royal bounty, and far from being suitable to the quality he yet held, and which was never obtained by his own ambition, as many persons of honour could testify.

The ninth article was, "That he had introduced "an arbitrary government in his majesty's "foreign plantations; and had caused such "as complained thereof before his majesty

"and his council, to be long imprisoned for
"so doing."

To this he said, that though he could not possibly comprehend the full meaning of that article, yet because he had heard of many discourses made of the authority that he assumed to himself over the plantations, and the great advantage and benefit that he had drawn to himself from thence, he was very willing to take that occasion to relate all that he knew, and all that he had done, with reference to any of his majesty's plantations; declaring in the first place, that at his majesty's return, and before, he had used all the endeavours he could to prepare and dispose the king to a great esteem of his plantations, and to encourage the improvement of them by all the ways that could reasonably be proposed to him. And he had been confirmed in that opinion and desire, as soon as he had a view of the entries in the custom-house; by which he found what a great revenue accrued to the king from those plantations, inasmuch as the receipts from thence had upon the matter repaired the decrease and diminution of the customs, which the late troubles had brought upon other parts of trade, from what it had formerly yielded.

The first consideration that offered itself before the king that related to the plantations, was concerning the Barbadoes; which having been most discoursed of since, and, as he had heard, with some reflections upon him of partiality and injustice, he said, he would in the first place set down all he knew in that affair, and how he came to meddle in it.

Before the beginning of the late troubles, the king had granted the island of the Barbadoes to the earl of Carlisle and his heirs for ever, upon a supposition that it had been first discovered, possessed, and planted at his charge: and the said earl sent a governor and people thither, and enjoyed it to his death; and by his will settled it for the payment of his debts, which were very great. The troubles falling out in a short time after, little or no profit had been drawn from thence towards the satisfaction of those debts; and the executors and trustees totally neglected the taking care of it, or prosecuting the plantation. But in and after the war many citizens, merchants, and gentlemen, who were willing or forced to withdraw themselves from England, transported themselves thither, and planted without asking any body's leave, and without being opposed or contradicted by any body.

About the year 1647, or thereabouts, the late earl of Carlisle, son and heir of the former earl, to whom the inheritance of that island belonged, treated with the late lord Willoughby of Parham, how that island might be so husbanded, that the plantation might be advanced, and profit made by it; which would at last redound to himself, when the debt should be paid. The late king was then in the hands of the army: and with his majesty's approbation and consent, it was agreed between the said earl and the said lord, "that a "lease should be made by the earl of Carlisle to "the lord Willoughby, of all the profits which "should arise out of that plantation, for the term
"of twenty-one years or thereabouts; a moiety
"of the whole profits to be received by the lord
"Willoughby himself for his own use, in recompense for his pains and charge. And he was

"likewise to receive a commission from the said earl, to be governor of that and the rest of the Caribbee islands," (all which were comprehended in the charter granted by the king to the earl of Carlisle;) "and that a commission should be likewise procured from the king or the prince of Wales, by which the lord Willoughby was to be constituted governor of the said islands."

About that time the fleet in the Downs returned to their obedience to the king, withdrawing themselves to the coast of Holland to offer their service to the prince of Wales, his majesty that now is; the lord Willoughby then likewise coming over to him, to serve him in any condition his highness would employ him in. That summer being passed without any good success, the lord Willoughby then informed the prince of what had passed between the earl of Carlisle and him with the king his father's consent; which his highness had likewise received from his majesty himself, with much recommendation of the lord Willoughby. He said, he was then attending upon the prince in Holland, as one of the king's council assigned by his majesty for that service. Upon the understanding this whole case, the prince, upon the unanimous advice of the council, thought fit to grant such a commission of governor of the Barbadoes and the other islands, as he desired: and he had the more reason to desire it, (notwithstanding the earl of Carlisle's grant and commission,) because the principal planters upon the Barbadoes had been officers in the king's army, or of manifest affections to him, and always looked upon as of his party.

With this commission the lord Willoughby had, at his great charge and expense, transported himself to the Barbadoes, and was there received as governor; and made a contract with the planters, "that so much should be paid upon the hundred to the earl of Carlisle," to whom the propriety of the whole belonged. But before this agreement could be well executed, or any profit drawn from thence, the island was reduced to the obedience of the parliament and of Cromwell, and a governor appointed by them; the lord Willoughby being sent into England, where he remained till the king's return, and had given unquestionable evidence of his affection to the king's service, for which he had often been committed to prison before and after Cromwell's death.

As soon as the king returned, the lord Willoughby (who had then eight or nine years to come of his lease formerly granted to him by the earl of Carlisle, who was then likewise living, and ready to do any other act to the lord Willoughby's advantage) resolved to return himself to the Barbadoes, and desired the king to renew his commission to him for the government; which his majesty was very willing to do, as to a person he esteemed very much, and who had spent very much of his own fortune, as was notoriously known, in that service. But the Barbadoes and all those other islands were now become of another consideration and value, than they had been of before the troubles: the Barbadoes itself was (by that confluence and resort thither as was mentioned before) so fully planted, that there was no room for new comers, and they had sent very many of their people to the other islands to plant; many citizens of London had raised very great estates there, and every year received a very great revenue from thence; [and] the king's customs from that one island came to a very great sum of money yearly.

All these men, [who] had entered upon that plantation as a waste place, and had with great charge brought it to that perfection, and with great trouble, begun now to apprehend, that they must depend upon the good-will of the earl of Carlisle and lord Willoughby for the enjoyment of their estates there, which they had hitherto looked upon as their own. All these men joined together in an appeal to the king, and humbly prayed "his protection, and that they might not be oppressed by those two lords." They pleaded, "that they were the king's subjects; that they had repaired thither as to a desolate place, and had by their industry obtained a livelihood there, when they could not with a good conscience stay in England. That if they should be now left to those lords to ransom themselves and compound for their estates, they must leave the country; and the plantation would be destroyed, which yielded his majesty so good a revenue. That they could defend themselves by law against the earl of Carlisle's title, if his majesty did not countenance it by a new grant of the government to the lord Willoughby: and therefore they were suitors to his majesty, that he would [not] destroy them by that countenance."

At the same time, the creditors of the late earl of Carlisle (whose debts were to be satisfied by the profits of that plantation, by the will and settlement of the said earl) petitioned the king, "that they might be in the first place provided for: their principal-money due to them at the death of the earl amounted to no less than fifty thousand pounds, of which they had never yet received one penny; and therefore that the profits which should arise ought in the first place to be applied to them, there having been many families utterly ruined for want of their monies so due to them." The king appointed to hear all their several pretences at the council-board, where they all attended with their council: and after his majesty had spent three or four days himself in hearing the several allegations, and finding new pretences and difficulties every day to arise, (which shall be mentioned anon,) the king appointed several of the lords of the council "to consider of the whole matter, and to confer with the several parties, and, if it were possible, to make an end between them by their own consent; otherwise to report the several titles to his majesty, with such expedients as in their judgments they thought most like to produce a general satisfaction, without endangering the plantation," the preservation whereof his majesty took to heart. The chancellor was one of that committee, and took very much pains in reading the charters, grants, and leases, and many other papers and despatches which concerned that affair; and conferred with several of the persons interested; to the end that he might the better discern what could be done, having never understood or heard any thing of the matter, or that concerned that plantation, otherwise than what he hath before set down upon the despatch of the lord Willoughby in Holland; nor had he the [least] inclination or bias to any party. Upon the hearing all the allegations before the lords, the several pretences and titles appeared to them to be these; which they afterwards reported to the king.

The lord Willoughby demanded nothing from the king, but his commission to be governor for the remainder of the years which had been granted to him by the earl of Carlisle; to the end that he might receive one moiety of those profits which should arise to the earl, and which had been assigned to him with the consent and approbation of the late king, and of his majesty that now is; upon which he had undertaken that voyage, and spent so much of his estate.

The earl of Carlisle, whilst this contention was depending, died, and by his will devised his interest in the Barbadoes to the earl of Kinnoul, who likewise petitioned the king for the preservation of his right: but neither he, nor the person under whom he claimed, had any pretence till all the debts should be satisfied; nor did the earl of Kinnoul demand any thing till then, but believed the profit would arise yearly to so much, that the debts would quickly be satisfied, and then the whole was to come to him.

There was another title that preceded the earl of Carlisle's, which was that of the earl of Marlborough, who alleged, and proved it to be true, "that the Barbadoes and those adjacent islands were first granted by the king to his grandfather the earl of Marlborough, who was then lord high treasurer of England, before the earl of Carlisle had any pretence thereunto; and that the lord treasurer had afterwards consented that the same should be granted to the earl of Carlisle, upon a full contract, that he should first receive for ever the sum of three hundred pounds by the year out of the first profits of the plantations; which sum of three hundred pounds had never been yet paid: and therefore the earl of Marlborough desired, as heir to his grandfather, to have satisfaction for the arrears, and that the growing rent might be secured to him."

The creditors were of two kinds: the first, and who had first petitioned the king, as was said before, had an assignment made to them by the executors and trustees of the earl of Carlisle upon his will, and who at his death owed them the full sum of fifty thousand pounds or thereabouts. The other creditors consisted of several tradesmen and artificers, to whom the said earl was indebted for wares and goods which they had delivered for his use; and of several servants for their arrears of wages: and all those had, during the late troubles, exhibited their bill in chancery against the executors and overseers of the late earl, and had obtained a decree in that court for their satisfaction out of the profits of those plantations, (which decree stood confirmed by the late act of judicial proceedings;) and, as he remembered, their debts amounted to thirty thousand pounds or thereabout. None of the creditors in general, of one or the other sort, had ever received one shilling from the time that the earl had first assigned it.

The planters insisted positively, "that the charter granted to the earl of Carlisle by the king was void in point of law:" for which their council alleged many reasons. And having spent much time upon that argumentation, they concluded with two humble propositions to the king.

1. "That his majesty would give them leave to "prosecute in his name in the exchequer, and at their own charge, to repeal that grant to the earl of Carlisle; by which they should be freed from the arbitrary power and oppression which would be exercised upon them under the colour of that charter, and his majesty might receive a great benefit to himself, by taking the sovereignty into his own hands, to which it belonged. And in that case they offered in their own names, and for the rest of the planters who were in the island, to consent to an imposition of so much in the hundred, which they confidently averred would amount in the year to ten thousand pounds at the least; out of which his majesty's governor might be well supported, and his majesty dispose of the overplus as he should think fit." 2. "If his majesty would not suffer the charter to be repealed, that he would leave those who claimed under the earl of Carlisle's patent to their remedy at law, and leave the planters to their own defence; which they hoped in justice could not be denied to them, since they alone had been at the charge to settle the plantation, which brought every year so great a revenue to the crown, when the earl had not been at the least expense thereupon: and if his majesty should [not] assist their pretences with his royal authority, they must all quit the plantation."

These being the several pretences of the several persons, and nothing being to be done by agreement between themselves, their interests being so distinct and inconsistent with each other; his majesty thought fit, in the first place, to refer the consideration of the validity and legality of the patent to his council at law; who, upon full deliberation and after the hearing of all parties, returned their opinion, "that their patent was void, and that his majesty might take the same into his own power." This report was no sooner made to his majesty, but that he very graciously declared, "that he would not receive from hence any benefit or advantage to himself, until all their pretences had received satisfaction; and that he would make no further use of avoiding the said charter, than to dispose the profits of the plantation to those, who in justice had any pretence in law or equity to receive the same: and therefore that the lord Willoughby should proceed in his voyage to the Barbadoes, and should receive according to his bargain a moiety of the profits; and that the other part should be disposed of for the satisfaction of the debts and other incumbrances." In order to which, his majesty appointed the same committee of the lords to meet again, and to adjust the several proportions.

When they met again, they had all the persons concerned with them, or ready to be called in upon any occasion; and they all appeared very glad that the king had taken the care and protection of the plantation upon himself, which was all the security the planters had or could desire. And the lords' first care was, to make some computation that might be depended upon, as the yearly revenue that would arise upon the imposition within the island. But the planters would not be drawn to any particular agreement in that point, not so much as to consent to what should be imposed upon every hundred; but on the contrary declared, "that too much had been under-

"taken in that kind by one of their own number, Mr. Kendall, in his discourse before the king in the council," and declared, "that the plantation could not bear the imposition he had mentioned. That whatsoever was to be done of that nature was to be transacted by an assembly in the island: and that all that they could promise for themselves was, that they would use their utmost endeavours with their friends in the island, that when the lord Willoughby should arrive there and call an assembly, they should consent to as great an imposition as the plantation would bear: by which," they said, "a good revenue would arise to the king for the purposes aforesaid."

The creditors had great reason to be glad of the resolution his majesty had taken: for though it would be a long time before they could be fully satisfied out of a moiety of the profits, though it should arise to the highest computation, yet in time they should receive all, and should every year receive some; which would lessen their debt, and relieve those who were in the highest necessities, of which there was a great number. Whereas they had hitherto in so many years received not one penny: and it was evident, that without his majesty's authority they never should, since the planters were resolved never to consent to any imposition, nor submit to any authority that should be exercised under the earl of Carlisle's patent, without a due course of law; the way to obtain which would be very difficult to find out. And they understood well enough, that, without his majesty's grace and bounty to them, the repeal or avoiding the earl of Carlisle's patent would put a quick end to all their pretences.

The greatest difficulty that did arise was from the earl of Kinnoul, to whom the last earl of Carlisle had devised these islands by his will: and he had a great mind to go thither himself, and take possession of his right; and his council had persuaded him, "that the king's charter granted to the first earl of Carlisle was good and valid in law, and that they believed they could defend and maintain it in any court of justice." Then his own estate in Scotland was so totally lost by the iniquity of the time, and his father's having so frankly declared himself for the king, when very few of that nation lost any thing for their loyalty, that he had very little left to support himself; and therefore was willing to retire into any place abroad, where he might find but a bare subsistence. But when he considered again, that he could have no pretence to any thing till after the creditors were fully satisfied, and how long it was like to be before they could be satisfied, there remaining still due to the creditors of both kinds no less than fourscore thousand pounds, principal-money; he did not believe that his insisting upon the patent would be worth the charge and hazard he must inevitably be put to: and therefore, upon further deliberation with his friends, he willingly referred himself and all his interest to the king's gracious determination, as all the rest of the pretenders and interested persons had done.

The case being thus fully stated to the lords, and every man's interest and pretence clearly appearing before them, they considered seriously amongst themselves what they might reasonably propose to the several persons, in order to their agreement amongst themselves; or, that proving ineffectual, what advice they might reasonably give his majesty. They were unanimously of opinion, "not to advise his majesty to cause the patent to be called in question: for though they doubted not, upon the opinion of his learned council, that the same would be judged void and illegal; yet they did not think it a seasonable time, when the nation was so active and industrious in foreign plantations, that they should see a charter or patent questioned and avoided, after it hath been so many years allowed and countenanced, and under which it had so long flourished, and was almost grown to perfection. And that since his majesty had declared, that, notwithstanding any right of his own, all possible care should be taken for the satisfaction of the creditors, as well as for the preservation and support of the plantation; it would be equally equitable and honourable in his majesty, not to leave the earl of Kinnoul the only person unconsidered, and bereaved of all his pretence. But that they would humbly move his majesty, that he would graciously vouchsafe to assign some present maintenance to the said earl, which his unhappy condition required, out of the revenue that should be there settled, and until the debts should be paid; and that after that time such an augmentation might be made to him, as his majesty in his royal bounty should think fit: in consideration whereof, the earl should procure the patent to be brought in and surrendered;" which he promised should be done accordingly, as soon as the settlement should be made of that proportion which should be assigned to him.

"That the lord Willoughby should enjoy the benefit of his former contract with the earl of Carlisle, and approved by his majesty, during the remainder of those years which are not yet expired; that he should make what haste he could thither, and call an assembly, to the end that such an imposition might be agreed upon to be paid to his majesty as should be reasonable, in consideration of the great benefit they had already and should still enjoy, in being continued and secured in their several plantations, in which as yet they were as it were but tenants at will, having no other pretence of right but the possession: and therefore, that those merchants and planters who had petitioned the king should, according to their obligation and promise made by them to his majesty, use all their credit with those in the island, that the imposition might arise to such a proportion, that the revenue might answer the ends proposed; and that one moiety of that revenue should be enjoyed by the lord Willoughby for his term.

"That the annuity of three hundred pounds by the year should be paid to the earl of Marlborough, according to the original contract mentioned before; and that the assignment, that his majesty would likewise be pleased to make to the earl of Kinnoul, should be first paid: and then that the remainder of that moiety should be received to the use of the creditors. And that when the lord Willoughby's term should be expired, his majesty should be desired, after the reservation of so much as he should think fit for the support of his governor,

"that all the remainder might be continued to wards the creditors, until their just debts should be paid."

These particulars appearing reasonable to the lords, all persons concerned were called, and the same communicated to them, who appeared all well contented: and thereupon the lords resolved to present the same to his majesty, which they did accordingly at the board; and his majesty with a full approbation and advice of the whole council ratified the same. Whereupon that order was made by the king in council, which comprehends all the particulars mentioned before; which was delivered to the lord Willoughby, with his majesty's express command, "that he should see it punctually and precisely executed;" and the like order was delivered by the clerk of the council to every other person mentioned, who desired the same: to which order he did for the more certainty refer himself, being in no degree confident (having then no other help than his memory) that all was set down with that exactness as it ought to be. And, he said, as he had throughout the whole affair taken very great pains to reduce it to that agreement, which at that time seemed to be satisfactory to all the persons concerned, so he had not the least temptation of particular benefit to himself; and he did still believe it to be very just, reasonable, and agreeable to his majesty's justice and goodness, all circumstances being considered. And though it may be, in strictness of law, and by the avoiding the grant made to the earl of Carlisle, his majesty might have possessed himself of the whole island, without any tender consideration of the planters or the creditors; he said, he was not ashamed that he had never given his majesty that or the like counsel, in that or any other matter of the like nature; and if he had, he was confident his majesty would have abhorred it, and not have thought the better of him for giving it.

The other part of that article, "That he had caused such as complained of the arbitrary government in the plantations before the king and council, to be long imprisoned for so doing," did refer, he supposed, to the commitment of one Farmer; who, being sent over a prisoner by the lord Willoughby in a ship that came from thence, made his appearance at Oxford, his majesty being then there in the sickness time, which, he said, was the first moment that he had ever heard of the man or the matter. And at the same time one of the secretaries of state received a letter from the lord Willoughby, which was sent by the same ship, in which his lordship had sent a direct, full charge of mutiny, sedition, and treason against the said Farmer; and by his letter informed the secretary of all his behaviour and carriage, with all the circumstances thereof; and "that he had, by his seditious practices, prevailed so far upon a disaffected party in that island, that the lord Willoughby found himself obliged in the instant to send him on board the ship, without which he did apprehend a general revolt in the island from his majesty's obedience:" and he did therefore desire, "that Farmer might not be suffered to return thither before the island should be reduced to a better temper." The man was called in before the king and council, and the charge that the lord Willoughby had sent read to him, the greatest part whereof he could not deny; and in his discourse upon it he behaved himself so peremptorily and insolently before the king, that his majesty thought it very necessary to commit him; nor did any one counsellor then present appear to think otherwise.

And he did confess, that the discharging him from his imprisonment was some time afterwards moved, and that he was always against his discharge; being of opinion that it would be impossible for the lord Willoughby, or any other governor in any of the plantations, to preserve his majesty's right and to support the government, if he should be so far discountenanced, that a man, being sent over by him as a prisoner under so particular and heinous a charge, should be upon his appearance here set at liberty. But his opinion was, "that he should be sent back a prisoner thither, that he might be tried by the law and justice of the island, and receive condign punishment for his offence:" and, he said, he could not deny but that he was still of the same opinion; and, if it were an error, it proceeded from the weakness of his understanding, which was not in his power to reform.

He said, what he had here set down was all that occurred to his memory with reference to the island of the Barbadoes, which being not particularly mentioned in the article, but comprehended under the general expression of his majesty's foreign plantations, and secretly and maliciously insinuated in private discourses, he took himself to be obliged to give some answer to what, how generally soever, had been charged. And he hoped it would not be imputed as a crime to him, if he had taken more pains than other men in that important service of his majesty concerning his foreign plantations, which he did not think had been enough taken to heart: and if his desire and readiness to take any pains, or give any assistance to the advancement of that service, had induced many persons to apply themselves to him on those occasions, he hoped it should not be charged upon him as over-activity, or ambition to engross more business into his hands than he was entitled to; for which he had this excuse to make for himself, that he found the pains he took to be acceptable to his majesty. And he was so far from having any particular design of advantage to himself, that he did profess and declare, that from all or any of his majesty's plantations he never had the least reward, or least present made to him; except that the now lord Willoughby once told him, "that his brother had sent over some pieces of the speckled wood which grows in Surinam, with direction, that if he liked it, he might have what he would of it;" whereupon he had some pieces of it, which he thought might have been applied to the making of cabinets or the adorning of wainscot, (but as they were very small, so the middle of every piece was wind-shaken and rotten, that they could not be applied to any considerable use;) and except some blocks of walnut-tree which the governor of Virginia sent to him, and of which he made some table boards and frames for chairs; the workmanship whereof cost much more than the wood was worth. And these two particulars contained all the rewards and presents or profit, that ever he received from all his majesty's plantations, or any body to his use.

The tenth article was, "That he did reject and frustrate a proposal and undertaking ap“proved by his majesty, for the preservation of Nevis and St. Christopher’s, and “reducing the French plantations to his “majesty’s obedience, after the commissions “were drawn for that purpose; which was “the occasion of such great losses and damages in those parts.”

To which he answered, that he never did reject or frustrate any such proposal or undertaking, never taking upon him in the least degree to make a judgment of enterprises of that nature; nor was ever any such proposition made to him. But he did very well remember, that his majesty himself did once deliver to the council a paper, which he said one of his servants (Mr. Marsh) had presented to him, containing some propositions for ships and men to be sent by his majesty for the recovery of St. Christopher’s, which had been newly taken by the French. Upon the reading which paper and propositions, the same were referred to the consideration of the general, one of the secretaries of state, and to the vice-chamberlain, who were to confer with Mr. Marsh, and such others as joined with him. And they were at the same time appointed to consider of another proposition delivered in writing by the now lord Willoughby, and some merchants of London who were planters in the Barbadoes, for the supplying and better securing that island, and the rest of those Caribbee islands; and for the reducing and recovering any of them which were or might be taken by the enemy. Upon the latter of which somewhat was afterwards done: and if the other concerning Nevis and St. Christopher’s was rejected, of which, he said, he knew nothing, he presumed it was, because it either appeared unpracticable, or not consistent with his majesty’s other affairs.

The eleventh article was, “That he advised and “effected the sale of Dunkirk to the French “king, being part of his majesty’s dominions, “together with the ammunition, artillery,
 “and all sorts of stores there; and for no “greater value than the said ammunition,
 “artillery, and stores were worth.”

This whole transaction of the sale of Dunkirk, with all the circumstances, is so fully related in this discourse, in the place and at the time when this affair was transacted, that any repetition here is to no purpose: and whosoever turns back and reads it will clearly see, that he had no hand in the counsel; though he is far from condemning it, or believing that it was not necessary, as his majesty’s affairs at that time stood. To which may be added, that the treatment he received after his coming into France was an unquestionable evidence, that that king did never take himself to be beholden to him for that or any other service; as in truth he never was.

The twelfth article was, “That he did unduly “cause his majesty’s letters patents under
 “the great seal of England to one Dr. Crowther to be altered, and the enrolment “thereof to be unduly razed.”

To which he said, that when he heard of this charge, he could not comprehend what the meaning thereof was, being most assured that he had never “caused any alteration to be made in any “of his majesty’s letters patents under the great

“seal, or the enrolment thereof to be razed.” But upon inquiry he was informed, that Dr. Crowther, who was chaplain to his royal highness the duke of York, and had attended upon his person during the whole time that his highness was beyond the seas, upon his majesty’s return into England, had obtained from the king his royal presentation to the parsonage of Treddington in the county of Worcester; which presentation, according to course, passed under the great seal of England. That when he brought his action against the intruder, who refused to give him possession, and the record was carried down to the assizes in the country; when the doctor’s council [were] to open his title, and thereupon to produce the king’s presentation, they found, upon perusal thereof, that either by misinformation or negligence of the clerk, instead of the county of Worcester, where the rectory was, the county of Warwick was inserted: upon which mistake the doctor was necessitated to be nonsuited. And thereupon he forthwith made a journey to London to advise with his council, and the most experienced clerks, how to recover the misfortune that had befallen him, and that his majesty’s right might not be destroyed by such an oversight in the clerk. And it seems he was by them advised, as the usual way in cases of that nature, to petition the king, “that in his majesty’s presence the presentation might be mended, and Worcester inserted instead of Warwick, and that thereupon
 “the great seal might be again affixed to it;” all which was done accordingly, as in such cases is usual.

The thirteenth article was, “That he had in an “arbitrary way examined and drawn into “question divers of his majesty’s subjects “concerning their lands, tenements, goods
 “and chattels, and properties; determined “thereof at the council-table, and stopped “proceedings at law, and threatened some
 “that pleaded the statute of 17 Car.”

To this he said, he must here again lament his own misfortunes, that he was exposed to public reproach under a general odious charge, without inserting any one particular to which he might make his defence. He had therefore no more to say, but that he was very innocent as to any crime laid to his charge in that article: and that he had been so far from “examining and drawing into “question any of his majesty’s subjects concerning their lands, tenements, goods and chattels, “and properties, and determining the same at
 “the council-table, and stopping proceedings at “law;” that he did not know or believe, that any one case of that nature had been ever determined there, at least when he had been present. That he had always discountenanced such addresses, and procured all petitions of that kind to be rejected as often as they have been tendered: and, he said, he took himself obliged to say, for the vindication of his majesty’s honour and justice, that there had not been so many years passed, since the erection of the council-table, with so little disturbance or disquiet to the subjects concerning their lands, tenements, goods, and properties, as hath been since his majesty’s happy return; nor hath the ordinary course of proceedings at law been less obstructed.

The fourteenth article was, "That he had caused quo warrantos to be issued out against most of the corporations in England, to the intent that he might receive great sums of money from them for renewing their charters; which when they complied withal, he caused the said quo warrantos to be discharged, and prosecution thereon to cease."

To this he answered, that he never caused any quo warranto to issue out against any one corporation in England, but by his majesty's express command, or by order of the board; which was always upon some miscarriage or misbehaviour in the corporation: and that he did not remember that he had ever moved the king against any particular corporation, but that of Woodstock; and which his duty to his majesty had obliged him to do, being intrusted by his majesty with the command of his house and park there, and being his majesty's steward of his majesty's honour and manor of Woodstock, upon which that borough had always depended.

He said, his majesty having conferred that charge upon him, he was no sooner possessed of it by the death of the late earl of Lindsey, who enjoyed that place before, than he received a petition from several inhabitants and burgesses of the borough of Woodstock, who complained, "that the mayor and justices had lately procured their charter to be renewed, without the privy or consent of the borough; and that under pretence of renewing it, they had procured many new clauses to be inserted, and thereby reduced much of the government, which before depended on the whole corporation, into their own hands; and had thereby likewise procured a piece of ground, the benefit whereof did formerly belong to all the burgesses, and was usually applied to the relief of such of them who were decayed in their estates, to be now granted to the mayor and a select number of the justices, and the profits thereof to be at their disposal, to the great prejudice of the borough and the inhabitants thereof." He referred this petition to Mr. Justice Morton, who lived within four or five miles thereof, and desired him to examine the truth of those allegations, and to certify him whether the complaints were just and reasonable. Whereupon he took the pains to go to the town, and to confer with the mayor and justices, and heard the allegations of the petitioners; and upon the whole matter certified, "that he found several important alterations in the new charter from what had been in the old, and some new concessions."

And at the same time sir William Fleetwood, who was ranger of the parks, certified him, "that since the renewing their charter, the mayor and justices were not so good neighbours to his majesty's game as they had formerly been, and had withdrawn many of those services which they had used to perform: and that when any trespasses were committed by those of the borough upon his majesty's woods or game, which happened very frequently, and complaint was thereof made to the mayor and justices, who had the sole jurisdiction within the borough; there was so slight and perfunctory

"examination thereof, that the prosecutors were wearied out, and no justice could be obtained."

That it was his duty to inform the king of those proceedings, who was much offended thereat, and thereupon gave his direction to his attorney general to bring a quo warranto, and to repeal the charter which had been so unduly procured, and in which his majesty had been so grossly deceived and abused: and he did believe that there was the less vigour used in the prosecution of that quo warranto because the mayor and justices for some time had pretended that they would surrender the said charter, and receive a new one in such a manner as his majesty thought fit, though they afterwards changed their mind. And this was the only charter, he said, which he gave direction for the prosecution of.

Nor did he ever give order, upon the receipt of any money, to discharge any quo warranto, nor cause the prosecution thereupon to cease: nor did he ever receive the least sum of money for the granting or renewing any charter, other than the usual fees received for the same by the clerk of the hanaper, and accounted to the seal; which fee, as he did remember, did amount to thirteen shillings and fourpence, or thereabouts.

The fifteenth article was, "That he procured the bills of settlement for Ireland, and received great sums of money for the same, in a most corrupt and unlawful manner."

To this article there needs no other answer than what is contained in two several places of this discourse, in which so full a relation is made of the whole settlement of Ireland, with all the circumstances that accompanied it, that it would be to no purpose to repeat it in this place. And therein it appears what money the chancellor received from Ireland, and how he came [to receive] any, and by what injustice he came to receive no more; all which was not only well known to the king himself, but to very many of those, who promoted the accusation directly contrary to what they knew to be true.

The sixteenth article was, "That he had deluded and betrayed his majesty and the nation in all foreign treaties and negotiations relating to the late war."

To which he said, that he did heartily wish that those particular treaties, and the particulars in those treaties, had been mentioned, wherein it was conceived that he had deluded and betrayed his majesty, that he might at large have set down whatsoever he had known or done in those treaties; and then it would easily have been made appear, how far he had been from betraying or deluding him. That it was never any ambition of his own that brought him to have a part in any treaty: he said, God knew, that he heartily wished to have meddled in nothing, but the administration of that great office the king had thought fit to have trusted him with. But his majesty had then so good an opinion of him, that he required and commanded his service in many of those treaties: and therefore it would be necessary for him, according to the method he had hitherto used, to mention every particular treaty that had been entered into since the time of his majesty's return into England, and the part that he had in it; being as willing to be called to the strictest account for any other treaty he had been engaged in when he had been abroad, or for any counsel he had ever given in his life, public or private; wherein, he doubted not, he should be found to have behaved himself (according to the weak abilities God had given him) with fidelity to his master, and with all imaginable affection to his country, how unhappily soever he had been represented.

<sup>a</sup> See above, p. 1025. &c. and p. 1050. &c.

The first treaty, he said, was with the crown of Portugal; in which he was none of the commissioners who treated, and was only present when any report was made by the commissioners to the king, or to the council-board, where all the articles were debated; and he did not remember that there had been any difference of opinion upon any of them: and that treaty had been generally held the best that hath been made with any crown, the merchants having thereby greater advantages in trade than they have in any other place, besides many other great benefits, with a great enlargement of his majesty's empire.

The second treaty was with the States of the United Provinces; in which likewise he was none of the commissioners who treated: but all that was by them transacted was still brought to the council-board, and debated there in his majesty's presence; in which the rule by which his majesty guided himself was, that he would not remit any of those concessions which had been formerly made by them in their last treaty with Cromwell; and their unwillingness to consent to that was the reason that their ambassadors proceeded so slowly. And his majesty had the less reason to be solicitous for expedition, because the king of France had given his royal word, and proposed it himself, "that the two crowns might proceed in the several treaties with the Dutch together, that so they might be brought to those good conditions, that they might live like good neighbours with both the crowns, which," he observed, "they were not naturally inclined to do;" and promised positively, "that for his part he would not conclude any thing with the Dutch, before he had entirely communicated the same to his majesty." Notwithstanding which engagement, France entered into and finished their treaty; and in it made that secret article, which they declared afterwards to be the ground [of] their obligation to assist the Dutch in the ensuing war. However, his majesty proceeded not, till the Holland ambassadors consented to all that had been before granted to Cromwell: which being done, the peace was made and ratified on both sides; and without doubt was with more advantage and honour to the English, than ever had been provided by any former treaty between the crown of England and those States.

From the two crowns of Sweden and Denmark ambassadors extraordinary arrived at London shortly after the king's return, and the several treaties were made with both those crowns before the departure of the ambassadors: in neither of which treaties the chancellor was a commissioner, nor knew any thing that passed in either, but as it was represented at the council-board, and debated in his majesty's presence; nor did he ever hear that either of them was reckoned a disadvantageous treaty, both of them containing as much benefit to the English as any treaties which had been made before with those crowns. He said, it was very true, that there were some unusual expressions of kindness and friendship in the treaty with Denmark; which, in respect of that king's being at that time in a very low condition, under the disadvantageous conditions of the treaty at Copenhagen newly submitted to, and under almost as ill a treaty extorted from that crown by the Dutch, and yet being in terrible apprehension of some new oppression from the one and from the other, the ambassador did very earnestly solicit to have inserted; and which were upon great deliberation allowed and inserted by his majesty's own particular direction, in consideration of the near alliance in blood between his majesty and that king, and the civilities and obligations his majesty had received from Denmark, during his being in Holland after the murder of his father, and during his being in Scotland, when the king of Denmark sent him horses, arms, and ammunition. Of which his majesty had so great a sense, that he was often heard to say, "that if it had pleased God to have brought him home before that disadvantageous peace at Copenhagen had been made," (which had been done by the countenance of the English ships, and the threats of those who were then ambassadors from the governing power in England,) "he would have done the best he could to have defended and protected him:" and therefore he did very readily yield to that article drawn by the ambassador; his majesty declaring at the same time, "that he was very willing that those princes, who were neighbours to Denmark, and from whom that kingdom apprehended new oppressions, should know his majesty's resolutions to support that king, and to defend him from new injuries;" to which the policy of his government, as well as his friendship, inclined and obliged him; though it is very true, the king of Denmark did shortly after make very ill returns to his majesty for that his so signal affection.

These were all the treaties made by the king before the war with the Dutch, (for there was very little progress made either with France or Spain, for the reasons mentioned before,) except only a short treaty with the elector of Brandenburg; which treaty was, for the most part, particular with reference only to the prince of Orange, his majesty's nephew, and for the better ordering his affairs. In which treaty his majesty likewise employed five or six of his council: and the few articles between his majesty and that elector in point of state were likewise transacted by them, and debated and considered at the council-board, and in which all things were inserted for his majesty's benefit and service; and if they had not been afterwards violated by the elector, the king would have reaped much fruit and advantage even from that treaty.

After the war was entered into with Holland, his majesty sent Mr. Coventry to Sweden, and sir Gilbert Talbot to Denmark, to dispose those two crowns to a confidence in each other, and then to dispose them both to adhere to his majesty, or at least not to assist or favour the Dutch. The treaty with Sweden succeeded to his majesty's wish, and was concluded in a league defensive, very much to the king's satisfaction, and with the full approbation of the whole board; that crown having manifested so much affection, and such an inclination to an entire conjunction with him, that upon very reasonable conditions they would have been induced to have entered into a league offensive, and even into the present war against the Dutch : in order to which, they sent their ambassadors to the king at the same time when Mr. Coventry returned, and they became the mediators for the peace ; having first declared to his majesty, " that if the treaty should prove ineffectual, the crown of Sweden would immediately join with his majesty against the Dutch." What became of the other treaty with Denmark is publicly known, his majesty having declared to all the world how perfidiously he was treated by the Dane.

There remains only one other treaty to be mentioned, which is the last with the Dutch, upon which the peace was made : and therefore it will be necessary to set down the inducements to that treaty, the whole progress and conclusion of it ; by all which it will easily appear that his majesty was neither betrayed nor deluded in it, or, if he were, that it was not done by him.

After so many encounters and various successes in the war, which had been carried on with a much greater expense than his majesty at his first entrance into it was persuaded it would cost him ; when he saw the strength and power of the Dutch so much increased by the conjunction of France and Denmark, who supplied them with money, ships, and, what they more wanted, with men as many as they desired ; and that all the propositions he could make to Spain could not induce them to enter into such an alliance with him, as might embark them against France, notwithstanding it was evident to all but themselves, that the French resolved to break the peace with them, having at that time published those declarations which they afterwards made the ground of the war : his majesty clearly discerned, that the Dutch grew less weary of the war than they had before seemed to have been ; and that they would be able, with that assistance and conjunction, to continue the war with less inconvenience than his majesty was like to do.

He had found it necessary for straitening the trade of the enemy, (the depriving them of which could only induce them to desire a peace, and which he could not do by the strength of his own ships, which were still kept together to encounter their fleet,) to grant commissions upon letters of marque to as many private men of war as desired the same, and with such strict orders and limitations as are necessary in those cases ; and he found indeed the advantage very great, in the damage those men of war did to the enemy, which was considerable, and gave them great trouble. On the other side, the common seamen chose much rather to go on board those men of war, where their profit out of their shares of the booty was greater, and their hazards much less, than in the king's ships, where they got only blows without booty, though their pay and provisions were much greater than they had been in any former time : so that when the royal fleet was to be set out, there was greater difficulty in procuring seamen and mariners to man it.

And then, whereas the advancement of trade was made the great end of the war, it was now found necessary to suppress all trade, that there might be mariners enough to furnish the ships for the carrying on the war. And this inconvenience produced another mischief : for by the great diminution and even suppression of trade, there was likewise so great a fall in the customs, excise, and all other branches of the king's revenue, that it was evident enough that his majesty would have little to carry on the war, but what should arise by imposition in parliament upon the people ; who already complained loudly of the decay of their rents, of the small and low prices which their commodities yielded by the cessation of trade, and especially by the carrying all the money in specie from the several counties to London for the carrying on the war. And the parliament itself appeared so weary of it, that, instead of granting a new supply proportionable to the charge, they fell upon expedients to raise money by the sale of part of the king's revenue, which was already too small to support the ordinary and necessary expense of the crown.

But above all, his majesty was most discouraged by the extreme license of the seamen in general ; but especially of those who were called privateers, set out in the particular ships of war upon adventure, who made no distinction between friends and foes ; but, as if the sea had been their own quarters, they seized upon all ships which passed within their view, and either pillaged them entirely, and so dismissed them, (which they usually did to those which they foresaw would be delivered by the course of justice,) or else brought them into the harbours, after they had taken from them what they best liked. And then the formal proceedings in the court of admiralty were so dilatory, and involved in so many appeals, that the prosecution of justice for injuries received grew as grievous as the injury itself ; which drew an universal clamour from all nations, " that without being parties to the war they were all treated as enemies."

France had made the damage they had this way received, and the interruption of their trade, a great part of their quarrel, and one ground of their conjunction with the Dutch. From Spain, which really wished better to us than to our enemies, the complaints were as great ; " that their whole trade was destroyed ; their ships of Flanders, which supplied Spain with what they wanted for themselves, and with what was necessary for their trade and intercourse with the Indies, were all taken as Dutch, because it was very hard to distinguish them by their language : " which was likewise the case of all the Hanse-towns, which made grievous complaints, and had without doubt received great damage. Those princes of Italy whose dominions reached to the sea, as the two republics of Venice and Genoa, and the duke of Florence, expostulated very grievously for their ships taken by those freebooters of Scotland and of Ireland, both which nations enriched themselves very much upon such depredations. And how much soever the royal navy was weakened every day, the number of those men of war wonderfully increased ; so that those kind of ships, of England, Scotland, and Ireland, covered the whole ocean : and of those ships which were taken and carried into Scotland or Ireland, (in England there were many redeliveries,) it was observed, that there were vestigia nulla retrorsum. Even Sweden itself, with whom a new stricter alliance was entered into at that time, with as severe restrictions to that license of the men of war as could be contrived for the liberty and security of the trade of that crown, complained exceedingly of the violation of all those concessions and provisions, and that their ships were every day taken and plundered. And this universal complaint began to awaken all princes to a jealousy, that the English endeavoured to restrain all trade, till they could make themselves the entire masters of it, and by their naval power put some imposition upon the whole traffick of Europe.

It is very true, at the first entrance into the war there had been many unskilful expressions even in the parliament itself, as well as in the frequent discourses of parliament-men, "that by this war, and by suppressing the power of the Dutch at sea," (of which they made not the least doubt,) "the king would be able to give the law to all the trade of the world, and that no ships should pass the sea without paying some tribute to England:" which liberty and rashness of discourse made great impression upon those who wished mischief enough to the Dutch, till they saw what danger might ensue to themselves by the success of the English; and thereupon wished that they might break themselves upon each other, without advantage to either party. And this general distemper and complaint made the deeper impression upon the king, by his discerning an extreme difficulty, if not an impossibility, to give any just remedy to it; and consequently, that he should be shortly looked upon as a common enemy.

He had taken very great pains, upon deliberate consultations, to suppress that odious irregularity and destructive license that was practised amongst the seamen, and had in many particular cases himself examined the excess, and caused exemplary justice to be done upon the offenders, and restitution to be made of what had been taken, at least of what was left; for no justice could preserve the injured persons from being losers. He had granted such rules and privileges and protection to the ports in Flanders, and to others of his allies, as themselves desired, and looked upon as full security; but then he quickly found, that from those very ports and in those very ships which enjoyed those privileges, the trade of the Dutch was driven on: so that it was evident that by that liberty, which other nations thought themselves in justice entitled to, if not restrained, the Hollanders themselves would be easily able to carry on their whole trade in the ships of Flanders, Hamburgh, and the other free towns, or in their own ships owned by the other; and that the restraint would likewise be impossible, without a total suppression of those men of war, and a revocation of all commissions granted to them or any of them, which would likewise be attended with the freedom and security of trade to all his majesty's enemies.

In the last encounter at sea, the Prince Royal, and three other of his majesty's navy, had been lost; and another, the London, had been burned in the river by the negligence of the seamen; for there was never any discovery made, that there was any purpose or malice in it. The French had obliged themselves, that the duke of Beaufort, admiral of France, should, with the whole fleet under his command, amounting to eighteen good ships, join with the Dutch; and the king of Denmark was likewise engaged to send all his great ships, which were ten or a dozen, in order to the like conjunction: so that it was evident to his majesty, that the enemy would be much superior to him in strength and power, though he had been able to have manned and set out all his royal navy; which he well foresaw he should not be able to do, both for want of money and want of seamen, who were already in great disorder and mutiny for want of their pay, of which there was indeed a great arrear due to them. And, which was worse, there was grown such an animosity amongst the principal officers of the fleet between themselves, that the whole discipline was corrupted; so that it was hard to resolve into what hands to put the government thereof, if it could have been made ready.

Upon which, and the whole state of affairs, and upon deliberation and frequent consultation with the principal officers of the sea, and such others whose experience in such matters rendered them most capable to give advice, the king found it most counsellable to resolve to make a defensive war the next year, and to lay up all his great ships, and to have some squadrons of the lighter vessels to continue in several quarters assigned to them, which should be ready to take all advantages which should be offered; and that there should be likewise ready in the river another good squadron of ships against the end of the summer, which being ready to join with those which lay out, when the enemy was weary and their ships foul, would be able to take many notable advantages upon them; of which they who advised it were so confident, that they did believe this defensive way thus ordered and prosecuted would prove a greater damage to the enemy in their trade, and all other respects, than they had ever undergone. And in all this counsel and resolution the chancellor had no other part than being present; and, not understanding the subject-matter of debate, could not be able to answer any of the reasons that had been alleged.

These considerations, upon a full survey of his ill condition at home and abroad, induced the king to wish that there were a good end of the war; of which inclination his majesty vouchsafed to inform the chancellor, well knowing that he would be very glad to contribute all he could to it, as a thing he desired most in this world, and which he thought would prove the greatest benefit to the king and kingdom; and his majesty likewise told him, "that he found all those, who had been most forward and impatient to enter into this war, were now weary of it, and would be glad of a peace:" so that there remained now nothing to do, but for his majesty to advise with those whom he thought fit, (for there seemed many reasons to conceal both the inclination to peace, and the resolution not to set out a summer fleet, from being publicly known,) what method to observe, and what expedients to make use of, for the better procuring this wished-for peace, without appearing to be too solicitous or importunate for it, or so weary of the war as in truth he was. And to this consultation the king was pleased to call together with his royal brother, prince Rupert, the chancellor, the general, the lord treasurer, and those other honourable persons with whom he used to advise in his most secret and most important affairs.

That which occurred first to consider was, whether there were any hope to divide the French from the Dutch; upon which supposition the prospect was not unpleasant, the war with one of them being hopefully enough to be pursued; the conjunction was only formidable. And to this purpose several attempts had been made both in France and in Holland; both sides being equally resolved not to separate from each other, till a joint peace should be made with England, though they both owned a jealousy of each other: those of Holland having a terrible apprehension and foresight of the king of France's designs upon Flanders, which would make his greatness too near a neighbour to their territories; besides that the logic of his demands upon the devolution and nullity of the treaty upon the marriage was equally applicable to their whole interest, as it was to their demands from the king of Spain. And France, upon all the attacks they had made both in France with the Dutch ambassador there, and in Holland by their own ambassador, found clearly, that they were to expect no assistance from the Dutch in their designs, and that at least they wished them ill success, and would probably contribute to it upon the first occasion: and this made them willing to put an end to their so strict alliance, which was already very chargeable to them, and not like to be attended with any notable advantage, except in weakening an ally from whom they might probably receive much more advantage.

However, neither the one nor the other would be induced to enter into any treaty apart, though they both seemed willing and desirous of a peace; in order to which, the Dutch, through the Swedes ambassadors' hands, had writ to the king, "to offer a treaty in any such neutral place as his majesty should make choice of;" professing, "that they should make no scruple of sending their ambassadors directly to his majesty, but that their conjunction with the other two crowns, who required a neutral place, would not admit that condescension." And at the same time they intimated to the Swedes ambassadors, "that the king of France would not send his ambassadors into Flanders, or any place of the king of Spain's dominions;" and therefore wished, "that his majesty would make choice of Dusseldorf, Cologne, Francfort, or Hamburgh, or any other place that his majesty should think more convenient than the other, under that exception:" all which places, and in truth any other out of the king of Spain's dominions, were at such a distance, (the winter being now near over,) that there could be no reasonable expectation of the fruit of the treaty in time to prevent more acts of hostility.

How the treaty came afterwards to be introduced by overtures from France, and what preliminaries were first proposed from thence by the earl of St. Alban's, and how agreed to by his majesty; how the place of the treaty came to be adjusted, the ambassadors chosen, and the whole progress thereupon, and the publication of the articles of the peace; is so particularly set forth in this narrative before, that it needs not to be repeated here. And one of the ambassadors repairing, as is there said, to the king, and giving him an account of all that had passed before any thing was concluded, and every particular having been debated at the council-board and consented to; he said, he could not understand how his majesty could be deluded or betrayed in that treaty, which passed with such a full examination and disquisition, and in all which debates his majesty himself had taken the pains to discourse more, and to enlarge in the answer to all objections which were foreseen, than he had been ever known to have done upon any other article.

It is very true, that the chancellor had been commanded by the king to write most of the letters which had been sent to the earl of St. Alban's, from the time of his going over concerning the treaty, his lordship having likewise directed most of his letters to him; and most of the despatches to the ambassadors were likewise prepared by him, they being by their instructions (without his desire or privy) to transmit all accounts to one of the secretaries or to himself. But, he said, it was as true, that he never received a letter from either of them, but it was read entirely, in his majesty's presence, to those lords of the council who were assigned for that service, where directions were given what answer should be returned, and he never did return any answer to either of them, without having first read it to the council, or having first sent it to one of the secretaries, to be read to his majesty. And he did with a very good conscience protest to all the world, that he never did the least thing, or gave the least advice, relating to the war, or relating to the peace, which he would not have done, if he had been to expire the next minute, and to have given an account thereof to God Almighty.

And as his majesty prudently, piously, and passionately desired to put an end to that war, so no man appeared more delighted with the peace when it was concluded, than his majesty himself did; though, he said, as far as he could make any judgment of public affairs, the publication of that peace was attended with the most universal joy and acclamations of the whole nation, that can be imagined. Nor is it easy to forget the general consternation that the city and people of all conditions were in, when the Dutch came into the river as high as Chatham; and when the distemper in the court itself was so great, that many persons of quality and title, in the galleries and privy lodgings, very indecently every day vented their passions in bitter execrations against those who had first counselled and brought on the war, and wishing that an end were put to it by any peace; some of which persons, within very few days after, as bitterly inveighed against the peace itself, and against the promoters of it. But, he said, he was yet so far from repenting or being ashamed of the part he had in it, that he looked upon it as a great honour, that the last service he performed for his majesty was the sealing the proclamations, and other instructions, for the conclusion and perfection of that peace, the great seal of England being that very day sent for and taken from him.

The seventeenth and last article was, "That he was a principal author of that fatal counsel of dividing the fleet about June 1666."

For answer to this, he set down at large an account of all the agitation that was in council upon that affair, and that the dividing and separation of the fleet at that time was by the election and advice of the two generals, and not by the order or direction of the council: all which hath been at large, in that part of this discourse which relates to the transactions of that time<sup>b</sup>, set down, and therefore needs not to be again inserted.

• See above, pp. 1214, &c. and 1228, &c.

He took notice of the prejudice that might befall him, in the opinion of good men, by his absenting himself, and thereby declining the full examination and trial which the public justice would have allowed him; which obliged him to set down all the particulars which passed from the taking the seal from him, the messages he had received by the bishop of Hereford, and finally the advice and command the bishop of Winchester brought him from the duke of York with the approbation of the king. Upon all which, and the great distemper that appeared in the two houses at that time, and which was pacified upon his withdrawing, he did hope, that all dispassioned men would believe that he had not deserted and betrayed his own innocence; but on the contrary, that he had complied with that obligation and duty which he had always paid to his majesty and to his service, in choosing at that time to sacrifice his own honour to the least intimation of his majesty's pleasure, and when the least inconvenience might have befallen it by his obstinacy, though in his own defence: and concluded, that though his enemies, who had by all the evil arts imaginable contrived his destruction, had yet the power and the credit to infuse into his majesty's ears stories of words spoken and things done by him, of all which he was as innocent as he was at the time of his birth, and other jealousies of a nature so odious, that themselves had not the confidence publicly to own; yet, he said, notwithstanding all those disadvantages for the present, he did not despair, but that his majesty, in his goodness and justice, might in due time discover the foul artifices which had been used to gain credit with him, and would reflect graciously upon some poor services (how overrewarded soever) heretofore performed by him, the memory whereof would prevail with him to think, that the banishing him out of his country, and forcing him to seek his bread in foreign parts at this age, is a very severe judgment. However, he was confident that posterity will clearly discern his innocence and integrity in all those particulars, which have been as untruly as maliciously laid to his charge by men who did nothing before, or have done any thing since, that will make them be thought to be wise or honest men; and will believe his misfortunes to have been much greater than his faults.

As soon as he had digested and transmitted this his answer and vindication to his children, which he did in a short time after his arrival at Montpelier, he appeared to all men who conversed with him to be entirely possessed of so much tranquillity of mind, and so unconcerned in all that had been done to him or said of him, that men believed the temper to be affected with much art, and could not be natural in a man, who was known to have so great an affection for his own country, the air and climate thereof; and to take so much delight and pleasure in his relations, from whom he was now banished, and at such a distance, that he could not wish that they should undergo the inconveniences in many respects which were like to attend their making him many visits. But when there was visibly always in him such a vivacity and cheerfulness as could not be counterfeited, that was not interrupted nor clouded upon such ill news as came every week out of England, of the improvement of the power and insolence of his enemies; all men concluded, that he had somewhat about him above a good constitution, and prosecuted him with all the offices of civility and respect they could manifest towards a stranger.

There were two inconveniences which he foresaw might happen, and could not but discompose the serenity of his mind. The first, and that which gave him least apprehension, though he could not avoid the thinking of it, nor the trouble of those thoughts which could not be separated from it, was, how he should be able to draw as much money out of England as would support his expense; which, though husbanded with as much frugality as could be used with any decency, he foresaw would amount to a greater proportion than he had proposed to himself. His indisposition and infirmity, which either kept him under the actual and sharp visitation of the gout, or, when the vigour of that was abated, in much weakness of his limbs when the pain was gone, were so great, that he could not be without the attendance of four servants about his own person; having, in those seasons when he enjoyed most health and underwent least pain, his knees, legs, and feet so weak, that he could not walk, especially up or down stairs, without the help of two men; and when he was seized upon by the gout, they were not able to perform the office of watching: so that to the English servants which he had brought with him, which with a cook, and a maid to wash his linen, amounted to six or seven, he was compelled to take four or five French servants for the market and other offices of the house; and his lodging cost him above two hundred pistoles. But all the apprehensions of this kind were upon short reflections composed, in the assurance he had of the affection and piety of his children, who he believed out of his and their own state would raise enough for his unavoidable disbursements.

The other apprehension stuck closer to him, and made him even tremble in the very reflection. He could not forget the treatment he had between Calais and Roan, and the strange violent importunity that was used to him to get out of the kingdom, when he had not strength to get out of his bed. And though he was now at ease from such inhuman pressures; yet his enemies, who had even extorted that importunity from a people not inclined to such incivilities, had still the same power, and the same malice, and a froppish kind of insolence, that delighted to deprive him of any thing that pleased him, and manifestly pleased itself in vexing him. And if they should again prevail with the same ministers to remove him from his quiet, and oblige him to new journeys, the same spirit would chase him from place to place; there being none in view like to be superior to their influence, when France had been subdued by it. So that besides the impossibility of preserving the peace and repose of his mind in so grievous a fatigue, and continual torture of his body, he saw no hope of rest but in his grave. And against this kind of tyranny he could by no reasonable discourse with himself provide any security, or stock of courage to support it.

<sup>b</sup> See above, p. 1181, &c.

His friend the abbot Mountague, who was the only advocate he had to that court, used all his powerful rhetoric to allay those fears, and to comfort him against those melancholic apprehensions, by assuring him, "that the ministers were far from such inclinations, and that nothing but reason of state could dispose them to that severity:" yet he prepared him not to think of removing from Montpellier, without first acquainting that court with it. And when afterwards he proposed to him, "that he might have leave to reside in Orleans, or some other city, at such a nearer distance from England, that his children or friends might more easily repair to him;" the court did not like the proposition, but proposed Moulins, whither they would not yet give him a pass, till first their ambassador in England should know that it would not be unacceptable to his majesty: so that he found himself upon the matter not only banished from his country, but confined to Montpellier, without any assurance that he should not be again shortly banished from thence.

However after he had revolved all the expedients that occurred to him for the prevention of such a mischief, he concluded there was no other remedy to be applied to those contingencies, than in acquiescing in the good pleasure of God, and depending upon him to enable him to bear what no discretion or foresight of his own could prevent. And in this composure of mind he betook himself to his books, and to the entertainment and exercise of such thoughts, as were most like to divert him from others which would be more unpleasant.

God blessed him very much in this composure and retreat. And the first consolation he administered to himself was from the reflection upon the wonderful and unusual proceedings and prosecution that had been against him, in another kind of manner, and after another measure, than used to be practised by the most bitter enemies, and than was necessary to their ends and advantages who had contrived them: not to mention the malice and injustice of their first design of removing him from the trust and credit he had with the king, and to alienate his majesty's affection and kindness from him, to which the corrupt hopes and expectation of benefit to themselves might incline them; and then such unrighteous ends cannot naturally be prosecuted but by as unrighteous means. When they were not only privy to but contrivers of his escape, which they looked upon as attended with more benefit to them than his imprisonment or the taking his life could have been; when they were secure of his absence, and of no more being troubled or contradicted by him, by the bill of banishment, by which they broke their faith and promises to the king, and made him depart from his own resolutions: to what purpose was all their other prosecution of him both at home and abroad, more derogatory to the king's honour, and that innate goodness of nature and clemency that all men know he abounds in, than mischievous to him? why must he be absurdly charged with counsels and actions, of which he could never be suspected? and why must his name be struck out of all books of council, and catalogues and lists of servants, that it might not appear that he had ever been a counsellor of state, or a magistrate of justice; a method that was never practised towards the greatest malefactor? to what worthy or necessary end could that exorbitant demand be made and pursued in France, to expose him and the honour of that crown to the general reproach of all men, with such unparalleled circumstances?

These very extraordinary attempts and unheard of devices seemed to all wise men but the last effort of vulgar spirited persons, and the faint grasping of impotent malice; and instead of depressing the spirits of him they hated, raised his confidence, that God would not permit such gross inventions of very ill and shortsighted men to triumph in the ruin of an honest man, whose heart was always fixed upon his protection, and whom he had so often preserved from more powerful stratagems: and he did really believe, that the divine justice would at some time expose the pride and ambition of those men to the infamy they deserved.

To those persons with whom he did with the most freedom communicate, he did often profess, that upon the strictest inquisition he could make into all his actions from the time of the king's return, when his condition was generally thought to have been very prosperous, though at best it was exercised with many thorns which made it uneasy, he could not reflect upon any one thing he had done, (amongst many which he doubted not were justly liable to the reproach of weakness and vanity,) of which he was so much ashamed, as he was of the vast expense he had made in the building of his house; which had more contributed to that gust of envy that had so violently shaken him, than any misdemeanour that he was thought to have been guilty of; and which had infinitely discomposed his whole affairs, and broken his estate. For all which he had no other excuse to make, than that he was necessitated to quit the habitation he was in at Worcester-house, which the owner required, and for which he had always paid five hundred pounds yearly rent, and could not find any convenient house to live in, except he built one himself, (to which he was naturally too much inclined;) and that he had so much encouragement thereunto from the king himself, that his majesty vouchsafed to appoint the place upon which it should stand, and graciously to bestow the inheritance of the land upon him after a short term of years, which he purchased from the present possessor: which approbation and bounty of his majesty was his greatest encouragement. And his own unskilfulness in architecture, and the positive undertaking of a gentleman, (who had skill enough, and a good reward for his skill,) that the expense should not amount to a third part of what in truth it afterwards amounted to, which he could without eminent inconvenience have disbursed, involved [him] in that rash enterprise, that proved so fatal and mischievous to him; not only in the accumulation of envy and prejudice that it brought upon him, but in the entanglement of a great debt, that broke all his measures; and, under the weight of his sudden, unexpected misfortune, made his condition very uneasy, and near insupportable.

And this he took all occasions to confess, and to reproach himself with the folly of it. And yet, when his children and his nearest friends proposed and advised the sale of it in his banishment, for the payment of his debts, and making some provision for two younger children; he remained still so much infatuated with the delight he had enjoyed, that, though he was deprived of it, he hearkened very unwillingly to the advice; and expressly refused to approve it, until such a sum should be offered for it, as held some proportion to the money he had laid out; and could not conceal some confidence he had, that he should live to be restored to it, and to be vindicated from the brand he suffered under, except his particular complete ruin were involved in the general distraction and confusion of his country, of which he had a more sensible and serious apprehension.

He was wont to say, "that of the infinite " blessings which God had vouchsafed to confer " upon him almost from his cradle," amongst which he delighted in the reckoning up many signal instances, "he esteemed himself so happy " in none as in his three acquiescences," which he called "his three vacations and retreats he had " in his life enjoyed from business of trouble and " vexation;" and in every of which God had given him grace and opportunity to make full reflections upon his actions, and his observations upon what he had done himself, and what he had seen others do and suffer; to repair the breaches in his own mind, and to fortify himself with new resolutions against future encounters, in an entire resignation of all his thoughts and purposes into the disposal of God Almighty, and in a firm confidence of his protection and deliverance in all the difficulties he should be obliged to contend with; and towards the obtaining whereof, he renewed those vows and promises of integrity and hearty endeavour to perform his duty, which are the only means to procure the continuance of that protection and deliverance.

The first of these recesses or acquiescences was, his remaining and residing in Jersey, when the prince of Wales, his now majesty, first went into France upon the command of the queen his mother, contrary, as to the time, to the opinion of the council the king his father had directed him to govern himself by, and, as they conceived, contrary to his majesty's own judgment, the knowing whereof they only waited for; and his stay there, during that time that his highness first remained at Paris and St. Germain's, until his expedition afterwards to the fleet and in the Downs. His second was, when he was sent by his majesty as his ambassador, together with the lord Cottington, into Spain; in which two full years were spent before he waited upon the king again. And the third was his last recess, by the disgrace he underwent, and by the act of banishment. In which three acquiescences, he had learned more, knew himself and other men much better, and served God and his country with more devotion, and he hoped more effectually, than in all the other more active part of his life.

He used to say, that he spent too much of his younger years in company and conversation, and too little with books; which was in some degree repaired, by the greatest part of his conversation being with persons of very eminent parts of learning and virtue, and never with men of loose and debauched manners. And he took great pleasure frequently to remember and mention the names of those with whom he kept most company, when he first entered into the world; many whereof lived to be very eminent in church and state: to whose information and example, and to the affection, awe, and reverence, he had to their persons, he did acknowledge to owe all that was commendable [in] him. He did very much affect to be loved and esteemed amongst men of good name and reputation, which made him warily avoid the company of loose and dissolute men, and to preserve himself from any notable scandal of any kind, and to live cautè, if not castè. Nor was the conversation he lived in liable to any other exception, than that it was with men superior to him in their quality and their fortunes, which exposed him to greater expense than his fortune would warrant: and yet it pleased God to preserve him from ever undergoing any reproach or inconvenience.

He accused himself of entering too soon out of a life of ease and pleasure and too much idleness, into a life of too much business, that required more labour and experience and knowledge than he was supplied for; for he put on his gown as soon as he was called to the bar; and, by the countenance of persons in place and authority, as soon engaged himself in the business of the profession as he put on his gown, and to that degree in practice, that gave little time for study, that he had too much neglected before; besides that he still indulged to his beloved conversation. Few years passed before the troubles in Scotland appeared, and the little parliament was convened; which being dissolved and presently a new one called, he was a member in both, and wholly gave himself up to the public affairs agitated there, and where he was enough esteemed and employed, till the spirit reigned there, and drove men of his principles from thence.

He was entirely and without reserve trusted, with two other of his friends, in all the king's affairs which related to the parliament, before the rebellion appeared; which brought him into prejudice and jealousy with many of both houses, who before were very kind to him. And in the beginning of the rebellion he was sworn of the privy-council and made chancellor of the exchequer: and from this time the pains he took, and the great fatigue he underwent, were notorious to all men; insomuch as, the refreshment of dinner excepted, for he never supped, he had very little of the day, and not much of the night, vacant from the most important business.

When the prince was separated from his father, the king commanded him to attend his highness into the west, under more than a common trust: and by the inequality of humours amongst the counsellors, the wants and necessities of the prince's little court and family, the want of wisdom in his governor, that made him want that respect from the prince and all other people that was due to him, the faction amongst all the country gentlemen, and, above all, the ill success in the king's affairs, and the prevalence of the parliament in all places, made the province he had very uncomfortable and uneasy. The unavoidable necessity of transporting the person of the prince out of the kingdom (which was intrusted only to four of the council by the king, and by his command reserved from his governor and another) when there should be apparent danger of his falling into the hands of the rebels, and the as necessary deferring it till that danger was even in view, and the designs of some of the prince's servants with the county to obstruct and prevent it when it was in view; the executing it in a seasonable article of time before or in the moment that it was suspected, and disguising it by a retreat to Scilly, and staying there till they could be provided for a further voyage; and then the prince's remove from thence to Jersey, the contests which happened there between the counsellors upon the queen's commands for his highness's present repair into France, her majesty's declared displeasure, and the personal animosities which grew from thence between the persons in the greatest trust; were all particulars of that weight and distraction, that made great impression upon his mind and faculties, which needed much reflection and contemplation to compose them.

This first retreat gave him opportunity and leisure to call himself to a strict account for whatsoever he had done, upon revolving of all his particular actions, and the behaviour of other men; and to compose those affections and allay those passions, which, in the warmth of perpetual actions and chafed by continual contradictions, had need of rest, and cool and deliberate cogitations. He had now time to mend his understanding, and to correct the defects and infirmities of his nature, by the observation of and reflection upon the grounds and successes of those counsels he had been privy to, upon the several tempers and dispositions of men employed both in the martial and civil affairs of the greatest importance, and upon the experience he had and the observation he had made in the three or four last years, where the part he had acted himself differed so much from all the former transactions and commerce of his life.

He had originally in his nature so great a tenderness and love towards mankind, that he did not only detest all calumniating and detraction towards the lessening the credit or parts or reputation of any man, but did really believe that all men were such as they seemed or appeared to be; that they had the same justice and candour and goodness in their nature, that they professed to have; and thought no men to be wicked and dishonest and corrupt, but those who in their manners and lives gave unquestionable evidence of it; and even amongst those he did think most to err and do amiss, rather out of weakness and ignorance, for want of friends and good counsel, than out of the malice and wickedness of their natures.

But now, upon the observation and experience he had in the parliament, (and he believed he could have made the discovery no where else, without doubt not so soon,) he reformed all those mistakes, and mended that easiness of his understanding. He had seen those there, upon whose ingenuity and probity he would willingly have deposited all his concerns of this world, behave themselves with that signal uningenuity and improbity that must pull up all confidence by the roots; men of the most unsuspected integrity, and of the greatest eminence for their piety and devotion, most industrious to impose upon and to cozen men of weaker parts and understanding, upon the credit of their sincerity, to concur with them in mischievous opinions, which they did not comprehend, and which conduced to dishonest actions they did not intend. He saw the most bloody and inhuman rebellion contrived by them who were generally believed to be the most solicitous and zealous for the peace and prosperity of the kingdom, with such art and subtilty, and so great pretences to religion, that it looked like ill-nature to believe that such sanctified persons could entertain any but holy purposes. In a word, religion was made a cloak to cover the most impious designs; and reputation of honesty, a stratagem to deceive and cheat others who had no mind to be wicked. The court [was] as full of murmuring, ingratitude, and treachery, [and] as willing and ready to rebel against the best and most bountiful master in the world, as the country and the city. A barbarous and bloody fierceness and savageness had extinguished all relations, hardened the hearts and bowels of all men; and an universal malice and animosity had even covered the most innocent and best-natured people and nation upon the earth.

These unavoidable reflections first made him discern how weak and foolish all his former imaginations had been, and how blind a surveyor he had been of the inclinations and affections of the heart of man; and it made him likewise conclude from thence, how uncomfortable and vain the dependence must be upon any thing in this world, where whatsoever is good and desirable suddenly perisheth, and nothing is lasting but the folly and wickedness of the inhabitants thereof. In this first vacation, he had leisure to read many learned and pious books; and here he began to compose his Meditations upon the Psalms, by applying those devotions to the present afflictions and calamities of his king and country. He began now by the especial encouragement of the king, who was then a prisoner in the army, to write The History of the late Rebellion and Civil Wars, and finished the four first books thereof; and made an entry upon some exercises of devotion, which he lived to enlarge afterwards.

When he had enjoyed, in that pleasant island of Jersey, full two years, in as great serenity of mind as the separation from country, wife, and children, can be imagined to admit, he received a command from the queen, then at St. Germain's, and an express order from the king, upon which the other had been sent, his majesty being then prisoner in the Isle of Wight, that he should forthwith attend the person of the prince of Wales, who, upon the revolt of the ships under the command of the parliament in the Downs, and their profession of obedience to the king, was advised to make all possible haste to them; and the chancellor was required to wait upon his highness at Roan upon a day assigned, which was past before the orders came to him.

And [then] without any delay he used all possible diligence to find the prince; who with greater expedition, without coming to Roan, passed to Calais, and from thence to Holland to possess the ships which he found there, and possessed with all that alacrity (which is always very loud) that seamen can express; and by the assistance of the prince of Orange got more victual quickly on board, that he might be in the Downs with the fleet to second some attempt which was already on foot in Kent, and others expected in several parts of the kingdom. And the chancellor having in his way called upon the lord Cottington at Roan, and together with him, and some other persons of honour and quality, made what haste they could to Dieppe, that they might there embark for any place where they should hear the prince to be; and there they were informed, that his highness was at the Brill in Holland. And thereupon they put themselves on board a French man of war, and upon the sea were taken prisoners by Ostenders, who, upon the advantage of being in the ship of an enemy, concluded them to be lawful prize, and treated them accordingly, with all the circumstances of barbarity; and after having plundered them thoroughly of money and jewels of great value, and stripped most of their servants to their shirts, they carried them in great triumph to Ostend; where though their persons were used with civility and respect, and presently set at liberty, yet they were compelled to stay there many days, in hope to obtain the jewels and money of which they had been robbed, and, finding that not to be done, (those privateers being subject to no discipline, nor regarding the orders of the admiralty, or any other governor,) to make such provision as was necessary for a further voyage. And at last they got from Ostend to Flushing, having found means to inform the prince of their misadventures, and of their readiness at Flushing to receive and obey his commands.

The fleet was then in the Downs in so good a posture, by the access of other ships and vessels to it, and by some notable commotions on land, that the prospect was fair and hopeful. And the prince received the advertisement no sooner, than he was pleased to send a frigate to Flushing for those who had been so long expected. But the winds proved then so cross and tempestuous in the gentlest season of the year, that after several attempts at sea, they were so often driven back again into the harbour, sometimes by very dangerous storms, that in the end they received new directions to attend the prince at the Hague, the fleet being at the same time under sail for that coast.

The earl of Lautherdale was at that time come to the fleet as commissioner from the kingdom of Scotland, to inform the prince, that duke Hamilton with a powerful army was already marched into England; and thereupon to invite his highness to make what haste he could, to put himself in the head of that army, according to a promise the king had made in some private treaty with the Scots; and which the queen had sent very positive commands to be observed and obeyed. This was the reason, not without other more reasonable motives, so suddenly to quit the Downs, that he might get more victual for the fleet, and therewith sail to the north, and disembark in such a place as should be nearest to the Scots army, with which he doubted not to find a very considerable conjunction of the English; since he knew that sir Marmaduke Langdale had possessed himself with a body of English officers and gentlemen, of Berwick, and sir Philip Musgrave had done the same with the like assistance, at Carlisle, before the Scots began their march.

The lord Cottington and the chancellor came to the Hague the next day after the prince's arrival, and were very graciously received by his highness, and with a wonderful kindness by all the court, and all the gentlemen who had attended upon him; not so much out of affection to them, as out of detestation of one another, who had kept company for the space of two months last past.

The prince had found the common seamen full of such a keen devotion for his service upon the true principles of the cause, and for the redemption of the king his father out of prison, and so full of indignation against those who had formerly misled them into rebellion, especially the presbyterians; that as they had before the declaration set all those officers on shore by force, who were appointed by the parliament to command them, so now they thought the new ones, which they had chosen for themselves, not fierce and resolute enough for their purposes. The truth is; there had been much unskilful tampering amongst them by emissaries from Paris, and other attempts. And the duke of York, having made his escape very little time before, and being then at the Hague when the fleet came to Helvoetsluye, upon the first notice lost no time in making haste to them. It was generally known, that the king his father had long designed to make him high admiral of England; and the commission which had been formerly granted to the earl of Northumberland they all knew to be repealed and cancelled: so that he no sooner came to the fleet, but he was received with the usual acclamations of joy as their admiral, and he as cheerfully assumed the command. And his small family presently began to propagate their several factions and animosities, with which they abounded, to make such parties amongst the seamen as might advance their several pretences. And in this posture the prince found the fleet when he came to it, and resolved to take the command immediately into his own hand, and that the duke should remain at the Hague with his sister, till that expedition were over; and so he made haste with the fleet into the Downs, hoping that some present occasion would be the best expedient to extinguish that fire, and compose those distempers, which he discerned already to be kindled amongst the seamen.

The advice and instruction which were brought from Paris were grounded upon the treaty with Scotland, the marching of that army, and the expectation of some notable attempt by the presbyterian party in London; in order to which, all address was to be made to that city, and a declaration to be published to gratify that party. This secret was intrusted only to one of the council, and one other who was to be ministerial in whatsoever the other directed. And this temper was quickly discovered when they came into the Downs, by the great [care] that was taken to give no offence or interruption to the trade of the city, which all men believed would be the best means to reduce it. Ships of return, richly laden, were suffered quietly to pass thither; others coming from thence, very well freighted, were likewise quietly permitted to prosecute their voyage: all which was passionately opposed by prince Rupert and all the rest of the council. And this contradiction was quickly known to the lords of the bedchamber, and others, who had no reverence for that council, and were now the more inflamed upon this division of opinion. And the seamen likewise coming to take notice of it, cried out, "the prince was betrayed;" and grew into such rage and fury, that they declared, "that they would throw those overboard who gave the prince such evil counsel." Two or three unsuccessful attempts at land, and then the lord

Lautherdale's coming thither, and the order thereupon for the fleet to sail presently for Holland for the reasons aforesaid, kindled all those sparkles into a bright flame of dissension, so universal, that there were very few who spake with any civility of one another, or without the highest animosity that can be imagined.

This was the distracted condition of affairs when the lord Cottington and the chancellor came to the Hague; the council divided between themselves, and more offended with the court for presumption in making themselves of the council, and opposing whatsoever the other directed, by their private whispering to the prince in reproach of them, and their public murmurings against their persons for the counsel they gave, every man endeavouring to incense others against those who were not affected by him; and this ill humour increased by such an universal poverty, that very few knew where to find a subsistence for three months to come, or how to dispose of themselves. The clamour from the fleet was so high for new victual and for money, that there was apprehension just enough, that they would provide for themselves by returning to their old station; to which they had both opportunity and invitation, by the parliament's having set out another fleet superior in power to them, that were already at anchor in their view, under the command of the earl of Warwick, to block them up in that inconvenient harbour. The sudden news of the total defeat of the Scots army, and shortly after the loss of Colchester, and taking the persons of so many gallant gentlemen, and murdering some of them in cold blood; the daily warm contests in council upon the insolent behaviour and the unreasonable demands of the lord Lautherdale, who as peremptorily insisted upon the prince's going immediately with the fleet into Scotland, as he had done before the total defeat of duke Hamilton, and without expecting to hear what alteration that fatal change had produced in that kingdom, which was very reasonable to apprehend, and in truth had at that time really fallen out: these and many other ill presages made the chancellor quickly find, that in his two years' repose in Jersey he had not fortified himself enough against future assaults, nor laid in ballast to be prepared to ride out the storms and tempests that he was like to be engaged in.

The preservation of the fleet was a consideration that would bear no delay; and was in a short time, though with infinite difficulties and contests full of animosity, resolved to be by committing the charge of it to prince Rupert, who was to carry it into Ireland, where were many good ports in his majesty's obedience. But that was no sooner done, but the horrid murder of the king, and the formed dissolution of the monarchy there, and erecting and establishing the government in that kingdom with a seeming general consent, at least without any visible appearance or possibility of contradiction or opposition; the faint proclamation of the present king in Scotland, under the same conditions which they would have imposed, and with all the circumstances with which they had prosecuted the rebellion against his father; the resolution what was fit for the young king to undertake in his own person, and the dismal prospect, how all the neighbour princes were solicitous not to pay him any such civilities, as might encourage him to expect any thing from them; were all arguments of perplexity and consternation to all men, who had been moderately versed in the transaction of affairs; and were too many things to be looked upon at once, and yet could not be effectually looked upon but together. So that the chancellor used to say, "that all the business he had been conversant in, from the beginning to his coming to the Hague, had not administered half the difficulties and disconsolation, had not half so much disturbed and distracted his understanding, and broken his mind, as the next six months from that time had done." Nor could he see any light before him to present a way to the king, by entering into which he might hopefully avoid the greatest misery that ever prince had been exposed to. His own particular condition (under so general a mortification) afflicted him very little, having long composed himself by a resolution, with God's blessing, to do his duty without hesitation, and to leave all the rest to the disposition of Providence.

When the fleet was committed to the government of prince Rupert to embark for Ireland, it was enough foreseen by those who foresaw what naturally might fall out, that Ireland was probably like to be the place whither it might be the most counsellable for the prince himself to repair. But as it was not then seasonable in many respects to publish such an imagination; so it was not possible to keep the fleet where it then was, or in any port of the dominions of Holland, where the States were already perplexed what answer they should return if the new commonwealth should demand the ships, or whether they were not obliged to deliver them: and therefore no time was to be lost. Nor was the voyage itself like to be secure, but by the benefit of the winter season, and the unquiet seas they were to pass through; which would have made it too dangerous a voyage for the person of the prince, who must find a shorter passage thither, when it should be necessary.

When that inhuman impiety was acted at London, and the young king had in some degree recovered his spirits from the sudden astonishment, and had received the vile proclamation and propositions from Scotland, his majesty with those few who were of nearest trust concluded, "that it would be shortly of necessity to transport himself into Ireland;" which was to be the highest secret, that it might be equally unsuspected in England and in Scotland. "That he should incognito, or with a light train, pass through France to Nantz, or some other port of Bretagne, where two or three ships of war, which he could not doubt of obtaining by the favour of his brother the prince of Orange, might attend him; and from thence he might with least hazard embark for the nearest coast of Ireland, where the marquis of Ormond might meet him."

This being concluded in that manner, the lord Cottington went in a morning to the king before he was dressed; and desired, "that when he was ready, he would give him a private audience in his closet." He there told him, "that his majesty had taken the most prudent resolution that his condition would admit, for Ireland; where there remained yet some foundation for hope. That for himself he was so old and in-

"firm," (for to his seventy-five years, which was then his age, he had frequent and painful visitations of the gout and the stone,) "that his majesty could not expect his personal attendance in so many journeys by land as he must be exposed to: yet having served the crown throughout the reign of his grandfather and his father, he was very desirous to finish his life in his majesty's service."

"That he had reflected upon the woful condition his affairs were in, not more by the power of his rebels, than by being abandoned by all his neighbour princes. That it was too apparent, that neither of them would embark themselves in his quarrel; so that the utmost he could hope from them was, that in some secret manner they might contribute such a supply and relief to him, as might give him a subsistence, till some new accidents and alterations at home or abroad might produce a more seasonable conjuncture. That even in that particular, he doubted the magnanimity or generosity of princes would not be very conspicuous: however it being all his present dependance, he must try all the ways he could to provoke them to that disposition."

"That he knew the crown of Spain was so low at that time, that whatever their inclinations might be, they could neither supply him with ships or men or money towards the raising or supporting of an army: yet that he knew too, that there is such a proportion of honour, and of a generous compassion and bounty, that is inseparable from that crown, and even runs through that people, which other nations are not inspired with. And he was confident, that if his majesty sent an ambassador thither, how necessitous soever that court might be, it would never refuse to make such an assignment of money to him as might, well husbanded, provide a decent support for him in Ireland; where likewise the king of Spain had power to do his majesty more offices than any other prince could do, or he any where else, by the universal influence he had upon the Irish nation. And general Owen O'Neill, who was the only man that then obstructed the union of that people in a submission to the king, had been bred up in the court of Spain, and had spent all his time in the service of that crown, and had still his sole dependance upon it; and therefore it was to be presumed, that he might be induced by direction from Madrid, to conform himself to a conjunction with the marquis of Ormond, the king's lieutenant there." He said, "that his majesty knew well that he had spent a great part of his life in that court, in the service of his grandfather and father; and he would be willing to end his days there, if it were thought of use to his affairs."

The discourse was too reasonable not to make impression upon the king; which discovering in his countenance, the other desired him, "that he would think that day upon all that he had said, without communicating it to any body, till the next morning, when he would again wait on him, to know his opinion upon the whole; for if his majesty should approve of what he proposed, he had another particular to offer, before the matter should be publicly debated." When he came the next morning, and found the king much pleased with what he had before discoursed, and asked what the other particular was that he intended to offer; the lord Cottington told him, "that he was very glad his majesty was so well pleased with what he had proposed, which he confessed the more he had revolved himself, the more hopeful the success appeared to him; which made him the more solicitous, that through any inadvertency such a design might not miscarry."

He put him then in mind again "of his great age, how unlike it was that he should be able to hold out such a journey, or, if he did, the fatigue thereof would probably cast him into a fit of the gout or the stone, or both, which if he should outlive, he should be long detained from the prosecution of his business, which the less vigorously pursued would be more ineffectual;" and therefore proposed, "that he might have a companion with him, of more youth and a stronger constitution, who would receive some benefit by the information and advice he should be able to give him, the advantage whereof would redound for the present, and might more in the future, to the king's service;" and in fine proposed, "that the chancellor of the exchequer might be joined in the commission with him, and accompany him into Spain, from whence if they made haste in their journey, they might make such a progress in that court, that he might be able to attend his majesty in Ireland in a very short time after his arrival there; whilst himself remained still at Madrid, to prosecute all further opportunities to advance his service."

The king was surprised with the overture; and asked "whether the chancellor would be willing to undertake the employment, and whether he had spoken with him of it." To which the other presently replied, "that he knew not, nor had ever spoke to him of it, nor would do, till his majesty, if he liked it, should first prepare him; for he knew well he would at first be startled at it, and it may be might take it unkindly. That he knew well how much of the weight or his business lay upon the chancellor's shoulders, and in that respect that many others would not be willing he should be absent: yet that there was a long vacation in view, and there could be little to be done till the king should come into Ireland; and by that time he might be with him again, with such a return from Spain as might be welcome and convenient to him. And therefore if his majesty would first break the matter to him, he would then take the work upon him; and he believed he should give him such reasons, since he could not suspect his friendship," (which was very notorious, and they lived then together,) "as would dispose him to the journey."

When the king spake to him of it, as a thing that had resulted from his own thoughts; "that he had more hope to obtain some supply from Spain, than from any other place; that no man could be so fit to solicit it as the lord Cottington, and nobody so fit to accompany him as he, who might be with him in Ireland in a short time;" he said, "he had spoken with lord Cottington to undertake the employment, to which he was not averse; but he had expressly refused to undertake it alone, and he knew that

"no companion would be so acceptable to him as he would be."

The chancellor did not at first dissemble the apprehension, that this device had been contrived at Paris, where he knew that neither of them were acceptable, nor were wished to be about the king, or to have so much credit with him as they were both thought to have: but the king quickly expelled that jealousy. And he desired a short time to consider of it; and received such reasons (besides kindness in the invitation) from the lord Cottington, that he did not submit only to the king's pleasure, but very willingly undertook the employment: and, though it was afterwards delayed by the importunity of many, and the queen's own advice, who thought the chancellor's attendance about the person of the king her son to be more useful to his service, than it was like to be in the other climate, the king was firm to his purpose; and despatched them shortly after his coming into France, when he resolved and prepared for his own expedition into Ireland, in order to which there were then some Dutch ships of war that waited for him at St. Malo's.

This was the occasion and ground of his second retreat and recess from a very uneasy condition, of which he was not more weary in respect of the difficulty and melancholy of the business, from which he could not entirely disentangle himself by absence, than in respect of the company he was to keep in the conducting it, who had humours and inclinations uneasy to him, irresolute in themselves, and contrary for the most part to his judgment. And he did still acknowledge, that he did receive much refreshment and benefit by that negotiation. For though the employment proved ineffectual to the purposes for which it was intended, by the king's finding it necessary to divert his intended journey for Ireland, into that of Scotland; yet he had vacancy to recollect and compose his broken thoughts; and mended his understanding, in the observation and experience of another kind of negotiation than he had formerly been acquainted with, under the assistance, advice, and friendship of the most able person, and the best acquainted with foreign negotiations and the general interests of the several kings and states in Christendom, of any statesman then alive in Europe, and who delighted in giving him all the information he could. He was conversant in a court of another nature and humour, of another kind of grandeur and gravity, of another constitution and policy; and where ambassadors are more esteemed and regarded, and live with more conversation and a better intelligence amongst themselves, than in any other court in the world.

The less of business he had, he was the more vacant to study the language and the manners and the government of that nation. He made a collection of and read many of the best books which are extant in that language, especially in the histories of their civil and ecclesiastical state. Upon the reading the Pontifical History written by Illescas in two volumes, and continued by one or two others in three other volumes, he begun there first his Animadversions upon the Superiority and Supremacy of the Pope, which he afterwards continued to a perfect work. Here he resumed the continuation of his Devotions on the Psalms, and other discourses of piety and devotion, which he reviewed and enlarged in his later times of leisure. Though he underwent in this employment many mortifications of several kinds, yet he still acknowledged that he learned much during the time of his being in Spain, from whence he returned a little before the battle of Worcester; and after the king's miraculous escape into France, he quickly waited upon his majesty, and was never separated from his person, till sixteen or seventeen years after by his banishment.

This he called his third and most blessed recess, in which God vouchsafed to exercise many of his mercies towards him. And though he entered into it with many very disconsolate circumstances; yet in a short time, upon the recovery of a better state of health, and being remitted into a posture of ease and quietness, and secure from the power of his enemies, he recovered likewise a marvellous tranquillity and serenity of mind, by making a strict review and recollection into all the actions, all the faults and follies, committed by himself and others in his last continued fatigue of seventeen or eighteen years; in which he had received very many signal instances of God's favour, and in which he had so behaved himself, that he had the good opinion and friendship of those of the best fame, reputation, and interest, and was generally believed to have deserved very well of the king and kingdom.

In all this retirement he was very seldom vacant, and then only when he was under some sharp visitation of the gout, from reading excellent books, or writing some animadversions and exertations of his own, as appears by the papers and notes which he left. He learned the Italian and French languages, in which he read many of the choicest books. Now he finished the work which his heart was most set upon, the History of the late Civil Wars and Transactions to the Time of the King's Return in the Year 1660; of which he gave the king advertisement. He finished his Reflections and Devotions upon the Psalms of David, which he dedicated to his children; which was ended at Montpelier before the death of the duchess. He wrote and finished his Answer to Mr. Hobbes's Leviathan, to which he prefixed an epistle dedicatory to the king, if his majesty would permit it. He wrote a good volume of Essays, Divine, Moral, and Political, to which he was always adding. He prepared a Discourse Historical of the Pretence and Practice of the successive Popes from the Beginning of that Jurisdiction they assume; in which he thought he had fully vindicated the power and authority of kings from that odious usurpation. He entered upon the forming a method for the better disposing the History of England, that it may be more profitably and exactly communicated than it hath yet been. He left so many papers of several kinds, and cut out so many pieces of work, that a man may conclude, that he never intended to be idle.

In a word, he did not only by all possible administrations subdue his affections and passions, to make his mind conformable to his present fortune; but did all he could to lay in a stock of patience and provision, that might support him in any future exigent or calamity that might befall him: yet with a cheerful expectation, that God would deliver him from that powerful combination which then oppressed him.

INDEXES.

I.

INDEX TO THE HISTORY OF THE REBELLION.

- ABBOT, George, archbishop of Canterbury, unfavourable character of, 36. reason of his promotion, ib. Calvinistic, ib. his remissness, 38.
- Aberdeen, flourishing state of its university, 33.
- Abingdon, quitted by the king's forces, 483. possessed by the earl of Essex, 484.
- Ablin, Jacob, 460.
- Aboyne, (see Auboyna.)
- Ackland, sir John, 402.
- Acts, passed since the beginning of the parliament, 1640, 113. act of pacification between England and Scotland, 111. for triennial parliaments, 113. for taking away the high commission court, ib. for taking away the star-chamber court, ib. for the certainty of meets, bounds, and limits of forests, 114. limiting the office of clerk of the market of his majesty's house, ib. for preventing vexatious proceedings touching the order of knighthood, ib. for the free making saltpetre and gunpowder within the kingdom, ib. against divers encroachments and oppressions in the stannery courts, ib. against ship-money, 115. (see Bill.)
- Action, (see Battle.)
- Address of the lords justices and the council in Ireland to the king, 1643, 457. of the anabaptists to Charles II. in exile, 852.
- Agitators, as well as a council of officers, appointed by the army, 610. for what purposes, ib.
- Aken, or Aquisgrane, here the king of the Romans ought to receive his first iron crown, 817. famous for its hot baths, which are resorted to after the cold waters of the Spa, ib.
- Alberquerque, duke of, 750.
- Albert, archduke, 20, 501.
- Alexander VII. (see Pope.)
- Algiers, Charles I.'s notice of an act concerning the captives of, 202. forced to a peace by admiral Blake, 834.
- Allen, captain, 735.
- Alonzo, don, (see Cardinas.)
- Alresford, battle at, 479.
- Alton, skirmish at, 478.
- Amirant, M., 779.
- Anabaptists' address to Charles II. in exile, 852. their propositions annexed to it, 856. the letter of one individual sent to the king with the address, ib.
- Andrews, Lancelot, bishop of Winchester, 36.
- Andrews, Thomas, sheriff of London, 321.
- Anne of Austria, (see queen of France.)
- Annesly, —, 88.
- Annedly, —, president of the council of state, 891.
- Antrim, Randal Macdonnell, second earl of, married the dowager of the great duke of Buckingham, 533. his character, ib. joined the Irish rebels, ib. his part afterwards in the earl of Mountrose's expedition into Scotland in favour of the king, 533, &c. made a marquis, 537. his ambition of being made lord lieutenant of Ireland through the queen's favour, 632.
- Appleyard, sir Matthew, 552.
- Apprentices, a petition published in their name against papists and prelates, 134. invited by the parliament to take arms, 314. a tumultuous petition of them and others to both houses concerning the militia, 617. they rise, but are suppressed by Hewson, 884.
- Apsley, sir Allen, 554.
- Aquisgrane, (see Aken.)
- Archduke of Austria, (Leopold William,) 718, 720, 815, 834, 859. removed from the government of Flanders, and succeeded by don Juan of Austria, 834, 835. treats with Charles II. near Brussels, 835.
- Arcois, duke of, 733.
- Ardglass, earl of, (see lord Cromwell.)
- Argyle, Archibald Campbell, seventh earl of, being a Roman catholic, is compelled by the king to give up his estates to his son, 52. retires beyond sea, ib. told the king he would live to repent of thus raising his son, ib.
- Argyle, Archibald Campbell, eighth earl of, 316, 633, 651, 652, 661, 662, 663, 738, 740, 741, 743, 750, 751, 761, 780. sides with the Scotch covenanters notwithstanding his obligations to the king, 51. his father's prophetic declaration of his future conduct, 52. transactions in Scotland respecting him, Mountrose, and Hamilton, 119. made a marquis, 119, 124. head of the violent party, 473. hated by the earl of Mountrose, 533. his principles, with respect to the church and state, 541. inveterate against the king, ib. a fast friend of sir H. Vane's, ib. his conduct with regard to the Scotch parliament of 1648, 642, 643. supposed to have invited Cromwell into Scotland, 662. was the creature of Cromwell, 678. his part in the public affairs of 1649, 705—707. clogs the act of proclaiming Charles II. with a clause for the covenant, 707. his object in so doing, 708, 710. his reasons for inviting the king into Scotland, 757. surprised at the king's intention of accepting the proposal, he sends fresh conditions, which miss the king, 746. receives him respectfully, ib. his behaviour to him, 747. his power on the decline, 758. the king escapes from him, 759. he treats him better after his return, ib. made to believe that the king would marry one of his daughters, ib. dissuades the king's marching into England, 760.
- Argyle, ninth earl of, (see lord Lorne.)
- Armagh, James Usher, archbishop of, 438.
- Arminian points, contentions concerning, 37.
- Arminius, Jacobus, 37.
- Armorer, sir Nicholas, 826.
- Armorer, sir William, 710, 765, 897.
- Army, the king raises an army against the Scots, 46. discovery of some correspondences between the court and some principal officers of the English army, 97. the petition intended to be subscribed by the officers, 98. the true matter of fact concerning that petition, 99. the ill use made of it in the house of commons, 100. the mention of the former plot between the court and the army revived in the house of commons, 106. the armies disbanded, 118. differences between the parliament and army, through Cromwell's instigation, 609. divers sects increase in the army, 610. Cromwell is declared head of the army, 610. the army erects a kind of parliament within itself, ib. agitators, as well as a council of officers, appointed by the army, ib. their first resolutions, ib. the parliament's declaration thereupon, 611. afterwards raised out of their journal book, ib. a committee of the parliament appointed to treat with a committee of the army, ib. Cromwell's behaviour at first in these mutinies, ib. the army seize upon the king, 612. the general's account of it to parliament, ib. distractions at Westminster upon notice of the army's coming towards London, ib. different designs of the parliament and army relating to the king, 615. the army wholly disposed to Cromwell's designs, 616. impeached eleven members of the house of commons, ib. the two speakers of parliament, with other members, join the army on Hounslow Heath, 618. the city sends six aldermen to the general, and submits, 619. the general conducts the two speakers and other members to their several houses of parliament, ib. the army quarters upon the city, 620. begins to be less regardful of the king, 622, 623. levellers grow up in the army, 623, 628. the large remonstrance of the army to the parliament, brought to the house by six officers, 688. another declaration of the army to them, 689. their general marches for London, ib. Cromwell and his council of officers dissolve the parliament, 792. a new one chosen by them, 794. a new council of officers, who consult about the government, 865. their address to the protector, Richard Cromwell, ib. who at their instigation dissolves the parliament, 866. the long parliament restored by them, ib. which appoints all military commissions to be signed by their speaker, 868. the petitions and proposals of Lambert's army, 879. the council of officers prepare a petition and representation to parliament, ib. the parliament make void all money acts, that there may be nothing to maintain the army, ib. cashier Lambert and eight other chief officers, ib. appoint seven commissioners to govern the army, ib. Lambert prevents the parliament from sitting, 880. the officers appoint certain general officers, ib. a committee of safety constituted by the army, ib. Cobbet sent to persuade Monk to concur with the army, 881. another sent to the army in Ireland to dispose it to submit to their power, ib. Monk declares for the parliament, ib. Lambert sent against him, ib. several troops declare for the parliament, 834. the parliament meet again, ib. and order Lambert's troops to their several quarters, ib. his army separates accordingly, 835. Charles II.'s letter to general Monk and the army, 898. their dutiful reception of it, 904. Armin, sir William, one of the committee appointed by the parliament to attend Charles I. into Scotland, 112. one of those chosen by parliament to treat with him at Oxford, 356. his arrival there, 366. one of the commissioners sent by parliament into Scotland for relief, 410. Array, commissions of, attempted to be revived by Charles I, 267. Articles of treason against lord Kimbolton and five other members of the house of commons, 143. of neutrality agreed in Yorkshire between both parties, 345. but disowned by the parliament, ib. Arundel, Thomas Howard, earl of, 49, 194, 373. his character, 23. affects a literary reputation, ib. married one of the heiresses of the earl of Shrewsbury, ib. purchased a collection of statues, &c. ib. chosen general of the army against the Scotch covenanters, 46. how he received their letter to him, 48. not employed in the second expedition, 57. made president of the court in the earl of Strafford's trial, being notoriously disaffected towards him, 87. his public employments, 23, 53. died in Italy, 23. his religion doubtful, ib. Arundel, earl of, (see lord Mowbray.) Arundel, (Alethea Talbot,) countess of, 23. Arundel of Wardour, Thomas, lord, wounded at Lansdown, 404. Arundel, John, 342, 372, 609, 869. Arundel, colonel Richard, afterwards lord Arundel of Trerice, 573, 609, 829. Arundels, the, 609. Arundel castle, surrendered to lord Hopton, 478. retaken by sir W. Waller, 479. Ascham, —, sent agent into Spain by the parliament, 747. killed by some officers at Madrid, 748. what was done in consequence, ib. Ashburnham, colonel, 291, 342, 343, 556. notice of him respecting the supposed conspiracy between the army and court, 107, 116, 283, 285. made governor of Weymouth, 487. deserted it upon the approach of the earl of Essex, 488. Ashburnham, John, 301, 589, 599, 604, 620. one of the commissioners of Charles I. to treat at Uxbridge, 520. entirely trusted by him, 599, 625. attended the king when he put himself under the protection of the Scotch army, 601. being forbidden to attend the king, he went to Paris, 598, 602. his return, 614. his and sir J. Berkley's transactions with some officers in the army, ib. 622, 623. how far concerned in committing Charles I. into the hands of colonel Hammond, 624, 627. by whom he had been influenced in all these transactions, 626. his apology for his conduct has been published, ib. he and sir J. Berkley became enemies in consequence of this business, 626. acquitted both by Charles I. and Charles II. of any treasonable intentions in the matter, ib.

Ashburton, lord Wentworth's horse beaten at, 576.

Ashley, colonel Bernard, 408, 411. (sir Bernard Astley) 508.

Ashley, or Astley, sir Jacob, (afterwards lord,) 115, 118, 185, 220, 225, 289, 305, 447, 477, 485, 509, 588. made major-general of the king's army at the opening of the civil war, 270. wounded at Edge-hill, 311. takes possession of Reading, 429. much consulted by the king on military affairs, 482. his character, ib. lately made a baron, 553. his part in the battle of Naseby, ib. the command of the posse comitatus of the Welsh counties given to him, 564.

Ashton, colonel, condemned and executed during the protectorship, 852.

Assembly of confederate catholics, (see Ireland.)

Assembly of divines, 1642, (see Church of England.)

Assembly of the kirk of Scotland, (see Scotland.)

Assizes, (see Gaol-delivery.)

Association of several counties formed under the earl of Manchester, 480. association in the west, of which the prince of Wales is made governor, 531.

Astley, (see Ashley.)

Aston, lord, his death, 50.

Aston, sir Arthur, 381, 386. made colonel-general of the king's dragoons, 306. a papist, ib. 351. his part in the battle of Edge-hill, 307, 308. made commissary-general of the horse, 322. garrisoned Reading, ib. besieged and wounded, 382. much esteemed where he was not known, and much disliked where he was, 500. given up to an immoderate love of money, ib. made governor of Oxford through the queen's influence, ib. his hatred of colonel Gage, 501. whom he tries to prevent being made his successor at Oxford, 511. he being pensioned and removed from the government in consequence of the loss of his leg, ib. garrisons Tredagh, 724.

Atkins, sergeant, 338.

Attorney-general usually advanced to be keeper of the great seal, 19. not usual for him to be a member of parliament, 84.

Aubigny, George Stewart, lord, fell at Edge-hill, 310, 390. a suspicion that he was killed by one of his own officers, 311. notice of him, ib.

Aubigny, (Catharine Howard,) lady, how far concerned in the design of Mr. Waller and Mr. Tomkins, 391, 392. imprisoned by the parliament in consequence, 391, 693. and would have been put to death, had she not made her escape, ib. to the Hague, 710. where she died, 711. her character, and share in the king's affairs, 710.

Aviliana, princess of, married the duke of Medina de los Torres, 733.

Aulger, —, an agent of the parliament in France, 326.

Aumigui, John, one of the anabaptists who signed an address to Charles II., 855.

Austria, archduke of, (see Archduke.)

Ayscue, sir George, takes or sinks thirty sail of the Dutch merchants, 786. fights the Dutch fleet near Plymouth, ib.

B.

Bacon, justice, 338, 453.

Baggot, colonel, made governor of Litchfield by prince Rupert, 384. of a good family in that county, ib.

Baily, —, 890.

Bainton, sir Edward, 330.

Baker, colonel, taken prisoner at Cropredy-bridge, 489.

Balcarris, (Balcarras,) Alexander Lindsay, lord, afterwards earl of, a petition intended of the Scotch presbyterians by him and Frazier, that the chancellor of the exchequer might be removed, 805. urges Charles II. to go to Scotland, 817.

Balfour, sir William, dismissed by Charles I. from being lieutenant of the Tower, 133. how the house of commons took his dismissal, ib. observations on his discharge, 142. the command of the parliament horse chiefly depended upon him at the battle of Edge-hill, 307, 311. reminded by the earl of Lindsey of his obligations to the king, 310. ordered to observe sir W. Waller's commands, 478. present with him at the battle of Alresford, 479. escapes with the earl of Essex's horse through the king's army in Cornwall, 499, 503.

Ball, sir Peter, one of the commissioners of the four associated counties who were summoned to Bridgewater by the prince of Wales, 546. invites the commissioners to propose to the prince to make lord Goring his lieutenant-general, 547.

Balthazar, colonel, 836.

Bamfield, or Bamford, colonel, notice of, 479. his endeavours to become governor of Arundel castle, ib. aids the escape of the duke of York beyond sea, 645. made groom of his bedchamber in consequence, ib. indignant at sir J. Berkley being made the duke's governor, ib. how far concerned in the factions in the prince's fleet at Holland, 648, 670. dismissed from his attendance on the duke, for infusing into him a desire to command the fleet, 674.

Bamford, (see Bamfield.)

Banbury castle surrendered to Charles I., 312. relieved by the earl of Northampton, 507.

Bancroft, Richard, archbishop of Canterbury, eulogium of, 36.

Banks, sir John, 338, 371. attorney-general, promoted to the common pleas, 84. an idea of making him lord keeper of the great seal, 239. notice of his character, ib. signed the declaration of the king's lords and counsellors disavowing any intentions of war, 263. his house, Corfe castle, defended by his lady with some few gentry, 424.

Barbadoes delivered up to the parliament forces, 788. vast fortunes made there, ib.

Barclay, —, one of the parliament commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520.

Bard, sir Henry, governor of Cambridgen house, 551. notice of his licentious acts, ib.

Barebone, Praise-God, a leather-seller, an eminent speaker in the parliament, which was afterwards named after him, 794. presents a petition to parliament from the fanatics to join others with Monk in the command of the army, 887.

Barnstable yielded to colonel Digby, 425. transactions there, especially complaints against sir R. Greenville, 557.

Basing-house, the seat of the marquis of Winchester, relieved by colonel Gage, 501. again besieged and abandoned, 511. taken by Cromwell, 588.

Basset, sir Arthur, 587.

Basset, sir Thomas, major-general of the Cornish, 397, 408.

Bastwick, John, M.D. an opponent of episcopacy, his character, 80. punished for libelling, ib. how received on his return from exile, 80, 81.

Bastwick, Dr., 279.

Bath taken possession of by the king's Cornish forces, 407.

Bath, Henry Bourchier, fifth earl of, 96. one of the lords that signed a declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. sent with the marquis of Hertford into Devonshire, from his supposed power there, 273. taken prisoner, 297. his intentions towards Charles I., ib.

Bath and Wells, William Pierce, bishop of, complaints against, for exorbitant acts, 82. signed the bishops' petition on their constrained absence from the house of lords, 141.

Batten, captain William, made vice-admiral, 193. hostile to Charles I., 193, 271, 272. his part in preventing the fleet from declaring for the king, 271. dissatisfied at the parliament appointing Rainborough to be admiral of a fleet, 646. joins the prince of Wales, is knighted, and made rear-admiral, 649. his appointment not liked by the sailors, ib. 674. retires with the leave of Charles II., 674.

Battle of Keinton, or Edge-hill, 307. at Bradock-down, 343. on Hop-ton-heath, 349. at Charlgrave, 396. near Stratton, 398. at Lansdown, 403. of Roundway-down, 406. at Torrington, 425. at Newbury, 429. at Alresford, 479. at Cropredy-bridge, 489. at Marston-moor, 491. second battle at Newbury, 508. of Naseby, 553. near Lampert, 559. at Ashburton, 576. at Chester, ib. near Preston, 658. at Dunbar, 751. at Worcester, 764. of Dunkirk, 859.

Bavaria, Wolfgang William, duke of, 9, 14.

Baynton, —, 188.

Beauchamp, Henry Seymour, lord, 496.

Beaufort, duke de, 782.

Beaumonts, —, 4.

Beckly, colonel, 395.

Beckwith, —, 218.

Bedford taken by prince Rupert, 447.

Bedford, Edward Russell, third earl of, 311. Oliver St. John made a peer through his means, ib.

Bedford, Francis Russell, fourth earl of, 99, 105, 136. one of the king's commissioners to treat with the Scots at Rippon, 63. much courted by them, ib. his object in countenancing the puritans, 73. Pym wholly devoted to him, 74. St. John of an intimate trust with him, to whom he was in some sort allied, 75. sworn a privy-counsellor, 78. was to be treasurer, 84. gets St. John made solicitor-general, ib. not hostile to the church government, yet did not discountenance the nonconforming clergy, 93. laboured to save lord Strafford's life, 96. his conversation with Mr. Hyde concerning the king's feeling and wishes with respect to him, ib. desirous of healing the breaches between the king and people, 99. secretly undertook to save lord Strafford's life, but died too soon, 102. afflicted at the intemperance of his party, ib.

Bedford, William Russell, fifth earl of, (afterwards duke of,) 340, 422, 436. sent by the parliament, as their general of the horse, against the marquis of Hertford in Somersetshire, 291. challenged by him to fight a duel, 296. drives him from thence, ib. his part at

- the battle of Edge-hill, 307. goes over to Charles I., 419. debate in the council at Oxford how he should be received, 420, 421. his reception, 420, 423. present with the king at the battle of Newbury, 435. makes his peace with the parliament again, 437, 451. his estates in Devonshire granted to sir R. Greenvil by the king, 560.
- Bedford yielded to colonel Digby, 425.
- Bedingfield, sir Thomas, committed to the Tower, 194.
- Bellasis, — 219.
- Bellasis, Harry, M.P. for Yorkshire, signs the articles of neutrality agreed on in that county, 345.
- Bellasis, John, (afterwards lord,) sent into Yorkshire, 345. present at the siege of Bristol, 408. where he was wounded, 410. the command of York, and the forces for the guard of the county, intrusted to him, 472. being a person of great interest in the county, and of exemplary industry and courage, ib. defeated and taken by sir T. Fairfax at Selby, ib. appointed governor of Newark, 579, 580. ordered by the king to surrender it, 602.
- Bellievre, monsieur, fixed upon by queen Henrietta and cardinal Mazzarini as ambassador into England, 598. his instructions, 604. his negotiations at London, and afterwards at Newcastle, with Charles I., 605.
- Bellingham, — killed at the battle of Edge-hill, 312.
- Bellingham, sir Henry, 662.
- Bennet, — secretary to sir J. Berkeley, 756.
- Bennet, colonel, 425.
- Bennet, sir Henry, sent envoy to Madrid, 847. what he did there, 874, 876, 877, 896.
- Bennet, sir Humphrey, distinguished himself at the second battle of Newbury, 509.
- Berkley, sir Charles, 546.
- Berkley, of Berkley-castle, George, twelfth lord, one of the committee sent by parliament to Charles II. at the Hague, 908.
- Berkley, sir Robert, justice, 441. committed to the Tower, ib. fined, ib.
- Berkley, sir John, 448, 549, 561, 565, 569, 626, 756. sets out for Holland, being obnoxious to the parliament, 283. returns, ib. sent into the west, 273, 287. joins the marquis of Hertford at Sherborne, 291. sent by him into Cornwall, 297. joined in the command of the western parts, 342. advances with others to Tavistock, 343. whereupon the earl of Stamford retires, ib. overruns Devon, ib. his part in the battle of Stratton, 397. present at the dislodgement of the enemy from Mendip-hill, 401. sent back into Devonshire, 402. besieges Exeter, 414, 424. sends colonel Digby into Cornwall, 425, 477. appointed to blockade Lyme, 506. ordered to take the command of sir R. Greenvil's forces, 549. wherewith he takes Wellington-house, ib. besieges Taunton, 546. sir R. Greenvil hostile to him, 545, 548. how he had been benefited by him, 560. cause of their animosities, 548, 561. ordered to intend the work before Plymouth, 554, 559, 560. sent by the prince of Wales to confer with lord Goring, 556. attends the prince at Barnstable, 557. after his surrender of Exeter waits upon the queen at Paris, 614. sent by her to the king, ib. his and Mr. Ashburnham's transactions with some officers of the army, ib. 622, 623. his part in the king's escape from Hampton-court, 624, 627. sent by the king to treat with colonel Hammond about receiving him, 624. some notice of him, 625. wrote an apology of his conduct as to the king's escape, 626. he and Ashburnham became enemies in consequence of this affair, ib. acquitted both by Charles I. and II. of any treasonable intentions in the business, ib. transports himself again into France, after the king went to the Isle of Wight, ib. made governor to the duke of York, 645. not agreeable to the duke, 648. by whose instigation, ib. his conduct in this post, 670, 776. being superseded by lord Byron, he does not accompany the duke to Brussels, 756. had most of the queen's favour, 776. urges the duke to join the French army, ib. his motives for so doing, ib. pretends to the mastership of wards, ib. the chancellor of the exchequer tries to dissuade him, 777. the king denies it him, ib. whereupon he breaks with the chancellor, ib. the late king had not a very good opinion of him, ib. upon lord Byron's death has the chief management of the duke of York's affairs, 783. designs mademoiselle de Longueville for the duke's wife, ib.
- Berkley, sir William, governor of Virginia, surrenders it to the parliament forces, 788. suffered to remain there as a private man, ib.
- Berkshire, Thomas, lord Howard of Charlton, first earl of, one of the commissioners to treat with the Scots at Rippon, 63. one of the lords who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. took prisoner, and committed to the Tower by the parliament, 297. notice of his character, 370. made governor of the prince of Wales, 455. Charles I. regrets having appointed him his son's governor, 514. sided against the prince's council in the west, 547, 565. jealous of the prince's intention of going into France, 584. or into Jersey, 594. returns into England from Jersey, upon the prince's going into France, 604.
- Berkshire, second earl of, (see lord Howard of Charlton.)
- Berwick, taken possession of by the earl of Essex against the Scotch covenanters, 46. delivered to the parliament, 662.
- Beteley, colonel, condemned and executed, 852.
- Beza, Theodore, 681.
- Bill passed for raising two subsidies, the commons naming commissioners to receive the money, 83. which method was afterwards continued, ib. a bill for a triennial parliament passed, 84. a bill of attainder brought into the commons against the earl of Strafford, 91. passed in a few days, 93. a bill passed in the commons to take away the bishops' votes in parliament, 94. rejected in the lords, 95. a bill brought into the commons for extirpating bishops, deans, and chapters, &c. 95. but laid by for that time, ib. revived and committed, 110. laid aside, ib. a bill for settling the militia preferred, 111. read once, ib. a new bill in the commons to take away bishops' votes, 121. a bill prepared in the commons for pressing men for Ireland, 131. its preamble excepted against by the lords, ib. passed, 132. a bill for settling the power of the militia received by the commons, 133. touching the bill against the bishops' votes, depending in the house of lords, 134. the militia bill passed by the commons, 155. and by the lords, 166. the lords pass the bills touching the bishops' votes and pressing, 167. which are passed by the king, 172. (see Acts and Parliament.)
- Binion, George, disfranchised and fined by the parliament for being concerned in the London petition against their settling the militia, 195.
- Bishopric, several vacant, filled up to the dissatisfaction of the house of commons, 121.
- Bishops, how their attendance at the earl of Strafford's trial was set aside, 87. wrong in acquiescing, ib. a bill passed the commons to take away the bishops' votes in parliament, 94. rejected in the house of lords, 95. a bill brought into the commons for extirpating bishops, deans, and chapters, ib. laid by, ib. revived and committed, 110. laid aside, ib. bishops censurable for not advising the king to persist in his refusal to sign the bill condemning the earl of Strafford for treason, 103. a new bill in the commons to take away bishops' votes, 121. touching it, depending in the house of lords, 134. all the bishops intimidated by the mob from attending the house of lords, 135. ill advised by archbishop Williams to protest against the legality of the proceedings of the house of lords during their constrained absence, 140. copy of the protest drawn up by the archbishop, 141. censure of this measure, 142. twelve that subscribed accused of treason by the commons, and sent to the Tower, ib. the bill depriving them of their votes passed in the house of lords, 167. reasons suggested to the king for depriving them of their seats in the house of lords, 171. he passes the bill chiefly through the queen's persuasions, ib. the twelve imprisoned bishops bailed by the house of lords, 174. recommitted by the commons, ib. (see Episcopacy.)

Blake, admiral Robert, encounters the Dutch fleet, 785. takes their fishingbuses and their guardships, 786. appointed one of the three admirals of the fleet in 1653, though not thought to be enough devoted to Cromwell, 796. the Dutch beaten by this fleet, ib. appointed to a fleet in 1655, as Cromwell had all confidence in him, 833. sent into the Mediterranean, ib. forces Algiers to a peace, 834. and burns a fleet in the harbour of Tunis, ib. Moun-tague joined in commission with him, 836. beats a Spanish fleet at Santa Cruz, 842. dies on his way home, ib. his burial and character, 843.

Blavett, — 725.

Blunt, sir Charles, 483.

Bois, (see Boys.)

Boles, colonel, killed in an action at Alton, 478.

Bolingbroke, (see Bullingbrook.)

Bolton, sir Richard, chancellor of Ireland, 465.

Bond, — 122.

Booth, sir George, 872, 893. undertakes to possess himself of Chester for Charles II, 869. seizes it, 871. his and sir T. Middleton's declaration, ib. Lambert sent against them by the parliament, ib. who routs sir G. and takes Chester, ib. sir G. escaped, but was taken and sent to the Tower, ib. released from prison, and chosen a member of the new parliament, 892. one of the committee sent by parliament to wait on the king at the Hague, 908.

Borgia, Caesar, 637.

Borlase, (Burlase,) sir John, one of the lords justices in Ireland, 465.

Borrel, monsieur, Dutch ambassador at Paris, 786.

Bostal-house taken by colonel Gage for Charles I, 487.

Boswell, sir William, the king's resident in Holland, 691.

Boteler, sir William, killed in the action of Cropredy-bridge, 489.

Bouchier, George, hanged for conspiring to deliver up Bristol to the king, 389.

Bowing at the name of Jesus forbidden by parliament, 117.

Boys, or Bois, colonel, garrisoned Donnington-castle, 429. bravely defended it, 499.

Brabant, 860.

Brabazon, Edward, 465.

Brachamonte, don Diego de, 734.

Bradock-down, sir R. Hopton beats the parliament forces under Ruthen there, 343.

Bradshaw, John, 701. made lord president of the court of justice to try king Charles, 692. notice of him, ib. his conduct in the trial, 695.

Braganza, duke of, (see king of Portugal.)

Brainford, or Brentford, earl of, (see general Ruthen.)

Bramston, sir John, chief justice, 306, 338.

Brandenburgh, Frederick William, elector of, 819.

Brandon, Charles, duke of Suffolk, 564.

Brandon family, 564.

Brent, sir Nathaniel, a commissioner to reform the university of Oxford by the rule of the covenant, 622.

Brentford, or Brainford, earl of, (see general Ruthen.)

Brereton, (see Bruerton.)

Bret, captain Edward, 498.

Brett, colonel, 351.

Bridges, captain, 477.

Bridges, major, drowned, 485.

Bridgman, sir Orlando, his reputation and dexterity, 347. attorney of the court of wards, 520. was instrumental in keeping Chester firm to Charles I, 347. one of the king's commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520, 525.

Bridgewater taken by the marquis of Hertford, 400. retaken by sir T. Fairfax, 563.

Brill, the, given up by king James, 27.

Bristol, a design of giving up the city to prince Rupert, how prevented, 389. besieged by him, 407. surrendered upon articles, 408. delivered up by the prince, 567.

Bristol, John Digby, first earl of, 15, 194, 195, 570, 721. as ambassador extraordinary in Spain he had negotiated the marriage between prince Charles and the infanta, 5. duke of Buckingham's reflections against him respecting this match, 9, 370. the real reason of his being recalled from Madrid, 9. king James's opinion of him, ib. committed to the Tower for treason, owing to the weakness of that king, 10. accuses Buckingham of treason, ib. how he had given offence to Buckingham in Spain, 15. one of the commissioners to treat with the Scots at Rippon, 63. sworn a privy counsellor, 78. one of the lords that signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. one of those excepted by parliament from being allowed to make their peace with them on any terms, 300. his dismissal from the king's councils proposed to Charles I. by parliament, 338. his character, 370. where he died, ib. retired into France at the end of the war, ib. summoned from Caen to attend prince Charles at the Louvre, 646. by whom he was less regarded, owing to Mr. Elliot, 720. died in France, 370.

Bristol, second earl of, (see George lord Digby.)

Broad seal, a new one voted by parliament, as the king had the old one, 453. delivered to six commissioners, ib.

Brogill, Roger Boyle, lord, afterwards first earl of Orrery, the province of Munster possessed for the parliament by his activity and lord Inchiquin's, 632. as president of Munster, was disposed towards Charles II. from hatred of Lambert, 903.

Bromicham, determined hostility of this place to the king's cause, 308. taken by prince Rupert, 383.

Brooke, Fulke Greville, first lord, 20.

Brook, Robert Greville, second lord, 91. refuses to make the protestation of loyalty at York, 47. one of the commissioners to treat with the Scots at Rippon, 63. hostile to the earl of Strafford and archbishop Laud, 74. he and lord Say the only positive enemies in the house of peers to the whole fabric of the church and of the state, 93. governed for the parliament in Warwickshire, 308. driven thence by the earl of Northampton, 350. certain counties associated against the king under his command, 348. shot in besieging Litchfield cathedral, 349. his character, ib.

Brook, Robert Greville, fourth lord, one of the committee sent by parliament to wait on Charles II. at the Hague, 908.

Brown, — one of the parliament commissioners intrusted with the new broad seal, 453.

Brown, colonel, 612.

Brown, major-general, 624. commanded the parliament garrison at Abingdon, 500. one of the committee appointed by parliament to receive Charles I. at Newcastle, 608. one of the leading men in the house of commons, 616. committed to prison by the house, 690.

Brown, Jeffery, one of the commissioners of trust in Ireland, sent with sir N. Plunket to treat with the duke of Lorraine, 789.

Brown, sir John, 509.

Brown, Samuel, 338.

Brownerigg, Ralph, made bishop of Exeter, 121.

- Bruce, Edward, lord, slain in a duel by the earl of Dorset, 25.
- Bruce, lord, one of the committee sent by parliament to wait upon Charles II. at the Hague, 908.
- Bruerton, or Brereton, sir William, M. P. for Cheshire, hostile to the church, 347. marches into Cheshire, ib. fortifies Nantwich, 348. notice of his character and conduct, ib. present at the battle of Hopton-heath, 349. his and sir J. Gell's unreasonable demand as a ransom for the earl of Northampton's body, 350. the strength of his forces, 466. joined by sir T. Fairfax, 472.
- Buck, colonel sir Brutus, fell at the siege of Bristol, 408. notice of him, 409.
- Buckhurst, Thomas Sackville, lord, treasurer, created earl of Dorset on king James's first entrance, 25. educated his grandchild Edward, afterwards earl of Dorset, ib.
- Buckhurst, Richard Sackville, lord, afterwards fifth earl of Dorset, 331.
- Buckingham, George Villiers, first duke of, 20, 24, 26, 73, 137, 371. advised the dissolutions of the two first parliaments of Charles I., 3. to escape impeachment, 3, 11. this advice the cause of his murder, 3. his conduct easily accounted for, ib. blasphemously called our Saviour by sir E. Coke, ib. his rise, 4. first owing to the handsomeness of his person, ib. which was universally admired, 16. he was a younger son of sir G. Villiers, ib. partly educated in France, ib. succeeded the earl of Somerset as the favourite of James I., 4. made cupbearer to him, ib. his numerous promotions, ib. had the disposal of all the public honours and offices, 5. how he dispensed them, ib. many thought that James grew weary of him, and would have deprived him of his power had he lived, ib. why not probable, ib. James never well pleased with him after prince Charles's journey to Spain, ib. 8, 9. why and how he contrived the journey, 5. this circumstance the beginning of the confidence between him and the prince, enmity previously existing, ib. his behaviour to the king on this occasion, ib. (usually called Stenny by king James,) 7. his behaviour to sir Fr. Cottington, whose opinion was against the journey, ib. having offended the king on account of the Spanish match being broken off, he resolves to court the parliament and people, 8, 375. his account to parliament of Charles's journey, 8. he reflects therein against the earl of Bristol, 9. was the cause both of the rise and fall of the earl of Middlesex, ib. offended king James by the impeachment of the earl, ib. the king's prophetic declaration in consequence respecting parliamentary impeachment, 10. continues king Charles's favourite after his accession, ib. and has the disposal of every thing, ib. brought Charles's bride from France, 11. was general at the unfortunate descent upon the isle of Rhé, ib. his brave conduct there, 13. particulars of his assassination by Felton, at Portsmouth, whilst preparing to embark for Rochelle, 11, 12. how the king received the news of his death, 13. his character, ib. the origin of his enmity with the earl of Oxford, ib. occasion of his avowed hostility to sir Fr. Cottington, ib. how far afterwards reconciled, 14. his never gaining a true friend, a chief cause of his misfortunes, ib. inherited a vast fortune by his wife, (Catharine Manners,) sole heiress of the earl of Rutland, ib. two particulars most hurtful to his reputation, ib. the first his engaging king James in a war with Spain, in consequence of his quarrel with Olivarez, 15. particulars of it, ib. the second, his involving him in a war with France, owing to a private amour, 16. endeavoured to estrange Charles from his wife, ib. these two wars the cause of his ruin, 17. an account of a prediction of his death, ib. the bishop of Lincoln removed from the keepership of the great seal, owing to his displeasure, 19. made Weston lord treasurer, 20. the earl of Manchester rose by his favour, 22. and the earl of Holland, 26. and sir D. Carleton, 27. guided by Laud in the disposal of the church preferment, ib. to make himself popular, he sought the friendship of lord Say; but finding him too imperious, and to affect too dangerous mutations, he cast him off, 375. how far concerned with the fortunes of sir H. Vane, the elder, ib. courted by sir R. Greenvil, 504.
- Buckingham, George Villiers, second duke of, 738, 759, 760, 766, 780. rises with the earl of Holland in favour of Charles II, 642, 663. the earl being routed, he escapes into Holland, 664. the only English person of quality allowed to be about the king in Scotland, 746. gave himself wholly up to the marquis of Argyle, 758, 761. having broken off his friendship with duke Hamilton, and the earl of Lauderdale, 761. solicits the king, whilst at Worcester, to make him general in chief, 763. refused, 764.
- Buckingham, (Mary Beaumont,) countess of, 18.
- Buckingham, (Catharine Manners,) duchess of, 14.
- Buckinghamshire petition to the house of commons, 152. the house of lords, 153. and the king, ib.
- Buckland Monachorum in Devon, 560.
- Bulkeley, Launcelot, archbishop of Dublin, 465.
- Buller, sir Richard, 340, 341.
- Bullingbrook, (Bolingbroke,) Oliver St. John, earl of, one of the parliament commissioners intrusted with the new broad seal, 453. one of the few peers who attended the house of lords, 467.
- Bunkly, lieutenant-colonel, 502.
- Burgess, Dr., 121.
- Burlacy, sir John, a lord justice in Ireland, 355.
- Burlase, (see Borlase.)
- Burly, captain, 272, 687. stirs up the people in the Isle of Wight for Charles I, 629. is condemned and executed, ib.
- Burton, Henry, an opponent of episcopacy, 38. his character, 80. punished for libelling, ib. how received on his return from exile, ib. 81. preaches against episcopacy, 134. his sermon printed under the title of The Protestation Protested, ib. 244.
- Bushel, Brown, executed for having gone over to the king, 775.
- Butler, lieutenant-colonel, 500.
- Byron, sir John, afterwards lord, 296, 298, 299, 653, 776. made lieutenant of the Tower, 133. the house of commons petition for his removal, 154, 160. the house of lords refusing to join them, 160. notice of his family and character, ib. the king dismisses him at his own request, 168. his part in the battle of Edge-hill, 307. and at Roundway-down, 406. his conduct as governor of Chester and Shropshire, 474, 551. made governor of the duke of York, 645. gets possession of Anglesey, and disposes North Wales to aid the king's cause, 651. accompanies the duke of York to Brussels, 756. not consulted about the duke's going there, ib. or about his proposed marriage, 757. sir J. Berkley tries to prejudice the duke against him, 776. his death, 783.
- Byron, sir Nicholas, 305, 307. wounded at the battle of Edge-hill, 311. made governor of Chester, 347. notice of him, 348.
- Byron, sir Thomas, wounded at the battle of Hopton-heath, 350. C.
- Cadiz, or Cales, unsuccessful attempt against, 2, 11, 16, 127.
- Cæsar, sir Julius, master of the rolls, 21.
- Cæsar, Robert, notice of, 21. a remarkable story with relation to him and the earl of Portland, ib.
- Calamy, Edmund, one of the presbyterian divines who had a public audience of Charles II. at the Hague, 909.

- Calendar, James Livingston, first earl of, 124, 316.
 Cales, (see Cadiz.)
 Calvin, 681.
 Calvinian party, notice of, 36. strong at Oxford, ib.
 Cambden house wantonly burnt down by sir H. Bard, 551.
 Cambridge, university of, contributes plate and money for the use of Charles I., 301.
 Cambridge, earl of, (see marquis of Hamilton.)
 Canons, (see Scotland.)
 Cansfield, sir John, his gallant conduct in the second battle of Newbury, 509. is wounded, ib.
 Canterbury, countess of, 757.
 Canterbury, archbishop of, (see Abbot and Laud.)
 Capel, — 85.
 Capel, Arthur lord, 466, 531, 544, 572, 573, 581, 582, 584, 609, 622. one of the lords who signed the declaration that Charles I. had no intentions of war, 263. sent to borrow money of the earl of Kingston for the king, 301. made lieutenant-general of Shropshire, Cheshire, and North Wales, 348. appointed one of the council to the prince of Wales, 514. and one of the king's commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. sent to Taunton, 545. and to Exeter, to investigate the complaints against sir R. Greenvil, 548. goes to Scilly, 585, 594. sent with lord Colepepper to Paris, to dissuade the queen from sending for the prince of Wales to France, 595. how far they prevailed, 598. his opinion against the prince's going, 603. remains in Jersey after his departure, 604. waits on the king at Hampton Court, 621. was in the most secret part in all the intrigues in the king's favour, 645. joins the rising in Essex, 655. remonstrates in favour of his fellow-prisoners at Colchester, 664. how treated by Fairfax, 665. sent to the Tower, ib. a new high court of justice appointed for his trial, and that of some others, 700. his behaviour at his trial, 701. Bradshaw's insolent expressions to him, ib. condemned, ib. account of his escape, and recapture, 702. beheaded, 703. his speech on the scaffold, ib. his character, ib.
 Capuchin friars, attendant upon the queen, sent back to France by the parliament, 299.
 Cardinas, don Alonso de, ambassador from the king of Spain in England, 112, 719, 727, 734, 747, 834, 897, 907. treats with the parliament, 591, 700. malignant towards the king, 700, 734. buys his pictures, &c. after his murder, 700. makes it believed at Madrid that the king's affairs were desperate, 734. ordered by Cromwell to leave England, 834. his intrigues with the levellers, 835. the chancellor of the exchequer sent to confer with him at Brussels, 845, 846. disliked the earl of Bristol, 847. urges the king to make a conjunction with the levellers, 858. don Juan recalled through his influence, and the marquis of Carracena's, 872. continues firm to the levellers, 896. and possessed the court of Madrid with the same spirit, ib.
 Cardinas, Antonio de, 726.
 Careless, captain, persuades Charles II. to hide himself in the oak, 766. and conducts him thence to a place of safety, ib.
 Carew, sir Alex., 341. possesses the east part of Cornwall for the parliament, 340. notice of him, 448. treats of a surrender of the fort of Plymouth to the king's forces, but is surprised, ib.
 Carleton, sir Dudley, afterwards viscount Dorchester, secretary of state, 26. his character, ib. his previous occupations, ib.
 Carlingford, earl of, (see viscount Taffa.)
 Carlisle delivered to the parliament, 662.
 Carlisle, James Hay, first earl of, previously viscount Dorchester, 25. of much authority in the council of king James, ib. with whom he came into England, ib. his education and character, ib. sets the example of the greatest expense in clothes and diet, ib. the earl of Holland his friend, 26. was first gentleman of the bed-chamber to Charles I. 32. married the earl of Northumberland's daughter, 372. and obtained his release from prison, ib.
 Carlisle, (Lucy Percy,) countess of, 656, 673. betrays the queen's secrets, 118.
 Carlos, don, infante of Spain, 15.
 Carnarvon, Robert Dormer, first earl of, 400, 414. one of the lords who signed the declaration that Charles I. had no intentions of war, 263. and one of those who were excepted by parliament from making peace with them on any terms, 300. his gallant conduct at Mendip-hill, 402. his part in the battle at Lansdown, 403. and at Roundway-down, 405, 406. marches into Dorsetshire, 423. Dorchester, Weymouth, and Portland, surrender to him, 424, 425. reason of his quitting his command, and returning to the king before Gloucester, 424. slain at the battle of Newbury, 430. his character, ib.
 Carnewarthy, (Carnwath,) Robert Dalzell, second earl of, 578. turns the king's horse out of the field of battle at Naseby, 553. marches with lord Digby to Doncaster, 578. after the defeat at Sherburne, he retires into Ireland, 579.
 Carpio, marquis of, 733.
 Carr, — governor of Cirencester, taken prisoner, 340.
 Carr, major, 499.
 Carracena, marquis of, 878, 897. appointed to command the Spanish army in Flanders, 835. receives the marquis of Ormond with great civility, 845. and the earl of Bristol, 847. he and don Juan neglect the prince of Condé's advice, 859. and lose the battle of Dunkirk in consequence, 860. procures the recall of don Juan, 872. and obtains the government of Flanders for himself, ib. his intention of seizing Charles II., 897. twice invites him back to Brussels, but in vain, 907.
 Carrington, lord, 480.
 Carteret, or Cartwright, captain, afterwards sir George, 609. refuses the vice-admiralty under the earl of Warwick, 193, 272. supplies the king's forces with ammunition, 344. had the command of Jersey under lord Jermyn, 724. which he defended as long as he could, 787. ordered by the king to surrender on conditions, 788.
 Cartwright, sir Hugh, 668.
 Cartwright, (see Carteret.)
 Case, — one of the presbyterian divines who had a public audience of Charles II. at the Hague, 909.
 Cassel, (see Hesse Cassel.)
 Castile, admiral, account of his altercation with the marquis de Liche, 728.
 Castille, Roderigo, marquis of, one of the Spanish council of state, 733. notice of him, 734.
 Castlehaven, — Touchet, earl of, 791.
 Castleton, — Saunderson, lord, one of the committee sent by the house of commons to wait on Charles II. at the Hague, 908.
 Castrilio, condé of, one of the Spanish council of state, 733. notice of him, 734.
 Cavaliers, use of the term, 136. all banished twenty miles from London by the parliament, 868.
 Cavendish, Charles, afterwards sir Charles, sent into Lincolnshire, 347. present at the battle of Marston-moor, 491. notice of him, ib.
 Cecil, sir Robert, 754.
 Cessation agreed on at Rippon, 64. cessation of arms concluded for a year in Ireland, 1643, 458. disowned by parliament, ib.
 Chafin, Dr., 24.
 Chalgrave-field, the action there, 395. Hambden mortally wounded, 396.
 Chaloner, — 418, 693. his trial and execution, 393.
 Chancellor of the exchequer, (see Hyde.)
 Chancellor of Scotland, (see earl of Loudon.)
 Chancels ordered by parliament to be levelled, 117.
 Chandois, George Bridges, sixth lord, Sudley-castle, his seat, 428. notice of him, 486.

Charenton, the ministers of, press Charles II. to go to their church, 779. seconded by lord Jermyn, ib. Hyde dissuades him, ib. he refuses to go, ib.

Charles I. (as prince of Wales) 26. (as king) 107, 108, 133, 154, 285, 309, 354, 390, 410, 420, 421, 426, 428, 431, 435, 451, 455, 493, 550, 614, 645, 660, 816. state of the country at his accession, 2. peace concluded with Spain and France, ib. 27. its happy effects, ib. 27. causes of an exhausted exchequer, 2. expedients for its replenishment, 2, 28. Charles's declaration at the close of the parliament in his fourth year, 2. its ill effects, 27. precipitate dissolution of parliaments one cause of the future calamities, 2. Charles unfortunate in the persons about him, ib. who advised the dissolutions of the three first parliaments, and why, 3. how Charles would have been benefited by not preventing parliament from impeaching any of his servants, ib. state of the court about that time, 11. how the duke of Buckingham induced him, when prince, to go to Spain, 5. which was the commencement of the confidence between them, enmity previously existing, ib. how James's consent to the journey was obtained, ib. his reasons against it, 6. (Charles usually called Baby by king James,) 7. sir Francis Cottington's opinion against it, ib. the Spanish match was broken off in consequence of this journey, 8, 15. Buckingham's account of the journey to parliament, 8. one statement was, that the Spaniards tried to persuade Charles to turn papist, 9. the parliament's resolution against Spain, ib. king James's prophetic declaration to his son concerning parliamentary impeachments in consequence of his countenancing that against the earl of Middlesex, 10. a treaty set on foot for his marriage with a daughter of the king of France, ib. great joy at his accession to the throne, ib. which happened at a favourable conjuncture with respect to foreign powers, ib. Buckingham continues his favourite, ib. and has the disposal of every thing, ib. how the news of Buckingham's death was received by him, 13. the supposition that it was not ungrateful incorrect, ib. he respected his memory, 18. the marquis of Hamilton had great power over his affections, 19. twice paid the debts of lord treasurer Weston, 21. makes money by knighthood, 28. revives the forest laws, ib. levies ship-money, ib. the powers of the council-table and star-chamber enlarged, ib. these measures censured, ib. the felicity of the times before the long parliament 30, 37. compared with the times of queen Elizabeth, 30. and of king James, 30, 31. what was wanting to complete this happiness, 31. notice of Charles's character, ib. his journey into Scotland to be crowned, 32. his reception, ib. yet the seeds of succeeding commotions then sown, 33. his intentions of introducing the English liturgy into Scotland, 33, 34. his attachment to the church of England, 33. his feeling towards the Scotch nation, 30, 44. erects the bishopric of Edinburgh, 35. unseasonably prefers some bishops in Scotland to secular offices, ib. his return to England, 36. unfavourably disposed to the Calvinistic party, 37. his passion for hunting, 40. his design of making a park between Richmond and Hampton Court, ib. opposed by bishop Juxon and lord Cottington, ib. and by archbishop Laud, 41. the disturbance in Scotland by the covenanters the first interruption of the peace and prosperity of his reign, 46. the king raises forces against the covenanters, ib. appoints the earl of Arundel general, and the earl of Essex lieutenant-general, ib. and the earl of Holland general of the horse, ib. provides a fleet also under the marquis of Hamilton, ib. the earl of Essex possesses Berwick, ib. the king might have finished the war at once, if it had been vigorously pursued, 47. his error in summoning all his nobility to attend him on this expedition, ib. one evil consequence, ib. the king goes to the borders of Scotland, 48. sends the earl of Holland as far as Dunoon, ib. his retreat from thence, ib. the king supposed only to have intended a show of war, 49. the Scotch style of address to the king, ib. a treaty concluded, 50. the king wrong in not holding the Scotch parliament to settle the differences, in person, ib. melancholic at the disgrace of this expedition, 51. the earl of Argyll joins the covenanters notwithstanding his obligations to him, ib. calls a parliament after twelve years discontinuance, April 1640, 52. for what reason, ib. offers to it to give up his claim to ship-money for twelve subsidies, 55. but dissolves it before the point was settled, owing to misrepresentations of their proceedings, 56. public regrets at this step, ib. his own, ib. money lent him by voluntary loans, 57. his preparations for a new war against the Scotch, ib. he makes the earl of Northumberland general, and lord Conway general of the horse, ib. and designs the earl of Strafford to succeed the earl, 58. a great council of peers summoned to attend the king at York, in consequence of a defeat at Newburn,

59. what step should have been taken after it, ib. state of affairs at court at that time, ib. the persons then composing the committee of state, 60. the king allows the marquis of Hamilton to ingratiate himself with the Scotch covenanters, 62. he declares his intention to the great council of calling a parliament, ib. reflections on this measure, 65. the Scots petition the king, 62. a treaty appointed at Rippon in consequence, ib. error in this point, 66. the commissioners, ib. their proceedings, 63. advised by the earl of Strafford to prosecute the war, 64. adjourns the treaty to London, whither he returns, 66. the error of this step, ib. a want of union among the king's friends, 67. the parliament meets, November 3, 1640, 68. the king prevented from making sir J. Gardiner speaker of the house of commons, not being able to procure him a seat in the house, ib. his ill choice of Lenthall, ib. he allows the privy-counsellors to be examined as to the earl of Strafford's conduct at their board, 78. the irreparable evil of this concession, ib. allows several of the popular party to be sworn as privy counsellors, ib. the ill consequences, 79. great license in preaching and printing, 80, 81. the king appoints several of the puritanical party to office, in hopes of saving the earl of Strafford, 84, 85. his friends and party dispirited, 84. present at the earl of Strafford's trial, 87. willing to have him imprisoned for life, or banished, but declares he could not give his assent to an act of parliament impeaching him of treason, though dissuaded from the step by the earl, 102. how resented by the commons, ib. the mob endeavour to intimidate the king, ib. advised by his council to give his consent to the bill, 103. archbishop Williams's ignominious advice on the subject, ib. the earl advises him to pass it, ib. signs it by commission, ib. how perhaps he had better have acted, ib. signs the bill giving up to parliament the power of dissolving itself, 104. its effects on the commons, 108. the king takes the staff of lord chamberlain from the earl of Pembroke, 105. and gives it to the earl of Essex, ib. his princely and fatherly affection for his people, 115. petitioned by parliament to defer his promised visit into Scotland, 110. begins his journey notwithstanding, 111. arrives at York, 115. why anxious to go to Scotland, 112. prevailed on by parliament not to allow any of the disbanded Irish army to enlist in the service of foreign powers, ib. attended into Scotland by a committee of both houses of parliament, ib. 118. the Irish rebellion disadvantageous to his affairs, 120. he refers it to the consideration of parliament, 121. charged by some of having fomented it, ib. he fills up several vacant bishoprics, to the indignation of the house of commons, ib. why weary of his visit to Scotland, 123. the duke of Lenox his only counsellor there, ib. he passes all the acts presented to him, 124. and confers several great offices, ib. returns to England, ib. his concessions in Scotland embolden the disaffected in England, ib. a remonstrance against him carried in the commons, ib. substance of it, 126. the ways by which the puritanical party grew in the commons, 128. the king had no servant of ability in the house, 129. his reception in London upon his return from Scotland, ib. the remonstrance presented to him with a petition, 130. his answer to the petition, ib. he resides at Whitehall instead of Hampton Court, petitioned thereto by the corporation of London, ib. his right of pressing abrogated by an act of parliament, 131. his interference whilst any bill was pending declared to be a breach of privilege, ib. the power of the militia declared by St. John not to be in the king, 133. his appointment of a lieutenant of the Tower ill-judged, ib. 143. his answer to the petition of the commons for a guard, 134. he appoints lord Falkland secretary of state, 136. and sir J. Colepepper chancellor of the exchequer, ib. reasons for Mr. Hyde's declining his offer of a place, 137. the king's professions to be guided by these three with regard to the house of commons, ib. confided much in lord Digby, ib. why an unfit counsellor for him, 138. unfortunately sends the bishops' protestation respecting their constrained absence from parliament to the house of lords, 141. the consequent violent proceedings of the commons would have been beneficial to him, had he not been misadvised by lord Digby, 142. injudiciously has lord Kimbolton and five members of the commons accused of treason, 143. advised thereto by lord Digby, 144. the articles against them, 143. the commons refuse to give up their accused members, ib. the king demands them in person, ib. goes after them into the city, where they had taken refuge, 144. his indifferent reception, ib. the consequent proceedings of the lords and commons, 145, 146. the king distressed at his imprudent steps, 145. and at not having consulted lord Falkland, sir J. Colepepper, and Mr. Hyde, ib. his going to the house of commons voted by them to be the highest breach of privilege, 146. his answer to the house of commons' former remonstrance, 147. declaration of his attachment to the church of England, ib. the city's petition to him, 148. his answer, ib. declaration of the commons touching the five members, and the king's measures respecting them, 150. sad consequence of the king's imprudent measures, 151, 156. which were imputed to lord Digby, 151. the king and the royal family remove to Hampton Court for security, 152. neither the earl of Essex nor the earl of Holland attend them, though it was the duty of their offices, ib. the Buckinghamshire petition to him, 153. in consequence of several more of the same nature he removes to Windsor for greater security, 155. his message to both houses of parliament from thence, ib. unnoticed by them, ib. his intention to secure the magazines and stores at Hull, prevented by the commons, who appoint sir J. Hotham governor, 156. his forlorn condition, ib. what line of conduct he should have pursued, ib. a new remonstrance prepared against him, 157. his proposition and message to both houses, 158. both houses petition him about the five accused members, ib. his answer, ib. the commons petition him to intrust the Tower of London and other forts to persons recommended by them, 160. his answer, ib. both houses petition him touching the Tower of London, forts, and militia, 167. his intentions of removing further from London, ib. the queen obliged to sell her plate to supply his and her wants, 168. his answer to the parliament's petition as to the militia, ib. makes sir J. Coniers lieutenant of the Tower at their request, ib. aspersions cast on him and the queen, ib. he demands reparation for an expression in the printed speech of Mr. Pym, 169. the answer of the house of commons, ib. his reply, ib. they persist in defending the expression, 170. he appoints the marquis of Hertford governor of the prince of Wales upon the earl of Newcastle's resignation, 176. reasons suggested to him for passing the bill depriving the bishops of their seats in the house of lords, 171. he signs it, chiefly at the persuasion of the queen, 1641, ib. ill effects of this step on his cause, 172. what reservation

he may have intended in assenting to some of the bills, ib. if so, why erroneous, ib. his answer respecting the militia, 174. the reply of the commons, ib. the commons endeavour to prevent the prince's meeting him at Greenwich according to his order, 175. upon what pretended reason, ib. his farther answer concerning the militia, ib. votes of both houses upon it, 176. and petition to him, ib. his answer, 177. resolutions of both houses upon it, ib. an intention of parliament to take the prince away from him by force, ib. their declaration to the king, ib. and their reasons for his continuance near the parliament, 180. his answer to both, ib. his message to both houses in his way to York, 181. he consents to the parliament's propositions for adventurers in Ireland, 183. his reception at York, 184, 190. his declaration from York, 184. observations on it, 186. petition of the lords and commons to him, March 26, 1642, 187. his answer, 188. its effect on the commons, 190. agreeably to his promise to the queen he removes the earls of Essex and Holland from their posts about him, 191. the removal of lord Essex one chief cause of his future miseries, ib. whoever accepted their offices voted enemies to their country by the parliament, ib. the commons disposed to have an admiral of the fleet appointed without applying to the king, 192. he interferes, ib. a message to him from both houses upon the matter, ib. his answer, ib. the earl of Warwick appointed notwithstanding, ib. the king not willing that any officers whom he valued should serve under him, 193. unfortunate result, ib. petition of parliament to remove the magazine from Hull, 195. his answer, 196. the magazine removed notwithstanding, 197. his message to both houses, April 8, 1642, offering to go in person to Ireland, ib. their answer, 198. his reply, 199. observations on this design, 201. his message to both houses concerning his refusal to pass the bill for the militia, April 28, ib. gentlemen of Yorkshire favourably disposed towards him, 203. particulars of his design of securing Hull, frustrated by sir John Hotham, ib. his messages to both houses concerning Hull, 204. his answer to their declaration and votes, ib. their answer to his two messages, 206. his reply, 207. his declaration in answer to that which the parliament had circulated respecting the militia, without sending it to him, 209. provides against the approaching storm, 213. the three votes of parliament in consequence of his appointing a guard for the defence of his person, 214. their petition to him to dissolve his guards, ib. his answer, ib. observations on this declaration, and vote that the king intended war against the parliament, 216. the king summons Skippon to repair to York, 218. forbidden by parliament to attend, ib. orders the term to be adjourned to York from Westminster, ib. counter-ordered by parliament, ib. declaration of both houses of what had been done amiss throughout the whole of his reign, May 19, ib. the lord keeper Littleton deserts the parliament, and joins the king at York with the great seal, 227. the king had been dissuaded through Mr. Hyde from taking it from him, 229. a fresh remonstrance of both houses to him, May 26, 230. many members of both houses join the king at York in consequence of it, 238. his answer to their declaration, 239. and to their remonstrance, 246. the nineteen propositions sent to him by both houses, 254. his answer to them, 257. observations on his not putting himself in a posture of safety, 261. his declaration to the lords attending him at York, June 13, 262. the promise of the lords thereupon, ib. his declaration and profession, disavowing any intention of war, June 15, ib. another of the lords and counsellors present with him, ib. his declaration thereupon, 263. explanation why those members of both houses, who were favourable to the king, absented themselves from parliament, instead of remaining to oppose the measures of the opposite party, 265, 266. he issues commissions of array, 267. published a declaration concerning the militia, and asserted his right of the crown to grant commissions of array, ib. the parliament's declaration to the city upon the king's letter to the lord mayor and aldermen, 268. his reply, ib. why he could not earlier have recourse to arms, 269. the difficulty the queen had to procure arms and ammunition in Holland, as the States were in favour of the parliament, ib. the small ship Providence brings arms and ammunition, the parliament not succeeding in intercepting it, ib. the king grants commissions to raise troops, 270. appoints the earl of Lindsey general of his army, ib. three months' pay for his horse-troops subscribed by the lords and council about him, ib. account of his attempt to secure the fleet, and to revoke the earl of Northumberland's command, ib. the earl of Warwick appointed by parliament in the place of the earl of Northumberland, 272. some unfortunate circumstances connected with the king's loss of the navy, ib. the king anticipates the parliament in the seizure of Newcastle, 273. sends persons into several counties to execute the commission of array, ib. his proclamation from Beverley, ib. goes to Newark, ib. thence to Lincoln, ib. and then back to Beverley, ib. the parliament's petition to him there, July 15, 274. his answer, 275. his refusal to return a more gentle reply, 278. he goes to Doncaster, 279. thence to Nottingham, ib. and so to Leicester, where he is favourably received, ib. proofs that if he were more loved, the parliament was more feared, ib. he returns towards Hull, 280. the parliament's replication to his answer, ib. each party lay aside all thoughts of further overtures, ib. his preparations for war, 282. his pecuniary distress, ib. state and feelings of his own party, ib. his fruitless design against Hull, being encouraged by sir J. Hotham to attempt it, 285. for which purpose he had gone to Beverley, ib. he returns to York, ib. colonel Goring, governor of Portsmouth, declares for him, which obliges him to enter upon the war, ib. observations on his setting up his standard at Nottingham instead of York, 287. unfortunately dissuaded from seizing lord Fairfax and sir T. Fairfax, 288. he goes to Nottingham, ib. marches to Coventry, ib. which is shut against him, ib. his standard erected at Nottingham, August 25, 289. loses Portsmouth again through colonel Goring's neglect, 289, 296. his condition at Nottingham, 289. the marquis of Hertford's actions in Somersetshire, 290. consultation about sending a message for peace to parliament, 291. the king at first averse, 292. the message, ib. how received, ib. the answer, 293. advised by some to repair to parliament himself, ib. his second message, ib. the answer, 294. and the parliament's declaration to the kingdom, ib. advantageous to the king, ib. 301. he removes to Derby, 295. his third message to parliament in answer to their last reply, ib. his speech and protestation at the head of his forces after the reading of his orders of war, ib. he goes to Shrewsbury, 296, 302. the marquis of Hertford's proceedings in the west, 296. prince Rupert successful in a skirmish at Worcester, 299. the king being at Chester, whence he returns to Shrewsbury, 302. of what advantage this skirmish was to him, 299. the petition of parliament to the king, sent to their general to be presented, 300. why never delivered, 305. the two universities contribute their money and plate to him, 301, 317, 325. the backwardness of some of his friends in lending him money one cause of his misfortunes, 302. an expedient for raising money from the Roman Catholics, 303. some money obtained by the grant of a baronage, rather against the king's will, ib. substance of his speeches to the gentry and commonalty of the counties through which he passed, 304. his demeanour wins many others to him, 304. strength of his army at Shrewsbury, 305. its great want of arms, ib. he marches towards London, 306. faction begun in his army owing to prince Rupert, ib. who was too much listened to by the king, ib. particulars of the battle of Keinton or Edge-hill, 307. he appoints general Ruthen general of his army in the room of the earl of Lindsey, who fell there, 312. Banbury castle surrenders to the king, ib. his favourable reception at Oxford, 313, 317. where he recruits his army, 317. the condition and inclinations of Scotland, 315. why he should not have proceeded onward to London, 317. the parliament's garrison quitting Reading, he marches thither, 318. advances to Colebrook, ib. a petition from both houses to him, ib. his answer, 319. his advance to Brentford, where he beats the enemy, acts aside the peaceable intentions of parliament, ib. 320, &c. the earl of Essex's army and the city trained bands opposed against him, 320. he draws off to Kingston, ib. thence to Reading, ib. his message to parliament, ib. another petition to him from parliament, November 24, 321. substance of his answer, ib. having garrisoned Reading and Wallingford, and some other places, he marches to Oxford, 322. Marlborough taken by his forces, 323. substance of his message to the privy-council of Scotland upon occasion of the parliament's declaration to that kingdom, ib. his means to raise money, 324. makes new sheriffs, 325. the inclinations of foreign states towards him or the parliament, 326. his declaration upon occasion of the parliament's ordinance for raising money, 330. the petition of the city of London to him to return to the parliament, 333. his answer, 334. expedients of the parliament to prevent its effect, 335. the city declares for the parliament, 336. the parliament's humble desires and propositions of peace to the king, January 1642, 337. his answer 339. Chichester possessed by his forces, 340. lost again, ib. Cirencester taken by prince Rupert, ib. state of the king's affairs in Cornwall, 340, &c. his forces victorious at Braddock-down, 343. and take Saltash, ib. come to Tavistock, 344. supplied with ammunition by captain Carteret, ib. a treaty between the two parties in Devon and Cornwall, ib. state of the king's affairs in Yorkshire, 344, &c. articles of neutrality agreed on there, 345. but disowned by parliament, ib. sir Hugh Cholmondeley revolts, and delivers up Scarborough castle to the queen, 347. state of the king's affairs in Lancashire, Cheshire, and Shropshire, ib. difference of temper in the common people who supported his cause, and such as were for the parliament, 348. state of his affairs in the counties between Oxford and York, 348, &c. Stafford garrisoned by some gentlemen for the king, 349. his forces victorious on Hopton-heath, but with the loss of the earl of Northampton, 350. state of his affairs in Wales, 350, &c. observations on his appointing lord Herbert, a Roman catholic, general of South Wales, 351. who is routed by sir W. Waller, 352. of what advantage the money expended in Wales would have been to the king at Oxford, ib. state of Ireland with reference to the differences between the king and parliament, 352, &c. the king had information every day of what passed in parliament, 356. he puts parliament in mind of his proposition for a cessation of arms, ib. both houses agree there should be a treaty, and send for a safe conduct, ib. which he grants to all they name but lord Say, ib. the parliament's terms for a cessation, 357. different opinions of his privy-council as to his accepting them, ib. his proposals of alterations in them, 358. petition to him from the general assembly of the kirk of Scotland, 359. his answer, 362. transactions of the Scotch commissioners with him, that they might be mediators, and for a parliament in Scotland, 365. his answer to them in both particulars, ib. the treaty begins upon the proposals of cessation, but takes no effect, 366. what advantage the king might have derived from an assent to these proposals, 368. the parliament's advice to him concerning gaol-delivery, ib. his answer, ib. the assizes forbidden by an ordinance of parliament, ib. an account and character of the privy-councillors at this time attending the king, and those who stayed with the two houses, 369, &c. the sum of the demands and concessions of both sides upon the first article of the treaty, 376. his message to parliament, April 12, 1643, 379. they return no answer, 380. what effect his appointment of the earl of Northumberland to be lord high admiral might have produced, ib. prince Rupert takes Bromicham, 383. and Litchfield, 384. the king unsuccessful in attempting to relieve Reading, ib. articles upon which it surrendered, 385. the breach of them gave rise to similar breaches in future by both sides, ib. the king's proclamation against one clause of the articles, 386. arguments for and against an attack of Oxford instead of Reading, 385, 387. the evils that arose to the king from the trial of colonel Fielding for his conduct at Reading, 387. the probable result, had the earl of Essex marched to Oxford immediately upon taking Reading, ib. the king's message to parliament, May 20, 388. his messenger committed by the commons, ib. and the queen impeached by them of high treason for assisting him in the war, ib. the design of Mr. Waller and others in favour of the king, 389, &c. 393. the vow and covenant taken by parliament in consequence, 392. and throughout the city and army, 393. skirmish in Chalgrave field fatal to Mr. Hambden, 396. state of the king's affairs in the west, 397. his forces victorious near Stratton, 398. a troop of cuirassiers the first that successfully opposed the king's horse, 402. the battle of Lansdown in his favour, 403. and that on Roundway-down, 406. meets the queen near Keinton, she coming with a great recruit, 407. Bristol taken by prince Rupert, 407, &c. why the king could make no farther application to parliament, 411. his declaration to his subjects after his late successes, ib. jealousies among his officers respecting the government of Bristol, 412. goes there to compose them, 413. reasons against uniting both his armies, 414. prince Maurice sent into the west with an army, ib. reasons for and against the siege of Gloucester, 415. the king marches there, and summons it, 416. besieges it, 417. propositions for peace given by the house of lords to the house of commons, ib. reasons for and against them, ib. assented to by the commons, 418. if sent to the king, would have produced peace, ib. preached against in London, ib. the common council petition against peace, ib. the propositions rejected by the commons in consequence, ib. certain counties associated to serve the parliament, 420. debates how the earls of Bedford and Holland, and some other lords, who had withdrawn from parliament, should be received at Oxford, 419, 420. the king comes to Oxford, to consult about it, 421. his affairs in the west, 423. Weymouth and Portsmouth surrendered to his forces, 424. the parliamentary forces routed at Torrington, 425. Barnstable and Bedford yielded to prince Maurice, ib. Exeter surrenders to him, ib. the king is with difficulty persuaded to make sir A. A. Cooper governor of Weymouth, 426. prosecution of the siege of Gloucester, ib. the siege raised by the earl of Essex, 428. who also takes Cirencester, ib. negligent security a prevailing fault in the king's troops, ib. he intercepts the earl of Essex's return to London, by reaching Newbury first, ib. imprudent in risking a battle, 429. which was not decisive on either side, ib. had sir W. Waller cooperated with the earl of Essex it would have been decisive against the king, ib. temper of the army and court at Oxford upon the king's return, 434. the lords who had deserted the parliament, and joined the king, return to the parliament, 437. divisions amongst the councils at Oxford, 444. the king obliged to break his resolution of conferring no honour or office until the end of the war, ib. inconveniences, that arose to himself from his affability, 446. Bedford taken by prince Rupert, 447. Newport Pannel possessed by the parliament forces, ib. the king's affairs in the west, ib. particulars of the failure against Plymouth, 447, &c. Dartmouth taken by prince Maurice, 449. fruitless effort of the French ambassador, the conte d'Harcourt, to negotiate a peace between the king and parliament, ib. observations upon this proceeding, 450. the king's unfavourable reception of those who had deserted the parliament hurtful to his cause, 452. a letter from the peers on his side to the council in Scotland, 455. the members who had left the parliament at Westminster summoned to repair to Oxford, ib. the king's intentions with regard to Ireland, 456. address of the lords justices and council of Ireland to him, on the miserable condition of his army there, 457. who are obliged to treat with the rebels, 458. a cessation of arms for a year in Ireland concluded, ib. disowned by parliament, ib. the king sends for English troops from Ireland, 466. the members of both houses meet at Oxford, 466. substance of the king's speech to them, ib. their considerations respecting a peace, ib. their letter to the earl of Essex, 467. the earl of Essex's answer, ib. an extract of the declaration of the kingdom of Scotland, 468. an extract of the declaration of England and Scotland, ib. the king's message to both houses, March 3, 1643, 469. their answer, 470. means agreed upon by the parliament at Oxford to raise money, ib. the parliament at Westminster imposes an excise, 471. that at Oxford follows the example, ib. substance of the declaration of the parliament at Oxford, ib. colonel Bellasis defeated at Selby by sir T. Fairfax, 472. the earl of Newcastle in consequence retires to York, ib. the marquis of Ormond sends the king aid from Ireland, ib. which under lord Byron is captured at Nantwich by sir T. Fairfax, 473. the earl of Mountrose comes to the king and informs him of the state of Scotland, ib. bad state of his affairs, 476. prince Rupert relieves Newark, ib. Arundel castle taken by lord Hopton, 478. retaken by sir W. Waller, 479. lord Hopton worsted at Alresford by sir W. Waller, ib. the association of several counties formed under the earl of Manchester, 480. who is ordered to join the Scots in the north, 481. the queen retires from Oxford to Exeter, ib. the parliament at Oxford prorogued from April till October, ib. the king undecided as to his plan of operations, 482. whom he chiefly consulted on military affairs, ib. Reading quitted by his forces, 483. plans of the parliamentary armies against him, ib. Abingdon quitted by his forces, ib. his deplorable condition at this time, 484. he is advised to surrender himself to the earl of Essex, 485. escapes from Oxford to Worcester, ib. thence proceeds to Bewdley, 486. pursued by sir W. Waller, ib. who advances beyond him towards Shrewsbury, ib. whereupon the king returns to Oxford, ib. Weymouth delivered to the earl of Essex, 488. Lyme relieved by him, ib. the king marches from Witney towards Buckingham, ib. is advised by lord Wilmot to march towards London, ib. fight at Cropredy bridge, against sir W. Waller, favourable to the king, 489. marches towards the west, as the earl of Essex was before Exeter, where the queen then was, 490. prince Rupert defeated at Marston-moor, 491. and quits the north in consequence, ib. the earl of Newcastle goes abroad also in consequence, ib. observations on this defeat, ib. York delivered up in consequence to the parliament forces, 492. the king continues his march towards the earl of Essex, 494. the queen retires to France, ib. the king pursues lord Essex into Cornwall, 495. makes an overture to him, which is not attended to, 496. the enemy's horse escape him, the foot surrender on terms, 499. 500. observations on the king's acceptance of these terms, 503. affairs at Oxford during the king's absence, 500. the king sends a message of peace to parliament, which was not noticed, 503. he leaves sir R. Greenvil to block up Plymouth, ib. goes to Exeter, 505. provides for the blocking up of

Lyme, and restraining the garrison of Taunton, 506. marches to Chard, ib. thence to Sherborne, ib. thence to Salisbury, ib. defeats Waller at Andover, 507. relieves Donnington castle, ib. Banbury castle relieved by the earl of Northampton, 508. colonel Urry deserts the king, and discovers his plans, ib. the second battle of Newbury, ib. from which the king hastens to Oxford, 509. and from thence relieves Donnington castle again, 510. returns to Oxford, 511. Newcastle taken by the Scots, ib. the temper of the army and court at this time, ib. propositions of peace from Ireland rejected by the king, 512. the council appointed by him to attend the prince of Wales into the west, 514. divisions in the parliament at Westminster, ib. the independent party against peace, 515. the self-denying ordinance proposed, 516. passes, 532. fresh overtures of peace, 517. the duke of Richmond and the earl of Southampton sent to London with a message for a treaty, 518. the king sends archbishop Laud a pardon under the great seal, 519. declared by parliament to be of no effect, ib. the parliament agree to a treaty at Uxbridge, 520. the names of their commissioners, ib. and the king's, ib. particulars respecting it, ib. first, of religion, 522. secondly, of the militia, 525. 529. thirdly, of Ireland, 525. Weymouth surprised by the king's party, 527. but lost again, 530. Shrewsbury surprised by the parliament forces, 527. the end of the treaty at Uxbridge without effect, 530. the king melancholy at the state of his affairs, ib. association in the west in favour of peace, 531. the prince of Wales made general of the king's forces, and of this association, 532. Newcastle taken by the Scots, ib. the earl of Mountrose's expedition into Scotland, 533. the prince of Wales removes to Bristol, 538, 540, 543. reasons why, 540, 542. why the court had better have been removed into the west, 538. the marquis of Argyle inveterate against the king, 541. state of the western counties when the prince of Wales came to Bristol, 542. the prince summons the commissioners of the associated western counties to Bridgewater, 546. resolutions taken at Oxford, 550. Evesham taken after the king's departure, 551. the king takes Hawkesley-house, ib. storms and takes Leicester, ib. marches back towards Oxford, hearing that Fairfax had set down before it, 552. is defeated at Naseby, 553. the king's troops throughout the war undisciplined in rallying, ib. the king's cabinet falls into the enemy's hands, 554. many of his letters afterwards garbled and published to his prejudice, ib. the king retires by Litchfield to Bewdley, and thence to Hereford, ib. prince Rupert to Bristol, ib. the king should have retired into the west, ib. 562. the affairs in that quarter in the mean time, 554. notice of the club-men in Somerset and Dorsetshire, 556. the king goes to Abergavenny, thence to Ragland-castle, 562. thence to Chepstow and Cardiff, having altered his intention of going to Bristol, ib. Leicester retaken by sir T. Fairfax, ib. Bridgewater taken by him, 563. false expectations of peace prevalent, ib. the king's letter to prince Rupert against treating of peace at that time, ib. he removes to Ludlow with the intention of joining the marquis of Mountrose in Scotland, who had been greatly victorious there, 564. his letter to the prince of Wales, ordering him to retire into France, whenever he might be in danger of falling into the rebels' hands, ib. France objected to by the prince's council, 565. the king's answer persisting in France, 570. a design to petition the prince to send conditions of peace prevented, 566. prince Rupert delivers up Bristol, 567. Pontefract castle surrendered to the enemy, 568. the king goes to Doncaster, ib. thence to Newark, alarmed at the approach of Lesley, ib. thence to Oxford, ib. thence to Ragland, in order to relieve Hereford, ib. the Scots rise from before Hereford, whither the king marched, ib. the marquis of Mountrose defeated by Lesley, ib. the king's intention of relieving Bristol, ib. his letter to prince Rupert upon his surrender of that place, 569. revokes his commission, ib. through lord Digby's influence, 577. his letter to prince Charles, recommending him to withdraw to Denmark, 574. another commanding him to retire abroad, and preferably to Denmark, 575. reasons against his immediate departure, ib. which his council decide against, ib. approved of by the king, 584. lord Wentworth's horse beaten at Ashburton, 576. the king marches to Chester, where his horse are routed by Pointz, ib. the king retires to Denbigh, 577. thence to Bridgenorth, ib. unfortunately persuaded by lord Digby to go to Newark instead of Worcester, ib. state of the garrison there, ib. lord Digby appointed general, and sent to join the earl of Mountrose, 578. his defeat at Sherborne after some previous success, ib. his cabinet of papers taken, and some afterwards published, ib. lord Digby retires to Ireland, 579. an account of the discontents of some of the king's chief commanders, ib. he retreats to Oxford, 581. his affairs in the west about this time, ib. lord Hopton's forces routed at Torrington by sir T. Fairfax, 583. prince Charles retires to Scilly, 585. lord Hopton's army dissolved, ib. the king's transactions at Oxford, 588. Cromwell takes Winchester and Basing, ib. the king sends some messages for peace, which were not noticed by parliament, ib. sends again for a safe conduct for the duke of Richmond and others, ib. their answer, ib. sends to desire a personal treaty at Westminster, ib. their answer, ib. he sends again, ib. their ordinance thereupon, 590. he tries in vain to deal with the independents, ib. a treaty between the king and the Scots set on foot by the interposition of France, ib. the parties cannot agree on the point of church-government, 592. the defeat of lord Astley's forces, 593. the king's letter to prince Charles, enjoining him never to yield to any dishonourable conditions, not even to save his (the king's) life, 594. the prince removes to Jersey, ib. a letter from the king to him, exhorting him to continue firm, 595. negotiations for and against the prince's removal into France, 594—597. a further account of Montrevill's negotiation with the Scots, 599. the paper he sent to the king, being a promise for the Scots receiving him, 600. sends another messenger to prevent the king's journey, who is intercepted, ib. the king, having no better resource, puts himself under the protection of the Scotch army at Newark, 601. his treatment by them, 602. orders Newark to be surrendered to them, that they might march northwards, ib. prince Charles removes to France, 604. transactions relating to the king in the Scotch army, ib. he is prevailed upon to order the marquis of Mountrose to lay down his arms, and to leave the kingdom, 605. Henderson employed to dispute with him concerning church-government, ib. the queen sends sir W. Davenant to persuade the king to give up the church for peace and security, 606. upon the Scots' desire he orders the surrender of Oxford and all his other garrisons, 607. the parliament, upon the Scots' request, send propositions of peace to him, ib. his answer, ib. the Scots enforce these propositions, ib. his answer to them, 608. the parliament demand, and the Scots deliver up the king for money, ib. a committee and servants appointed by parliament to attend him, ib. he is brought to Holmby, ib. his request for the attendance of any two of his own chaplains refused, ib. several garrisons surrendered to parliament, ib. differences arise between the parliament and army, 609. (see Army.) the army seize upon the king, 612. his chaplains allowed him by the army, 613. he removes according to the marches of the army, ib. sir John Berkley sent from the queen to him, 614. Mr. Ashburnham comes to him, ib. the different designs of the parliament and army relating to him, 615. he is allowed to see his children, 616. removed to Hampton Court, 618, 620. his conversation with his children, 620. lord Capel waits upon him, 621. substance of his letter to the chancellor of the exchequer, ib. the marquis of Ormond visits him, 622. and the Scotch commissioners, ib. the army begin to be less regardful of him, ib. 623. his hopes blasted by the violent proceedings, 623. major Huntington tells him that Cromwell would destroy him, if not prevented, 623. he escapes from Hampton Court, 624. confides himself to colonel Hammond in the Isle of Wight, ib. is lodged in Carisbrook castle, 625. observations on this whole business, ib. the parliament send to the king to pass four acts, 628. protested against by the Scotch commissioners, ib. his answer, 629. his old servants removed from about him, to prevent his further escape, ib. captain Burly's vain attempt at his release, ib. how his answer is received by parliament, and Cromwell's speech thereupon, 630. a vote and declaration of parliament that no more addresses should be made to him, 630, 631. odious to the people in general, 631. a meeting of Cromwell and his officers, wherein they design his destruction, 630. the Scotch commissioners' private treaty with him, 634. observations on it, ib. substance of this scandalous treaty, ib. the king's condition in the Isle of Wight, 639. the temper of the nation at this time, 641. revolt of part of the fleet to the king, 646. commotions in Kent for him, 646, 654. factions in the prince's fleet, 648, 655. Berwick and Carlisle seized for the king, 653. delivered up to parliament again, 662. the duke of Hamilton and the Scotch troops, who had entered England on the king's behalf, routed by Cromwell, 658. the earl of Holland routed, 663. and Colchester, whither the Kentish royalists had retired, taken, 664. the parliament resolves on a personal treaty with the king, 665. substance of their message to him, 666. his answer, ib. the vote against making any more addresses to him repealed, ib. the treaty to be at Newport, ib. an account of the taking of Pontefract castle for the king, ib. delivered up to Lambert, 670. the king's altered appearance, 678. the commissioners for the treaty arrive in the Isle of Wight, 677. the first proposition for revoking all the king's declarations, &c. 678. his answer, ib. disputes concerning the preamble, 679. he consents to it, 680. the second proposition concerning religion and the church, ib. the king offers a proposition of his own, which the commissioners refuse to send to the parliament, ib. he sends it himself, ib. it is voted unsatisfactory, ib. their ministers dispute with the king about the bishops, ib. his concessions on this point, 681. the third proposition concerning the militia, ib. his answer, ib. voted by parliament unsatisfactory, 682. he consents to it with a preamble, ib. at last without it, ib. the fourth proposition concerning Ireland, ib. his answer, ib. some further particulars he at first refuses, but at last consents to, ib. his proposition now sent to parliament by the commissioners, ib. a declaration required of him against the marquis of Ormond, 683. his answer, ib. the treaty continued fourteen days longer, ib. the demand against Ormond renewed, ib. his answer, ib. a further demand about the church, ib. his answer, ib. the parliament's votes upon his former proposition, ib. the treaty prolonged till November 25, 684. the declaration of the army, ib. new propositions against delinquents, especially the marquis of Ormond, ib. his answer, ib. the treaty further prolonged for a day, ib. proposition concerning Scotland, ib. his answer, ib. another touching the church, 685. his final answer, ib. sum of the king's letter to his son concerning the treaty, ib. the conclusion in his own words, ib. his attempt at an escape, 686, 687. a sharp debate in parliament on the commissioners' report of the treaty, 688. remonstrance of the army against the treaty presented to parliament, ib. the king removed from Carisbrook castle to Hurst castle, ib. votes of the commons thereupon, 689. another declaration of the army to the parliament, ib. their general marches for London, ib. the parliament vote that the king's answer was a ground for peace, ib. a contrary vote, ib. vote of no more addresses renewed, 690. votes of the commons about settling a form of government, ib. a committee appointed to prepare a charge of high treason against the king, ib. the prince of Wales desires the States of Holland to intercede with parliament, 691. their answer, ib. their ambassador not admitted by parliament to an audience before the king's death, ib. the queen's paper to the parliament laid aside, ib. the charge against the king approved by the commons, ib. rejected by the lords, ib. the commons constitute a high court of justice, 692. Bradshaw made lord president, ib. the king sent for from Hurst castle, 693. a plan for his escape not tried, ib. he is brought to St. James's, 694. the several consultations among the officers before and after this time, what to do with him, ib. concluded to have him publicly tried, ib. the prince writes to Fairfax and the council of war, 695. the letter laid aside, ib. the king's usage at St. James's, ib. he is brought to Westminster-hall, ib. the sum of his charge, ib. what passed the first day of the trial, ib. disturbance in the court by lady Fairfax, 696. a summary passing over the rest of the trial, ib. the king's character, 697. his justice and mercy, ib. his devotion and religion, ib. his conjugal chastity, ib. not very bountiful, ib. kept state in his court, ib. patient in hearing causes, ib. fearless, but not enterprising, ib. not confident in his own judgment, ib. a great lover of the Scotch, ib. abhorred debauchery, ib. beloved by his subjects in general when he was murdered, 698. the sum of his character, ib. his funeral at Windsor, ib. why his body was not removed to Westminster in the time of Charles II, 698. proclamation against proclaiming the prince of Wales king, 699. how some neighbouring princes took the king's murder, ib. Cromwell when in Scotland supposed to have agreed with Argyle to keep him in perpetual imprisonment, 707. condition of his family after his death, 811.

Charles II. (as prince of Wales,) 129, 176, 178, 179, 282, 547, 551, 561, 572, 573, 585, 596, 632, 634 (as king,) 708, 718, 782, 803, 804, 806, 807, 808, 810, 811, 813, 827, 837, 870. (as prince of Wales,) the earl of Newcastle his governor, 50. whom the marquis of Hertford succeeds, 170. meets his father at Greenwich, notwithstanding an order of parliament, 175. an intention of parliament to remove him from the king by force, 177. appointed captain of a troop of horse for the defence of the king's person, 214. present at the battle of Edge-hill, 309. was one of those that signed a letter to the earl of Essex, 467. removes with the king from Oxford, 485. marquis of Hertford had an extraordinary devotion for him, 493. the king thinks it no longer safe and prudent for him and the prince to be together, 513, 530. the council appointed to attend him into the west, 514. made general of the king's forces, and of the western association, 532. removes to Bristol, 538, 540, 543. reasons why, 540, 542. no preparations to receive him, 543. his proceedings there, 543, 545. summons the commissioners of the four associated western counties to Bridgewater, 546. himself diverted from business, and divisions caused in his councils by Mrs. Windham, ib. sends three commissioners to Exeter to inquire into the complaints against sir R. Greenvil, 548. removes from Bristol to Barnstable, 554, 555. transactions there, 557. goes to Launceston, 559, 569. the king's letter to him, ordering him to retire into France whenever he might be in danger of falling into the rebels' hands, 564. France objected to by his council, 565. the king's answer persisting in France, 570. a design to petition him to send conditions of peace prevented, 566. a conference between lord Goring and one of his council, 567. refuses lord Goring's demands of being next in command to himself, &c. 566, 567. goes to Tavistock, 574. his intention of going to Totness, ib. 576. the king's letter to him, recommending him to withdraw to Denmark, 575. his letter commanding him to retire abroad, and preferably to Denmark, ib. reasons against his immediate departure, ib. which step his council decide against, ib. their decision approved of by the king, 584. state of his affairs in the west, 581. he commits sir R. Greenvil, refusing the command, to prison, 582. goes to Pendennis, 584. thence to Scilly, 585. the king's letter to him, enjoining him never to yield to any dishonourable conditions, not even to save his (the king's) life, 594. he removes to Jersey, ib. the queen's letter pressing his removal from Scilly, ib. a letter to him from the king, exhorting him to continue firm, 595. he is inclined to go to France, ib. the lords Capel and Colepepper sent to dissuade the queen from sending for him into France, ib. their instructions and arrival at Paris, 596. lord Digby goes to Jersey to persuade him to remove to Ireland, ib. thence he goes to France to gain the queen's consent to this measure, 597. where, being cajoled by cardinal Mazarine, he returns to Jersey to persuade the prince to remove into France, ib. debates in the prince's council concerning his going, 603. lord Capel's opinion against it, ib. the arguments of the lords Digby and Jermyn for it, ib. the prince resolves to go, 604. all his council, except lord Colepepper, dissent, and stay behind, ib. the prince's treatment and condition in France, 606, 640. he goes to Helvoetsluyt to take the command of the fleet that had revolted from Rainsborough, 646. 648. factions in his fleet, 648, 655. he comes into the Downs with his fleet, 649. an unsuccessful enterprise there, 657. thence into the Thames, 649. and takes several ships, 656. commissioners sent to him from the city, with a petition, ib. he writes to the city, ib. he writes to the earl of Warwick, 657. his answer, ib. he went to sea towards Holland after having attempted to fight with the earl of Warwick, ib. the earl follows him, ib. the prince comes to the Hague, 659. divisions in his court, ib. the letter of the parliament of Scotland to him, 660. deliberations in his council about it, ib. his and the duke of York's condition at the Hague, and the factions among their followers, 670. the ill condition of his fleet in Holland, 672, 673. he has the smallpox, 673. he prevails with the States of Holland to intercede with the parliament for his father, 691. sends a letter to Fairfax, and the council of war on his behalf, 695. which was read and laid aside, ib. (as king) proclamation against proclaiming him king, 699. his condition at the Hague, 704. the States condole with him, ib. his new council sworn, ib. the queen's first message to him, ib. he thinks of going into Ireland, 705. proclaimed in Scotland, and commissioners sent from thence to him, ib. factions in his court with reference to Scotland, 708. circumstances that made his departure from Holland necessary, 711. he delivers a memorial to the States, 712. deliberations respecting his movements, 713. conference between lord Cottington and the chancellor of the exchequer concerning his sending an embassy to Spain, 714. he declares those two to be his ambassadors, 715. the chancellor of the exchequer appointed by him to make a declaration relating to England, 717. different opinions in his council about it when read, ib. upon which it was laid aside, 718. he removes to Breda, 719. thence to Antwerp, 720. thence to Brussels, ib. has an interview with the archduke near Valenciennes, ib. meets his mother at St. Germain's, ib. unwilling that she should interfere in public affairs, ib. Mr. Elliot comes to him, ib. his influence over him, ib. Cromwell's arrival in Ireland delays his voyage there, 724. he removes to Jersey, 725. stays some months there, 731. account of the embassy he sent to Spain, 725, 732, 739, 747, 752, 753. he gives over all thought of going into Ireland in consequence of

Cromwell's success there, 737. again invited to Scotland upon the old conditions through the marquis of Argyle, ib. his answer, that he would have a treaty with them in Holland, 737. the queen advises him to agree to the terms, ib. he meets the queen at Beauvais, 738. meets the Scotch commissioners at Breda, ib. resolves for Scotland, ib. arguments of some against this step, ib. receives the news relating to the marquis of Mountrose, 743. low condition of his party in England, 745. Argyle sends him new propositions, which miss him, 746. he arrives in Scotland, and takes the covenant, ib. Hamilton and Lauderdale depart from him, ib. Argyle receives him, ib. most of his English servants removed from him, ib. the Scotch clergy always about him, 747. their sermons before him, ib. the marquis of Argyle's behaviour to him, ib. his condition, ib. obtains more liberty through the Scots' defeat by Cromwell, 751. his loss in the death of the prince of Orange, 755. believed in France to be dead, 756. state of his affairs in Scotland, 758. he withdraws to the Highlands, but returns the next day, ib. is better treated in consequence by Argyle, 759. a Scotch parliament summoned in his name, ib. which reconciles the lords, ib. an army raised, of which he is general, ib. his coronation, ib. in consequence of Cromwell's army gaining a pass in his rear, he marches forward into England, 760. Argyle dissuaded it, and stayed behind, ib. Lambert sent after the king, ib. Cromwell follows three days after, ib. Massey sent to precede the king, 761. a committee of ministers in his army ruin all, ib. the earl of Derby meets him in Lancashire, ib. Lambert follows, but is forced to retire, ib. at Warrington the earl of Derby leaves the king, and is sent back into Lancashire, ib. he summons Shrewsbury in vain, ib. well received at Worcester, 762. where he is proclaimed king, ib. favourableness of this post, ib. ill success of the earl of Derby, ib. the king's army not much increased by access of English, 763. his transactions at Worcester, ib. the ill disposition of his officers, 764. his defeat, ib. his retreat and concealment, 765. his foot driven prisoners to London, and sold to the plantations, ib. a price set on his head, ib. particulars of his escape, as the author had them from himself, 766, 772. meets captain Careless in a wood, who persuades him to get up into an oak, 766. thence he came to a cottage nine miles off, where he lay in a barn, 767. thence is conducted to another house twelve miles off, ib. thence to another, and so to others, ib. brought by Mr. Huddleston to lord Wilmot, and to Mr. Lane's house, 768. goes to Mr. Norton's, near Bristol, riding behind Mrs. Lane, ib. passing under the name of William, 769. is known to the butler of the house, ib. goes to colonel Francis Windham's house, 770. thence is brought to an inn near Lyme, ib. the ship that was hired by captain Ellison failed, owing to an accident, and he leaves the inn, ib. he and lord Wilmot near being discovered by a smith shoeing their horses, 771. goes back to the colonel's house, ib. sends Wilmot for Robert Philips, ib. who conducts him to a place near Salisbury, ib. Dr. Hinchman conducts him to Heale, Mrs. Hyde's house, ib. thence to a house near Bright-helmstone, ib. where a bark was provided by colonel Gunter, ib. he arrives in Normandy in November, 772. and goes to Rouen, ib. the chancellor of the exchequer meets him at Paris by his order, ib. the marquis of Ormond, after appointing the marquis of Clanrickard his deputy in Ireland, waits upon the king at Paris, 775. his necessities at Paris, ib. appoints a new council, 776. refuses to make sir J. Berkeley master of the wards, 777. his conduct with respect to the duke of York's going into the French army, ib. six thousand livres per month assigned him by the French court, 778. how the money was disposed that was sent him from Moscow and Poland, ib. invited to attend the Hugonot church at Charenton, 779. urged to it by lord Jermyne, ib. dissuaded by the chancellor of the exchequer, ib. refuses to go, ib. the requests to him from his friends in Scotland, 780. did not expect much from their exertions, ib. appoints the chancellor of the exchequer to make all the despatches for Scotland, 781. the marquis of Ormond's and the chancellor's opinion of his affairs at this time, ib. the chancellor desires him not to employ him in the Scottish affairs, ib. his reply, ib. the chancellor submits, ib. the king with his mother dwelt at the Louvre, 782. they remove to St. Germain's, ib. solicitations for places in his court, ib. disapproves of the proposed marriage of the duke of York, 783. Mademoiselle thought of for the king, ib. the marquis of Ormond's and chancellor of the exchequer's exceptions against this match, 784. the king well inclined to it, ib. both these designs come to nothing, ib. offers to join the Dutch in their war with the English parliament, 786. his proposal declined, 787. orders sir G. Carteret to surrender Jersey on conditions, ib. allows the marquis of Clanrickard to retire from his government of Ireland, 791. Cromwell prosecutes his party, 797. his condition abroad, 803. 809. thinks of retreating out of France, but whether was the question, 803. makes Wilmot earl of Rochester, and sends him to the diet at Ratisbon, ib. sends a commission to the earl of Glencarne in Scotland, 804. who is unable to effect any thing, ib. quashes the designs of the Scotch presbyterians and of the Roman catholics against the chancellor of the exchequer, 806. his discourse with cardinal de Retz, ib. makes lord Herbert lord keeper of the great seal at his mother's desire, 807. refuses to reappoint Mr. Long secretary of state, ib. acquits the chancellor of the exchequer of the charge of having conferred with Cromwell, 808. his avowal of his disinclination to business, and his exculpation of the chancellor from the charge of having used disrespectful language against him, 809. reasons for his removal into Germany, 810. a private supply of money sent to him from England, ib. receives all his arrears from France, 811. Stephen Fox appointed to manage his money, 812. lord Herbert resigns his office to him, 813. leaves the duke of Gloucester with the queen at her desire, ib. quits Paris, 814. a foolish project for his marriage, ib. his reception at Cambray, 815. passes through Flanders without being noticed by the archduke, ib. advises his friends in England to remain quiet, 816, 817. arrives at Spa, where he meets with the princess of Orange, 816. a small subsidy granted him by the diet in Germany, ib. improvement in his family expenses, 817. removes to Aken, ib. gives his signet to secretary Nicholas, ib. his reply to the chancellor of the exchequer's suggestion that he should return to the Highlands of Scotland, ib. removes to Cologne with his sister, by invitation of the citizens, 818. his way of life there, 820. entertained by the duke of Newburgh, 819. brings his sister to Santen, where they part, and he returns to Cologne, 220. sends for the duke of Gloucester from France, as his mother was attempting to make him a catholic, ib. his declaration as to the enforcement of the laws against the catholics, 822. an insurrection designed by some of his party in England, ib. he goes to Zealand to be ready, 823. the rising at Salisbury, 824. its failure, 825. ill success of the design in the north under the earl of Rochester, 826. the king returns to Cologne, 827. his designs betrayed to Cromwell by

Manning, ib. the risings of his party advantageous to Cromwell, 830. Cromwell's order for decimating the property of his party, ib. his declaration in justification, ib. the king caused an answer to be made to it, 831. he stayed at Cologne about two years, ib. goes into Flanders, and treats with the archduke, 835. makes a treaty with Spain, ib. removes to Bruges in consequence, 836. state of his affairs in Flanders, 844. raises four regiments of his subjects there, 845. declines for the future the pension from France, ib. appoints sir H. Bennet his envoy to Madrid, 847. makes the chancellor of the exchequer lord chancellor, 848. transactions of his friends in England, ib. jealousies amongst them, 849. Mr. Stapley's engagement for him, ib. Mr. Mor-daunt active for him, ib. the address of the anabaptists to him, 852. their propositions annexed to it, 855. the letter sent to him by one individual with the address, 856. the result, 857. his desire of joining the Spanish army refused, 858, 860. present in the attempt upon Mardyke, ib. leaves Bruges, and removes to Brussels, 858. retires to Hochstraten, 860. returns to Brussels upon hearing of Cromwell's death, 861. all cavaliers banished twenty miles from London, 868. his party begin to move after Cromwell's son had been put aside by the parliament, ib. their designs, 868. discovery of the treachery of sir Richard Willis, 869. the king removes to Calais, afterwards to the coast of Bretagne, to be ready to go over into England, 870, 871. disappointment of all the designs in his favour, 870. except the seizure of Chester by sir George Booth, 871. who is routed by Lambert, and Chester taken, ib. resolves to attend the conference between the Spanish and French favourites, 872, 874. cardinal Mazarine advises against it, ib. begins his journey, ib. goes by mistake to Saragossa, 877. returns to Fuentarabia, ib. well received by don Lewis de Haro, ib. cardinal Mazarine would not see him, ib. returns to Brussels, ib. thoughts of persuading the king to turn catholic, in order to be restored by foreign catholic princes, 878. ill state of his affairs abroad, ib. lord Jermyn comes to him with compliments from the cardinal, ib. the affairs of England after the defeat of sir G. Booth, ib. his affairs more desperate upon the return of the parliament that had been interrupted by Lambert, 885. his condition at Brussels, ib. and the state of his affairs, 890. the council of states' kind behaviour to the king's friends after the dissolution of parliament, 891. Monk sends sir J. Greenvil to negotiate with the king, 895. his deliberations upon the terms proposed, 896. removes to Breda as Monk required, 895, 897. the Spaniards' design to seize him discovered, ib. his letter to the general and army, 898. and to the house of commons, ib. his declaration, 900. his letter to the house of lords, ib. and to the fleet, 901. and to the lord mayor and aldermen of London, ib. declaration of the king's party had great effect, 902. his letter and declaration joyfully received by parliament, 904. and by the city, army, and navy, ib. the answer of the house of commons to him, ib. extraordinary change in his favour, 905. is proclaimed king, 906. many addresses to him, ib. Montague's message to him, ib. the marquis of Carracena invites him back to Brussels, 907. his answer, ib. invites him again, but in vain, ib. cardinal Mazarine persuades the queen-mother to send lord Jermyn to invite him into France, ib. his answer, ib. the States General congratulate his coming to Breda, and the States of Holland invite him to the Hague, ib. whither he goes, 908. his reception and entertainment there, ib. a committee of lords and commons wait on him there, to invite him to return to the throne, ib. also a deputation from the city, 909. and certain presbyterian divines, ib. their public audience, ib. and private discourses with him, ib. his reply to them, ib. embarks for England, 910. arrives at Dover, ib. goes through the city to Whitehall, ib. where the two houses waited on him, ib. (See Ireland, Parliament, and Scotland.) Charles Louis, elector palatine, (see Elector.) Chater, colonel, 662. Chaucer, Geoffrey, Donnington Castle near Newbury, his house, 420. Cheshire, the condition of, at the end of 1642, 347. Chester, the king very dutifully received there, 304. his horse routed there by Pointz, 576. seized by sir G. Booth for Charles II, 871. retaken by Lambert, ib. Cheynel, Francis, 523. Chichester possessed by the king's forces, 340. surrendered to sir W. Waller, ib. Chichester, Arthur lord, 89. Chichester, earl of, (see lord Duns-more.) Chigi, cardinal, chosen pope, and assumed the name of Alexander VII, 821. Chillingworth, William, notice of his work against the church of Rome, 31. his death and character, 479. Cholmeley, or Cholmondley, sir

Hugh, one of the northern members of the house of commons, 76, 96, 119, 126. a fast friend to sir J. Hotham, 206. revolts to the king, after having done great service to the parliament, 347. had espoused that party owing to his friendship with Hotham, ib. Cholmeley, sir Henry, 206. one of the committee appointed by parliament to wait upon Charles II. at the Hague, 908. Cholmondley, (see Cholmeley.) Christian IV., (see king of Denmark.) Christina, queen of Sweden, purchased the choice of the medals and jewels, and some pictures, that belonged to Charles I, 700. received the parliament's agent with great joy and pomp, ib. 739. made an alliance with them, ib. Chudleigh, sir George, 341, 397, 398. Chudleigh, James, major-general of the parliament forces in the west, 343, 397. his conduct at the battle of Stratton, 398. accused by the earl of Stamford of betraying him, ib. goes over to the king in consequence, 399. some account of him, ib. his death a great loss to the king's service, 449. Church of England, king Charles's attachment to, 33. hostile feeling entertained against it, for engrossing civil situations, 40. feeling of the leaders of the popular party towards the church, 93. assembly of divines in 1642, to reform the church, how appointed, 212. character of most of its members, 213. (See Bishops, Episcopacy, and Clergy.) Churches, foreign, in England, notice of their origin, 327. checked, 328. Chute Forest in Hampshire given to Weston, earl of Portland, by Charles I, 21. Cirencester taken by prince Rupert, 340. seized upon by the earl of Essex, 428. Civil law, no reason for its having more connection with the church than common law, 122. Clanrickard, Ulrick de Burgh, marquis of, earl of St. Alban's, notice of his character, 774. a zealous Roman catholic, ib. is prevailed upon to become deputy of Ireland, 775. does all that is possible to support the king's government, 789. he renounces his consent to the treaty that had been made with the duke of Lorraine, 790. discovers a correspondence between the popish clergy and Ludlow, managed by a friar, ib. sends the earl of Castlehaven to give an account of all to the king, 791. the king sends him leave to retire, ib. goes into England, and dies within a year, ib. Clare, John Holles, second earl of, one of the lords that signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. joins the king at Oxford, 419, 423. had been with him at York, and by his leave had gone to London, 422. notice of his character, ib. present at the siege of Gloucester, 423. and at the battle of Newbury, 435. allowed to attend the councils of war, ib. returns to London, 437, 451. how received by parliament, ib.

Clarendon, earl of, (see Hyde.)

Clarges, one of the persons sent by the committee of safety to general Monk, 881.

Clark, — groom of the prince's bedchamber, 15, 26.

Clarke, sir William, killed in the fight at Cropredy bridge, 489.

Claypole, Mrs., her death, 861.

Clement IX. pope, (see J. Rospi-gliosi.)

Clergy, high character of in the reign of Charles I., though somewhat indiscreet in their court sermons, 31. animosity of certain great lawyers against the clergy, 122. which produced great mischief, ib. how far the clergy brought it on themselves, ib. remarks on this feeling, ib. 123. how the clergy were treated by the puritanical party, 213. the clergy on the side of parliament chiefly instrumental in infuriating the people against the king and his party, 297. instances of their violence, 298.

Clerk of the market of the king's household, an act of parliament respecting, 114.

Clerks, (see Six Clerks.)

Cleve, duchy of, 819.

Cleve, duke of, 819.

Cleveland, Thomas Wentworth, earl of, notice of his character, 484. makes an unsuccessful attempt upon Abingdon, ib. his part in the fight at Cropredy-bridge, 489.

Clobery, — appointed by Monk a commissioner to treat with the officers of the army at London, 881.

Clogher, Ever Mac Mahon, titular bishop of, carried before Ireton, and by his order hanged, 773.

Clotworthy, sir John, 120. inveighs in parliament against the earl of Strafford, 69. committed to prison by the house of commons, 690.

Clubmen in Somerset and Dorset-shire, 556.

Cobbet, colonel, sent by the committee of safety into Scotland to Monk, 881. imprisoned by him, ib. taken prisoner when Lambert's party were dispersed, 892.

Cohogan, father, manages a correspondence between the popish Irish clergy and Ludlow, 790.

Coke, sir Edward, blasphemously called the duke of Buckingham our Saviour, 3.

Coke, George, bishop of Hereford

one of the bishops who signed the petition and protestation respecting their constrained absence from the house of lords, 141.

Coke, sir John, secretary of state, his character, 26, 49. the odium of the failure of the Scotch expedition thrown upon him, 49, 51. removed from his post in consequence by the interest of the queen, in opposition to the earl of Strafford, 51.

Colchester delivered up by Charles II.'s party to Fairfax, 664.

Colepepper, sir John, 426, 483, 545, 565, 566, 572, 573, 575, 584, 586, 587, 594, 595. made chancellor of the exchequer, 136, 147. his character, 136, 147, 371, 671. slanderously reported to be a Roman catholic, 137. inclined through the king's imprudence to take no part in public affairs, 145. counselled the king that the only way to preserve the church was to pass the bill against the bishops' votes, 171. one of the counsellors who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. one of those who carried the king's message for peace to parliament, 292. censured for being in favour of the siege of Gloucester, 421, 434. one of those appointed by the king to inquire into the charges brought against the duke of Hamilton, 473. and of those whom he consulted in his military affairs, 483, 495. Wilmot jealous of him, 482, 488, 495. prince Rupert hostile to him, 511, 655, 671. made a baron, to the offence of the court and army, 512, 520. the king confers most particularly with him, as to sending the prince of Wales away from himself, 513. named by him one of the prince's council, 514. one of the commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. sent to settle disputes at Taunton, 545. one of the commissioners to examine the allegations against sir R. Greenvil, 548. waits on the king to Brecknock, 564. his conversation with the chancellor of the exchequer as to the benefit the king might obtain by liberating the duke of Hamilton, 588. changed his opinion in favour of the prince of Wales's going to France, 595. sent with lord Capel to dissuade the queen from sending for the prince into France, ib. their success, 598. he alone of the privy-council accompanied him into France, 604. the king, upon hearing that it was Colepepper's advice that he should give up the church, said he had no religion, 606. attends the prince to the fleet, 648. trusted by the queen to keep the prince firm in his dependence on the presbyterian party, 649. how concerned in the divisions in the prince's fleet, 659.

his quarrel with prince Rupert respecting sir R. Walsh, 671. had been sent to Moscow to borrow money, 778.

Cologne, character of its inhabitants, 818. was the staple for the wines of that country, ib. the elector's residence is at the castle of Bonne, about four miles from the city, ib. description of the city, ib. Charles II. fixed his abode here by invitation of the citizens, ib. where he remained about two years, 831.

Cologne, elector of, his character, 818, 819.

Colvil, — 52.

Committee of safety for treating with the Scots at Rippon, 62. meet and transact, 63. commissioners of the four associated western counties meet the prince of Wales at Bridgewater, 546. result of their consultations, ib. commissioners of Devon complain of sir Richard Greenvil, 548. commissioners of Scotland protest against the four acts which the parliament sent to the king to pass, 628. their private treaty with the king at Hampton Court, 634. which was renewed and signed by him at the Isle of Wight, ib. substance of it, ib. commissioners sent from parliament into Scotland, 644. commissioners sent to the prince of Wales from the city with a petition, 657. seven commissioners to govern the army appointed by parliament, 879. Monk appoints three commissioners to treat with the committee of safety of the army at London, 881.

Committee of state, in 1640, of whom composed, 60. a committee of both houses appointed to treat with the Scottish commissioners, 76. the committee appointed by parliament receive Charles I. from the Scots at Newark, 608. committee of the Scots parliament order Monroe to disband, 662. committee of safety constituted by the army, 880. their operations, 881. the committee of the lords and commons wait upon Charles II. at the Hague, 908. (see Parliament.)

Common-Prayer, Book of, a bill for its disuse negated in the house of commons, 117. (see Liturgy.)

Commons, house of, forty members required to make a house, 117. (see Parliament.)

Communion-table, disputes and differences arising from its removal from the body of the church, 38. archbishop Laud zealous for the alteration, 39. opposed chiefly by bishop Williams, ib. ordered by the house of commons, notwithstanding the dissent of the house of lords, to be again altered, 117. Compton, James lord, afterwards third earl of Northampton, 188, 350, 510. wounded at the battle on Hopton-heath, 350. defeats

- some forces at Banbury, 388. present at the fight at Cropredy-bridge, 489. Banbury castle relieved by him, 507.
- Compton, sir Thomas, married the countess of Buckingham, 18.
- Compton, sir William, 655. bravely defended Banbury, 506.
- Con, — 60, 127.
- Condé, prince of, 725, 726, 781, 782, 784, 814, 859, 860, 873. appeased the sedition at Paris, 725. one of a cabal against the court, ib. imprisoned, 731, 732. had won the battle of Rocroix, 734. marquis of Lusignon styled his ambassador at the Spanish court, 750. liberated, 781. visited Charles II. and his mother with many professions of civility, 782. his altered conduct, ib. the duke of Lorraine's retreat broke the neck of his design, ib. unsatisfied with the proceedings in Flanders, 834. tells the Spaniards what steps Turenne would take at Dunkirk, 859. but not hearkened to, ib. one of the difficulties in the Spanish and French treaty relative to him, 873. how settled, 874, 875.
- Coniers, or Conyers, sir John, 115, 118, 220, 225, 427. recommended by the house of commons to Charles I. for the lieutenancy of the Tower, 154, 168. who consents to it, ib. had been lieutenant-general of the king's horse in his last preparation against the Scots, and governor of Berwick, 427.
- Conti, prince of, imprisoned, 732. liberated, 781. Pezenas belonged to him, 867. was governor of Languedoc, ib. anecdote of his conversation with Richard Cromwell, ib.
- Convocation, its sitting continued after the dissolution of parliament, 60. makes canons, ib. by which prejudice is excited against the whole body of the clergy, ib. its canons allowed by the council, 82. condemned by the house of commons, ib.
- Conwallis, sir Charles, 754.
- Conway, Edward, first viscount, removed from the secretary's office, 16.
- Conway, Edward, second viscount, 423, 461. general of the horse in the second expedition against the Scotch covenanters, 57. notice of him, ib. thought highly of by archbishop Laud, ib. shamefully routed at Newburn, 58. how far concerned in Mr. Waller's and Tomkins' design, 389, 391, 393. left London, and resorted to the king at Oxford, 419.
- Cony, — an eminent fanatic, 862.
- Conyers, lord, (see lord Darcy.)
- Conyers, (see Coniers.)
- Cookein, captain, 408.
- Cooper, sir Anthony Ashley, afterwards earl of Shaftsbury, 884. notice of him, 426. appointed governor of Weymouth after some demur, ib. joined the parliament in consequence of his removal from that post, 488. the command of the Tower intrusted to him and others by parliament, 884. one of the committee sent by parliament to wait upon Charles II. at the Hague, 908.
- Coot, or Coots, sir Charles, defended Londonderry for the parliament, 744. president of Connaught, 903. favourably disposed towards Charles II, ib.
- Cope, Isabel, countess of Holland, 26.
- Copley, colonel, defeats lord Digby at Sherborne, 578. as commissary-general imprisoned by parliament, 690.
- Corbet, — 903.
- Coriton, — one of the commissioners for the associated county of Cornwall, 546.
- Cork basely delivered up to Cromwell, 736.
- Cork, Richard Boyle, first earl of, 88.
- Coronation; form of the oath taken by the kings of England at their coronation, 233, 250.
- Cosins, John, afterwards bishop of Durham, forbid to officiate to the protestants in the queen's family at Paris, 757. the queen had some personal exceptions against him, 758.
- Costaloe, viscount, (see viscount Dillon of Costello.)
- Cotterell, colonel, his conduct as the parliamentary governor of Pontefract castle, 667. colonel Morrice surprises the castle, 667, 668.
- Cottingham, sir Francis, afterwards lord, 90, 92, 423, 671, 714, 777. selected to attend prince Charles in his journey to Spain, 7. what situations he had filled, ib. his opinion against the journey, ib. the duke of Buckingham's behaviour to him in consequence, ib. his advocating the Spanish match the cause of Buckingham's avowed hostility to him, 14. his reply to the duke's avowal, ib. how far afterwards reconciled, ib. chancellor of the exchequer, 40. thwarts archbishop Laud as a commissioner of the treasury, ib. and exposes his irascibility, 40, 41. opposes the king's making a park between Richmond and Hampton Court, 40. one of the committee of state during the king's expedition against Scotland, 60. why unpopular, 61. why he resigned the chancellorship of the exchequer, and the mastership of the wards, 84, 85, 92, 105, 136. resident at Rouen, 646. had still the title of lord high treasurer of England, ib. proceeds to Dieppe, ib. after being captured and plundered, and after many attempts to go to the prince in the Downs, he joins him at the Hague on his re- turn, 659. conference between him and the chancellor of the exchequer concerning the king's sending an embassy to Spain, 714. he and the chancellor appointed ambassadors through his management, 715. how provided with money for their embassy, 718. they set out, ib. visit the duke of Lorraine at Brussels, ib. his dexterity prevails with the duke to furnish a loan, 719. they wait for the king's arrival at St. Germain's, 720. their reception there, ib. his ingenious method of dissuading the king from making colonel Windham secretary of state, 721. their departure from St. Germain's, 725. his conference with cardinal Mazarine, ib. they begin their journey for Spain, and arrive at Bourdeaux, 725, 726. their reception at St. Sebastian's, 726. their passes are sent to them, 727. they proceed on their journey, ib. their arrival at Madrid, ib. his interview with don Lewis de Haro, 728. they visit the toros, &c. 729. their interview with the king, 732. they have a house assigned them, ib. their private audience and demands, 733. the answer they receive, ib. ordered by Charles II. to stay where they were, 739. they acquaint the king of Spain with their master's resolution for Scotland, ib. his answer, ib. they expostulate with don Lewis about Aecham's coming to Spain as agent of the English parliament, 748. they write to him about Aecham's murder, ib. his answer, ib. they are desired by the king of Spain to be gone, 752. they apply to don Lewis, ib. the reason of their being required to depart in such haste, ib. his desire of remaining and dying in Spain, ib. reason of the discountenance he met with at the Spanish court, ib. had turned Roman catholic when formerly in Spain, and reverted to protestantism on his return to England, 753. reconciled again to the church of Rome, ib. they have audience of leave, ib. he is allowed to live at Valladolid, ib. his death, ib. his character, ib. was of an incomparable temper, 14, 40. and of the most profound dissimulation, ib.
- Cotton, sir Thomas, 191, 703.
- Covenant, the Scottish, 45. a vow and covenant taken by both houses of parliament upon discovery of Mr. Waller's and Tomkins' design, 392. and throughout the city and army, 393. a covenant proposed by the Scots between the two kingdoms, and agreed to, 438. subscribed by the lords and commons, and their assembly of divines, 439. a copy of it, ib. ordered to be taken by others, especially by the city, 440.
- Covenanters, Scottish, (see Scotland.)

Coventry, sir Thomas, afterwards first lord, 22, 61, 104. his character and rise, 19. his high reputation as keeper of the great seal, ib. 53. his death, ib.

Coventry, Thomas, second lord, one of the lords who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. sent into the western parts, 287.

Coventry and Litchfield, bishop of, (see Robert Wright.)

Council; a great council of peers summoned to York, 59. ill consequences of the disrespect towards Charles I.'s council of state, 444. a council settled for the prince of Wales, 514. council of officers, (see Army.) common-council, (see London.)

Council-table, its powers enlarged, 28. lord keeper Finch's declaration in its favour, 30. prejudicial to it, ib.

Counsellors, (see Privy-Counsellors.)

Counties; divers counties enter upon exercising the power of the militia, 174. condition of the counties between Oxford and York at the close of 1642, 348. the association of several counties formed under the earl of Manchester, 480. state of the western counties when the prince of Wales took the command of them, 531, 542.

Court, state of, at the beginning of Charles I.'s reign, 4. a prospect of the court and the ministers after the duke of Buckingham's death, 19. no ladies as yet intermeddle in public affairs, ib. the state of affairs at court in 1640, 59. which was full of faction, ib. correspondence between the court and some officers of the army, 98. (see Army.) court at Oxford, its state of scarcity and poverty in 1645, 660.

Courtney, sir William, 555.

Crane, sir ——— 302.

Cranfeild, Lionel, (see earl of Middlesex.)

Craven, William lord, afterwards earl, 616.

Crawford, Ludovick Lindsay, fifteenth earl of, 404, 405. taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester, 780.

Crawford, earl of, (see earl of Lindsay.)

Creed, major, 880, 892.

Crey, duke of, 860.

Creswell, sergeant, 838.

Crew, ——— 110, 219. one of the parliament commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. notice of him, 529. was in favour of the self-denying ordinance, 532.

Crisp, sir Nicholas, one of the citizens of London who resorted to the king at Oxford, 390. notice of him, ib.

Crofts, William, (afterwards lord,) 157, 657, 778. (as lord,) 814.

Cromwell, Henry, 903, 841. made by his father lord lieutenant of Ireland, 799, 903. very popular there, 816, 867. submits to the parliament, contrary to their expectations, and resigns his lieutenantancy, ib.

Cromwell, Oliver, 125, 515, 530, 543, 544, 550, 623, 626, 627, 628, 631, 634, 643, 646, 648, 653, 658, 661, 662, 663, 665, 666, 668, 669, 670, 677, 678, 681, 686, 687, 691, 700, 705, 706, 708, 709, 710, 715, 724, 737, 738, 750, 751, 752, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 761, 762, 773, 788, 793, 805, 808, 809, 810, 811, 816, 823, 825, 826, 828, 829, 831, 833, 835, 836, 837, 846, 849, 850, 851, 852, 857, 860, 861, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 872, 873, 879, 880, 881, 884, 886, 892, 897, 902. little taken notice of in parliament, 1641, 125. his declaration that he would have left the country, if the remonstrance against the king had not passed the commons, ib. appointed to command the horse of the association of several counties under the earl of Manchester, 481. wounded at the battle of Marston-moor, 491. charges the earl of Manchester with cowardice, 514. who charges him with designs against the parliament, ib. he and Vane and Ireton leaders of the independents, 515, 532, 590. his speech in favour of the self-denying ordinance, 516, 532. assures parliament that sir T. Fairfax was fully equal to be their general, 518. how he retains his commission notwithstanding the self-denying ordinance, 542. and new models the army, ib. commanded the right wing of the horse at the battle of Naseby, 553. takes Winchester and Basing, 588. his friendship with cardinal Mazarine, 606, 699, 810, 846. instigates the army against the parliament, 609. declared head of the army, 610. his behaviour at first in the mutinies of the army against parliament, 611. frustrates the parliament's intention of seizing him by returning to the army, ib. appeared in the council of officers, 613. Fairfax entirely resigned himself to him, 614. his behaviour to the king, ib. the army wholly disposed to his designs, 616. the earl of Manchester particularly odious to him, 618. visits the king oftener at Hampton Court, 620. he and Ireton, who steered the whole council of officers, resolved never to trust the king, nor to do any thing towards his restoration, 623. he and Ireton at least outwitted Ashburnham with respect to the king, 626, 627. whom he afterwards imprisoned, ib. fearful lest the agitators, by whose means he had effected his designs, should no longer be controlled by him, 628. suppresses a tumult of the levellers, ib. his speech against the king in parliament, on his refusing to pass four acts sent to him by parliament, 630. his meeting with his officers, wherein they design the king's destruction, ib. he made every thing, right or wrong, subservient to his ends, 637. observations on his conduct as subservient to his own ends, 638. was a great preacher, 640. got lord Lisle sent lord lieutenant into Ireland, 641. opposes sir W. Waller's being appointed to succeed lord Lisle, ib. and proposes Lambert, 642. the marquis of Argyle makes a fast friendship with him and Vane, ib. foreseeing a war with Scotland, he nevertheless did not garrison Berwick or Carlisle, 653. owing to his perfect contempt for the Scotch, ib. advances against them, 654. leaving Ireton to watch Fairfax and the army in Kent, 655. defeats sir M. Langdale near Preston, 658. and routs duke Hamilton at Uxeter, ib. marches into Scotland, 662. his declaration of his intentions, ib. is received at Edinburgh, ib. returns to England, leaving his friend Argyle to settle affairs, 663. endeavours to prevent the parliament from repealing their votes of no more addresses to the king, 666. reasons that obliged him to be present in parliament, and to leave the siege of Pontefract castle to Lambert, ib. his great loss in Rainsborough, 669. the house of peers had little to do after his return from Scotland, 691. he long after endeavoured in vain to erect a new house of peers of his own creation, 692. placed much confidence in Harrison, who owed his rise to him, 693. outwitted Fairfax, and made use of him in compassing the king's death, 696. employed and contemned sir J. Danvers, ib. causes duke Hamilton's petition for his life to be rejected by the house of commons, 702. as also the earl of Holland's, ib. votes against lord Capel's similar petition, for the good of the commonwealth, ib. supposed to have agreed with Argyle when in Scotland to keep the king in perpetual imprisonment, 707. was to have been excepted in Charles II.'s proposed declaration, 718. made lord lieutenant of Ireland, 723. how brought about, ib. his hypocrisy as to this appointment, ib. provides forces for his going thither, 724. arrives at Dublin, ib. is obliged to take Tredagh by storm, 736. marches into Munster, ib. Cork betrayed to him, ib. the whole province submits to him, 737. France grew every day into a closer correspondence with him, ib. Christina queen of Sweden expressed a great esteem for him, 739. makes great use of the animosities amongst the Irish, 744. gives the Irish leave to transport themselves into any foreign prince's service, 744, 745. what use he had made of the levellers, 745. sent for by the parliament out of Ireland, leaves Ireton his deputy, 750, 773. made general upon Fairfax's resignation, 750. the Scots raise an army against him, ib. he enters Scotland, 751. the distress of his army, ib. entirely routs the Scots at Dunbar, ib. enters Edinburgh, ib. endeavours to fight the king's army, 759. gains a pass and gets behind the king, ib. who thereupon marches into England, without his knowing it till a day afterwards, 760. his resolutions and counsels upon this news, ib. orders Lambert to follow the king with a body of the horse, ib. leaves Monk in Scotland, ib. 780. and follows the king three days after, 760. defeats him at Worcester, 764. supposed by some to have corrupted Lesley the king's general, 765. an argument against it, ib. returned in triumph to London, and received with universal joy, ib. discountenances the presbyterians from the time of his being chosen general, 775. causes several high courts of justice to be erected, ib. grieved and vexed at the escape of Middleton and Massey, 780. Saint-John his confidant, 784. never zealous for the war with the Dutch, but governed in it by Saint-John, 787. his successes abroad, 787, 788. his reason for keeping the better quarter with cardinal Mazarine, 788. Ireton by his obstinacy often prevailed over Cromwell, ib. and was so thorough a republican, that had he lived he would have opposed his schemes, ib. the parliament not so obedient to him as he expected, 791. he erects another council of officers who expostulate with them about their dissolution, 792. he and they dissolve them, ib. his behaviour on this occasion, 793. his declaration to the people, ib. what would have been the consequence had not Cromwell now made himself a tyrant, 794. he and his council choose a new parliament, ib. calls them together by his own warrant, ib. and delivers them an instrument for their authority, ib. they deliver up their power to him, 795. he is made protector by his council, ib. and by Lambert's support, 879. installed according to an instrument of government, 795. takes an oath to observe it, ib. proclaimed, 796. entertained by the city, ib. his fleets twice victorious against the Dutch, ib. his reception of the Dutch commissioners, ib. makes peace with them, 797.

makes Portugal send an ambassador for peace, ib. prosecutes the king's party, ib. general discontents in the nation against him, ib. a high court of justice erected for the better establishment of his empire, to try persons accused of holding correspondence with Charles Stuart, 798. has the brother of the Portuguese ambassador beheaded for a murder, 798, 799. makes his son Henry lord lieutenant of Ireland, 799, 841. disputes among his own party, 799. especially the levellers, ib. calls a parliament after a new method, ib. substance of his speech to them, 800. chooses Lenthall their speaker, ib. his speech to them upon their questioning the validity of his government, ib. admits none into the house but such as subscribed an engagement to him, 801. dissolves them, ib. his conduct with respect to Wildman, ib. and with respect to Lillburn, 802. his treaty with France, 803. his friendship coveted by Spain, ib. 815. falsely suspected of having poisoned the princess Elizabeth, 812. allows the duke of Gloucester to transport himself beyond sea, ib. state of affairs relating to him and his army, 815, 817. Lambert thought to be before him in the army's affections, 816. Monk had the absolute command of Scotland, and was his rival already, ib. manifestation of the general aversion to his government, 824. alarmed at the rising at Salisbury, 825. his proceedings after its failure, ib. all the king's designs betrayed to him by Manning, 827. his advantage by the risings of the king's party, 830. his order for decimating the property of the king's party, ib. his declaration in justification, ib. the decimation exceedingly lucrative, 831. the king caused an answer to be made to the declaration, ib. which obliged the nation to look upon Cromwell as a detestable enemy, who was to be removed by any way, ib. the condition of Scotland under him, ib. of Ireland, ib. of England, 832. sends out two great fleets, one under Pen, the other under Blake, ib. their orders, 833. the marquis of Leyda sent ambassador by Spain to him, who after a month returns to Flanders, ib. the fleet under Pen and Venables unsuccessful against Hispaniola, ib. successful at Jamaica, 834. that under Blake prosperous against Algiers and Tunis, ib. unusually discomposed at the failure at Hispaniola, ib. commits Pen and Venables to the Tower, ib. sends recruits to Jamaica, ib. finishes his alliance with France, ib. disturbed with the divisions in his army, 836. constitutes his major-generals, ib. their power, ib. part of the Spanish West India fleet captured, ib. summons parliament, 837. imposes a subscription upon the members, 837. jealous of Lambert, ib. a proposition in parliament to make him king, ib. feelings of the different parties on this point, ib. Lambert and his party oppose this overture, and some of his own relations, 838. a committee appointed to confer with him upon it, ib. their audience with him, ib. what persons chiefly deterred him from accepting it, 839. he refuses it, 840. what would probably have been the consequence of his acceptance, ib. is confirmed protector by the humble petition and advice of parliament, ib. contents of the petition, ib. his speech on passing it, 841. his inauguration, ib. he adjourns his parliament, ib. his actions in the interim, ib. his daughters disposed of in marriage, 842. allows them, after the public ceremonies were performed, to be privately married according to the form in the Book of Common Prayer, ib. success of his arms abroad, ib. his fleet victorious over the Spanish at Santa Cruz, ib. buries admiral Blake with great pomp, 843. addresses the parliament on its meeting again, ib. the house of commons readmit certain members that had been excluded, whereby many of his bitterest enemies sat again in the house, ib. he dissolves the parliament, as it was disposed to question his authority, having spoken to them in vain, 843, 844. turns Lambert out of the army, 844. abridges the power of his major-generals, ib. acquaints the lord mayor &c. of the city with a plot of the cavaliers, and of the marquis of Ormond's being in England, ib. 849. apprehends several persons, ib. his severities towards them, 851, 852. what was supposed to have been promised him in his alliance with France, 846. John Lisle his entire confidant and instrument, 850. finds new enemies amongst the sectaries, 852. Sexby had so great interest with him, that he was frequently his bedfellow, 858. a familiarity he often admitted those to, whom he employed in any great trust, ib. the French king takes Dunkirk, and delivers it into the hands of Lockhart, whom he appointed governor, 860. his affairs sometime before his death, 861. his domestic delights lessened every day, ib. his son Falconbridge's heart was set upon an interest destructive to his, and grew to hate him perfectly, ib. his daughter Claypole's death the source of great sorrow to him, ib. is seized with an ague, ib. appoints his son Richard his successor and expires,

- ib.* a terrible storm on the day of his death, 862. his character, ib. two instances of his interest among foreign princes, 863. conclusion of his character, 864. Monk had remained firm to him, 882. Mountague completely gained over by him, 893. the parliament of 1660 begin their proceedings with invectives against him, 903. anecdotes of Cromwell's guiding Ingoldsby's pen in signing the death warrant of Charles I., 906.
- Cromwell, Richard, made a privy counsellor by the protector, and chancellor of the university of Oxford, having lived retired before, 841. appointed by the protector to be his successor, 861. quiet beginning of his government, 864. calls a parliament, ib. differences in it, 865. a new council of officers meet, who consult about the government, ib. their address to him, ib. seconded by the city militia, ib. votes of the parliament upon it, ib. the officers advise him to dissolve the parliament, ib. advice to him to the contrary, 866. he issues out a proclamation to that purpose, ib. whereupon he was no longer regarded as protector, ib. his assent to the question from parliament, whether he submitted to their authority, 867. after Charles's restoration he is obliged to go abroad on account of his debts, ib. anecdote of his visit to the prince of Conti, ib.
- Cromwell, Mary, married viscount Falconbridge, 842. intercedes in vain with her father to save Dr. Hewet's life, 852.
- Croptredy-bridge, fight at, 489.
- Crown, jewels of the, the parliament's order against pawning them, 256.
- Cumberland, Henry Clifford, last earl of, one of the lords who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 262. invested by the king with the command in Yorkshire, at the request of the gentry, 288. his character, ib. 346, 493. one of those excepted against by parliament from being included in any conditions of peace, 300. offers to give up the command in Yorkshire to the earl of Newcastle, 346.
- Cunningham, — 474.
- D
- Dacres, lord, one of the few peers who attended parliament at the end of 1643, 467.
- Dalbeer, — the earl of Holland chiefly depended on him in his rising at Kingston, 663. killed at St. Neot's, 664.
- Dalkeith, lady, (Agnes Keith) afterwards countess of Morton, governess to princess Henrietta, 495. carried her secretly into France to the queen, 620, 811.
- Danby, Henry Danvers, earl of, 696.
- Danvers, sir John, notice of, 696.
- Darcy, Marmaduke, 824, 826.
- Darmstadt, (see Hesse Darmstadt.)
- Dartmouth taken by prince Maurice, 449.
- Davenant, sir William, sent from the queen to Charles I. to persuade him to give up the church, 606. rebuked by Charles for speaking slightly of the church, ib.
- Dausk, captain, 464.
- Dean, admiral, originally a common mariner, appointed with two others to the command of a fleet by Cromwell, 796. killed in an engagement with the Dutch, ib.
- Debates in the council at Oxford, how the lords who went over from the parliament to the king should be received, 420. in the prince of Wales's council concerning his going to France, 603.
- Declaration of some ministers against the government of the church by bishops, 81. of the commons touching their five members accused of treason by the king, 150. of both houses of parliament to the king respecting the causes of their fears and jealousies, 177. his answer, 180. his declaration from York, March 9, 1641, 184. his answer to the parliament's declaration and votes concerning Hull, 204. the declaration of the two houses about the militia, May 5, 1642, 208. the king's declaration in answer, 209. the two houses' declaration concerning a reformation of the liturgy, 212. the declaration or remonstrance of the lords and commons, May 19, 1642, 218. and May 26, 230. the king's answer to that of May 19, 239. and to that of May 26, 246. his declaration to the lords attending him at York, June 13, 262. his declaration of June 15, disavowing any intention of war, ib. the declaration of the lords and counsellors to the same effect, ib. the king's declaration thereupon, 263. the parliament's declaration to the city upon a letter from the king to the lord mayor and aldermen, 268. the king's reply, ib. the two houses' declaration to the kingdom, 294. and to the subjects of Scotland, 315. the king's message to the privy council of Scotland upon occasion of this declaration, 323. the two houses' declaration concerning their general's acceptable service, 321. the substance of their declaration to the states general of the United Provinces, 325. the king's declaration upon occasion of the former ordinance of the militia, 330. and after his victories over lord Fairfax in the north, sir W. Waller in the west, and the taking of Bristol, 411. an extract of the declaration of the kingdom of Scotland, 468. and of England and Scotland, ib. the substance of the declaration of
- the lords and commons at Oxford, 471. the parliament's declaration upon the resolutions of the council of officers, 611. afterwards raised out of their books, ib. parliament's vote of no more addresses seconded by a declaration, 631. Mr. Maynard's argument against it, ib. its effects on the minds of the people, ib. the declaration of the army about changing the frame of government, 684. another of the army sent to the house of commons, 689. declaration of the marquis of Mountrose in Scotland, 740. Cromwell's declaration to justify his decimating the property of the king's party, 830. a declaration of the council of officers to restore the long parliament, May 6, 1659, 866. the declaration of sir G. Booth and sir T. Middleton, who had seized on Chester for Charles II., 871. Charles II.'s declaration sent with his letter to the house of commons, 900. declaration of the king's party at this time, which had great effect, 902.
- Deering, sir Edward, 224. brings in a bill into the house of commons for extirpating bishops, deans, and chapters, &c. 95. which is laid by, ib. revived and committed, ib. laid aside, ib.
- Deincourt, or Dencourt, Francis Leake, lord, afterwards earl of Scarsdale, anecdote of an application made to him for money for the king, 301, 302.
- Denbigh, William Fielding, first earl of, served as a volunteer at the battle of Edge-hill, 307. died in consequence of the wounds he received at Bromicham, 383.
- Denbigh, second earl of, (see lord Fielding.)
- Denmark, Christian IV. king of, 740.
- Denmark, Frederick III. king of, favourably disposed to Charles II.'s cause, 739. why unable to give him much pecuniary aid, 740. not so much esteemed, because not so much feared as his father, ib.
- Denny, lord, 25.
- Denny, Honora, married viscount Doncaster, afterwards earl of Carlisle, 25.
- Derby, seventh earl of, (see lord Strange.)
- Derby, (Charlotte de la Tremouille,) countess of, 766.
- Desborough, — 771. opposed Cromwell's being made a king, 838. tells Richard Cromwell that he could not have both the parliament and the army his friends, and therefore he must choose which he would have, 865. appointed commissary-general of the horse by the officers of the army, 880. one of the committee of safety constituted by the army, ib.
- Deserters, observations respecting, 452.

Design discovered at London, by which Mr. Waller, Mr. Tomkins, and others meant to benefit the king, 389. the real project, 390. a vow and covenant taken by parliament on its discovery, 392. and throughout the city and army, 393. Mr. Tomkins and Mr. Chaloner executed, ib. the design not carried on also at Oxford, as pretended, ib.

Devizes besieged by sir W. Waller, 405.

Devonshire, Mountjoy, earl of, 26.

Devonshire, William Cavendish, third earl of, one of the lords who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 262.

De Wit, John, pensioner of Holland, and of the greatest influence in the public counsels, 786. an avowed enemy to the prince of Orange, ib. his advice against Charles II.'s joining the Dutch in their war with Cromwell, ib.

D'Ewa, lieutenant-colonel, killed at Reading, 382.

Differences arise between the parliament and the army, 609.

Digby, George lord, afterwards second earl of Bristol, 76, 144, 299. (as earl of Bristol,) 496, 513, 550, 580, 814, 858. opposes the bill of attainder against the earl of Strafford, though not his friend, 93. much trusted by the king, 137. his character, 137, 138, 415, 596. notice of his going over to the court party, 138. instrumental in promoting lord Falkland, sir John Colepepper, and Mr. Hyde to the king's favour, ib. his ill advice enables the violent party in the commons to recover themselves, when they had nearly ruined their own cause, 142. advises the king to accuse certain members of parliament of treason, 144. his conduct on the occasion, ib. advises the king to go to the city after them, where they had taken refuge, ib. his offer to seize them himself, ib. all the king's imprudent measures as to these members imputed to him, 151. the most universally odious man in the kingdom, ib. accused of high treason by the house of commons upon pretence of his levying war at Kingston, though he had retired abroad, 154. certain of his letters opened by the commons, 173. expressions against the parliament in them, ib. mention respecting him in several communications between the king and the parliament, 178, 185, 188, 204, 226, 234, 235, 237, 244, 245, 338. particulars of his return to England in disguise, of his capture and escape through sir John Hotham's connivance, 283. persuades sir John to favour the king's cause, 284. his feeling towards his father, 370. wounded at the siege of Litchfield cathedral, 384. his fortunate escape from an accident, 428. one of those appointed to examine into the charges brought against the duke Hamilton, 473. is much consulted by the king on military affairs, (being now secretary of state,) 482, 495. his ascendancy over sir John Colepepper, 483. lord Wilmot's hostility to him, 482, 488, 495. prince Rupert his great enemy, 511. his and Goring's motives in becoming friends, 513. the king given to understand, that the parliament would not treat if he was one of the commissioners, 518. furthers the project of the earl of Antrim's transporting troops from Ireland, and joining the earl of Mountrose in Scotland, 534, 535, 537. was the principal cause of the king's revoking prince Rupert's commission, having the chief influence on the king's councils, 577. advises that the king should retire to Newark, 578. and contrives to get himself appointed lieutenant-general of all the forces raised north of the Trent, ib. marches to Doncaster, ib. routed at Sherborne, ib. observations on this circumstance, 579. after his enterprises and disbanding in Scotland, went into Ireland, 596. arrives at Jersey from thence, ib. and tries to persuade the prince of Wales to go into Ireland, 596, 597. thence goes into France to persuade the queen to approve of this step, rather than of the prince's going into France, 597. his transactions there with the queen and cardinal Mazarine, ib. which alter his views, and he returns to Jersey to persuade the prince to go into France, 598, 599, 602, 603. his arguments for this step, 603. Charles II. partly estranged from him, by Mr. Elliot, 720. against whom he had prejudiced Charles I., ib. (as earl of Bristol) serves as a lieutenant-general in the French army, 814. ordered to leave France, 846. comes to Bruges to the king, ib. don Juan exceedingly prejudiced against him, ib. ingratiates himself with him notwithstanding, 847. instrumental in recovering St. Ghislain to the Spaniards, ib. persuades the chancellor of the exchequer to accept the great seal, 848. attends the king to Calais, 870. and afterwards to Fuentarabia, 874. persuades him to turn aside into Spain, 876. at Fuentarabia he removes all don Lewis de Haro's prejudice against him, who takes him to Madrid to be received into the Spanish service, 877. resigns the signet, on turning a Roman catholic, 898.

Digby, colonel, afterwards general sir John, 291, 297, 414, 581, 668, 669, 670. as sheriff of Nottinghamshire collects forces for the king, 289, 291. commanded the horse at the battle of Stratton, 397. routs the parliament's forces at Torrington, 425. Barnstable and Bedford yielded to him, ib. appears before Plymouth, 447, 448. where he is joined by prince Maurice, 449. who afterwards left him to block up the town, 505, 558, 570, 574. where he is dangerously wounded, 505, 560.

Digby, Kenelm, the eldest son of sir Kenelm, killed at St. Neot's, 664.

Dillon, Thomas, viscount of Costello, or Costeloe, 353.

Discontents in the nation, 1654, 797.

Dives, sir Lewis, 143, 559. wounded in a rencounter near Worcester, 299. unable to retain Newport Pannel, 447. made commander in chief of Dorsetshire, 506. surprises Weymouth, 527, 543. able to keep the rebels out of a small part of the country only, 543.

Divisions in the parliament, 1644, 514.

Doddington, sir Francis, 499.

Doleman, — 508, 509.

Doncaster, viscount, (see earl of Carlisle.)

Donnington castle, once the residence of Chaucer, 429. garrisoned by colonel Boys, ib. relieved from a siege by the king, 507.

Dorchester surrendered to the king's forces, 424.

Dorchester, marquiss of, (see viscount Newark.)

Dorchester, viscount, (see sir D. Carleton.)

Dorislans, — LL. D. an agent of the parliament, killed at the Hague by some Scottish men, 711, 742.

Dorset, Richard Sackville, third earl of, 134.

Dorset, Edward Sackville, fourth earl of, 25, 305. his character, 25. killed lord Bruce in a duel, ib. one of the lords who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. one of those that carried the king's message for peace to the parliament, 292.

Dorset, fifth earl of, (see lord Buckhurst.)

Dorset, Mary Carzon, countess of, 25. three of Charles I.'s children intrusted to her care by him, 615, 620.

Dort, synod of, observation upon, 26.

Doucet, — employed to aid the king's attempt at an escape from the Isle of Wight, 687.

Dover, Henry Carey, first earl of, one of the lords who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 262. served as a volunteer at the battle of Edge-hill, 307.

Dover, earl of, (see viscount Rochford.)

- Douglass, sir Joseph, 705.
 Downing, Dr., one of the parliament chaplains, 322. (see Marshall.)
 Drake, sir Francis, his estates in Devon granted by the king to sir R. Greenvil, 561, 562.
 Dublin blocked up by the marquis of Ormond, 722. his army beat in a sally, 723, 724. he retires before Cromwell's arrival, 724.
 Dublin, Launcelot Bulkeley, archbishop of, 465.
 Dunbar, Cromwell entirely routs the Scots there, 751.
 Dunbar, Henry Constable, first earl of, king James's first Scotch favourite, instrumental to the rise of archbishop Abbot, 36.
 Duncomb, colonel, 345.
 Dunkirk besieged by the French army, 859. the Spanish under don Juan defeated by marshal Turenne, ib. the town surrendered to the French, 860. the French king delivers it to the English, ib.
 Dunsmore, Francis Leigh, afterwards earl of Chichester, one of the commissioners to treat with the Scots at Rippon, 63. one of the lords who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. notice of his character, 371. (as earl of Chichester) one of the king's commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. notice of his creation as an earl, ib.
 Dunstar castle taken by the marquis of Hertford, 400.
 Duppa, Brian, bishop of Salisbury, 570. tutor to the prince of Wales, (Charles II.) 564.
 Duresme (Durham), bishop of, (see T. Moreton.)
 Dusseldorp, 819.
 E.
 Earl, sir Walter, 291, 424.
 Earles, Dr., 649, 827.
 Earnly, sir Michael, governor of Shrewsbury, killed when the town was betrayed to the parliament, 527.
 Edgecomb, — 584.
 Edge-hill, or Keinton, particulars of the battle of, 307.
 Edinburgh, bishopric of, erected by Charles I., 35. disliked by the people, ib.
 Edinburgh, bishop of, (see W. Forbes.)
 Edward the confessor, 250.
 Edward III, 91, 206, 223, 233, 236, 249, 252, 253, 280, 325, 452, 679.
 Edward IV, 105, 254.
 Edward VI, 90, 327.
 Elector palatine, Charles Louis, nephew of Charles I., 203. well received in London by the parliament, 475. notice of his former visit to England, and abrupt departure, ib. did not contribute to the subsidy granted to Charles II. by the diet in Germany, 816. nor notice him whilst resident at Cologne, 820.
 Elizabeth, queen, 2, 22, 68, 72, 73, 90, 96, 113, 185, 211, 248, 328, 363, 372, 675, 701. the felicity of the times before the long parliament of Charles compared with her reign, 30. Mary queen of Scots' death an unparalleled act of blood, ib.
 Elizabeth, princess, daughter of Charles I., notice of, 620. her father's advice to her, ib. committed by the parliament to the care of the countess of Leicester, 811. and afterwards to captain Mildmay, at Carisbrook castle, 812. where she died, ib. the report of Cromwell's having her poisoned false, ib.
 Elliot, Thomas, 721. sent by Charles I. to carry the great seal from lord Littleton to York, 230. his own account of the matter, ib. aids in the arrest of lord Wilnot, 406. joins Charles II. at the Hague, 720. his influence over him, ib. instigates him against the earl of Bristol and lord Digby, ib.
 Ellison, — aids in the escape of Charles II. after the battle of Worcester, 770.
 Ely, viscount, (see Loftus.)
 Ely, bishop of, (see Matthew Wren.)
 Emperor of Germany, Ferdinand II, 9.
 Emperor of Germany, Ferdinand III, 803. [did not contribute to the subsidy granted by the diet in Germany to Charles II, 816. (see Charles I., Charles II., Cromwell, and Parliament.)]
 Episcopacy, Pym, Burton, and Bastwick its most notorious opponents, 38. declaration and petition in parliament against episcopacy, 81, 82. a bill brought into the commons for extirpating bishops, deans, and chapters, 95. laid by, ib. revived and committed, 110. again laid aside, ib. a new bill brought into parliament to take away bishops' votes, 121, 134. episcopacy abolished in Scotland, 124. petition of apprentices against prelates, 134. expedients of the commons for procuring the assent of the lords to the abolition of episcopacy, 336, 359. a covenant for the extirpation of prelacy proposed by the Scots between the two nations, and agreed to, 437, &c. copy of it, 439. ordered to be generally taken, 440, 452. its passing the parliament chiefly owing to sir H. Vane the younger, 442.
 Erasmus, 298.
 Erskin, sir Charles, one of the parliament's commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520.
 Espernon, duke of, 726. complaints and proceedings against, by the city of Bourdeaux, where he was governor, 725, 726.
 Essex, colonel Charles, 291. notice of, 311, 312.
 Essex, sir William, 312.
 Essex, Robert Devereux, third earl of, 49, 85, 111, 119, 132, 177, 275, 282, 286, 288, 293, 297, 298, 300, 305, 306, 308, 310, 311, 313, 314, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 330, 332, 335, 340, 345, 346, 348, 349, 352, 353, 357, 358, 364, 368, 373, 380, 382, 383, 385, 386, 387, 394, 395, 396, 397, 399, 401, 405, 407, 417, 418, 421, 423, 427, 433, 434, 437, 438, 439, 441, 454, 466, 467, 469, 470, 471, 475, 478, 479, 480, 481, 483, 487, 488, 490, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 503, 506, 507, 508, 514, 515, 517, 518, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 539, 540, 541, 546, 554. made lieutenant-general of the army against the Scotch covenanters, 46. takes possession of Berwick, ib. the covenanters' letter to him, 48. how received, ib. merited well in this expedition, yet slighted by the king, 50. not employed in the second expedition, 57. why it would have been better if he had, ib. an enemy to the earl of Strafford, and why, 57, 61. one of the commissioners to treat with the Scots at Rippon, 62, 63. why won over by the puritans, 74. sworn a privy-counsellor, 78. not hostile to the church at large, 93. yet in favour of taking away from the bishops their temporal power and privileges, 94. Mr. Hyde in vain endeavours to persuade him that the earl of Strafford was not guilty of treason, 97. made lord chamberlain, 105. why he ought to have been appointed general to disband the army, 109. made lieutenant-general south of the Trent during the king's visit to Scotland, 111. one of the committee of the house of lords appointed to sit during the recess, 117. appoints a guard for the security of the parliament, 119. resigns his commission as general on this side Trent, 129. though lord chamberlain, he is dissuaded by the earl of Holland from attending the king when he removed to Hampton-court, 152. reason of his enmity to the earl of Newcastle, 170. desired that the proceedings of parliament should be more moderate, 190. his deprivation of the office of lord chamberlain for refusing to attend the king at York, 191. one chief cause of the future miseries, and why, ib. appointed general of the parliament's forces, 274. his object in accepting the command, 373. joins the army at Northampton, 294, 295, 296. moves with it from thence, 298. his instructions from parliament, 299. marches after the king, 307. the battle of Keinton, or Edge-hill, ib. vindicated from the aspersion of allowing the wounded earl of Lindsey to die through a grudge, 310. retires to Warwick castle, 312. condition of his army after the battle, 313. marches towards London, 318, 319. opposes the king's army at Brentford, which retires, 320. the declaration of parliament concerning his acceptable service, 321. fixes his head quarters at Windsor, 332. the marquis of Hertford his particular friend, having married his sister, 369. his character, 373. besieges Reading, 381, 387. which is surrendered on articles, 384, 385. the probable result, had he thereupon marched to Oxford, 387. his conduct at Reading not satisfactory to his party, ib. his army impaired by sickness, ib. 394. marches to Thame, ib. his horse beaten by prince Rupert, ib. cause of the enmity between him and sir W. Waller, 406. the parliament let him discern that they had another general to trust to by raising an army under the earl of Manchester, 419. and try to recover him to his former vigour, ib. insensibly altered from his moderate inclinations, ib. the consequences, ib. what use was endeavoured to be made of him by the moderate party, 422. raises the siege of Gloucester, 427, 428. and seizes Cirencester in his return, 428. after a drawn battle at Newbury, where the king had intercepted his course, he proceeds to London, 429. his reception there, ib. 434. pretended reconciliation between him and sir W. Waller, 434. courted popularity too much, 444. removes his head quarters from Windsor to St. Alban's, 447. letter to him from the parliament at Oxford, 467. his answer, directed to the earl of Forth, ib. never prospered after having taken the covenant and writing this letter, 469. his movements against Abingdon and Oxford, 483, 485. marches towards the west, 485. notwithstanding the orders of parliament, 486, 487. Weymouth delivered up to him, 488. he relieves Lyme, ib. his good fortune declines, 494. pursued into Cornwall by the king, 495. pays no attention to his overture of peace, 496. rejects also an overture from the king's officers, 497. his horse troops escape the king's, his foot surrender on terms, 499, 500. escapes himself to Plymouth by sea, 500. he and the parliament dissatisfied with each other, 514. gives up his commission, in consequence of the self-denying ordinance, 540, 541, 542. his death, 610. Evelyn, sir John, 318. Evesham taken by the parliament forces, 551. Eugenio, don, 735. Ewre, colonel, 689. Exchequer, by what means exhausted at the beginning of the reign of Charles I. 2. expedients for replenishing it, ib. 10. Excise, imposition of, hitherto considered by the English as a mark of slavery, and never feared by themselves, 388. an excise imposed by the parliament at Westminster, 471. and by that at Oxford, ib.

Exeter delivered up to prince Maurice upon articles, 425. designs there in favour of Charles II, 869. Eyres, captain, 408.

F.

Faction begun in the king's army, 306.

Fairfax, Ferdinando lord, 206, 358, 359, 410. one of the few who were active for the parliament in Yorkshire, 288. unmolested by the king's party, 344. signs the articles of neutrality agreed in Yorkshire, 345. reprehended for it by parliament, ib. if assisted, would have been master of Yorkshire, 346. made general in Yorkshire for the parliament, ib. his operations, ib. 347.

Fairfax, sir Thomas, afterwards lord, 111, 476, 530, 544, 550, 552, 553, 555, 570, 572, 574, 583, 584, 585, 593, 594, 601, 611, 612, 613, 642, 654, 665, 689, 701, 723. one of the few who were active in Yorkshire for the parliament, 288. unmolested by the king's party, 344. first distinguished himself by defeating colonel Bellasis at Selby, 472. defeats lord Byron at Nantwich, ib. wounded at the battle of Marston-moor, 491. made general in the room of the earl of Essex, 542. sits down before Oxford, 551. draws off again, 552. defeats the king at Naseby, 553. his troops well disciplined, 554. enters Somersetshire, 559. defeats lord Goring near Lampert, ib. having retaken Leicester, 562. takes Bridgewater, 563. routs lord Hopton's forces at Torrington, 583. thought himself a presbyterian, 590. Ragland-castle maintained against him by the marquis of Worcester, 609. Cromwell now declared head of the army, though he continued general in name, 610. was a member of the house of commons notwithstanding the self-denying ordinance, ib. the parliament not jealous of him, though Cromwell had the ascendant over him, 611. did not suspect Cromwell entertained any wicked designs against the king, ib. his account to the parliament of the king's being seized at Holmby, 612. applies to parliament for permission for the king to see his children, 616. writ a sharp letter to the parliament upon the tumultuous petition of apprentices and others to parliament concerning their militia, 617. the city sends six aldermen to him, now with his army on Hounslow heath, and submits, 619. he conducts the two speakers and other members to their several houses of parliament, ib. wished nothing that Cromwell did, and yet contributed to bring it all to pass, 628, 606. sent against the royalists who had risen in Kent under the earl of Norwich, 654, 655. besieges them in Colchester, whither the earl and some of them had betaken themselves, 655. the town delivered up to him, 664. marches for London, 689. did not sit in the court that condemned Charles I, 696. suppresses a mutiny of the levellers, 745. gives up his commission, 750. possesses himself of York, with an intention of declaring for Charles II, 885, 886. dismisses his troops on finding Monk not disposed to concur with him, 886.

Fairfax, (Anne Vere,) lady, her interruption of the court that sat in judgment on Charles I, 696.

Falconbridge, (Fauconberg,) Thos.

Bellasis, first viscount, 345, 472.

Falconbridge, Thomas Bellasis, second viscount, afterwards earl, married one of Cromwell's daughters, 842. intercedes in vain with the protector to save Dr. Hewet's life, 852. hostile to his father-in-law's interest, 861.

Falkland, Henry Carey, first viscount, 89, 431.

Falkland, Lucius Carey, second viscount, 122, 125, 137, 191, 228, 229, 293, 294, 302, 306, 318, 371, 391, 392, 426. the only one in the house of commons who spoke in favour of the earl of Strafford, 70. he and Hyde sat so constantly together in the house of commons, that room was always made for them, 94. declares in favour of the bill to take the bishops' votes in parliament, ib. afterwards changed his opinion, and gave his reason for having supported the bill, ib. a saying of his respecting bishops, 110. made secretary of state, 136, 147. his character, 136. his scruples about accepting office, ib. overcome by Mr. Hyde, 137. his reasons for accepting the seals, 433. inclined through the king's imprudence to take no part in public affairs, 145. the king imposes on him the unpleasant duty of demanding the staffs of office from the earls of Essex and Holland, 191. one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. one of those excepted by parliament from making their peace on any terms, 300. slain in the battle of Newbury, 430. further particulars of his character and conduct, ib. the alteration produced in him by the war, 433.

Falkland, Henry Carey, third viscount, one of the committee sent by parliament to wait upon Charles II. at the Hague, 908.

Falkland, (Elizabeth Tannfield,) lady, 431.

Fanatics, when this appellation came to be used, 610.

- Fanshaw, — 560, 569, 573, 584.
 Farr, colonel, 655.
 Fauconberg, (see Falconbridge.)
 Featly, Dr., 438.
 Feild, Theophilus, bishop of St. David's, 24.
 Felton, John, his situation and family, 11. on what private and public grounds hostile to the duke of Buckingham, ib. particulars of his assassination of the duke, ib. his behaviour after having effected it, 12.
 Ferdinand II. (see Emperor.)
 Ferdinand III. (see Emperor and king of Hungary.)
 Fern, 21.
 Fern, Henry, afterwards bishop of Chester, one of the king's commissioners to treat at Uxbridge in matters relating to the church, 523.
 Ferté, M. la Senneterre, the French ambassador, courts the parliament, 327, 450. recalled, 450.
 Fettyplace, — 340.
 Fielding, Basil lord, afterwards second earl of Denbigh, 282, 703. present on the parliament side at the battle of Edge-hill, 307. (as earl of Denbigh,) one of the few lords who attended parliament, 467. one of the parliament commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. notice of him, 528. detested the desperate designs of his party, 529. according to his own statement, would have served the king, if he could have materially benefited him, ib. dispossessed of his command by the self-denying ordinance, 541, 542. one of the commissioners sent by the parliament to the king about his passing four acts, 629.
 Fielding, colonel Richard, 305, 384, 487. the command devolves upon him at Reading when besieged by the earl of Essex, 382. tried for surrendering the place, 385, 386. sentenced to lose his head, 386. reprieved by the king, but deprived of his regiment, ib. served afterwards as a volunteer, ib. and had a principal command in another army, yet never recovered this blemish, ib. acquitted by lord Clarendon of any base compliance with the enemy, or of cowardice, ib. evils that arose to the king from this trial, 387. made captain of the ship Constant Reformation, 676.
 Fiennes, colonel John, 506.
 Fiennes, Nathaniel, 389, 407, 409. his character, 75. one of those for root and branch, as it was called, 94. one of the committee appointed by parliament, to accompany Charles I. into Scotland, 112. routed by prince Rupert near Worcester, 298. his courage generally disesteemed, 407. surrenders Bristol, of which he was governor, upon articles to prince Rupert, 408. tried and condemned for this surrender, but pardoned, 454. goes abroad in consequence, ib. keeper of the great seal to the protector, Richard Cromwell, 864.
 Fifth-monarchy-men, who so called, 857.
 Finch, sir John, afterwards lord, 84, 128. made ship-money odious by his speech, 29. first lord chief justice of the common pleas, then lord keeper of the great seal, 30, 53. his character, 30. his declaration in favour of the council-board, ib. prejudicial to it, ib. one of the king's counsellors at York, 64. withdraws beyond sea to escape impeachment, 71. lord Falkland severe against him, 431.
 Firmo, J. B. Ranucini, archbishop of, (see Nuncio.)
 Fisheries on the coasts of Scotland and the isles of Orkney, a source of great trade to Holland, 786.
 Fleet, Charles I. raises one against Scotland, 46. revolt of part of the fleet to the king from Rainsborough, 646. Rainsborough and some other officers put on shore by the seamen, 648. the revolted ships go over to Holland, ib. the prince of Wales is received at the fleet, ib. factions in it, ib. 655. the prince comes into the Downs with it, 649. thence into the river Thames, ib. 656. the parliament prepares a fleet against this under the earl of Warwick, 657. the prince returns towards Holland, and the earl of Warwick after him, ib. the ill condition of the prince's fleet, 672. the earl of Warwick comes with his fleet on the coast of Holland, ib. prince Rupert comes with his fleet on the coast of Spain, 735. goes into the river of Lisbon, ib. the chief commander of the parliament's fleet comes on the Spanish coast, ib. his letter to the king of Spain, ib. sails into the river of Lisbon, 736. requires prince Rupert's fleet to be delivered up, ib. the prince escapes with his fleet, ib. a fleet in 1653, sent forth under three admirals, 796. beats the Dutch, ib. and again, when Van Trump is slain, ib. prince Rupert with his fleet arrives at Nantes, 807. a fleet sent out under Pen, with a land army under Venables, 832. goes to Barbadoes, 833. thence to Hispaniola, ib. their orders from Cromwell, ib. Venables beaten by a few Spaniards, ib. succeeds at Jamaica, 834. returns to England, ib. Pen and Venables committed to the Tower, ib. another fleet sent out at the same time under Blake, 833. goes into the Mediterranean, ib. forces Algiers to a peace, 834. enters the harbour of Tunis, and burns their fleet, ib. Lawson and the fleet declare for the parliament, and come into the river, 834. the parliament reforms the navy by making Monk and Mountague admirals, 893. Charles II.'s letter to the fleet, 901. dutifully received, 904. the English fleet under Mountague comes on the coast of Holland, 908. the duke of York as admiral takes possession of it, ib. the ships new named, ib. the king embarks for England, 910. the fleet sails May 24, ib. and lands the king at Dover May 26, ib.
 Fleetwood, Charles, 305, 879. originally a trooper in the earl of Essex's guards, 305. opposed Cromwell's being made king, 838. delivers the address of the council of officers about the government to the protector Richard, 865. sent by the council to advise him to dissolve the parliament, ib. notice of him, 879. appointed by parliament one of the seven commissioners to govern the army, ib. chosen general by the officers, 880. one of the committee of safety constituted by the army, ib. his behaviour during several tergiversations of the soldiers in 1659, 834.
 Florence, duke of, 878.
 Flushing given up by king James, 27.
 Forbes, sir Arthur, 903.
 Forbes, William, bishop of Edinburgh, notice of, 35. ill treated by the rabble about the liturgy, 44.
 Ford, sir Edward, 626. made high sheriff of Sussex by the king, and had a regiment of horse, 477. Arundel castle committed to him, 478. married Ireton's sister, 626.
 Forest laws revived, 28. an act passed to ascertain the limits of all forests in England, 114.
 Foreign kings and states, inclinations of, in the contest between the king and parliament, 326.
 Fortescue, sir Faithful, 309, 353. why he had come from Ireland, 308. deserts to the king in the battle of Edge-hill, ib.
 Forth, earl of, (see Patrick Ruthen.)
 Foster, justice, 338.
 Foulke, — 334.
 Fountain, — 531, 543.
 Fox, Stephen, admitted to manage Charles II.'s money upon his removal from France into Germany, 812.
 France, 112. war precipitately declared against, 11. its origin chiefly owing to a private amour of the duke of Buckingham, 16. the feeling of the country with respect to this war, ib. peace concluded with France, and why, 2, 27. France encourages the disaffected in Scotland, against king Charles, 51. favours the parliament against the king, 327. the affairs at France whilst Charles II. was at Paris, 725. countenances Cromwell, 737. troubles of the French court, 1652, 781. a French fleet seized by the English commonwealth, 787. the French send an ambassador into England, ib. Cromwell's treaty with France, 803. the French defeat the Spanish at Dunkirk, 859. Dunkirk is surrendered, 860. and the French king delivers it to the English, ib. observations on this war with Spain, 872. the queen mother of France designs to put an end to it by a treaty and marriage between the two crowns, 872. she advises cardinal Mazarine to concur in it, ib. his arguments against it, ib. why he afterwards yielded to a peace, 873. two particulars of difficulty in this treaty referred to a personal conference between cardinal Mazarine and don Lewis de Haro, ib. how settled, 874.

- France, king of, Louis XIV, 725, 860, 873.
- France, Anne of Austria, queen of, 451, 591, 592, 595, 640, 725, 754, 757, 781, 806, 875. the duke of Buckingham when in France fell in love with her, 16. made regent, and professed to espouse the cause of Charles I, 450, 590, 591. was a very worthy lady, 806. designs to put an end to the war between France and Spain by a treaty and marriage, 872. advises cardinal Mazarine to concur in it, ib. who yields at last, 873.
- Francis I, king of France, 873.
- Frazier, Dr., physician to Charles II, 588. much contributed to Charles II.'s journey into Scotland, 758. contrived the empty design of his withdrawing to the Highlands, ib. a petition intended of the Scottish presbyterians by Balcaris and him that the chancellor of the exchequer might be removed, 805.
- Frederic III, (see king of Denmark.)
- Freeman, sir Ralph, 18.
- Fryer, colonel, sir Thomas, 12.
- Fuensaldagna, conde of, 720, 835, 859. he and the conde of Pignoranda governed the councils at Brussels, 719, 750, 834. notice of him, 719. removed to the government of Milan, 835.
- Fuentarabia, treaty concluded there between France and Spain, 873. G.
- Gage, colonel, 510. takes Bostal house, 487. notice of him, 501. relieves Basing-house, ib. aids in relieving Banbury castle, 507. and Donnington castle, 510. made governor of Oxford, 511. within a month after shot in attempting to break down Culham bridge, ib.
- Galloway, William, 897.
- Gaol-delivery, the advice and desire of parliament to the king concerning, 368. his answer, ib. parliament makes an ordinance to forbid the next assizes and gaol-delivery, ib.
- Garcies, conde de, governor of Cambridge, 720.
- Gardiner, sir Thomas, 519, 525. recorder of London, designed by Charles I. to be the speaker of the house of commons, 1640, but was not returned a member, 68. notice of him, ib. committed to the tower by parliament, 194. appointed by the king his solicitor-general, 453, 520. one of his commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520.
- Garraway, captain, 498.
- Garrisons, divers, surrendered to the parliament, 608.
- Gascoign, sir Bernard, joins those who rose in Kent for Charles II, 655. taken prisoner at Colchester, 664. notice of him, ib. why he was not shot with sir C. Lucas and sir G. Lisle, ib.
- Gell, sir John, 466. possessed Derbyshire for the parliament, 346, 348. disquieted by colonel Hastings, 349. took Litchfield cathedral, ib. he and sir W. Bruerton routed by the earl of Northampton on Hopton-heath, though the earl fell there, ib. his and sir W. B.'s exorbitant demand as a ransom for the earl's body, 350.
- Generals, (see Major-generals.)
- George, — 340.
- Gerard, — tried for holding correspondence with Charles II, 798. condemned, ib. beheaded, ib.
- Gerard, (see Gerrard.)
- Germany, 51. invaded by the Swedes, 27. the Jesuits there possess ascendancy over all other men, 822.
- Germany, emperor of, (see Emperor.)
- Gerrard, colonel Charles, afterwards general and lord, 506, 510, 552, 554, 576, 579, 580, 588. wounded in the battle of Edge-hill, 311. and again at the siege of Litchfield, 384. present at the siege of Bristol, 408. general of South Wales, 554, 562. notice of his conduct as governor thereof, 562, 564. the king obliged to remove him in consequence of the complaints against him, 564. and to make him a baron as a compensation, ib. entertained extreme malice against lord Digby, 577. calls him a traitor in the king's presence, 580. produced by lord Littleton, to prove that the chancellor of the exchequer had spoken ill of the king, 809.
- Gerrard, sir Gilbert, 76. one of the committee of the house of commons who sat during the recess, 117.
- Gilvy, — 826.
- Glamorgan, earl of, (see lord Herbert.)
- Glanville, John, sergeant, chosen speaker of the house of commons, 1640, 53. well qualified for it, ib. notice of his speech about a supply, 55.
- Glemham, sir Thomas, 288, 472, 564. his character, 288. left by the king governor of York, at the request of the gentry, 344. made governor of Oxford, 577.
- Glencarne, William Cunningham, ninth earl of, receives a commission from Charles II. to collect troops in the Highlands, 804. retires to his own house, and makes his peace with Monk, ib. yet still faithful to the king, ib.
- Glin (Glyn) opposed the self-denying ordinance, 532. a leading man in the house of commons, 616.
- Gloucester, considerations whether Charles I. should besiege it, 415. he summons it, 416. the citizens' and garrison's answer, ib. he besieges it, 417. prosecution of the siege, 426. the siege raised by the approach of the earl of Essex, 427. design of seizing the town for Charles II. by major-general Massey, 868.
- Gloucester, bishop of, (see G. Goodman.)
- Gloucester, Henry, duke of, son of Charles I, 845, 877, 878, 897. committed by parliament to the care of the earl of Northumberland, 615, 620. how treated by him, 620. the countess of Dorset had been his governess, by the king's appointment, until her death, ib. his father's discourse with him, about seven years' old, by consent of parliament, 621. placed by parliament with the countess of Leicester after being with the earl of Northumberland, 811. well instructed by Mr. Lovel his tutor, ib. removed to Carisbrook castle under captain Mildmay, 812. his promising character, ib. allowed by parliament, with the advice of Cromwell, to go beyond sea, ib. joins his mother and brother at Paris, ib. Charles II. on removing into Germany, leaves him with his mother in France, 813. an account of the endeavours at Paris to pervert him in his religion, 820. Charles II. sends for him in consequence, and he joins him at Cologne, 820, 821. present at the battle of Dunkirk, 860. five thousand pounds sent to him to the Hague, by the English parliament, 908.
- Glyn, (see Glin.)
- Godolphin, Sidney, shot at Chagford, 343. his character, ib.
- Godolphin, colonel William, 343, 397.
- Goffe, colonel, offers to stand by the protector, Richard Cromwell, against the council of officers, 866. removed from his command by them, ib.
- Goffe, Dr. chief agent of lord Jermyn, 648. his part in the factions in the prince's fleet, 649. has a share of the money sent from Moscow for Charles II, 778. changes his religion, ib.
- Goodman, Godfrey, bishop of Gloucester, one of the bishops who signed the protestation against their constrained absence from the house of lords, 141.
- Goodwin, or Goodwyn, Robert, one of the committee sent to Dublin by the parliament, 355, 465.

Gorges, Dr., Charles II.'s chaplain, 769.

Gorges, lord, 507.

Goring, George, earl of Norwich, 565, 650, 665. the king's ambassador extraordinary in France, 451, 565. heads the rising in Kent in favour of the king, 654. advances to Blackheath, ib. transports himself into Essex, and fixes in Colchester, 655. taken prisoner there, and sent to the Tower, 665. a new high court of justice sits to try him and others, 700. his behaviour at his trial, 701. condemned, ib. votes in parliament for and against his petition for life equally divided, 702. the speaker gives the casting vote in his favour, and why, ib.

Goring, colonel George, afterwards general and lord, 481, 491, 495, 497, 498, 503, 507, 513, 540, 543, (as lord G.) 546, 548, 550, 552, 554, 555, 556, 559, 560, 562, 565, 566, 567, 569, 570, 571, 882. how far concerned in the correspondences between the court and the army, 107, 220, 225, 227. made himself a favourite of parliament by discovering these designs, 285. governor of Portsmouth, 167. ingratiates himself again with the king and queen, ib. declares for the king, 285. notice of his character, ib. 512. and some previous particulars of his conduct, 285. Portsmouth besieged by the parliament forces, and taken through his neglect, 289, 296. appointed lieutenant-general of the horse at York, 346. made general of the horse in the room of prince Rupert, 496. Wilmot his mortal enemy, ib. the earl of Essex's horse, under sir W. Balfour, escape through the king's army owing to his neglect, 499. his conduct in the second battle of Newbury, 509. made a friendship with lord Digby, each believing he could deceive the other, 513. the king had no intentions that he should be with the prince of Wales, a point at which he aimed, and why, 531. sent with a command into Hampshire, 543. beaten off with loss from Christ-Church, ib. outrages of his horse, ib. Weymouth taken through his want of vigilance, ib. his conduct and movements in those parts, 544, 545. complaints against his horse, 544. further particulars of his design to have the command of the west, 547, 548. sent for by the king to Oxford, 550. prince Rupert, being jealous of him, promotes his views respecting the west, ib. 551. whether he is sent back with full command, ib. expressed all possible contempt of the council attending the prince, 555, 565. his mismanagement at Taunton, 555. ordered to march into Northamptonshire ib. his conduct towards the garrison at Lampport, 556. the prince of Wales writes to him to reform the disorders of his army, ib. draws off from Taunton upon sir T. Fairfax's entering Somersetshire, 559. beaten by him near Lampport, ib. retires to Barnstable, ib. makes propositions to the prince, 564. which are granted, 565. his demands of the prince, 566. his conference with one of the prince's council, 567, 570. his conduct at Exeter, 567, 571. gives over the thought of defending Devon, 570. retires into France, 571. discourses against him, ib. had rendered the Cornish hostile to him, ib. 572. reasons for and against his having had a secret understanding with the enemy, 572.

Gourney, or Gurney, sir Richard, lord mayor of London, his loyalty to Charles I, 129. reckoned in consequence a malignant, 135. unable to prevent the city from petitioning the king, 148. honourable mention of him, 149. Charles I.'s encomium of him, upon the exclusion of his name by parliament from the militia bill, 202, 210. committed to the Tower for causing the king's proclamation against the militia to be publicly proclaimed, 281.

Gowre, colonel, 345.

Graham, James, (see marquis of Mountrose.)

Grammont, marshal de, 873.

Grandison, William Villiers, viscount, 89. takes Nantwich, 304. taken prisoner at Winchester, 323. died of wounds received at the siege of Bristol, 408, 409. his character, 410.

Grantham taken by the king's forces, 347.

Grantham, colonel, 309.

Greenvil, sir Bevil, 409, 503. active for Charles I. in Cornwall, 340, 342, 343, 397. the most beloved man in the county, 342. he and sir J. Berkley beat the earl of Stamford near Stratton, 398. killed in the battle of Lansdown, 403. his character, 404. sir R. Greenvil was his younger brother, 504. and sir John Greenvil his son, 895. recommended his family to the care of Mr. Morrice, ib.

Greenvil, sir John, 869, 882, 897. wounded in the second battle of Newbury, 510. governor of Scilly, 667. which he delivered up to sir G. Ayscue after a vigorous defence, 788. allowed by parliament after this surrender to enjoy his estate, 895. was a son of sir Bevil Greenvil, ib. introduced to general Monk by Mr. Morrice, ib. and receiving his instructions goes over to Charles II. at Brussels, 896. who sends back his letters to the parliament, army, &c. by him, 897. being called for by the parliament delivers the letter, 903.

the answer of the house of commons delivered to him, 905.

Greenvil, sir Richard, 497, 498, 503, 557, 565, 566, 569, 570, 573, 581, 585, 587. beats a party of the earl of Essex's horse at Bodmin, 498. left by the king to block up Plymouth, 503. notice of his character, and of some previous particulars of his conduct, ib. was a younger brother of sir Bevil Greenvil, 504. his conduct and movements in the west, 544, 545. wounded at Taunton, 545. the commissioners of Devon complain of him, 548. his conduct inquired into, 548, 549. appointed major-general of the army in the west, 554. complaints against him at Barnstable, 557. notice of his nature and temper, &c. 558. the prince of Wales's intentions with regard to him, 559. grows troublesome again, 560. returns his commission of field-marshal, formerly given him by the prince, ib. particulars respecting the estate he obtained by his wife, ib. and his military promotion, ib. a great plunderer, 561. notice respecting the protection granted to his house and estate, ib. his conduct after he had given up his commission, ib. the prince remonstrates with him, ib. cooperates with lord Goring in his designs, 564. and obtains the command of the remains of the western army, ib. 569. reasons for and against his being sent to continue the blockade of Plymouth, 570. his movements, ib. 572. his behaviour towards the prince, ib. and at Tavistock, 581. appointed to command the foot in the west under lord Hopton, ib. whom he himself had recommended as general in chief, ib. yet notwithstanding refuses to act under him, 582. whereupon he is committed to prison by the prince, ib. an unpopular act, notwithstanding his previous oppression and tyranny, ib.

Gregory XV. pope, 9.

Grey, Anchetil, one of the commissioners for the associated county of Dorset, 546.

Grey, Thomas lord, had the command in Leicestershire for the parliament, 348. joins the earl of Essex on his march to relieve Gloucester, 427.

Grey of Ruthvin, Michael Longueville, lord, one of those who signed the declaration that Charles I. had no intentions of war, 263.

Grey of Warke, William lord, 467. committed to the Tower by parliament for refusing to go as their commissioner into Scotland for relief, 410. as speaker of the house of lords signs a letter to the lords justices in Ireland, 459. and another to the king, 470.

Grievances, Mr. Pym's and others' speeches concerning, 53. Mr. Pym begins the debate of grievances, 69.

 Griffith, — 175.
 Grimston, afterwards sir Harbottle, spoke against ship-money in the house of commons, 54. chosen speaker of the house of commons that met 1660, 903. signs, as speaker, the loyal answer of the house to Charles II.'s letter, 905.
 Grocers' hall, both houses of parliament appoint committees to sit there, from pretended danger at Westminster, 155.
 Grove, Hugh, concerned in the rising at Salisbury for Charles II, 824. taken prisoner and beheaded, 826.
 Guilford, earl of, (see earl of Lauderdale.)
 Guernsey reduced by Cromwell's forces, 787.
 Gunpowder, an act for the free making of, within the kingdom, 114.
 Gunter, colonel, killed in the fight at Charlgrave field, 395. the best officer of horse the parliament had, ib. of known malice to the church, ib.
 Gunter, colonel, provides a bark for the escape of Charles II. after the battle of Worcester, 771.
 Gurney, (see Gourney.)
 Guzman, Louisa de, (see queen of Portugal.)
 H.
 Hales, — his part in the commotions in Kent for Charles II, 647, 650. transports himself into Holland, ib.
 Hales, sir Edward, 650.
 Hall, Joseph, bishop of Norwich, the earl of Essex had great reverence for him, 93. one of the bishops who signed the protestation against their constrained absence from the house of lords, 141.
 Hamblen, Alexander, kept in prison till his death for his part in Mr. Waller's and Tomkin's design, 391, 393.
 Hamblen, John, 29, 54, 55, 59, 85, 86, 125, 175, 305, 442. compelled by law to pay the ship-money, 28, 29, 55. the most popular man in the house of commons, ib. his character, 74, 119. courted by solicitor-general Herbert, 84. was for root and branch, as it was termed, 94. how he induces lord Falkland to vote against the bishops' votes in parliament, ib. one of the committee sent by parliament with Charles I. into Scotland, 112, 119. might have been of service, had he been conciliated by the king, 129. articles of treason charged against him and five others, by order of the king, 143. farther particulars relative to the charge, 143, 144, 148, 150, 151, 152, 153, 156, 158, 167, 174, 178, 179, 185, 187, 193, 218, 221, 224, 241, 256, 282. has a regiment conferred on him by parliament, 282. reinforces the earl of Essex at the battle of Edge-hill, 309. unsuccessful in an attempt against the Brill, 356. advised the besieging of Oxford, where the king was, rather than Reading, 385. mortally wounded in the fight at Charlgrave field, 395. farther sketch of his character, 396. bishop Warburton's remark respecting the place of his death, ib. lord Falkland entertained a good opinion of his uprightness and integrity, 431. Mr. Pym much governed by him, 475. a daughter of his married colonel Hammond, 624. was cousin to, and bosom friend of Cromwell, 638.

 Hamilton, — 585.
 Hamilton, James Hamilton, third marquis, afterwards duke, and earl of Cambridge, 84, 90, 91, 124, 316, 473, 644, 651, 652, 653, 665. his character, 19. master of the horse to Charles I, 32. his sole adviser in all Scotch affairs, ib. 33, 44, 697. his affection to the king suspected, 33. has the command of the fleet against the Scotch covenanters, 46. his suspicious conduct, 49. not at all acceptable to the earl of Essex, 48. nor to the earl of Holland, 49. nor to his countrymen, 50. finds fault with the treaty of pacification made with the covenanters, ib. gets sir H. Vane made secretary of state in the room of sir J. Coke, 51. supposed to have obtained lord Lowden's release from imprisonment to endear himself to the Scotch, 58. had the skill to interfere in public affairs as much or as little as he pleased, 60. why more hateful to the people than any other person, 61. had been accused of a design of making himself king of Scotland, ib. account of his craft in inducing the king to allow him to endear himself to the Scotch covenanters, ib. one of the counsellors about the king at York, 64. his removal from him recommended by the Scotch commissioners, 63. how he gained them over, 76. advises the king to appoint several of the popular party privy-counsellors, 78. Mr. Hyde importuned by the king and others not to bring him forward as an evil counsellor, 110. compelled to give up the cinque ports, ib. transactions in Scotland respecting him, Argyle, and Mountrose, 119. made a duke, ib. signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 262. sir H. Vane never kept fair quarter with him, 375. his conduct with respect to the Scotch parliament called by the covenanters, 442, 443. goes to the king at Oxford, 444. imprisoned, 474. private examination of certain persons respecting his conduct, ib.

particulars respecting his being set at liberty, 585, 588. goes into Scotland, 633. enters England with an army raised by the Scotch, in consequence of their treaty with Charles I. in the Isle of Wight, 657. his irregular march, ib. 658. routed at Uxeter by Lambert, ib. and taken prisoner, ib. tried by a new high court of justice, 700. condemned, 701. his petition for life rejected in the house of commons, ib. beheaded, 703.
 Hamilton, duke of, (see earl of Lanrick.)
 Hamilton, (Anne Cunningham,) marchioness of, 474.
 Hamilton, sir James, 402.
 Hammond, — mayor of St. Ives, 583.
 Hammond, colonel, 628, 687, 694. governor of the Isle of Wight, 624. nephew of Dr. Hammond, 625. negotiated with to receive Charles I. upon his escape from Hampton-court, ib. brought to the king, ib. removes him to Carisbrook castle, ib. lord Clarendon's opinion of this whole business, ib. removes the king's old servants from about him, 629. imprisons Burly for attempting to stir up the people of the island in the king's favour, ib. removed from the charge of the king's person, 689.
 Hammond, Dr. Henry, one of the king's commissioners in matters relating to the church to treat at Uxbridge, 523. allowed to attend the king as one of his chaplains, 613. uncle of colonel Hammond, 625.
 Harcourt, conte d', 598. arrives ambassador extraordinary from France, 449. returns into France without any good effect to Charles I, 450. besieges Cambray, 720. raised the siege, ib.
 Harding, — 496.
 Haro, Lewis de, 714, 725, 735, 874, 876, 877. his intercourse with Charles II.'s ambassadors at Madrid, 727, 731, 732, 752, 754. his private interview with them, 728. ran several courses with the king in the public races, 729. one of the council of state, 733. his character, ib. 875. was an absolute favourite of the king, 733. his origin, ib. the ambassadors expostulate with him about an agent of the parliament sent into Spain, 748. his answer, ib. they write to him about the murder of this agent, ib. his answer, ib. his speech to them concerning it, 749. he and cardinal Mazarine meet at Fuentarabia, to settle a treaty between Spain and France, 873. advises Charles II. to attend, 874. was against the earl of Bristol accompanying him, ib. who however wrought himself into his good graces, 877. how far the cardinal had the advantage over him, 874. an account of the close of this treaty in respect of Portugal and the prince of Condé, as settled by them, 874, 876. his treatment of king Charles, 877. died soon after this business, 910.

Harris, major-general, 581. a member of the house of commons, notwithstanding the self-denying ordinance, 610. conducted Charles I. from Hurst castle to St. James's, 693, 694. his origin and character, 693. much trusted by Cromwell, ib. was in favour of the king's being publicly tried, 694. removed from the army by Cromwell, 840.

Harry, (see Henry.)

Harvey, — 418.

Hasdunck, — 575.

Haslerig, sir Arthur, 76, 95, 110, 479, 881. prefers a bill in the house of commons for the attainder of the earl of Strafford of high treason, 91. and another for settling the militia, 111. the tool of his party, 91, 111. one of the five members of the commons accused of high treason by the king's order, 143. farther particulars relating to the charge, 143, 144, 148, 150, 151, 152, 153, 156, 158, 167, 174, 178, 179, 185, 187, 193, 218, 221, 225, 241, 256, 282. his regiment of horse, so completely armed, as to be called lobsters, 402. and were the first that made any impression on the king's horse, ib. wounded in the battle of Roundway-down, and his impenetrable regiment routed, 406. is readmitted into the house of commons by virtue of a clause in the petition and advice, 843. having been excluded for refusing to sign the recognition of the protector, ib. the petition and proposals of Lambert's army discovered to him, 879. acquaints the parliament with it, ib. what measures he and Vane, the heads of the republic party, induced parliament to adopt, ib. 880. appointed in consequence one of the seven commissioners to govern the army, 879. his character, 880. he, Walton, and Morley go to Portsmouth, upon Lambert's dispersing the parliament, and are well received, 881. he and Morley were looked upon as invested with the authority of parliament, 883. they march towards London, 884. the soldiers in London, in consequence, restore the parliament, ib. general Monk conversed most freely with him, 894.

Hassel, — 392, 393.

Hastings, Ferdinando lord, afterwards sixth earl of Huntingdon, ran away from the battle of Edgehill, 313.

Hastings, colonel Henry, made sheriff of Leicestershire, to retain it in obedience to the king, 279.

his services there, 348, 349. present at the battle of Edge-hill, 349.

Hastings, sir Walter, governor of Portland, surprised Weymouth, 543.

Hatton, sir Christopher, afterwards lord, notice of, 372. one of the king's commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. had been made a lord, ib. resident at Paris, 821.

Hawkealey-house taken by the king's forces, 552.

Hawkins, colonel, 501.

Hawley, sir Francis, 291.

Hay, sir Francis, one of the officers taken with the marquis of Mountrose and executed, 742.

Hayward, — 100.

Hazienda, president de la, 753.

Heath, sir Robert, 194.

Hedworth, John, signed the anabaptists' address to Charles II, 855.

Hedworth, Randolph, signed the anabaptists' address to Charles II, 855.

Hemflet, — 718.

Henderson, Alexander, 361, 362, 440. one of the Scotch commissioners to treat at Rippon, 63. goes with the commissioners to London, 76. crowds go to hear him and the other chaplains preach, ib. 77. meddled much in temporal affairs, 121. presents the petition of the general assembly of the kirk of Scotland to Charles I, 359, 360. and carries the answer back, 362. one of the commissioners to treat at Uxbridge in matters relating to the church, 520, 522, 523. his speech, 523. sent to dispute with the king concerning church government, 605. the king too hard for him, ib. partly convinced of the mischief he had been the author of, ib. dies shortly after, ib.

Henly, James, 188.

Henrietta, wife of Charles I. mentioned as queen, 84, 103, 108, 118, 127, 129, 140, 167, 168, 175, 185, 221, 222, 237, 240, 243, 257, 285, 326, 354, 361, 364, 383, 405, 435, 455, 590, 591, 592, 595, 614, 632, 633, 640, 646, 652, 659, 737, 755, 772, 776, 777, 778, 780, 781, 783, 806, 874, 877. her influence obtains the secretaryship for sir H. Vane, 51. what was thought of her recommendation to the catholics to contribute money for carrying on the war against the Scots, 60. said by the king to have recommended him to call the parliament in 1640, 62. her great power with the king complained of by the Scotch commissioners, 63. and generally disliked, 67. neither archbishop Laud nor the earl of Strafford acceptable to her, ib. withdraws her favour from the earl of Holland, ib. present at the trial of the earl of Strafford, 87. becomes odious to the people, 116, 121. the earl of Holland, who had been her creature, and whom she had preserved from destruction, neglects her, 118. still courted by some, and why, ib. charged by some with fomenting the rebellion in Ireland, 121, 169. three thousand pounds raised for the king's use by the sale of her jewels, 133. notice of her in the parliament's remonstrance, 1642, 157. full of fears, chiefly on hearing of an intention of accusing her of high treason, 167. the object of this rumour, ib. 168. compelled to sell her plate to supply her wants, 168. persuades the king to sign the bill depriving the bishops of their votes in the house of lords, 171. lord Digby's letter to her opened by the house of commons, 173. goes to Holland, 168, 175. mention of her in the parliament's declaration, 1642, 178. made the king promise to remove the earls of Essex and Holland from their situations, 190, 191. purchases arms and ammunition in Holland for the king, 213. with what difficulty, 269. her capuchin friars sent back to France by parliament, 299. returns to England, 347. the danger she escaped, ib. parliament thought to have wished her death, ib. her chapel and lodgings plundered by authority of parliament, 380. impeached by the house of commons for aiding the king in the war, 388. joins the king near Keinton, 406, 407. bringing a great recruit, 407. was against the king's attempting the siege of Gloucester, 420. from what motives, 421. the earl of Holland again offers his service to her, 423. Jermyn prevails with her to accept it, ib. how many paid court to her, 435. how she behaved towards the earl of Holland upon his arrival at Oxford, 435. lived in Merton college, ib. why offended with the marquis of Hertford, 435. chooses the conte d'Harcourt to be the French ambassador to negotiate between the king and the parliament, 450. whatever was done by papists was ascribed to her zeal for her religion, 458. the court at Oxford and its expense much increased by her, 466. retires from Oxford to Exeter, 481. delivered of a daughter there, 490. and from thence to France, 494. lord Percy made a baron upon her intercession, 496. prevailed with the king to make sir A. Aston governor of Oxford, being a Roman catholic, 500. solicitous for O'Neile to be made groom of the bedchamber, 534, 535. her and the king's letters fell into their enemies' hands at the battle of Naseby, 554. garbled and published by them, ib. cardinal Richelieu prevented her going into France, when she first went abroad, 591.

admitted there by cardinal Mazarine on her leaving England a second time, ib. advised the king to promise the Scotch to establish presbyterianism in England, 592, 604. her letter to the chancellor of the exchequer concerning the prince of Wales's removal into France, 594, 595. the lords Capel and Colepepper sent to dissuade her from sending for the prince into France, 595. how far prevailed upon, 596, 598. lord Digby's transactions with her and cardinal Mazarine in France, 597. sends for the prince, 602. sir W. Davenant sent by her to the king to persuade him to give up the church, 606. sir J. Berkley sent from her to him, 614. gained over by the Scottish commissioners, 633, 672. how she treated the prince at Paris, 640. lord Jermyn her chief officer, ib. the earl of Holland, designing to rise with the duke of Buckingham and others, again countenanced by her, 642. the prince disposed by her to depend wholly upon the presbyterian party, 649. the countess of Carlisle gains confidence again with her, 656. sends a paper to be delivered to the parliament, upon the report of what they intended against the king, but it was laid aside, 691. her first message to the prince, as king, 704. who resolved not to resign himself entirely to her governance, ib. why she coolly received the marquis of Mountrose, notwithstanding his services in the royal cause, 708. why some urged and others dissuaded the king's seeing her on his intended journey to Ireland, 714. the chancellor not at all in her favour, 715. and why, 719. why angry at the king's project of going into Ireland, ib. her interview with him at St. Germain's, 720. he tells her plainly that he would not be governed by her, ib. Mr. Elliot, though under great obligations, had little reverence for her, ib. the chancellor of the exchequer's private audience with her, 721. not solicitous for the king's stay in France, as she could not have the dominion over him, 724. removes to the Louvre, 725. advises the king to agree with the Scots upon their terms, and why, 737, 738. why lord Cottington was ungracious to her, 752. the king left the duke of York with her, with direction to conform himself to her will, 755. too large an establishment assigned him by her, 755. complains to the chancellor of the foolish marriage scheme proposed to the duke of York by two of his counsellors, 757. Dr. Cosins forbid to officiate to the protestants in her family, ib. the chancellor speaks to her about it, ib. her answer, ib. how she received the duke of York and his counsellors, 758. her pecuniary difficulties, 772, 778. lord Jermyn appointed by the king one of his new council, to please her, 776. earnestly presses for sir John Berkley to be made one also, ib. not granted, ib. why countenanced the king's attending the Hugonot church, 779. how her prejudice against the chancellor of the exchequer was increased, ib. 780. his intended behaviour towards her, 781. supposed to have countenanced the scheme of marrying the duke of York to mademoiselle de Longueville, 783. consults the chancellor about it, ib. instances of her displeasure against him, 805, 806. though hitherto averse from sir Edward Herbert, she now recommends him to the king as lord keeper, who appoints him, 807. solicits that Mr. Long, one of her creatures, might be restored to the secretaryship of state, ib. 808. is refused, ib. prevails with the king to send her son, the duke of Gloucester to her at Paris, 812. and to leave him with her, 813. at the king's desire the chancellor had an audience with her, ib. countenances the endeavours to pervert the duke of Gloucester in his religion, 820. is obliged to let him go to the king, who had sent for him in consequence, ib. at cardinal Mazarine's request sent lord Jermyn to invite the king into France, when his restoration was probable, 907. had lately persuaded the king to make lord Jermyn earl of St. Alban's, ib.

Henrietta, princess, daughter of Charles I, 778, 847. born at Exeter, 490, 620. privately conveyed by her governess, the countess of Morton, into France, ib. 811. married the duke of Orleans, 490.

Henry III, 308, 904.

Henry IV, 90, 214, 215, 233, 267.

Henry IV, king of France, 764.

Henry VI, 88.

Henry VII, 88, 114, 172, 206, 238, 253, 698, 838, 843.

Henry VIII, 22, 90, 96, 698.

Henry, prince, son of James I, 8, 307, 701.

Henry, prince of Orange, (see Orange.)

Herbert, sir Edward, (as attorney-general,) 221, 674, 717. solicitor-general, 54. his part in the debate in the house of commons concerning grievances, ib. opposes Mr. Hyde's question on the king's proposition to parliament respecting ship-money, 56. misrepresents the proceedings of parliament in this business to the king, ib. his general conduct in parliament, 84. made attorney-general, ib. in which capacity he accuses lord Kimbolton and five members of the house of commons, of high treason, by the king's command, 143. a committee appointed by the house of commons to prepare a charge against him for having accused their five members, 153. the commons examine him, 154. his answer, ib. they vote a charge against him, ib. impeached by them, 174. the king's letter in his favour prejudicial to him, 194. differences between the lords and commons respecting council being allowed him, ib. his defence, ib. decision of the lords in his favour, ib. altered to please the commons, ib. had more influence than any person over prince Rupert, 655, 807. farther notice of him, ib. concerned in the divisions among the prince of Wales's court, 659. causes the prince to undervalue lord Hopton, 660. cultivates prince Rupert's prejudice against lord Colepepper, 671. an instance of it, ib. he and sir George Radcliff have great interest with the duke of York, 756. concerned in the factions in the duke's family, 758, 776. what led lord Jermyn to court him, both being hitherto enemies to each other, 807. his declaration respecting lord Jermyn, ib. made lord keeper at the queen's solicitation, ib. how qualified for the post, ib. why he and Jermyn advised Mr. Long to petition to be restored to the secretaryship, ib. his opinion as to the chancellor of the exchequer's having conversed with Cromwell, 808. accuses the chancellor of having spoken ill of the king, 809. produces lord Gerrard to prove it, ib. ill satisfied with the result, ib. partly instrumental in making prince Rupert leave Charles II. and go into Germany, 812. resigns the great seal to the king, 813. and never afterwards saw him, ib.

Herbert of Ragland, Edward Somerset, lord, afterwards earl of Glamorgan, and subsequently second marquis of Worcester, 351, 352, 401. made general of South Wales, 351. observations on this appointment, ib. a subject of complaint by parliament, 337. who request he may be removed from court, 338. raises a little army, 351. is surprised by sir William Waller, and routed, 352. persuaded to decline the command of Wales, 417.

Herbert, Henry lord, afterwards duke of Beaufort, one of the committee sent by parliament to wait on Charles II. at the Hague, 908.

Hereford and Tewkesbury taken by sir William Waller: both which he presently left, 352. Hereford taken again by sir William Waller, 382.

Hereford, Walter Devereux, fifth viscount, one of the committee sent by the parliament to wait on Charles II. at the Hague, 908.

Hereford, bishop of, (see G. Coke.)

Hertford, William Seymour, earl of, afterwards marquis of, and duke of Somerset, 97, 121, 340, 350, 395, 399, 400, 401, 404, 412, 413, 424, 437, 527, 626, 666, 810. sworn one of the new privy-counsellors, 78. made a marquis, 97. made governor to the prince of Wales, 170. ordered by parliament not to suffer him to go out of the country, 154. his character, 170, 369, 414, 415. and previous conduct, 170. concurred not in the proceedings against the earl of Strafford, although he had no affection for him, ib. his reason for accepting the office of governor, 171. carried the prince to the king at Greenwich by his command, though prohibited by parliament, 175. one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 262. appointed by the king his lieutenant-general of all the western parts, 273. sent thither, 287. his actions in Somersetshire, 290. retires to Sherborne, 291. the earl of Bedford comes against him, ib. his challenge to fight not accepted by the earl, 296. his proceedings in the west, ib. thence transports himself into Glamorganshire, ib. he and prince Maurice, as his lieutenant-general, with their forces, join the Cornish army at Chard, 399. whither they had been sent by the king, ib. takes Taunton, Bridgewater, and Dunstar castle, 400. some jealousy between him and prince Maurice, 401. he and the prince prepare their march for Oxford, ib. followed by sir W. Waller, ib. 402, 403. beat sir W. Waller in the battle of Lansdown, 403. they come to Oxford, 405. return to Bath, 407. jealousies between him and prince Rupert, 412. sir Ralph Hopton firmly devoted to him, 413. why removed from the army to attend the king, 414. against his inclination, ib. observations on this change, 415. difference between him and prince Maurice relative to appointing sir A. A. Cooper governor of Weymouth, 42. the king with difficulty persuaded by the chancellor of the exchequer to gratify the marquis, 426. returns to the king at Oxford, ib. 435. one of the king's commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. attended Charles I.'s funeral, 698. the garter conferred on him by Charles II. on his restoration, 910. dies shortly after, ib.

Hertford, (Frances Devereux,) marchioness of, 501.

Hesse, landgrave of, contributed not to the subsidy granted by the diet in Germany to Charles II. though under obligations to James I. and Charles I., 816.

Hesse Darmstadt, Elizabeth Amelia, daughter of George II. landgrave of, married the duke of Newburgh, 819.

Hewet, (Huet,) Dr., tried before a high court of justice for sending money to Charles II., 850. refused to plead, ib. condemned, 851. executed, 852. notice of him, ib. lord Falconbridge and his wife, a daughter of Cromwell, interceded for him in vain, ib.

Hewson, colonel, suppresses a rising of the city apprentices, 884.

Heydon, sir John, lieutenant of the ordnance to Charles I., 289, 305.

High-commission court, dissolved by act of parliament, 113. its origin and object, ib. how it had exceeded its bounds, ib.

High court of justice, constituted by the commons for trial of Charles I., 692. Bradshaw its president, ib. lawyers and other officers appointed, ib. proceedings, 695. disturbance in the court by lady Fairfax, 696. a new high court of justice sits, 700. duke Hamilton, earls of Holland and Norwich, lord Capel, and sir J. Owen, tried and condemned, 700, 701. a high court of justice erected to try persons holding correspondence with Charles Stuart, 708. Mr. Gerard and Mr. Vowel tried, ib.

Hill, colonel Arthur, 354.

Hinchman, Dr., prebendary of Salisbury, meets Charles II. in his flight after the battle of Worcester, on Salisbury plains, and conducts him to Heale, Mrs. Hyde's house, 771.

Hippesley, sir John, 12.

Hispaniola, the English fleet under Pen, and the troops under Venables, unsuccessful in an attempt upon, 833.

Hochstraten, village, notice of, 860.

Hochstraten, count of, owner of the village of that name, 860. one of the greatest nobles in the duchy of Brabant, ib.

Holland, the privilege allowed to the English ambassador of voting in the States General discontinued, 27. how long permitted, ib. Holland entered into a close correspondence with the Scotch covenanters, 51. the States hostile to Charles I. and favourable to the parliament, 269. substance of the declaration of the parliament to the States General, 325. the prince of Wales desires the States to intercede with parliament for his father, 691. their answer, ib. they send an ambassador, ib. who was not admitted to an audience till after his death, ib. the States condole with Charles II. on his father's murder, 704. circumstances that made Charles II.'s departure from Holland necessary, 711. he delivers a memorial to the States, 712, 713. the States unwilling that he should return to the Hague, 738. or that the duke of York should remain there, 758. invited by the English parliament to a strict union, 784. without effect, ib. thereupon the act of navigation passed against them, ib. their ships ordered in consequence not to strike to the English, 785. a war begun on this account, ib. the message of the States to parliament, ib. their answer, 780. Blake takes their fishing busses, and their guard ships, ib. sir G. Ayscue takes or sinks thirty sail of their merchants, ib. and fights their fleet near Plymouth, ib. Charles II. proposes that he should join his interest with theirs, ib. they thank him, but decline his proposal, 787. their fleet beaten by Blake, ib. they send again to the parliament for peace, ib. Cromwell never zealous for this war, but governed in it by Saint-John, ib. their fleet beaten again, 1653, 796. they send four commissioners to treat of peace with the protector, ib. how received, ib. their fleet again beaten, and their admiral, Van Trump, slain, 797. Cromwell makes peace with them, ib. the States General congratulate the king's coming to Breda; and the States of Holland invite him to the Hague, 908. his reception and entertainment there, ib. the fisheries on the coasts of Scotland and the isles of Orkney, a source of great trade to Holland, 786.

Holland, Henry Rich, first earl of, 64, 111, 114, 119, 170, 278, 282, 422, 437, 665, 738. his family, 25. served in the war in Holland, ib. became very acceptable to the duke of Buckingham, 26. whom he courted implicitly, ib. but his friendship was more entire to the earl of Carlisle, ib. had a fortune by his wife, Isabel Cope, ib. placed about the prince of Wales through the duke's interest, ib. made earl of Holland, ib. his other honours, ib. had the queen's good opinion, ib. and was consequently an enemy to the earl of Portland, ib. made general of the horse against the Scotch covenanters, 46. his retreat from Dunc, 48. how he received the covenanters' letter to him, ib. neither loved the marquis of Hamilton, Wentworth, nor archbishop Laud, 49. nor almost any thing then done in church or state, ib. challenged by the earl of Newcastle to fight, in consequence of an occurrence in the Scotch expedition, but declines, 50. not employed in the second Scotch expedition, 57. irreconcilable to the earl of Strafford, ib. and why, 60. one of the commissioners to treat with the Scots at Rippon, 63. courted by the Scotch commis- sioners, ib. and gained over by them, 64. why the queen's favour was withdrawn from him, 67. appointed general to disband the armies after the second Scotch expedition, 109. the misfortune of his appointment, ib. his conduct in consequence of the king's refusing to make some one a baron, 115. declares for the factious party, 118. will not attend the king to Hampton-court, though groom of the stole, 152. and dissuaded the earl of Essex from attending, ib. sent to the king by the parliament, with their declaration, 180, 181. observations on his rise and conduct, 190, 374. presented the parliament's petition to the king at Beverley, 274. the king's censure of him, 278. reasons of his rancorous hostility to the king, 279. one of the commissioners sent by parliament to the king with propositions of peace, 337. weary of the war, 407. puts himself into the king's quarters, 419. it is debated how he should be received, 421. had from the time of the queen's return from abroad privately made offer of his service to her, and renewed his old friendship with Jermyn, 423. particulars respecting his going to Oxford, 421, 423. waited on the king at the siege of Gloucester, 423. behaved bravely in the battle of Newbury, 435. why displeased with his reception, ib. did not act his part well, ib. 436. chancellor of the exchequer's advice to him, 436. returns to the parliament's quarters, 437, 451. committed to prison by parliament on his return, 452. prepares to rise with the duke of Bucks and others in favour of the king, 642, 650. goes to Kingston, 663. is routed there, ib. escapes to St. Neot's, where he is taken, 664. tried by a new high court of justice, 700. condemned, 701. his petition for his life rejected by the commons, chiefly through Cromwell's animosity, 702. beheaded, 703. his behaviour, ib.

- Holland, sir John, one of the committee appointed by parliament to present their petition to the king at Beverley, 274. one of their commissioners to treat with him, 356, 366. one of the committee sent by parliament to wait upon Charles II. at the Hague, 908.
- Hollis, Denzil, 166, 262. his family, character, and conduct, 75. a plan of making him secretary of state, 72, 85, 101. not hostile to the church, 94. what advantage might have arisen from his being gained over, 129. one of the five members of the commons accused of high treason by the king's order, 143. further particulars relative to the charge, 143, 144, 148, 150, 152, 153, 156, 158, 167, 174, 178, 179, 185, 187, 193, 195, 221, 225, 241, 256, 282. sent down by parliament into the west with the earl of Bedford, 291. lieutenant of Bristol, 290. one of the parliament's commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. his feeling with respect to the presbyterian and independent parties, 529. opposed the self-denying ordinance, 532. one of the leading members in the commons, 616. his insult to Ireton, ib. one of the eleven members impeached by the army, ib. Monk consults him and other leaders of the presbyterian party respecting Charles II.'s restoration, 894. one of the committee sent by parliament to wait upon the king at the Hague, 908.
- Hooker, Richard, 247.
- Hopton, sir Ralph, afterwards lord, 291, 409, 420, 448, 466, 477, 484, 545, 547, 556, 565, 567, 570, 573, 582, 584. committed to the Tower by the commons for certain expressions relative to their declaration to the king, 179. sent into the west to assist in forming an army for the king, 273, 287. arms a troop of dragoons at his own charge, 291. sent into Cornwall, 297, 340. his and sir B. Greenvil's progress there, 340, 343, 397, 400, 401. beats the parliament's forces under Ruthen at Braddock-down, 343. takes Saltash, ib. present at the defeat of the earl of Stamford at Stratton, 397. his reputation in the west second to no man's, 400. wounded in the battle of Lansdown, 404. looked upon as the soul of the western army, ib. particulars of his being appointed governor of Bristol, 412, 413. his regret respecting the differences that arose, ib. made baron Hopton of Stratton, 416. his character, 482. possesses himself of Winchester, 477. takes Arundel castle, 478. which is retaken by sir W. Waller, ib. weakened by the loss of colonel Boles's regiment, ib. 479. joined by the earl of Brentford, ib. the closest friendship between them, ib. sir W. Waller has the advantage over him at Alresford, ib. chiefly owing to sir A. Haalerig's lobsters, ib. much consulted by the king in military affairs, 482. made general of the ordinance, 496. one of the prince of Wales's council, 514. sent to Bristol, 531, 540, 543. disparaged by lord Goring, 547, 567. the prince's council firm in his favour, 547. ordered by the king to command the forces under the prince, 555. sir R. Greenvil's jealousy of him, 573. who afterwards recommends him or the earl of Brentford to command in chief, 581. he is appointed, ib. yet to the dissatisfaction of sir R. Greenvil, 582. his movements, ib. 583. his forces routed at Torrington by sir T. Fairfax, ib. his movements afterwards, ib. 584. dissolves his army, 585. goes to Scilly, ib. 594. remained in Jersey upon the prince of Wales's departure into France, 604. has a particular friendship for sir H. Killigrew, 609. attends the prince to join the fleet at Helvoetsluys, 648. the only one of the prince's council of whom nobody spoke ill, 660.
- Hopton-heath, the earl of Northampton slain there, having first vanquished the parliament's horse, 349.
- Horner, sir John, 290, 291, 408.
- Horton, colonel, 507.
- Hotham, sir John, 119, 174, 218, 219, 288. inveighs in parliament against the earl of Strafford, 69. what use made of him in the house, 76. active for the bill to take away the court of York, 96. why, and on what occasion he supported Mr. Hyde in the house, 126. appointed by the parliament governor of Hull, 154, 156. differences respecting his conduct between the king and parliament, 196, 197, 202, 203, 204, 205, 207, 211, 214, 215, 231, 232, 234, 235, 237, 244, 251, 252, 264, 268, 273, 275, 277, 281, 283. particulars of his refusing the king admittance into Hull, 203, 204. his conduct approved of by parliament, 204, 206, 207. lord Digby's transactions with him at Hull, 283. allows him and Ashburnham to escape, 284, 285. notice of his character, 284. the parliament would have been absolute masters of Yorkshire but for his improper conduct, 346. executed with his son by order of parliament, chiefly for corresponding with the marquis of Newcastle, 539.
- Hotham, the son, 126. sent with his father by the parliament to Hull, 156. who had more confidence in him than in his father, 206, 283. and used him as a spy over him, ib. what his father said against him, 284. cabals against his father, 285. infested Yorkshire, 344, 345. was against allowing a neutrality in that county, ib. executed with his father, chiefly for holding a correspondence with the marquis of Newcastle, 539.
- Howard of Escrick, Edward, lord, one of the king's commissioners to treat with the Scots at Rippon, 63. coincided with others in the prosecution of archbishop Laud and the earl of Strafford, 74. one of the committee sent by parliament to be a check upon Charles I. in Scotland, 112, 119. one of those sent with the parliament's answer to the king's message concerning Hull, 206. one of the few lords who attended parliament, 467.

Howard, colonel Thomas, 400, 402.

Howard, William, signed the anabaptists' address to Charles II, 85.

Hudleston, — sent to Charles II. in his flight from Worcester, by Careless, and brings him to lord Wilmot, 767. and to Mrs. Lane's house, 768.

Hudson, — acted as guide to Charles I. through the by-ways from Oxford, when he put himself into the Scotch quarters before Newark, 601.

Huet, (see Hewet.)

Hugonots in France, declared enemies to Charles I, 327.

Hull, sir J. Hotham appointed governor of, by parliament, 154. differences between the king and parliament respecting this appointment, 156, 196, 197, 203, 203, 204, 205, 207, 211, 214, 215, 231, 232, 234, 235, 244, 251, 264, 268, 273, 275, 277, 281, 283. order of parliament concerning Hull, 182. their petition to the king to remove the magazine from thence, 195. his answer, 196. the magazine removed notwithstanding, 197. particulars of sir J. Hotham's refusing the king admittance into Hull, 203. his conduct approved of by parliament, 204, 206.

Hungary, Ferdinand III. king of, 803.

Huntingdon, Henry Hastings, fifth earl of, 348.

Huntingdon, sixth earl of, (see lord Hastings.)

Huntington, major, 623. one of the best officers the parliament had, ib. on whom Cromwell relied more than any one, ib. made tender of his services to Charles II, 892.

Hurry, (see Urry.)

Hutton, sir Richard, judge, notice of, 578.

Hutton, sir Richard, the son, 578. notice of, ib.

Hyde, captain, 221.

Hyde, sir Edward, afterwards earl of Clarendon, 77, 85, 374, 119, 122, 132, 284, 303. (as chancellor of the exchequer,) 423, 435, 446, 513, 599, 530, 550, 565, 566, 573, 584, 586, 646, 660, 661, 671, 674, 676, 677, 720, 757, 761, 779, 786, 789, 804, 806, 807, 814, 823, 824, 827, 893, 896, 897. his object in writing the history of the rebellion, 1, 541. his fitness for the undertaking, 1. his speech in the house about a supply to be granted to Charles I. in lieu of ship-money, 55, 56. his regret at the dissolution of this parliament, 56. chairman of the committee respecting the bill against the court of York, 96. obtains great credit for his speech upon it, ib. why he did not obtain a vote of thanks, as was proposed by the northern members, ib. by the earl of Bedford's desire, attempts to alter the earl of Essex's resolution with respect to the earl of Strafford, 96, 97. but in vain, 97. importuned not to name the marquis of Hamilton as one of the king's evil counsellors, 110. why made chairman of the committee concerning the bill for the abolition of episcopacy, ib. which he nevertheless materially obstructs, ib. protests against the remonstrance of the house of commons being printed, 125. in consequence of his service against the court of York, the northern members prevent his being prosecuted for protesting, 126. his defence of himself, ib. and of Jeffery Palmer, ib. opposes a committee being appointed respecting the militia, 132. with difficulty persuades lord Falkland to accept the office of secretary of state, 137. his reasons for declining any office himself, ib. the king declares he would do nothing concerning the house of commons without his, lord Falkland's, and sir J. Colepepper's advice, ib. lord Digby had been instrumental in promoting these three to the king's favour, 138. and had a great esteem for them himself, ib. the three discouraged, by the king prosecuting lord Kimbolton and five members of the commons without consulting them, 145. advised not to approve of the king's prosecution, ib. his speech notwithstanding, 146. one of those most trusted in the commons, by the king, 228. had a great friendship with lord Falkland, ib. and a great respect for lord Littleton, ib. his conversation with him respecting the king's being dissatisfied with his conduct, ib. 229. one of those excepted by parliament from making peace with them on any terms, 300. made chancellor of the exchequer, (under which title he is hereafter mentioned,) 369, 520. and the earl of Southampton, 370. why entertained great kindness for the earl of Pembroke, 373. supposed to know as much as most men about the design of Mr. Waller and Mr. Tomkins, 389. seldom spoke without some earnestness, 421. advises that the lords who came over to the king from parliament should be well received, 422. why very civil to the earl of Holland, 423. with difficulty persuades the king to make sir A. A. Cooper governor of Weymouth in compliance with the wishes of the marquis of Hertford, 426. has not related the transactions in the northern parts, not being present, nor having any part in those counsels, 454, 455. his expedients adopted, that the peers about the king should write to the council in Scotland, 455. drawn up by him, ib. and that a parliament should be summoned at Oxford of those members who had left that at Westminster, ib. had a kindness for the earl of Leicester, ib. his firm persuasion that the king was not concerned in the rebellion of Ireland, 459. one of those appointed to investigate the accusations against duke Hamilton, 473. appointed one of the prince of Wales's council, 514. out of esteem for archbishop Laud he advises the king to send him a pardon under the great seal, 519. one of the king's commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. prepared all the papers at the treaty, 522. the earl of Lowden in vain tries to prevail on him to persuade the king to give up the church, ib. his answer to the earl's speech against episcopacy, 525. his comments to prove the king's counsels just, 526. much to the confusion of the parliament commissioners, ib. the earl of Pembroke in vain tries to persuade him that it was reasonable to consent to all the parliament demanded, 528. troubled at being one in the king's intended list of those in whom he would consent to vest the power of the militia, 530. one of the commissioners to inquire into the complaints against sir R. Greenvil, 548. unable to wait on the king in Wales, by reason of the gout, 564. his conference with lord Goring, 566. remained in Jersey after the prince's departure into France, 604. Charles I.'s opinion of him, 606. sir H. Killigrew his intimate friend, 609. substance of the king's letter to him, 621. sent for to the prince from Jersey, 645, 646. his and lord Cottington's capture before they joined the prince, 659. most esteemed of all the prince's council by prince Rupert, 677. sent by Charles II. to confer with the marquis of Mountrose in a village near the Hague, 708. lady Aubigny his friend, 710. his conference with duke Hamilton concerning the affairs of Scotland, 710. and with lord Cottington concerning the king's sending an embassy into Spain, 714. why disposed to go on this embassy, 715. the queen unfavourable towards him, ib. 719. he and lord Cottington appointed ambassadors, 715. why the Scots rejoiced at his appointment, ib. appointed to make a declaration relating to England, 717. which was laid aside owing to the different opinions upon it, 717, 718. the ambassadors begin their journey, 718. visit the duke of Lorraine at Brussels, ib. proceed to Paris to wait on the king and queen, 720. his private audience with the queen, 721. the ambassadors begin their journey for Spain, 725. his account of certain public spectacles at Madrid, 729. an account of their audience, 732. they have a house assigned them, ib. their private audience and demands, 734. the answer they receive, 735. prince Rupert's letter to him, ib. his occupation there, ib. they are ordered by Charles II. to remain where they were, 739. their audience with the Spanish king, ib. they expostulate with don Lewis de Haro, respecting the reception of Ascham as the parliamentary agent in Spain, 748. they write to don Lewis about his murder, ib. are ordered by the Spanish king to leave Madrid, and why, 752. they have audience of leave, 753. he is dismissed very courteously, 754. in his passage through France he waits on the queen-mother, ib. speaks with her about Dr. Cosins's being forbid to officiate to the protestants in her family at Paris, 757. confers with Mr. Montague about it, 758. finds the duke of York at Breda, ib. sent for by the king at Paris, 772. where he receives from him the account of his escape after the battle of Worcester, ib. his friendship with the marquis of Ormond, 775. without which he could not have borne what he did, ib. sir J. Berkley tries to prejudice the duke of York against him, 776. one of the king's new council, ib. tries to dissuade sir J. Berkley from applying for the mastership of the wards, 777. who breaks with him, in consequence of the king's refusal to grant it, ib. his opinion as to the duke of York's going into the French army, 778. generally liked, ib. dissuades the king from attending the Hugonot church at Charenton, 779. appointed to make all the king's despatches for Scotland, 781. desires not to be employed, ib. the king's reply to him, ib. he submits, ib. the queen more prejudiced against him in consequence, ib. his natural prejudice against Scotland, ib. all failures in soliciting for places attributed to him, 782. the queen consults him about the marriage of the duke of York, 783. acted as secretary of state during the king's stay in France, 804. his uneasy state there, 805. the queen is against him there, ib. a petition intended of the Scotch presbyterians by Balcarris and Frazier for his removal, ib. and of the Roman catholics also against him, 806. the king quashes them both, ib. designs to mortify him, 807. accused by Mr. Long of having conversed with Cromwell, 808. lord keeper Littleton accuses him of having spoken ill of the king, ib. 809. his defence, 809. the king declares that he took nothing ill that he had said, ib. forgives Mr. Long, ib. at the king's request, has an audience of the queen-mother, before his departure from France, 813. his discourse with the king about his going into Scotland, and his reply, 817, 818. the queen ascribes to him the recall of the duke of Gloucester from her, 821. how far concerned in the discovery of the treachery of Manning, 827, 828, 829. sent to Brussels to confer with don Alonzo de Cardinas, 845, 846. made lord chancellor, 848. was against the marquis of Ormond's going into England, ib.

Hyde, sir Robert, sergeant, afterwards chief justice of the king's bench, 771.

I.

Jamaica, city of, taken by Pen and Venables, 834. Cromwell sends recruits there, ib.

James, — 100.

James I, 21, 22, 25, 26, 27, 34, 45, 80, 81, 96, 105, 127, 138, 170, 211, 274, 328, 369, 370, 373, 493, 504, 639, 696, 701, 744, 754, 797, 816. his death, 2, 10. succeeded by Charles I, ib. state of the kingdom at that time, 2. though learned, yet fond of handsome persons and fine clothes, 4. quicksighted in discerning difficulties, and very slow in mastering them, 5. weary of his favourite, the earl of Somerset, he first noticed Mr. Villiers, (duke of Buckingham,) 4. the favours he conferred upon him, 4, 5. even allowed him to dispose of every public honour and office, ib. many thought that he grew weary of him, and had he lived, would have deprived him of his power, ib. why not probable, ib. never well pleased with him after prince Charles's journey into Spain, ib. 8. how his consent to the journey was obtained, 5, 8. his reasons against it, 7. usually called Buckingham, Stenny, and his son, Baby Charles, ib. calls a parliament after the prince's return from Spain, 8. offended also with Buckingham, as the cause of the earl of Middlesex's impeachment, 10. his prophetic declaration to prince Charles and Buckingham concerning parliamentary impeachments, in consequence of their supporting that against the earl of Middlesex, 10. his weakness in still listening to Buckingham, and deserting the earl of Bristol, ib. libels circulated against him after his death, ib. the earl of Montgomery one of his favourites before the earl of Somerset, 24. the felicity of the times before the long parliament of Charles compared with his reign, 30. he intended to have introduced the English liturgy into Scotland, 33. jealous at his first coming into England of those who had the reputation of great parts, 24. his partiality for the earl of Carlisle, 25. the earl of Holland got into his grace by the handsomeness of his person, 26. his observation on the insolence of the Scotch preachers, 35.

James II, (see duke of York.)

Jarvis, captain, 501, 502.

Jealousies arise among the king's principal officers about the government of Bristol, 412.

Jenkins, — 680.

Jennings, Ralph, signed the anabaptists' address to Charles II, 855.

Jephson, captain, 502.

Jermyn, Jermin, Henry, first lord, and afterwards earl of St. Alban's, 423. (as lord,) 435, 455, 593, 595, 718, 778, 780, 787. notice of his flight in the communications between the king and parliament, 178, 180, 185, 221, 225, 243. being courted by the earl of Holland, he induces the queen to receive the earl again into favour, 423. valued himself on the impossible faculty of pleasing all, and displeasing none, ib. made a baron, 435. wounded at Awborne Chase, 428. was governor of Jersey, 599. sent to Jersey to take the prince of Wales to the queen in France, 599, 603. his and lord Digby's arguments in favour of the prince's going, ib. Charles I.'s opinion of his advice as to the church, 606. was the chief officer of the queen's household at Paris, 640. the earl of Holland renews his friendship with him, 642. encourages the risings in England in favour of the king, ib. his efforts to have the command of the fleet, 648, 649. an instance of his covetousness as governor of Jersey, 725. appointed one of Charles II.'s new council to please the queen, 776. his feeling and conduct as to religion, 778. advises Charles II. to attend the Hugonot church at Charenton, 778, 779. active in the design of marrying the duke of York to mademoiselle de Longueville, 783. in order to make a party against the chancellor of the exchequer, he courts sir E. Herbert, his avowed enemy, 807. concerned in Mr. Long's affair to mortify the chancellor, ib. 808. went to the king with compliments from cardinal Mazarine, 878. advises that the duke of York should accept the offer of being made admiral of Spain, ib. cardinal Mazarine persuades the queen-mother to send him to invite the king into France, 907. made earl of St. Alban's, ib.

Jermyn, sir Thomas, 129, 372.

Jersey reduced, sir G. Carteret being ordered by Charles II. to make conditions, after a brave defence of Elizabeth castle, 787.

Jesuits possess ascendancy in Germany over all other men, 821.

Jesus, bowing at his name forbidden by parliament, 117.

Jewels, (see Crown.)

Inchiquin, Murrrough O'Brien, lord, afterwards earl of, 633, 641, 674, 675, 676, 705, 724. the English parliament possessed the province of Munster through his and lord Broghill's activity, 632. was president of that province, 633. holds a correspondence with the marquis of Ormond, ib. concludes a cessation of arms with the confederate catholics, 667. the marquis of Ormond chiefly depended upon him, 722. confirmed in his intentions of serving the king, 723. departs for Munster, ib. Cromwell marches into Munster against him, 737. why unable to retain Munster against Cromwell, ib.

Independents; observations on the different conduct of the independent English and the presbyterian Scots, 637.

Infanta of Spain, 732.

Ingoldsby, colonel, 892. advised the protector Richard to remain firm to the parliament against the council of officers, 866. removed in consequence by this council, ib. sent against Lambert by the parliament, 892. one of Lambert's troops revolt to him, ib. takes Lambert prisoner, ib. makes tender of his service to Charles II, ib. why the king was perplexed with his particular case, 906. anecdote of his having signed Charles I.'s death-warrant by compulsion, ib.

Innocent X. pope, 806, 821. notice of his death, ib. had fomented the rebellion in England by cherishing that in Ireland, ib.

Instructions; the parliament's instructions to the earl of Essex their general, 299. the lords Capel and Colepepper's instructions when sent to dissuade the king from sending for the prince into France, 595. the Scotch commissioners' private instructions from Argyle's party, 706.

Instrument of government, Cromwell installed protector by it, 795.

Insurrection designed in England by Charles II.'s party, 822.

John, don, of Austria, (see Juan.)

Jones, — sallies out of Dublin and beats the marquis of Ormond, 723.

Joyce, cornet, seized upon Charles I. at Holmby, 612.

Ireland, 151, 162, 165, 166, 167, 362, 523. mention of in the communications and proceedings between the king and parliament, 148, 155, 161, 162, 164, 172, 173, 174, 178, 180, 181, 182, 183, 185, 186, 188, 189, 195, 196, 204, 207, 211, 212, 220, 222, 223, 234, 235, 242, 277, 300, 388, 456. its state before the long parliament of Charles I., 31. rebellion under sir P. O'Neill, 121. insinuated by some that it was contrived by the king, or at least the queen, 121, 130, 169. state of affairs, 130. money raised under pretence of relieving Ireland, as the prosecution of the war was committed by the king to the parliament, 174. propositions for adventurers in Ireland, 183. a commission appointed, 184. the king offers to go in person to Ireland, 197. observations on this design, 201. Spain aided the rebellion there, 326. state of it with respect to the differences between the king and parliament, 352, 356. miserable condition of the army there, 456. the address of the lords justices and council to the king upon the subject, 457. who is obliged to treat with the rebels, 458. a cessation of arms concluded, ib. disowned by parliament, ib. the letter from parliament to the lords justices and council on the subject, 459. their answer, ib. 460. notice of the condition of Ireland, 460. propositions of peace rejected by the king, 512. discussion respecting Ireland, by the commissioners for a treaty at Uxbridge, 525. the Irish prisoners allowed no quarter by the parliament, 539. the affairs in Ireland in 1647, 632. the marquis of Ormond transports himself out of England into France, ib. the reasons that moved him to go again into Ireland, 633. the affairs of Ireland during lord Lisle's being there, 641. the affairs of the marquis of Ormond and lord Inchiquin there, 674, 675. an account of the affairs of the Irish about this time, ib. the characters of Preston and O'Neill their chief generals, 675. the pope's nuncio commands the Irish, 667. the marquis of Ormond arrives at Kinsale, and the nuncio leaves Ireland, ib. an account of the affairs in Ireland after the marquis's return, 722. he blocks up Dublin, 723. the lord Inchiquin departs from him for Munster, ib. recruits land at Dublin from England, ib. Jones sallies out of Dublin, and beats the marquis's army, ib. Cromwell made by the English parliament lord lieutenant of Ireland, ib. provides forces for his going thither, 724. arrives at Dublin, ib. which delays Charles II.'s intended voyage to Ireland, ib. state of affairs, 1649, 736. Tredagh taken by storm, 737. Cromwell marches into Munster, ib. his success there, 736. Charles II. gives over the thought of going into Ireland, 737. state of affairs, 1650, 743. the English parliament refuse to ratify Monk's treaty with Owen

O'Neill, 744. Cromwell gives the Irish leave to enter into any foreign service, ib. state of affairs, 1651, 773. Ireton made lord deputy by Cromwell, ib. the marquis of Ormond's condition there, ib. Owen O'Neill died, as he was going to join him, ib. a mutiny in Limerick, whence the marquis escaped, ib. the popish bishops make an assembly, and publish a declaration against the English, 774. they declare to the marquis of Ormond that they will no longer submit to him; and require him to commit the government to a Roman catholic, ib. he in consequence makes the marquis of Clanrickard his deputy, ib. and goes to France, and waits on the king at Paris after his escape from Worcester, 775. Ireton dies in Limerick of the plague, 788. Ludlow succeeds him in the charge of the army, ib. the ill condition of the marquis of Clanrickard's affairs, 789. the rebels resolve to invite the duke of Lorrain into Ireland, ib. commissioners sent to him to Brussels, ib. he sends an abbot into Ireland to be informed of the state of it, 790. the marquis of Clanrickard renounces any consent to the treaty, ib. the abbot returns to the duke, who gives over the negotiation, ib. the marquis discovers a correspondence managed by a friar between the popish Irish clergy and Ludlow, ib. he sends the earl of Castlehaven to give an account of all to the king, 791. who sends him leave to retire, ib. state of Ireland under the protector, 799, 831, 832. its affairs for some years past till 1660, ib. notice respecting property purchased in Ireland by the city of London, 149.

Ireton, Henry, 623, 626, 627, 665, 701. he, Vane, and Cromwell, the leaders of the independents, 590. one of those called by the new name of fanatics, 610. appears among the council of officers, 613. his behaviour towards Charles I, 614. insulted by Hollis, 616. the consequences, ib. he and Cromwell design with the council of officers the king's destruction, 630. left by Cromwell in Essex to watch Fairfax and his army, 655. sir C. Lucas and sir G. Lisle shot to death, chiefly owing to him, 664. being of an unmerciful and bloody nature, 665. he and Harrison the head of the levellers and agitators of the army, 694. his hatred against lord Capel immortal, 702. left by Cromwell his deputy in Ireland, 750, 773. (had married his daughter, 750.) his treatment of the rebels, 773. died in Limerick of the plague, 788. his character, ib. Wogan more in credit with him than any man, 804. Ireton, sir John, alderman, 865. lord mayor, 880.

Isabella, archduchess, 20, 501.

Juan, (John,) don of Austria, 835, 845, 846, 847. made governor of Flanders, 835. besieges Condé, 845. which he takes, 847. the earl of Bristol ingratiates himself with him, notwithstanding the prejudice against him, 847. he and Carracena took not the prince of Condé's advice, 859. and lose the battle of Dunkirk in consequence, ib. 860. is recalled to Spain, 872. notice of him, ib.

Judges made themselves and the laws despised by their decision respecting ship-money, 29.

Juliers, notice of the town, 818. duchy of, 819.

Justice, (see High court of justice.)

Justices, lord, (see Ireland.)

Juxon, William, 80, 90, 698. succeeded archbishop Laud in the bishopric of London, through his means, 37. made lord treasurer, 40. offence taken at his appointment, ib. opposes the king's making a park between Richmond and Hampton-court, 41. the Scotch liturgy and canons submitted, when framed, to him, archbishop Laud, and bishop Wren, 42, 43. resigns the treasurership, and lives retired during all the troubled times, 84.

Keepership of the great seal, the attorney-general usually advanced to, 19.

Keinton, (see Edge-hill.)

Kendall, major, killed at the siege of Bristol, 409.

Kensington, manor of, came to the earl of Holland in right of his wife, (Isabel Cope,) 26.

Kent, commotions there in favour of Charles II, 646, 650. the earl of Norwich at Maidstone with the Kentish forces, 654. which march towards Blackheath, ib. Fairfax advances against them, 655. the earl of Norwich and some of the forces transport themselves into Essex, and fix in Colchester, ib. Fairfax besieges them, ib. Colchester delivered up to him, 664.

Kent, Anthony Grey, twelfth earl of, one of the commissioners intrusted with the parliament's new great seal, 453. one of the few lords who attended parliament, 467.

Ker, (see Carr.)

Kerry, Patrick Fitz-Maurice, nineteenth lord, 353.

Kettleby, (or Rytbeby,) captain, afterwards sir Thomas, 272, 667.

Killigrew, major, killed, 499.

Killigrew, sir Henry, 260, 587. one of the commissioners for the associated county of Devon, 546. the lords Capel and Hopton, and the chancellor of the exchequer, his particular friends, 609. his death, ib. his character, ib.

Killigrew, sir William, 306.

Kimbolton, Edward Mountague, lord, viscount Mandeville, afterwards second earl of Manchester, 85, 99, 144, 148, 151, 156, 174, 285, 286, 305. (as earl of Manchester,) 492, 505, 506, 507, 508, 530, 532. (as lord Mandeville,) one of the commissioners to treat with the Scots at Rippon, 63. much courted by them, ib. notice of his previous life, 73. called to the house of peers by the name of lord Kimbolton, ib. sworn a privy counsellor, 78. an intention of making him lord privy-seal after the death of his father, 102. accused, with five members of the commons, of high treason, by order of the king, 143. communications between the king and parliament on the subject, 178, 179, 185, 187, 193, 218, 221, 225, 241, 256. has a regiment conferred on him by parliament, 282. present at the battle of Edge-hill, 307. (as earl of Manchester,) notice of him, 374. an ordinance for raising an army under him, 419. the violent party wholly depended upon him, 419. one of the few peers who attended parliament, 467. the association of several counties formed under him, 480. ordered to march into the north to join the Scots, 481. commanded at the second battle of Newbury, 508. accused by Cromwell of cowardice on this occasion, 514. recriminates Cromwell, ib. disposes of his command by the self-denying ordinance, 541, 542. being speaker of the house of lords, withdrew from parliament to the army, 618. had all the prejudice imaginable against Cromwell, ib. he and the earl of Warwick the two pillars of the presbyterian party, ib. conducted back to parliament by the general of the army, 619. present with others at Monk's conference respecting the restoration of Charles II, 894.

Kimbolton, (Anne Rich,) lady, 374.

King, Henry, made bishop of Chester, 121.

King, general, 493. made lieutenant-general of the earl of Newcastle's army, 346. went abroad with the earl, 494.

Kingston, Robert Pierrepont, first earl of, anecdote of an application made to him to furnish Charles I. with money, 301, 302.

Kingston, second earl of, (see viscount Newark.)

Kinoul, George Hay, second earl of, 443, 473.

Kinoul, William Hay, third earl of, 799.

Kirton, 770.

Knight, — one of the commissioners appointed by Monk to treat with the officers of the army at London, 881.

Knighthood, made an object of profit by king Charles, 28. an act preventing vexatious proceedings touching the order of knighthood, 114.

Kniveton, Daniel, one of Charles I.'s messengers executed by parliament, 453.

Knox, John, 35.

Knox, — 780.

L.

Lambert, Charles, 465.

Lambert, — 657, 760, 761, 795, 816, 837, 838, 840, 864, 866, 879, 881, 884, 903. proposed by Cromwell as deputy of Ireland in opposition to sir W. Waller, 642, 723. marches against sir M. Langdale, and sir P. Musgrave, 654. beats sir M. Langdale, 658. routs duke Hamilton, ib. Pontefract castle delivered up to him, 670. sent by Cromwell to follow Charles II. who had entered England with an army, 760. follows, but is forced to retire, 761. makes the army dissatisfied with Cromwell, 816. was the second in command, but the first in the affections of the army, ib. aided Cromwell in becoming protector, ib. Cromwell's jealousy of him, 837. opposed Cromwell's being made king, 838. who now looked upon him as his mortal enemy, 839. and turned him out of the army, 844. one of the new council of officers who consult about the government, 865. restored to the army by the council of officers, 866. sent by parliament against sir G. Booth and sir T. Middleton, 871. routs sir G. Booth and takes Chester, 871. the parliament grows jealous of his army, 879. the petition and proposals of his army, ib. this petition discovered to Hasle-rig, who acquaints parliament with it, ib. they cashier Lambert, and eight other chief officers, ib. Lambert draws some troops together, stops the speaker, and makes him go home, 880. the officers meet, and choose Fleetwood general, and him major-general, ib. was one of the committee of safety constituted by the army, ib. sent against Monk, who had declared for the parliament, 881. comes to Newcastle, 883. the parliament meets again, and orders his troops to separate, 884. they separate, and he is committed to the Tower, 885. his escape, 891. draws four troops to him near Daventry, 892. Ingoldsbay sent against him, ib. two of his troops revolt to Ingoldsbay, 892. his party dispersed, ib. he and others taken, ib. committed again to the Tower, ib.

Lampart, sir T. Fairfax beats lord Goring near there, 559.

Lanark, earl of, (see Lanrick.)

Lancashire, the condition of, at the end of 1642, 347.

Lane, sir George, secretary to the marquess of Ormond, 847.

Lane, afterwards sir Richard, 525. argued the matter of law for the earl of Strafford at his trial, 90.

- as lord chief baron of the exchequer, one of the king's commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. was keeper of the great seal to Charles I, 807.
- Lane, — notice of, 768. Charles II. brought to his house in his flight from Worcester, ib.
- Lane, Mrs., Charles II. in his flight from Worcester rides behind her to Mr. Norton's through Bristol, ib. 769.
- Langdale, sir Marmaduke, afterwards lord, 550, 551, 553, 578, 625, 627, 644, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 658, 667, 670. commanded the left wing at the battle of Naseby, 553. the king's horse under him routed by Pointz, 576. he and sir P. Musgrave treated with by the Scots, and invited into Scotland, whither they went, 643. they refuse to take the covenant, 652. he surprises Berwick, and sir P. Musgrave Carlisle, 653. he marches a day before duke Hamilton, 658. gives him an account of the English army, ib. is beaten by Lambert, 658. and taken, ib. escapes out of Nottingham castle, 670. and goes beyond sea, ib.
- Langham, John, 321.
- Langhorn, (or Laughorn,) colonel, active in the parliament's service about Shropshire and North Wales, 527. notice of him, 650. disposed to declare for the king, ib. taken prisoner in Pembroke castle by Cromwell, 655.
- Lanrick, (Lanark,) William Hamilton, earl of, afterwards second duke Hamilton, 443, 444, 586, 588, 651, 662, 705, 706. (as duke Hamilton) 714, 737. secretary of state in Scotland to Charles I, 443. repairs to him at Oxford, 473. detained in custody, 474. escapes, ib. signed the Scotch treaty with Charles I. at the Isle of Wight, 636. his character, 643, 705. deprived of the secretaryship by the Scotch parliament, 663. (as duke Hamilton) waits on Charles II. in Holland, 705, 709. conference between him and the chancellor of the exchequer, 710. leaves the king shortly after his arrival in Scotland, 746. he and the earl of Lauderdale were nearest the king's confidence, 759. the duke of Buckingham broke off all friendship with them, 761. died of the wounds received at the battle of Worcester, 765. farther notice of his character, ib.
- Landown, battle of, 403.
- Lany, doctor Benjamin, afterwards bishop of Ely, one of the king's commissioners on ecclesiastical matters at the treaty of Uxbridge, 523.
- Laud, William, bishop of Bath and Wells, then bishop of London, and afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, 31, 45, 80, 81, 84, 87, 90, 91, 116, 118, 122, 128, 139, 228, 432, 524. the direction of ecclesiastical affairs intrusted to him by the duke of Buckingham, 27, 36. and afterwards by king Charles, 27. how administered, ib. his character, 27, 36, 38, 40. (as bishop of London) attends the king into Scotland, to advise him respecting the introduction of the English liturgy there, 33, 34. preaches before him at Edinburgh on the subject, ib. his opinion of the matter, ib. ill effects of his views, 35. discountenances Calvinism in his diocese and at Oxford, 36. made archbishop of Canterbury, ib. his rise and character, ib. 38. prejudiced against the Calvinistic party, 37. procures the see of London for bishop Juxon, ib. injudicious in too rigorously enforcing the removal of the communion table from the body of the church, 39. his proceedings opposed by bishop Williams, ib. 138, 139. the earl of Portland tries in vain to undermine his influence with the king, 39, 40. made a commissioner of the treasury, ib. his conduct in that capacity, ib. 41. opposed by lord Cottington, 40. his irascibility, ib. exposed by lord Cottington, ib. 41. endeavours to dissuade the king from making a park between Richmond and Hampton-court, as being unpopular, 41. the Scotch liturgy and canons submitted, when framed, to him, bp. Juxon, and bp. Wren, 42, 44. his direction to the framers as to the method of drawing them up, 42. the earl of Traquair the only layman consulted by him on these matters, 44. very partial to lord Conway, 57. his palace at Lambeth assaulted by the mob, 58. one of the committee of state, 60. his removal from about the king recommended by the Scotch commissioners, 63. the queen hostile to him, 67. accused of high treason by the house of commons, 71. always treated with respect by the earl of Bedford, 93. never had so great influence upon the court, as Dr. Burgess and Mr. Marshall had upon parliament, 121. lord Falkland contracted some prejudice against him, 432. his trial, 519. condemned by an ordinance, ib. the king's pardon of him, which had been suggested by the chancellor of the exchequer, declared by parliament to be of no effect, ib. beheaded, ib.
- Lauderdale, John, lord Maitland, earl of, afterwards duke of, and earl of Guilford, 633, 651, 652, 672, 709, 711, 717, 737, 758. one of the parliament's commissioners for Scotland to treat at Uxbridge, 520. his part in the treaty, 523. as one of the Scotch commissioners, signed the private treaty with Charles I. in the Isle of Wight, 636. his character, 643. sent to demand the prince of Wales's personal appearance in Scotland, 657, 659, 660, 661. returns, ib. waits on the prince, now king, in Holland, 705, 709. his discourse against the marquis of Mountrose, ib. departs from the king, when in Scotland, 746. he and duke Hamilton nearest the king's confidence, 759. the duke of Buckingham broke off all friendship with them, 761. taken prisoner after the king's defeat at Worcester, and sent to the Tower, 780.
- Laughorn, (see Langhorn.)
- Lawly, colonel, 351.
- Lawson, vice-admiral, he and the fleet declare for the parliament, and come into the river, 884. the fleet reformed, in order that he might not have so much power over it, being an anabaptist, 892, 893. well disposed towards Charles II, 908.
- Lawyers; animosities between some great lawyers and some churchmen, 122. which produced great mischiefs, ib.
- League, solemn league and covenant, copy of, 439.
- Leake, lieutenant-colonel, killed at the second battle of Newbury, 439.
- Le Bruue, 718, 719. notice of, ib.
- Lee, sergeant, 230.
- Lee, sir Thomas, 288.
- Leg, Legge, captain, 178, 185, 205, 220, 225, 235, 243.
- Leg, colonel William, 415, 710. taken prisoner at the siege of Litchfield cathedral, 384. much in prince Rupert's confidence, 415. imprisoned, whilst governor of Oxford, owing to this intimacy, 569.
- Legg, — aided Charles I.'s escape from Hampton-court, 624. notice of, 625.
- Leganez, marquis of, 733.
- Leicester stormed and taken by the king, 551, 552.
- Leicester, Robert Sydney, second earl of, 120, 303, 356, 504. made no haste to Ireland, 131, 354. shewed the instructions he had received, as lord-lieutenant from the king, to parliament, ib. his reasons for so doing, ib. jealousies between him and the earl of Ormond, 355. his character, and previous occupations, 370. refuses to sign the peers' letter to the council in Scotland, 455. thereby prevents his appointment to be the prince's governor, ib. the marquis of Ormond having the lieutenancy of Ireland in his stead, ib.
- Leicester, third earl of, (see lord Lisle.)
- Leicester, (Dorothy Percy,) countess of, the princess Elizabeth and duke of Gloucester committed to her care by parliament, 811.
- Lenox, duke of, (see duke of Richmond.)

Lenthall, William, 55, 338, 459, 470, 520, 866. unfavourable character of, 68. unfortunately chosen speaker of the house of commons, of November 1640, ib. withdraws, with other members, to the army, 618. a new speaker chosen, ib. believed to have no malice towards the king, and not to be without good inclinations to the church, ib. conducted back to parliament by the general of the army, 619. chosen speaker of Cromwell's parliament, 1654, 800. stopt by Lambert from going to parliament, and sent home again, 880. the soldiers in London resolve to restore the parliament, and wait on him, 884. goes into the city, ib. changes the command of the Tower, ib.

Leopold, William, archduke, 700, 750, 754. (see Archduke.)

Lesley, David, 564, 568, 577, 578, 708, 763, 764, 765. routs the marquis of Mountrose, 741. his insolent treatment of the marquis, who was taken prisoner, ib. made lieutenant-general by Charles II. to his Scotch army, 759. his saying concerning this army, 761. his strange conduct, 764. defeated at Worcester, ib. taken prisoner, 765. opinions for and against his having been unfaithful to his charge, ib.

Lesley, general, Alexander, earl of Leven, 64. chosen general of the Scotch covenanters, 46. had served under the king of Sweden, ib. the earl of Holland retires before him at Dunce, 48. made earl of Leven, 124, 315. his professions to the king, 124, 315. accepts the command of a fresh Scotch army against him notwithstanding, 443, 466. taken prisoner at the battle of Marston-moor, 491. induced to decline the command of another Scotch army, 651.

L'Estrange, afterwards sir Roger, notices of, 647. concerned in the commotions in Kent for Charles II, ib. escapes into Holland, 650.

Letter, intercepted from some of the Scottish nobility to the French king, 52. from the peers on the king's side to the council in Scotland, 455. from the English parliament to the lords justices in Ireland concerning a cessation of arms concluded there for a year, 459. from the lords justices in reply, ib. 460. from the members of both houses of parliament at Oxford to the earl of Essex, 467. from Charles I. to prince Rupert against treating of peace at that time, August 1645, 563. from the same at Brecknock, to the prince of Wales, 564. from the same to prince Rupert upon his surrender of Bristol, 569. from the same to lord Colepepper concerning the prince of Wales, 570. from the same to the prince, 574. another, 575.

another from Hereford, 594. from the queen to the chancellor of the exchequer concerning the prince of Wales's removal into France, 594, 595. from the general of the army to the parliament respecting a tumultuous petition of apprentices concerning the militia, 617. substance of the king's letter to the chancellor of the exchequer, 621. letter from the parliament of Scotland to the prince of Wales, 660. sum of the king's letter to his son concerning the treaty at Newport, 685. conclusion in the king's own words, ib. 686. letter from prince Rupert to the chancellor of the exchequer, 735. from the commander of the parliament's fleet to the king of Spain, ib. 736. from an anabaptist to Charles II, 856. from Monk to the parliament, 888. from Charles II. to the general and army, 898. from the same to the house of commons, ib. 899. from the same to the house of lords, 900. from the same to the fleet, 901. from the same to the lord mayor and aldermen of London, ib. from the house of commons to the king in reply, 904.

Levellers, rise of, in the army, 623, 628. Cromwell suppresses a tumult of them, ib. they mutiny, and are suppressed by Fairfax, 745. hostile to Cromwell as protector, 799. the term of levellers, to what party applied, according to the statement of an anabaptist, 857.

Leven, earl of, see general Lesley.

Levingston, sir William, 662.

Lewis, — one of the leading men in the house of commons, 1647, 616. one of the heads of the moderate presbyterian party, 894.

Lewis, don, (see Haro.)

Leyda, marquis of, sent ambassador by Spain to Cromwell, after a month returns to France, 833. comes to Brussels to solicit for supplies for Dunkirk, but in vain, 858. sallies out of Dunkirk upon the enemy, is repulsed and slain, 860.

Liche, marquis de, 729, 730.

Lichfield, (see Litchfield.)

Lilburn, John, a leveller, 617. some account of, 801, 802.

Lincoln, Theophilus Clinton, fourth earl of, one of the few peers who attended parliament, 467.

Lincoln, bishop of, (see Williams and Winnif.)

Lindsay, John Lindsay, earl of, afterwards earl of Crawford, 323.

Lindsey, Robert Bertie, first earl of, 19, 306, 307. one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. made general of the king's army at the opening of the civil war, 270, 285. killed at the battle of Edge-hill, 308, 310. his character ib.

Lindsey, second earl of, (see lord Willoughby.)

Lisle, colonel, afterwards sir George, present at the second battle of Newbury, 509. joins the Kentish men in Essex in favour of the king, 655. given up at the surrender of Colchester, 664. shot to death, ib. his character, 665.

Lisle, John, gave his vote in the king's blood, 850. and continued an entire confident and instrument of Cromwell's, ib. was president of the high court of justice to try Mr. Mordaunt and others, ib.

Lisle, Philip Sidney, lord, afterwards third earl of Leicester, 674. through Cromwell's interest sent as lord lieutenant into Ireland, 641. his kindness towards Monk, 722, 882. Cromwell appointed his successor, 723.

Litchfield cathedral taken by sir J. Gell, 349.

Litchfield, earl of, (see lord B. Stewart.)

Littleton, Edward lord, 120, 520. made lord keeper of the great seal in the room of lord Finch, 71, 84. reason for his being made a baron, 87. yet why notwithstanding he would not vote at the earl of Strafford's trial, ib. declines demanding the staff and the key of office from the earls of Essex and Holland, 191. particulars of his deserting the parliament, and of his joining the king with the great seal at York, 227, 228, 229. reasons for his previous acquiescence in the proceedings of parliament, 229. his character, 227, 369. his rise, 228. his failure as lord keeper, ib. one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 262. one of those appointed to examine into the accusation against duke Hamilton, 473.

Littleton, — 869.

Liturgy, Charles I.'s intentions of introducing the English liturgy into Scotland, how far, and why opposed, 33, 34. the liturgy and canons appointed to be drawn up by some of the Scotch bishops and submitted to archbishop Laud, bishop Juxon, and bishop Wren, 42. observations respecting the canons, ib. and the liturgy, 43. how received in Edinburgh, 44, 45. declaration of parliament concerning a reformation of the liturgy, 212.

Lockhart, — 842, 844, 864, 876. sent by Cromwell ambassador into France, who finishes an alliance there begun before by the agents of France in England, 834. commanded the English foot at the battle of Dunkirk, 850. the French king delivers Dunkirk, which had surrendered, to him, he being appointed governor by Cromwell, 860. continued ambas-

- sador in France by the parliament after Cromwell's death, 268. generally too hard for cardinal Mazarine, but cajoled by him respecting the peace between France and Spain, 876. why he could not be prevailed on to declare for Charles II, 896, 897. refuses to give up Dunkirk and Mardyke upon an offer from cardinal Mazarine of being made marshal of France, ib.
- Loftus, Adam lord, afterwards viscount Ely, chancellor of Ireland, 87, 88. case of the earl of Strafford's stretch of power against him, 89.
- London, city of, nature of its government, 149. common councilmen, how chosen, ib. generally for life, ib. notice of its common hall, 335. the sink of the ill humours of the kingdom, 80. money borrowed of the city by parliament for supplying their two armies, 83. a new common council chosen of such as were most eminent for opposing the government, and most disaffected to the church, 83, 149, 150. the committee of the house of commons that sat in the city well received, 145. the city's petition to the king, 148. his answer, ib. the state and temper of the city at that time, 149. hostile to the court, in consequence of the property bought by the city in Ireland being resumed by the king, ib. the common council's answer to the desire of the commons to borrow money of the city, 161. an intended petition from the city against the militia bill considered as a conspiracy by the commons, 180. the person who drew it up impeached by them, 195. petition of the city to the king for peace, 333. his answer, 334. expedients of parliament to prevent its effect, 335, 336. the city declares for the parliament, ib. its proportion of the weekly assessment levied by parliament on the whole kingdom, 358. the city fortified, ib. the common council petition against making peace with the king, 418. whereupon the house of commons rejected the propositions of the lords, ib. some women, petitioners for peace, cut down by a troop of horse, ib. transactions of the city when the king was seized by the army, 613. the temper of the city and the changes of their militia at the time of the impeachment of eleven members of the commons by the army, 617. the city sends six aldermen to the general, and submits, 619. the army marches through the city and quarters about it, 620. commissioners sent to the prince of Wales, now in the river with the fleet, with a petition, 656. he writes to the city, ib. the behaviour of the city after
- some ineffectual risings in favour of the king, 1648, 665. they petition for a personal treaty, ib. a committee of parliament treats with them about it, ib. the parliament declares for a personal treaty, ib. the city invites Cromwell, after being proclaimed protector, to Grocers' hall, 796. the city militia second the address of the new council of officers to the protector Richard, 865. the common council are refractory to the parliament, 887. Monk sent into the city to reduce it to obedience, ib. he marches again into the city, and sends an expostulatory letter to the parliament, 888. he meets the lord mayor and common council, excuses what was past, and promises to stand by them, and they by him, ib. great rejoicings in the city upon it, ib. Charles II.'s letter to the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council, 901. which is dutifully received, 904. the city send fourteen of their citizens to the king at the Hague to assure him of their fidelity, 909. the king passes through the city to Whitehall, 910.
- London, Tower of, (see Tower.)
- London, bp. of, (see W. Juxon.)
- Long, — one of the presbyterian party, who opposed the self-denying ordinance, 532.
- Long, colonel, high sheriff of Wiltshire, routed by sir W. Waller and Cromwell, owing to his great defect of courage and conduct, 543.
- Long, Robert, 772. how far concerned in the factions of the prince of Wales's family, 546, 547. being secretary to the prince, is trusted by the queen to keep him firm to the presbyterian party, 649. he and lord Colepepper accused of corruption, 659. his fondness for money induced him to undertake the disagreeable office of taking care of the prince's pecuniary affairs, 673. upon the prince's becoming king, is sworn one of his new council, 704. removed from the king by the marquis of Argyle, upon his arrival in Scotland, although he had chiefly recommended the king's going thither, 747. his scheme for keeping the chancellor of the exchequer away from the king, 772. petitions the king to be restored to the secretary's place, 808. is refused by the king, ib. whereupon he accuses the chancellor of the exchequer of having conversed with Cromwell, ib. the business heard in council, ib. the king acquits the chancellor, ib. he asks the chancellor's pardon and is forgiven, 809.
- Longueville, duke of, imprisoned, 732.
- Longueville, mademoiselle de, designed by sir J. Berkley for the duke of York's wife, 783.
- Lord steward of the king's household, his office to swear the members of the house of commons before they sit, 53.
- Lords, house of, origin of the custom of protesting there, 163. abuse of this custom, ib. notice of the few lords who attended parliament, 1643, 467. the house of lords had little to do after Cromwell returned from Scotland, and were few in number, 691. they reject the capital charge against the king, and adjourn a week, 692. the door of their house locked up against the day to which they had adjourned, ib. the commons abolish the house of peers, 1649, 699. but allowed the peers to be elected as knights or burgesses, ib. Cromwell reassembles a house of peers as a check on the commons, 1657, 843. filling it chiefly with officers and his creatures, ib. carried in the commons that the house of peers should be allowed, 865. (see Parliament.)
- Lords and others at York, their promise to the king upon his declaration to them, June 13, 1642, 262. their declaration and profession that the king had no intentions of war, ib.
- Lorne, Archibald Campbell, lord, afterwards ninth earl of Argyle, captain of the guard to Charles II. whilst in Scotland, 751.
- Lorrain, duke of, 718, 756. lord Cottington and the chancellor of the exchequer visit him at Brussels, 718. his character, 756. why he objected to the project of marrying his bastard daughter to the duke of York, 757. concludes a treaty with the French court, 782. commissioners sent to him to Brussels, 789. he sends an ambassador into Ireland to be informed of the state of it, 790. renounces any consent to the treaty, ib. the ambassador returns, whereupon the duke gives over the negotiation, ib.
- Lothian, William Ker, third earl of, made secretary of state in Scotland, 663, 706. his previous part in the rebellion, 663. one of the commissioners sent from the parliament of Scotland before the death of the king to the parliament of England, 706. their private instructions, ib. upon the king's trial they enter their protestation and dissent, ib. the parliament, after the king's murder, send their answer to it, 707. the commissioners reply, and are imprisoned, but afterwards freed, ib.
- Love, — notice of his sermon at Uxbridge before the treaty began, 521. executed by Cromwell for being in a plot with the Scots against the army and their parliament, 522, 775.
- Love, — accidentally tutor to the duke of Gloucester, 811. the benefit of his instructions, ib. sent by

- him to London, and procures the parliament's permission for the duke to go abroad, 812.
- Lovelace, John lord, one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. joins the king at Oxford, 419, 422. why he remained in London at first, 419.
- Louis XIV., (see the king of France.)
- Louisa de Guzman, (see queen of Portugal.)
- Lowden, John Campbell, lord, afterwards earl of, 315, 361, 607. sent by the Scotch covenanters to account for their proceedings to king Charles I., 52. sent to the Tower for signing a letter to the French king, ib. supposed reasons of his release, 58, 76. one of the Scotch commissioners to treat at Rippon, 63. goes as such to London, 76. made chancellor of Scotland, 124. and an earl, ib. one of those who engaged that Scotland should assist the English parliament, 316. comes to Oxford as a commissioner from the conservators of the peace in Scotland, 359. his and the other commissioners' transactions at Oxford, that they might be mediators, and for a parliament in Scotland, 365. the king's answer to them in both particulars, ib. they return to Scotland, 366. one of the Scotch commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. his private conference with the chancellor of the exchequer, 522. his speech at the treaty against episcopacy, 524. answered by the chancellor of the exchequer, 525. his behaviour towards Charles I., as soon as he appeared with some show of liberty, 633. signed as a Scotch commissioner the treaty made with the king in the Isle of Wight, 636. why he durst not take part in the execution of this treaty, 643. zealous for the covenant, 651. his virulent declamation against the marquis of Mountrose when brought before the Scotch parliament, 741.
- Lowe, — 656, 659.
- Lowther, Ger. 465.
- Loyal party, its low condition in England, 1650, 745.
- Lucas, sir Charles, victorious in a skirmish against colonel Middleton, 407. joins in Essex the Kentish men who had risen in favour of the king, 655. given up at the surrender of Colchester, 664. shot to death, ib. his character, ib.
- Lucas, sir Gervas, governor of Belvoir castle, 580.
- Lucas sir John, his ill treatment in Essex, being a royalist, 297. (as lord.) 664.
- Lucas, Thomas, 465.
- Lucerne, Cromwell compels the duke of Savoy to restore the forfeited privileges to the valley of, 863.
- Ludlow, — 903. succeeds Ireton in the charge of the army in Ireland, 788. grants the marquis of Clanrickard a pass to go to England, 791. the parliament makes him and four commissioners governors of Ireland, 867. one of the seven commissioners appointed by parliament to govern the army, 879.
- Lunaford, colonel Henry, 291. killed at the siege of Bristol, 409. an officer of extraordinary sobriety, industry, and courage, ib.
- Lunsford, colonel, sir Thomas, 154, 221. made lieutenant of the Tower in the room of sir W. Balfour, 133. his character, 143. taken prisoner at Edge-hill, 311.
- Lusignon, marquis of, sent by the prince of Condé as his ambassador to Madrid, 750. afterwards beheaded, ib.
- Lutterel, — owner of Dunstan castle, surrendered it to the king's forces, 400.
- Lyne, relieved by the earl of Essex, 488.
- Lynne, design of surprising, by lord Willoughby of Parham, and sir Horatio Townsend, 868.
- Lyonne, M. de, 873.
- M. —
- Macdonnel, family of, 533.
- Macdonnel, Alexander, ib. 537.
- Macguyres, the, 675.
- Machiavel, Nicholas, vindication of, 637.
- Mackey, lord, 61.
- Mackworth, sir Francis, 556.
- Macmahoons, the, 675.
- Mademoiselle, (see Orleans.)
- Madrid, ambassadors and public ministers there receive greater respect than in any other court in Christendom, 748.
- Maitland, lord, (see earl of Lauderdale.)
- Major generals, a sort of military magistrates appointed by Cromwell whilst protector, 836. their power, ib. abridged by him, 844.
- Malignants, a term imposed upon all those whom the factious party meant to render odious to the people, 135.
- Mallett, sir Thomas, judge, committed to the Tower for having sent a petition in favour of the Common Prayer Book, and against the imposition of the militia by ordinance, 195, 281, 368. redeemed by the king by giving up another prisoner in exchange, 281.
- Mallory, colonel, 850, 851, 852.
- Maltravers, lords, (see lord Mowbray.)
- Manchester disaffected to the king, 304. lord Strange undertakes to reduce it, ib. not so fortunately performed, ib.
- Manchester, Henry Montagu, viscount Mandeville, first earl of, had been lord treasurer, 20. his origin and rise, 22. was lord privy-seal, ib. his character, ib. his death, 23.
- Manchester, second earl of, (see lord Kimbolton.)
- Mancini, — 860.
- Mandeville, Robert Montagu, viscount, afterwards third earl of Manchester, one of the committee sent by parliament to wait on Charles II. at the Hague, 908. (see lord Kimbolton and the earl of Manchester.)
- Manners, Frances, married to the duke of Buckingham, 14. afterwards to the earl of Antrim, 533. Charles I. always heard her with favour on account of her first husband, 537. notice of her, ib.
- Manning, — discovery of his treachery in revealing Charles II.'s designs, and a particular account of it, 827—829.
- Mansel, sir Robert, 270.
- Manton, — one of the presbyterian divines who had a public and private audience of Charles II. at the Hague, 909.
- Mantua, duke of, 591.
- Manwaring, — 334.
- Margaret of Austria, (see queen of Spain.)
- Margarita, don Josepho de, 876.
- Marlborough garrisoned by the parliament, 322. taken by the king's forces under lieutenant general Wilmot, 323.
- Marlborough, James Ley, first earl of, had been lord treasurer, 20. why removed, ib.
- Marlborough, Henry Ley, second earl of, general of the king's artillery, 405.
- Marshall, — 82, 612. he and Dr. Burgess had more influence upon parliament, than archbishop Laud had upon the court, 121. notice of his preaching against the malignants, 208. he and Dr. Downing publicly avowed, that the soldiers taken prisoners, and released by Charles I. upon their oaths of not bearing arms against him again, were not bound by that oath, 322. sent as one of the parliament commissioners into Scotland for relief, 410. was one of the parliament commissioners in ecclesiastical matters to treat at Uxbridge, 523. was chief chaplain in the army, ib.
- Marston-moor, battle of, 491.
- Martin, Anthony, bishop of Meath, a lord justice in Ireland, 465.
- Martin, sir Henry, 3, 82.
- Martin, or Martyn, Henry, 380, 387. the parliament-governor of Reading, 317. fled at the king's approach, 318. one of the leaders of the independent party in parliament, 532. his application of the story of Moses to the sitting of parliament, 792.
- Mary, queen, 90.
- Mary queen of Scots, her death an unparalleled act of blood, 30.
- Mary, princess, 157, 174. married the prince of Orange, 168.
- Mary Anne, (see queen of Spain.)

Massonet, — 808, 809.

Massey, colonel, afterwards major general, 427, 613, 761. governor of Gloucester, 415. why he sided with the parliament, ib. notice of him, ib. an attempt to gain him over, ib. unsuccessful, 416. a letter of kindness and one thousand pounds sent him by parliament for holding Gloucester out against the king's forces, 434. deprived of his commission by the self-denying ordinance, 542. much beloved in the city, 616. one of the leading men in the house of commons, ib. 690. committed to prison by the house, ib. has the command of a regiment of horse under the duke of Buckingham for Charles II, 760. sent to march before the king into England from Scotland, 761. wounded in an excursion from Worcester, 764. taken in his flight from thence, 780. sent to the Tower, ib. a design of trying him by a high court of justice, ib. escapes, ib. his project of surprising Gloucester, 869. betrayed by sir R. Willis, 870. seized on, but escapes, 871.

Master of the rolls, (see Rolls.)

Maurice, prince, 307. the greatest general of his age, 504.

Maurice, prince, 352, 447, 482, 488, 505, 506, 507, 560, 577, 578, 579, 600, 400, 414. present at the rencounter between the forces near Worcester, where his brother, prince Rupert, gets the better, 209. follows sir W. Waller, 352, 383. he and the marquis of Hertford sent into the west, 399. they join the Cornish forces at Chard, 400. some jealousy between them, 401. his skirmish with the enemy near Chewton, 402. present at the battle of Lansdown, 403. he and the marquis retire to Chippenham, 404. break through the enemy's quarters with the horse, and reach Oxford, 405. they return to Bath to assist at the siege of Bristol, 407. how far concerned in the jealousies which arose among the king's officers about the government of Bristol, 412, 413. sent into the west with an army, 414. his movements, 423, 424. comes before Exeter with his army, ib. the earl of Warwick attempts to relieve it, but succeeds not, 424. it surrenders to him upon articles, 425. fresh difference between him and the marquis of Hertford about the governorship of Weymouth, 426. what errors he committed after the reduction of Exeter, 447. sits down before Dartmouth, and takes it, 449. sits down before Plymouth too late, ib. besieges Lyme, 484. which is relieved by the earl of Essex, 488, 506. lost much reputation by spending nearly two years against Plymouth and Lyme without taking either, 494. pursued by the earl of Essex, 495. one of those officers who signed the letter to the earl of Essex urging him to a treaty, 497. present at the second battle of Newbury, 509. was governor of Worcester, 577.

Maxwell, — gentleman usher of the black rod, 70.

Maynard, John, his argument in parliament against the vote of no more addresses to the king, 631. abstained from parliament in consequence of this vote, ib. sent to the Tower by Cromwell for questioning the legality of a commitment, 862.

Mazarine, cardinal, 450, 451, 592, 596, 599, 601, 605, 633, 648, 714, 754, 810, 833, 845, 860, 863, 868, 874, 876. presides over the French counsels, 450, 591. reason of his rise, ib. notice of him, ib. his supposed views with regard to England, 451, 591. why more inclined to aid Charles I. after the battle of Naseby, ib. lord Digby's transactions with him, 597. his views as to the prince of Wales's going into France, 606. promised to supply the marquis of Ormond with arms and ammunition on his return into Ireland, 633. did not do so from fear of the English parliament, 640, 648. gives no encouragement to the king's party, 674. courted Cromwell, 699, 700. bought some of Charles I.'s rich furniture, ib. gives the marquis of Mountrose no encouragement, 708. glad at the departure of Charles II. from Paris, 724. the prince of Condé breaks his friendship with him, 725. one of the exceptions the prince had against him, 726. fears an attempt on his person from the cabals in consequence, 725. lord Cottington and the chancellor wait upon him in their way to Spain, 725. his message to don Lewis de Haro by them, which he afterwards disavows, ib. the duke of Espernon his fast friend, ib. 726. causes the imprisonment of the princes of Condé and Conti, and of the duke of Longueville, and the flight of marshal Turenne, 731, 732. engages twenty thousand Irish in the service of France, 745. the English parliament at first more disposed to a peace with Spain than France, from their prejudice to him, 747. first suggested the idea of the duke of York's entering the French service, 776. being pressed by the parliament of Paris, is obliged to set the princes at liberty again, 781. tumult at Paris against him, ib. why he resents not the capture of a French fleet by the English, but sends an ambassador into England, 787. proceeds in a treaty with Cromwell, 803. pays Charles II. all the arrears of his salary from France,

811. throws difficulties in the way of the king's selling some cannon, ib. why he gives the duke of York notice to quit the French service, 846. the earl of Bristol ordered to leave France owing to him, ib. Cromwell's influence over him, ib. advised by the queen-mother of France to make a peace between France and Spain, 872. his arguments against it, ib. why he at last yielded, 873. his promises to Lockhart touching his adhering to the parliament, ib. two particulars of difficulty in the treaty with Spain referred to a personal conference between him and don Lewis de Haro, ib. at Fuentarabia, ib. advises against Charles II. being present at it, 874. how he and don Lewis de Haro settled the points of difficulty, 874—876. how he deluded the pope as to this treaty, 876. deceived Lockhart also as to the treaty, who was in general too hard for him, ib. would not see Charles II. when he came to Fuentarabia, 877. offers to make Lockhart a marshal of France if he would deliver up Dunkirk and Mardyke to the French, 897. persuades the queen-mother of England to send lord Jermyn to invite the king into France upon the prospect of his restoration, 907. his death, 910.

Meath, Anthony Martin, bishop of, a lord justice in Ireland, 465.

Medina Celi, duke de, 733, 748.

Medina de los Torres, duke de, one of the Spanish council of state, 733. notice of, ib.

Meldrum, sir John, 476.

Melleray, marshal, governor of Nantes, 810.

Melos, Francisco de, governor of Flanders, discountenances any preparations in favour of Charles I, 326. one of the Spanish council of state, 733. notice of him, 734. lost the battle of Rocroix to the prince of Condé, ib.

Members; five members of the house of commons accused of high treason by order of Charles I, 143. the articles against them, ib. a sergeant at arms demands them in the house of commons, ib. the king goes to the house to demand them, ib. 144. they remove into the city, ib. where the king goes after them, 145. a declaration of the commons touching them, 150. they are brought in triumph to Westminster, 152.

Mennes, sir John, rear-admiral, unquestionably loyal, 271. refused to act under the earl of Warwick as admiral, and is discharged, 272. commands a ship in the prince of Wales's fleet, 667. sent to Zealand, 823.

Mentz, elector of, the wisest and most practical prince of the German empire, 816. a small subsidy

- granted by the diet to Charles II, chiefly through him, ib.
- Merchant-Tailors' hall, the committee of the house of commons that removed into the city for safety sat there, 145.
- Merrick, sir John, made general of the parliament's ordinance, 382.
- Merton college, Oxford, queen Henrietta lodged there, 1643, 435.
- Mervin, colonel Audly, 354.
- Message from the king at Windsor to both houses of parliament, 155. and Jan. 20, 158. and in his way to York, 181. from both houses to him, March 28, 1642, 192. his answer, ib. from him to them, April 8, 1642, offering to go in person to Ireland, 197. their answer, 198. his reply touching his going to Ireland, 199. from him to them, April 28, 1642, concerning his refusal to pass the bill for the militia, 201. and concerning Hull, 204. and again concerning Hull, ib. their answer to these two messages, 206, 207. his reply, ib. the king consults at Nottingham of sending a message for peace to both houses, 291, 292. the message, ib. their answer, 293. another message from him to them, ib. their answer, 294. another from him in reply, 295. from him at Reading to them, 320. substance of his message to the privy-council of Scotland upon occasion of the two houses' declaration to that kingdom, 323. from him to both houses, April 12, 1643, 379. and May 20, 388. and March 3, 469. their answer, ib. he sends another message for peace, which was laid aside by the houses, 589. the parliament send a message to him to pass four acts, 628. his answer, 629. the substance of the message of both houses to him, August, 1648, 666. his answer, ib. the queen's first message to Charles II, 704. Mountague's message to him, 906.
- Mexico, vice-king of, 836.
- Middlesex, Lionel Cranfield, first earl of, 5, 331. was lord high treasurer, 5, 20. both his rise and fall owing to the duke of Buckingham, 9. impeached, ib. unjust sentence against him, 10. James I.'s prophetic declaration relative to this impeachment, ib.
- Middlesex, Lionel Cranfield, third and last earl of, one of the committee sent by parliament to wait on Charles II. at the Hague, 908.
- Middleton, colonel, afterwards lieutenant general, sir Thomas, 466, 499, 503, 505, 507, 780, 781. defeated in a skirmish by sir C. Lucas, 407. notice of him, 499. unsuccessful against Donnington castle, ib. assembles some troops in Scotland, 708. had very entire affection for Charles II, 758. commands the horse of Charles II.'s Scotch army, 759. Lealey, Charles's lieutenant general, jealous of him because he was generally beloved, 764. the part of the army where he was, made a brave resistance at the battle of Worcester, ib. wounded, ib. 780. taken prisoner and sent to the Tower, ib. designed to be tried by a high court of justice, ib. makes his escape into France, ib. is sent into Scotland, 804, 805. his successes, 817. his defeat, 818. joins sir G. Booth in his attempt on Chester, 869, 871. their declaration, 871. delivers up his castle to Lambert, ib.
- Mildmay, sir Henry, 71. one of the committee of the house of commons appointed to sit during the recess, 117. one of the murderers of Charles I, 696. notice of his rise and conduct, ib. the princess Elizabeth and the duke of Gloucester intrusted to his care as governor of Carisbrook castle, 812.
- Militia, sir A. Haslerig prefers a bill for settling it, 111. Saint-John seconds it, ib. the bill read once, and no more, ib. a proposal in the commons for a committee to consider the present state and power of the militia, 132. debated, ib. 133. Saint-John declares the power of it not to be in the king, ib. he is appointed to bring in a bill to settle it, ib. the bill received, ib. passed the commons, 156. petitions from several counties concerning the militia, 162. how the bill passed the lords, 166. an ordinance agreed on by both houses for settling the militia, 173. the king's answer respecting the militia, 174. the reply of the commons, ib. his farther answer, 175. votes of both houses upon it, 176. and petition to the king, ib. his answer, 177. resolutions of both houses upon it, ib. votes of both houses concerning the militia, 182. the king's message to both houses concerning his refusal to pass the bill for the militia, 201. declaration of both houses concerning the militia, 208. (see Parliament.)
- Mittorf, colonel, 650. he and colonel Langhorn seize on Shrewsbury for the parliament, 527.
- Modena, duke of, 847.
- Mohun, lord, 405, 497, 498. one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. his doubtful conduct, 342. joined in the command of the king's forces in Cornwall, ib. not very gracious there, ib. present at the taking of Saltash, 343. and at the battle near Stratton, 397.
- Molesworth, major-general, 574, 576.
- Monk, colonel George, afterwards duke of Albemarle, 864, 885, 890. distinguished himself in early life, in the Spanish and Dutch war, 882. had formerly served the king, 722, 882. was sometime imprisoned in the Tower, ib. having been taken prisoner at Nantwich, ib. prevailed with to serve the parliament against the Irish, as that would not be against the king, 722, 882. by the parliament's instructions he treats privately with O'Neill, 743. parliament refuses to ratify this treaty, 744. left by Cromwell in Scotland, 760. where he made himself terrible, ib. 780, 788. called out of Scotland by Cromwell, and made one of his admirals, 796. after the Dutch war returns to the government of Scotland, 799. the state of that kingdom under him, 803. the earl of Glencarne, who had received a commission from Charles II, makes his peace with him, 804. being Lambert's rival would not have allowed him to be protector, 816. declares his obedience to parliament, 867. appointed by parliament one of the seven commissioners to govern the army, 879. Cobbet sent into Scotland to him by the committee of safety, 881. writes to the officers of the army declaring for the parliament, ib. possesses Berwick, ib. imprisons Cobbet, ib. purges his army of fanatics, ib. Lambert sent against him, ib. they send charges &c. to him, ib. his answer to them, ib. appoints three commissioners to treat with the officers of the army at London, ib. they at London accept of a treaty, ib. a particular account of him, and of the previous circumstances of his life, ib. his jealousy of Lambert before this time, 883. calls together an assembly of the Scottish nation, ib. his discourse to them, ib. observations on his intentions as to Charles II, 885. marches towards London, 886. the parliament desire that part of his forces may be sent back to Scotland, ib. comes to York, ib. addresses to him from all counties as he passed, ib. the city sent to him by their sword-bearer to the same purpose, ib. his manner of receiving these addresses, ib. the parliament send Scot and Robinson to meet him, ib. at St Alban's he sends to the parliament to have the other regiments moved out of town, ib. the parliament give orders accordingly, ib. he marches into London, ib. is conducted to parliament, and complimented by the speaker, ib. his reply, 887. sent by parliament to reduce the common council of the city to obedience, ib. returns to Whitehall, ib. the parliament resolve to join others in commission with him, ib. his officers discontented at this neglect of the parliament towards him, 888. this awakens him, ib. he marches again into the city, and sends an expostula-tory letter to the parliament, ib. this letter printed and dispersed, ib. meets the lord mayor and common council, excuses what was past, and promises to stand by them, and they by him, ib. great rejoicings in the city upon it, ib. the parliament send some members to treat with him, 889. he engages them in a conference with some excluded members, ib. returns to Whitehall, ib. sends for members of both parties, ib. delivers his mind to them in a paper, ib. the parliament reform the navy, making him and Mountague admirals, 893. his counsels at this time, 894. had a conference with divers at Northumberland house, about the restoration of Charles II, ib. consults with Mr. Morrice, 895. what wrought most upon him in favour of the king, ib. sends sir J. Greenvil to negotiate with him, 895, 896. the king's deliberations upon the terms proposed by him, ib. advised the king's letters to parliament, &c., 898. the king's letter to him and the army, 898. his behaviour after this time, 902. offered all the authority Cromwell had, and the title of king, ib. acquaints the parliament of the arrival of these letters from the king, 903. the king confers the order of the garter upon him, 910.

Monk, reverend — notice of, 882. his effort to gain over his brother, general Monk, to serve the king, 883.

Monmouth, Henry Carey, second and last earl of, one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 262.

Monroe, sir George, 652. having entered England, upon duke Hamilton's defeat retreats towards Scotland, 662. the committee of the Scottish parliament order him to disband, ib.

Monsieur, J. B. Gaston, duke of Orleans, 591.

Montague, — a priest in the Roman catholic church, 757. had great power with queen Henrietta, ib. the chancellor of the exchequer confers with him about Dr. Cosins's being prohibited to officiate to the protestants in the queen's family at Paris, 758. the duke of Gloucester committed to his care by the queen in order to pervert him in his religion, 820. obliged to give him up, ib.

Montague, (see Mountague.)

Montgomery, Philip Herbert, earl of, (see earl of Pembroke.)

Montgomery, sir James, 354.

Montmorency, duke of, 591.

Montrevil, — 593, 599, 602. sent by the interposition of France to negotiate a treaty between Charles I. and the Scots, 590. his negotiation with the king, 592. his endeavours with both parties, ib. reason for his return to France, 599, 602. a farther account of his negotiation with the Scots, 599—601. why given, 599. notice of him, ib. the paper he sent to the king, being a promise for the Scots receiving the king, 600.

Montrose, marquis of, (see Montrose.)

Mora, Juan de, notice of, 734.

Moray, sir Robert, 592.

Mordaunt, John, (afterwards viscount Avalon,) 901, 642, 895, 897. active for Charles II, 850. is seized on, owing to Mr. Stapley's discovery, and committed to the Tower, ib. tried before a high court of justice, ib. the means by which he escaped sentence, ib. 851. set at liberty, ib. embarks again in the king's cause, ib. goes to Brussels to acquaint the king with the preparations, 868, 870. the king informs him of sir Richard Willis's betraying their designs, ib. known to be entirely trusted by the king, yet not molested, 892. goes over to Brussels with sir J. Greenvil, who carried instructions from general Monk to the king, 896. and returns with him with despatches to England, 898.

Morland, — 869.

Moreton, sir Albert, 26.

Moreton, Thomas, bishop of Durham, the earl of Essex had a great reverence for him, 93. one of the bishops who signed the protestation against their constrained absence from the house of lords, 141.

Moreton, (see Morton.)

Morgan, sir Charles, 24.

Morgan, major-general, 883.

Morley, colonel, 501, 881. one of the seven commissioners appointed by parliament to govern the army, 879. he, Haslerig, and Walton go to Portsmouth, 881. which declares for the parliament, ib. he and Haslerig looked upon as invested with the authority of parliament, 883. they march towards London, 884. the consequences, ib.

Morley, Dr. George, afterwards bishop of Winchester, one of the chaplains allowed by the army to attend Charles I. at Newmarket, 613. attended lord Capel to the scaffold, 703.

Morrice, colonel, notice of, 667. first served the king, ib. then sided with the parliament, ib. why left out of their army when new modelled, ib. his subsequent conduct, ib. an account of his surprising Pontefract castle for the king, ib. 668. would not accept the command of it, 669. concerned in the murder of Rainsborough there, 670. escaped when the castle was delivered up to Lambert, ib. taken in Lancashire and put to death, ib.

Morrice, afterwards sir William, notice of, 895. consulted by general Monk concerning the restoration of Charles II, ib. introduces sir J. Greenvil to Monk, ib. the transactions between him, Monk, and Greenvil, ib. recommended to the king for one of his secretaries of state, 898. he alone knew of Monk's having received a letter from the king, 902. knighted and made secretary of state by the king, 910.

Morton, countess of, (see lady Dalkeith.)

Morton, sir William, notice of, 486.

Morton, (see Moreton.)

Moulina, — 863.

Mountague, sir Edward, lord chief justice, 22.

Mountague, admiral, Edward, sent to join with Blake, and put in commission with him, 836. the parliament reform the navy by making him and Monk admirals, 893. an account of him, ib. suspected of favouring the king, 894. his message to him, 907. goes with the fleet to Holland, and presents his duty to the king, and duke of York, 908. this expedition never forgiven him by some, ib. the garter sent to him by the king, 910.

Mountague of Boughton, Edward lord, notice of, 297. imprisoned by the parliament for being dissatisfied with their proceedings against the king and concerning the militia, ib.

Mountague, Edward, (son of the preceding,) succeeds in gaining over his cousin, admiral Mountague, to the king, 893. sent by the admiral to tell the king he would obey his orders, 906.

Mountague, sir Sidney, 332.

Mountague, Walter, 451, 878.

Mountague, (see Mountague.)

Mounterey, duke de, one of the Spanish council of state, 733. what situations he had held, 734. notice of him, ib.

Mountnorris, Francis Annesley, viscount, the earl of Strafford's severe conduct towards him, 60, 87, 88. his rise, 89.

Mountrose, (Montrose,) James Graham, fifth earl of, afterwards marquis of, 459, 492, 564, 578, 586, 587, 599, 601, 714, 716. transactions in Scotland respecting him, Argyle, and Hamilton, 119. his enmity to Argyle, ib. the king declines his offer of having Argyle and Hamilton made away with, ib. comes to the king and informs him of the state of Scotland, 473. one of those who accused duke Hamilton of treason, ib. one of those appointed to examine into the charges against the duke, ib. most hated and condemned the marquis of Argyle, 533. an account of his expedition

- into Scotland, ib. which he nearly reduced, 568. defeated by David Lesley, ib. the king gives up the idea of joining him, ib. 577, 578. the king sends to him to disband, which he did, 605. arrives in France, 708. thence goes into Germany, ib. the chancellor of the exchequer sent to confer with him in a village near the Hague, ib. who thought the king ought to have welcomed him at once, 709. he comes to the Hague, ib. certain Scotch lords of the engagement refuse even to be in the same room with him, ib. earl of Lauderdale's discourse against him, ib. conference between duke Hamilton and an English privy counsellor concerning the affairs of Scotland, in which he was concerned, 710, 711. his dependants kill Dorislaus, an agent of the English parliament at the Hague, ib. impossible to bring the Hamiltonian party to cooperate with him, 713. his feeling with respect to the chancellor of the exchequer's going ambassador into Spain, 715. his object in going to Hamburg, 716. his design against Scotland, 739. embarks for Scotland, lands there in March, 1649, ib. publishes his declaration, ib. the continuation of his affairs to his death, ib. colonel Straghan sent against him and his small forces, 741. by whom he is routed, ib. taken prisoner, ib. brought to Edinburgh, ib. brought before the parliament, ib. his behaviour there, ib. the sentence against him, 742. his discourse with the presbyterian ministers, ib. his execution, ib. the execution of his officers, ib. his character, ib.
- Mount Stamford taken by the king's forces, 447.
- Mowbray and Maltravers, Henry Frederic Howard, lord, afterwards earl of Arundel, he and the earl of Pembroke committed to the Tower for a quarrel in the house of lords, 105. one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263.
- Moyle, lieutenant colonel Nathaniel, killed at the siege of Bristol, 409.
- Muddyford, — one of the commissioners for the associated county of Devon, 546.
- Mulgrave, Edmund Sheffield, first earl of, 395. one of the few peers who attended parliament, 1643, 467.
- Murray, Charles, 588.
- Murray, William, of the king's bed-chamber, 119, 144. lord Digby had a great friendship with him, 144. one of those the parliament wished to be removed from the king, 157.
- Musgrave, sir Philip, taken prisoner at Chester, 577. notice of him, ib. he and sir M. Langdale, and others, treated with by the Scots, and invited into Scotland, whither they went, 643, 644. their proceedings, 644, 651, 652. he surprises Carlisle, 653, 654. which was delivered up again to parliament, 662. transports himself into Holland, ib.
- Muskerry, Charles Macarthy, viscount, married the marquess of Ormond's sister, 667. was the most powerful person, and of the greatest interest in Munster, ib. commanded an Irish regiment in the service of France at Condé, 845. his scruples about serving the Spanish instead, ib. which he however does, 846.
- N.
- Nantwich surrendered to lord Grandison, 304. lord Byron defeated there by sir T. Fairfax, 473.
- Naseby, battle of, 553.
- Navy possessed by the parliament, 272. (see Fleet.)
- Neve, sir William le, Clarencieux king at arms, 310.
- Nevil, sir Henry, ambassador at Paris, 26.
- Newark, a garrison fixed there by the earl of Newcastle, 347. relieved by prince Rupert, 476. condition of its garrison at the king's arrival, 1645, 577. lord Bellasis made its governor, 579, 580. ordered by the king to surrender it, 602. and why, ib.
- Newark, Henry Pierrepont, viscount, afterwards second earl of Kingston and first marquess of Dorchester, one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. (as earl of Kingston) one of the king's commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520.
- Newburgh, James Livingston, viscount, afterwards first earl of, 780, 781. married lady Aubigny, 693. how he and his wife served the king, ib. they fled to the Hague, 710. notice of his education, ib. has the command of one of the four regiments raised by Charles II. from his subjects in Flanders, 845.
- Newburgh, duke of, in Germany, (the father,) reasons for his turning Roman catholic, 819.
- Newburgh, duke of, in Germany, (the son,) 821, 875. entertains Charles II, 819. his character, ib. a zealous Roman catholic, ib. twice married, ib. his discourse with Charles II. about applying to pope Alexander VII. for assistance, 821.
- Newburgh, duchess of, 819.
- Newburn, lord Conway routed there by the Scotch covenanters, 58.
- Newbury, battle of, 429. second battle of, 508, 509.
- Newcastle, secured for the king, 269, 273.
- Newcastle, William Cavendish, first earl of, afterwards marquess of, 156, 203, 358, 388, 539. sumptuously entertains king Charles on his way to Scotland to be crowned, 32. furnished a troop of horse in the Scotch expedition, 50. notice of him, ib. 370. was governor to the prince of Wales, 50. his zeal in the king's cause remarkable, 108. resigns his place of governor to the prince, 170. mention of him in the communications between the king and parliament, 204, 205, 235, 251, 252, 337, 338. secures Newcastle for the king, 269, 273. one of those excepted by parliament from being suffered to make peace with them on any terms, 300. was made governor of Newcastle, 346. goes from Newcastle into York, ib. high in the queen's favour, ib. receives her upon her landing at Burlington, 347. fixes a garrison at Newark, ib. notice of his declaration of his reasons for marching into Yorkshire, 359, 360, 364. his success there, 372. imprisoned lord Savile, 371. why he could not march into the associated counties, 420, 454. obliged to raise the siege of Hull, 449, 454. marches to oppose the Scots, 472. retires to York, upon colonel Bellasis's defeat, ib. 476, 480, 481. quits the kingdom after the battle of Marston-moor, 491. observations on his conduct and his character, 492. Wellbeck, a house of his in Nottinghamshire; made one of the king's garrisons, 568. lord Withington had an entire friendship with him, 763. and accompanied him abroad, ib. he resides at Antwerp, 789. what motives the bishop assigns for the marquess's love of monarchy and the church, 493. other observations of the bishop respecting him, 480, 492, 493, 494.
- New College, Oxford, 375.
- New England, colony of, notice of its foundation, 75. the mischief done to it by sir Harry Vane, junior, ib.
- Newport, Mountjoy Blount, first earl of, 26. one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 262.
- Newport, — Dutch ambassador at London, 661.
- Newport, Francis, 303.
- Newport, sir Richard, notice of, 303. made baron Newport of Erccall, ib. ready with others, to secure Shrewsbury for Charles II, 869.
- Newport in the Isle of Wight, treaty there between Charles I. and the parliament commissioners, 666. particulars of it, 677—685.
- Newport Pannel possessed by the parliament forces, 447.
- Newton, — 72.

Neyl, Richard, bishop of Durham, 80.
 Nicholas, afterwards sir Edward, secretary of state, 192, 456, 646, 721, 789, 824. one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. one of those excepted by parliament from making peace with them on any terms, 300. some account of him, 371. one of those appointed to examine into the charges against duke Hamilton, 473. one of the king's commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. notice of his wife's dangerous illness, 646. goes to Charles II. at Aken, who gives him the signet, 817. persuaded the chancellor of the exchequer to accept the great seal, 848.
 Nicholas, John, 823.
 Niddisdale, (Nithsdale,) Robert Maxwell, first earl of, present with lord Digby when routed at Sherborne, 578. goes into Ireland, 579.
 Nismes, account of a faction in the election of its consuls, 863. Cromwell's interference, ib.
 Nithsdale, earl of, (see Niddisdale.)
 Norcot, sir John, 296.
 Northampton, Spencer Compton, second earl of, one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. the command of the garrison at Banbury committed to him, 313. relieves Stafford, 349. slain at Hopton-heath, having first vanquished the enemy's horse, 349, 350. his character, 350.
 Northampton, third earl of, (see lord Compton.)
 Northern parts, an account of their disposition about the end of 1643, 344.
 Northumberland, Henry Percy, ninth earl of, imprisoned in the Tower, under suspicion of having some knowledge of the gunpowder treason, 372. released through the mediation of the earl of Carlisle, who had married his daughter, against his consent, ib.
 Northumberland, Algernon Percy, tenth earl of, lord high admiral, 75, 89, 91, 92, 107, 111, 181, 276, 281, 282, 354, 450. appointed general of the second expedition against the Scotch covenanters, 57. generally esteemed, ib. instrumental in the appointment of lord Conway to be general of the horse, who was very dear to him, ib. too ill to take the command, 58. gave up his commission, 109. high admiral of England, 75. his defection from the king's service, 108. the honours the king had conferred upon him, ib. 372. origin of his quarrel with his brother lord Percy, 108. declares that whoever of the house of lords refused to join with the house of commons respecting the militia, was an enemy to the commonwealth, 166. parliament send to him to provide a fleet, 177. urged by parliament to appoint the earl of Warwick his admiral of the fleet, 191. the king writes to him, that sir J. Pennington should have the command, 192. he appoints the earl, ib. moved for a committee to consider how there might be an accommodation between the king and his people, which was appointed, 230. his commission of lord high admiral revoked by the king, 270, 271. refuses to retain his post at the desire of parliament against the king's consent, ib. one of those who presented a petition from both houses to the king, 318. one of the commissioners sent by parliament to the king with propositions of peace, January 1643, 337. his interest saved the earl of Leicester from a public exception by parliament, 354. one of those chosen again by parliament to treat with the king, 356, 366. his character, 372. what advantages might have arisen had the king reappointed him lord high admiral, 380. cudgelled Mr. Martin after a conference of the two houses in the painted chamber, for having opened a letter of his to his lady, ib. 387. which increased the divisions of the counsels at Westminster, 422. how far concerned in the design of Mr. Waller and Mr. Tomkins, for the king, 389, 390, 391. the violent party afraid to proceed harshly against him, 393. one of those who were weary of the war, 407. retires for his health to his house at Petworth with leave of parliament, 419, 423. would have joined the king, had the other lords, who first made the experiment, been well received, ib. 436. that not being the case, he returns to parliament, and is received with great respect, 437. surmises on his not being appointed lord high admiral by the parliament, 453. one of the few peers who now attended parliament, 467. one of the parliament's commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. his part, 521. his feelings as to the state of affairs in 1644, 528. was the proudest man alive, ib. one of those in whom the militia was proposed to be vested for seven or eight years, 530. the dukes of York and Gloucester, and the princess, committed to his care, 615, 620. how treated by him, ib. are removed from his care, 811. withdrew with others from parliament to the army, 618. the consequence of this step, ib. Monk had a conference with him and others concerning the restoration of Charles II, 894.

Norton, sir Daniel, 11.
 Norton, colonel, 501, 502.
 Norton, — 768, 769, 770.
 Norwich, earl of, (see lord George Goring.)
 Noy, sir William, attorney-general, 114. his character, 30. framed the odious project respecting soap, ib. drew up the writ for ship-money, ib.
 Nye, — one of the parliament divines sent by them as a commissioner into Scotland for relief, 410.
 O.
 Oath, (see Coronation oath.)
 O'Connelly, Owen, 120, 178.
 Officers repel the rabble about Whitehall, 136. consultation among the officers what to do with the king, 1649, 694. conclude to have him publicly tried, ib. the officers meet, and choose Fleetwood general, 880. (see Army.)
 Offices, great, designed for some heads of the popular party, 84.
 Ogilby, lord, one of those who accused duke Hamilton of treason, 473.
 Ogle, sir William, 501, 502. seizes Winchester castle for Charles I, 477.
 Ogniate, Mark, serviceable to Charles II. at Bruges, 858.
 Olivarez, duke of, 733. particulars of his quarrel with the duke of Buckingham, 15. raised the duke of Medina de los Torres, who had married his daughter, 733.
 Olivarez, duchess of, notice of, 16.
 Oliver, receiver to the duke of Buckingham, 14.
 Oliver, (see Cromwell.)
 O'Neale, Daniel, nephew of Owen O'Neale, 64, 848. notice of his character and previous life, 534. an enemy to the earl of Strafford, ib. his views and expectations, ib. 535. his part in the earl of Mountrose's expedition into Scotland in favour of the king, ib. 537. banished from Scotland, whither he had accompanied Charles II, 747. accompanies Charles II. to Fuentarabia, 874, 877. his duty on the journey, 874.
 O'Neale, (O'Neal,) general, Owen Roe, 735. his character, 675. had the command of all the Irish in Ulster, and was the best general they had, 713, 715. refused to submit to the articles of peace in Ireland, though confirmed by the catholic council at Kilkenny, 675, 713, 722. for what reasons, ib. 743. Monk treats privately with him, by order of parliament, ib. who, notwithstanding, refuse to ratify the treaty, 744. enters into an engagement with the lord lieutenant in consequence, ib. died as he was going to join him, 773.
 O'Neil, sir Phelim, leader of the rebellion in Ireland, 121.
 Onalow, colonel, 501.

- Oquendo, — 752.
- Orange, Henry Frederic de Nassau, prince of, 64, 284, 346, 347, 494, 754, 819. well disposed towards Charles I, yet unable to do much for him, 269, 326. accused by the English parliament for supplying the king with arms, 325.
- Orange, William X. de Nassau, prince of, 620, 648, 649, 659, 691, 711, 714, 717, 719, 738. supplied Charles II. with necessities, 705. advises that the king should refer all matters of religion to a national synod, 717. and that there should be no sharpness in the king's proposed declaration, ib. supplies the king with twenty thousand pounds, 718. advises him to accede to the terms offered by the Scotch, 737. died of the small-pox, 754, 755. a prince of great hope and expectation, 754. why he adhered to that party in the States that inclined more to France than to Spain, ib. Charles II. lost a sure friend in him, 755. in what respects benefited by him, ib.
- Orange, William Henry de Nassau, prince of, one of the articles of peace between Cromwell and the Dutch was, never to admit the prince of Orange to be their stateholder, general, or admiral, 797.
- Orange, Emilie de Solms, princess of, 818.
- Orange, Mary, daughter of Charles I, princess of, 168, 174, 591, 620, 645, 648, 659, 714, 810, 847. delivered of a son shortly after her husband's death, 755. dependent on the States, 758. resides at Spa with Charles II, 816. removes with him to Aken, 817. and to Cologne, 818. differences between her and the princess dowager, ib. visits the duke of Newburgh, 819. returns to Holland, ib.
- Order of parliament, to disarm papists, 115. concerning Hull, 182. against pawning the jewels of the crown, 256. order for bringing in money and plate for maintaining horse, 260. orders from the admiralty in Holland to their fleet not to strike to the English, 785. Cromwell's order for decimating the property of the king's party, 830.
- Ordinance of parliament, for a day of thanksgiving, on occasion of the pacification with Scotland, 117. for settling the militia, 172. for raising money upon public faith, 321. for a reassessment of the city of London, 329, 330. for a weekly assessment on the whole kingdom, 358. to forbid the next assizes and gaol-delivery, 368. for raising an army under the earl of Manchester, 419. the self-denying ordinance proposed by Vane and Cromwell, 516. passed the commons, 517. and the lords, 532. set aside when it had effected its purpose, 610. archbishop Laud condemned by an ordinance, 519. the parliament's ordinance upon the king's desiring a personal treaty with them, 590.
- Orleans, duke of, 606, 782. notice of lord Cottington's interview with him, 725. visited Charles II. with civility, 782. alteration of his conduct, ib. mademoiselle, his daughter, thought of as a wife for Charles II, 783.
- Orleans, duke of, (see Monsieur.)
- Orleans, duchess of, (see princess Henrietta.)
- Orleans, mademoiselle, daughter of the duke of, thought of as a wife for Charles II, ib. the design comes to nothing, 784.
- Ormond, James Butler, twelfth earl of, afterwards marquis of, and duke of, 57, 58, 112, 356, 456, 465, 533, 535, 537, 596, 622, 632, 667, 705, 713, 724, 736, 737, 743, 744, 773, 778, 780, 781, 786, 789, 804, 806, 807, 844, 846, 848, 849, 869, 870, 890. lieutenant general in Ireland to the earl of Strafford, 57. notice of his character and conduct, 355. beat general Preston at Rosse, 456. agrees to a cessation with the Roman catholic Irish, 458. resolved not to act under the earl of Leicester, who was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland, 355. made lord lieutenant in his stead, 472. condemned the earl of Antrim, who entertained malice against him, 534, 535. constrained to deliver up Dublin to the English rebels, and leave Ireland, 621. waits on the king at Hampton-court, and acquaints him with his care for his service, 622, 632. he secretly leaves England, and arrives in France, 632. well received by queen Henrietta, 640. reasons that moved him to it, 632. he in vain solicits supplies from France, 640. arrives in Ireland with a small retinue, 648, 667. his affairs there, 674. the propositions of the parliament commissioners to the king at Newport against delinquents, especially the marquis of Ormond, 684. an account of the affairs in Ireland after his arrival, 722. blocks up Dublin, 722. lord Inchiquin departs from him into Munster, 723. defeated there by Jones, 723. he treats with O'Neill, 743. who however died before he joined him, 773. his condition, ib. a mutiny thereon, 773. he escapes, ib. a declaration is published against him, 774. purport of it, ib. he deposes the marquis of Clanrickard, 774, 775. and lands in France, 775. and waits on Charles II. at Paris, ib. the friendship between him and the chancellor of the exchequer, 775. one of the new council appointed by Charles II, 776. his and the chancellor of the exchequer's opinion concerning the king's affairs, 1652, 781. all who were angry with the chancellor of the exchequer were angry with him, 805. sent into France by the king to fetch the duke of Gloucester, 820. has the command of one of the four regiments raised by the king from his subjects in Flanders, 845. sent to treat with lord Muskerry about transferring his regiment from the French to the Spanish service, ib. his success, ib. his going into England occasioned by the transactions of the king's friends there, 848. returns, 849. present at the attempt upon Mardyke, 858. particulars of his attending the king to Fuentarabia, 874, 876, 877. attends him to Breda, 897.
- Osborne, — concerned in an attempt for the king's escape from the Isle of Wight, 686, 687. accuses Ralph of a design on the king's life, ib.
- Overal, John, bishop of Norwich, 36.
- Overbury, sir Thomas, the earl and countess of Somerset privy to his murder, 4. they are tried and condemned, ib.
- Overton, — 617. one of the seven commissioners appointed by parliament to govern the army, 879.
- Owen, colonel sir John, wounded at the siege of Bristol, 410. tried before a new high court of justice, 700. what for, ib. condemned, 701. pardoned by the house of commons, 703.
- Owen, John, bp. of St. Asaph, one of the bishops who signed the protestation against their constrained absence from the house of lords, 141.
- Owen, Morgan, bp. of Landaff, one of the bishops who signed the protestation against their constrained absence from the house of lords, ib.
- Oxford, university of, contributes plate and money for the use of Charles I, 301, 317, 325. Oxford, owing to the university, the only city entirely at the king's devotion, 313, 317. troops formed of the scholars there, 481. affairs there whilst the earl of Essex's army was before it, 484. affairs there during the king's absence in the west, 500. resolutions there upon lord Goring's arrival, 550. the university visited by the parliament, 622. reasons against the covenant passed in convocation there at this time, ib. learning, religion, and loyalty flourished there, notwithstanding these violent proceedings against it, 623.
- Oxford, Robert de Vere, 19th earl of, origin of his enmity with the duke of Buckingham, 13.
- Oxford, Aubrey de Vere, 20th and last earl of, one of the committee appointed by parliament to wait on Charles II. at the Hague, 908.

Oxford, bishop of, (see Robert Skinner.)

P.

Pacification, (see Peace.)

Packer, John, Donnington castle belonged to him, 429.

Page, captain, afterwards lieutenant colonel, 498, 551. wounded in the second battle of Newbury, 510.

Paget, William lord, concurred in the prosecution of archbishop Laud and the earl of Strafford, 74. made lord lieutenant of Bucks for his zeal in the parliament's service, 261.

Palatine, Frederic, elector, inexcusably incurred the ban of the empire, 6.

Palatine, (see Elector.)

Pale, origin and application of the term in Ireland, 675.

Palmer, sir Henry, 271.

Palmer, Jeffery, 525, 589. offended the violent party in the house of commons by using decency towards the earl of Strafford on his trial, 87. dispute in the house upon his protesting against the printing of the remonstrance, 125, 126. one of the king's commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520.

Papists, their boldness and activity, about 1640, 60. cashiered out of the army at the instigation of parliament, 73. an order of parliament for disarming them all throughout England, 115. petition of apprentices against them, 134. (see Penal Laws.)

Parliament, certain days at the beginning of a session spent in formalities, 8. its old hours of sitting and other customs, 53. the office of the lord steward of the king's house, to swear the members of the commons before they sit, ib. all supplies must originate in the commons, 54. speaker of the house of commons usually a lawyer, 68. not usual for the attorney-general to be a member of parliament, 84. forty members of the commons required to make a house, 117. contrary to order that a rejected bill should be preferred again the same session, 121. its privileges not meant to screen its members from being punished for treason, felony, or breaches of the peace, 146, 149. made to do so by the commons, 1642, 153. observations on its privileges, 159. no act done at any committee may be divulged before it be reported to the house at large, 151. (see Lords.)

Parliament, Charles's declaration concerning, in his 4th year, 2. precipitate dissolutions of parliament one cause of the future calamities, ib. temper and proceedings of the first parliaments, ib. particularly against the duke of Buckingham, 11. good consequences that would have arisen from parliament's being allowed to impeach any of the king's ministers, 3. resolutions of parliament, 1628, for war against Spain upon hearing Buckingham's statement of prince Charles's journey thither, 9. a parliament after 12 years' discontinuance summoned April 1640, to support a war against the Scotch covenanters, 53. sergeant Glanville chosen speaker of the commons, ib. notice of Mr. Pym's and others' speeches concerning grievances, 53, 54. the house of peers advise the commons to begin with a supply, ib. this voted a breach of privilege by the commons, ib. the king proposes to the commons to give up his claim of ship-money for twelve subsidies, 55. debated, 56. the parliament dissolved owing to misrepresentations of their proceedings, ib. public regrets at this step, ib. the king declares to the great council at York his resolutions to call a parliament, 62. parliament meets November 3, 1640, 68. its temper different from the last, ib. 69. Mr. Lenthall made speaker, 68. Pym opens the debate of grievances, 69. the earl of Strafford's impeachment resolved on, ib. 70. illegal proceedings of the commons respecting elections, 70, 71. certain severe acts passed, ib. 73. abp. Laud accused of high treason, 71. charge brought against lord Finch, ib. and secretary Windbank, ib. extraordinary proceedings against the earl of Strafford, 72. the temper of both houses at that time, and the character of their leading men, 73. a committee of both houses appointed to treat with the Scotch commissioners, 76. proceedings respecting the earl of Strafford's trial, 72, 77, 86, 90. dissimilarity used in procuring petitions to parliament, 82. the new canons condemned by the commons, ib. money borrowed of the city by the two houses, for supplying the two armies, 83. appoint commissioners to dispose of the two subsidies voted by them, ib. the same method afterwards continued, ib. a bill for a triennial parliament passed, 84, 113. a proposition for borrowing money in the city, 85. defeated by the factious party, 86. bill of attainder passed against the earl of Strafford, 91, 92, 93. those who voted against it placarded as Straffordians, or enemies to their country, ib. a bill passed the commons to take away the bishops' votes in parliament, 94. rejected in the lords, 95. sir E. Deering's bill brought in to do away with bishops, deans, and chapters, ib. laid by, ib. a vote passed both houses against the court of York, 96. the ill use made by the commons of the discovery of some correspondences between the court and some principal officers of the army, 100. protestation made by both houses to preserve their privileges, ib. the part inferring the maintenance of the church establishment is explained away by the commons, 101. a bill passed to compel all the subjects to take it, ib. how the commons resent the king's declaration before parliament, that he could not sign the bill condemning the earl of Strafford of treason, 102. the house of lords pass the bill, intimidated by the mob, ib. the bill allowing parliament to dissolve itself passed, 105. by what arts obtained, ib. its effects on the commons, ib. the mention of the plot between the court and the army revived in the commons, 106. their bill respecting tonnage and poundage, ib. a gratuity voted to the Scotch army, ib. sir E. Deering's bill extirpating episcopacy revived and committed in the commons, 110. laid aside, ib. the king petitioned to defer his visit into Scotland, ib. sir A. Haalerig's bill for settling the militia, 111. seconded by St. John, ib. read once and no more, ib. parliament sits on a Sunday, in vain endeavouring to defer the king's journey any longer, 111. prevails on the king not to allow any of the disbanded Irish army to enlist in the service of foreign princes, 112. its motives for so doing, ib. committees of both houses appointed to sit during the adjournment of parliament, ib. 117. powers intrusted to them, ib. the business before the committee of the commons, 118. the various bills passed this parliament, 113. order of both houses to disarm all papists, 115. declaration of the lords against certain ecclesiastical innovations of the commons, 117. an ordinance of both houses for a day of thanksgiving on occasion of the pacification with Scotland, ib. a small committee of both houses attend the king into Scotland, 118. a guard appointed for the security of parliament upon its meeting again, 119. the Irish rebellion referred to parliament by the king, 121. a committee revived for drawing up a remonstrance, 121. a motion that the king might be desired not to appoint a privy-counsellor without the approbation of parliament, ib. a new bill brought in to take away bishops' votes, ib. the commons offended at the king's filling up divers vacant bishoprics, ib. the committee for the remonstrance make their report, 124. the remonstrance carried by nine voices, 125. dispute concerning certain members protesting against its being printed, ib. it is ordered to be printed, 126. substance of it, 127. the ways by which the factious party grew in the commons, 128. the remonstrance and a petition presented to the king, 130. his answer to the petition, ib. a bill prepared in the commons for pressing men for Ireland, 131. the preamble of the bill excepted against by the lords, ib. the king's interference in any bill whilst pending declared a breach of privilege, 131. the bill concerning pressing passed, 132. debate concerning the militia, ib. 133. Saint-John to bring in a bill to settle it, ib. the commons petition for the renewal of a guard, 134. tumults of the mob about the house of lords, ib. encouraged by the commons, 135. watches appointed by the lords, ib. dismissed by the commons, ib. all the bishops, and many other members of both houses, intimidated from attending, ib. the commons accuse of treason all the bishops who protested respecting their constrained absence from parliament, 141. censure of this measure, 142. the consequences of this violent step would have been beneficial to the king, had not lord Digby's ill advice given fresh advantages to the commons, ib. the commons refuse to give up five of their members accused of treason by order of the king, 143. the king demands them in person, ib. reason for their taking refuge in the city, 144. and for concealing themselves for a time, 146. the commons adjourn themselves, and appoint a committee to sit in the city, 145. the lords adjourn, but appoint no committee, ib. the committee of the commons well received in the city, ib. its transactions, ib. 150, 153. the king's going to the house of commons voted the highest breach of privilege by the house, 146. the king's answer to the former remonstrance of the commons, ib. declaration of the commons respecting the five members, 150. the five members required by the commons to resume their seats, 152. are brought in triumph to Westminster, ib. the Buckinghamshire petition to the commons, ib. 153. and the house of lords, ib. the commons revive the votes passed by their committee in the city, and add more, ib. accuse lord Digby of high treason, upon pretence of levying war, 154. the orders of both houses respecting the Tower, Hull, and Portsmouth, ib. the commons vote a charge against, and impeach the attorney-general for impeaching their five members, ib. 174, 193. the king's message to both houses, 155. unnoticed by them, ib. fresh committees of both houses appointed to sit in the city, ib. motive for removing there, ib. the commons pass Saint-John's militia bill, 155, 156. both houses move the king, that the magazine at Hull might be removed to the Tower, ib. they send both the Hothams to Hull, ib. matter prepared for a new remonstrance by the committee at Grocers' hall, 157. the king's proposition and message to both houses, Jan. 20, 158. both houses petition him concerning the accused members, ib. his answer, ib. the commons, without the concurrence of the lords, petition the king to intrust the Tower of London and other forts to persons recommended by them, 160. his answer, ib. they resolve to carry their point, 161. they desire to borrow money of the city, ib. petitions from several counties concerning the militia, 162. the commons adopt a new way of influencing the lords, 163. a petition to the commons from the porters of London, 165. and from the poor people, ib. the militia bill passed the lords, 166. and the bills touching the bishops' votes and pressing, 167. both houses adjourn again into London, ib. and petition the king touching the Tower of London, forts, and militia, ib. his answer concerning the militia, 168. the commons return him thanks, and request that sir J. Coniers, should be made lieutenant of the Tower, ib. which is granted, 168. the king's demand of reparation for an expression in Mr. Pym's printed speech, 169. their answer, ib. his reply, ib. they persist in defending the expression, 170. the ordinance agreed on by both houses for settling the militia, 172. the king's answer concerning the militia, 174. the reply of the commons, ib. the twelve imprisoned bishops bailed by the lords, ib. recommitted by the commons, ib. divers counties exercise the power of the militia at the instigation of the commons, ib. the commons raise money under pretence of relieving Ireland, ib. and endeavour to prevent the prince of Wales from removing from Hampton-court to Greenwich to meet his father, 175. upon what pretended reason, ib. the king's farther answer respecting the militia, ib. votes of both houses upon it, 176. and petition to the king, ib. his answer, 177. resolutions of both houses upon it, ib. they order a fleet to be prepared, ib. their declaration to the king, ib. and their reasons for his continuance near the parliament, 180. his answer, ib. 181. instances of the illegal proceedings of the commons against individuals, 179, 180. the king's message to both houses in his way to York, 181. votes of both houses concerning the militia, 182. their order concerning Hull, ib. they make propositions for adventurers in Ireland, 183. to which the king consents, ib. and passes a bill to that purpose, ib. his declaration from York, 184. petition of the lords and commons to him, March 26, 1642, 187. his answer, 188. its effect on the commons, 190. both houses voted, that whoever accepted the offices from which the earls of Essex and Holland were removed by the king, should be reputed enemies of their country, 191. the commons disposed to have an admiral of the fleet appointed without applying to the king, 192. he interferences, ib. the message of both houses to him upon the matter, ib. his answer, ib. the earl of Warwick appointed notwithstanding, ib. the bill of tonnage and poundage suffered by parliament to expire, 192, 193. their method of screening the collectors from a præmunire till a new bill passed, ib. object of these measures, ib. impeach G. Binion for drawing up the London petition against the militia bill, 195. the petition from Kent concerning the militia and the Book of Common Prayer, how received by parliament, ib. petition of both houses to the king to remove the magazine from Hull, ib. his answer, 196. the magazine removed notwithstanding, 197. the king's message to both houses offering to go in person to Ireland, ib. their answer, 198. his reply, 199. his message to both houses concerning his refusal to pass the bill for the militia, 201. their exultation at the failure of the king's design of securing Hull, 204. his messages to them concerning Hull, ib. his second message about it, ib. their declaration and votes upon the matter, ib. his answer, ib. they appoint the younger Hotham governor of Hull, in case of any accident happening to his father, 206. the bearers of their answer to the king designed as a committee to remain at York, ib. their answer to his messages, ib. his reply, 207. declaration of both houses concerning the militia, 208. which was circulated without being sent to the king, 209. his declaration in answer to it, ib. their hostile preparations, 211, 212. their declaration concerning a reformation of the liturgy, ib. they enforce their ordinance respecting the militia by ordering out the train-bands of London, 213. the members of both houses present at the muster, ib. their directions for their ordinance to be executed throughout the country, ib. the three votes of both houses in consequence of the king appointing a guard for the defence of his person, 214. their petition to him to dissolve his guards, ib. his answer, 214, 215. observations on their declaration and vote that the king intended to make war upon them, 216. what line of policy they had followed, ib. they forbid Skippon from repairing to York in obedience to the king's warrant, 218. and counter-order the king's adjournment of the term to York from Westminster, ib. declaration of both houses, May 19, 1642, of what had been done amiss throughout the whole of the king's reign, 218. a fresh remonstrance of both houses, May 26, 230. many members of both houses either absent themselves, or join the king in consequence of it, 238. the king's answer to their declaration of May 19, 239. and to their remonstrance of May 26, 246. the nineteen propositions sent to the king by both houses, 255, 256. his answer to them, 257. their order against pawning the crown jewels, 256, 257. their proceedings against such members as had absented themselves, 259, 260, 267. their propositions and orders for bringing in money and plate for maintaining horse, &c. 260. immense sums brought in, 261. explanation why those members of both houses who were favourable to the king absented themselves from parliament, instead of remaining to oppose the measures of the opposite party, 265. the king's commissions of array declared illegal by parliament, 267. their declaration to the city upon the king's letter to the lord mayor and aldermen, 268. his reply, ib. the king having revoked the earl of Northumberland's commission as lord high admiral, the earl of Warwick is appointed by parliament in his stead, 271, 272. the votes of both houses for raising an army, 274. the earl of Essex appointed the general, ib. their petition to the king at Beverley, ib. his answer, 275. his refusal to return a more gentle reply, 278. their replication to his answer, 280. proofs that if the king were more loved, the parliament was more feared, 279. each party lay aside all thoughts of farther overtures, 280. their unjust proceedings against sir Richard Gurney, lord mayor of London, 281. and against judge Mallet, ib. their preparations for war, 280, 281. their declaration to the people as to their objects in raising an army, ib. Portsmouth besieged by their forces, 289. surrendered to them by colonel Goring, 296. the king's message to them for peace, 292. how received, ib. 293. their answer, ib.

his second message, ib. their answer, 294. and their declaration to the kingdom, ib. advantageous to the king, ib. 301. his third message in answer to their last reply, 295. reasons of their being backward in taking the field against the king, 296. their conduct towards such as did not coincide with them, 297. they send out of the country the Capuchin friars belonging to the queen, 299. their instructions to their general, ib. their petition to the king sent to their general to be presented, 300. why never delivered, 305. their vote that all who did not contribute to the charge of the commonwealth, should be disarmed and secured, 301. both houses how affected by the accounts of the battle of Edge-hill, 313. apprentices invited by them to take arms, 314. their declaration to the subjects of Scotland, ib. their garrison quits Reading, 317, 318. their petition to the king, ib. his answer, 319. their peaceable intentions set aside by the king's advance to Brentford, ib. 320. his message to them, 320. their ordinance for raising money upon the public faith, 321. their declaration of their general's acceptable service, ib. another petition from them to the king, ib. substance of his answer, ib. 322. Marlborough garrisoned by them, ib. taken from them by the king's forces, ib. 323. they declare all whom the king appointed sheriffs, to be delinquents, 325. substance of their declaration to the States General of the United Provinces, ib. the inclinations of foreign states towards them or the king, 326, 327. their new ordinance for raising money 329. the king's declaration thereupon, 330. their humble desires and propositions to the king, 337. his answer, 339. Chichester taken by their forces, 340. Cirencester lost, ib. their strength in Cornwall and Devonshire, ib. their forces beaten at Bradock-down, 343. they lose Saltash, ib. their condition in the northern parts, 344. they disown the articles of neutrality agreed on in Yorkshire, 345. they make lord Fairfax their general there, 346. sir Hugh Cholmondley revolts from them, and delivers up Scarborough castle to the queen, 347. their condition in Lancashire, Cheshire, and Shropshire, ib. and in the counties between Oxford and York, 348. and in Wales, 350. their horse beaten on Hopton-heath, 349, 350. state of Ireland with reference to the differences between the king and parliament, 352, 353, 354, 355. negotiations between parliament and him concerning a treaty, 356, 357. the majority of members, though outwitted, in favour of peace, 356. their terms for a cessation of arms, 357. different opinions of the privy-council of the king as to his accepting them, ib. parliament pass an ordinance for a weekly assessment on the whole kingdom, 358. the king's proposals of alterations in the articles of cessation, ib. 359. the treaty begins upon the proposals of cessation, but takes no effect, 366, 367. the parliament's advice and desires to the king respecting the next assizes, 368. his answer, ib. their ordinance forbidding them, ib. an account and character of the privy-councillors at this time attending the king, and of those who stayed with parliament, 369. the sum of the demands and concessions of both sides upon the first article of the treaty, 376. the king's message to parliament, 379. who return no answer, 380. Hereford taken for them by sir W. Waller, 382. who is repulsed at Worcester, 383. Reading taken by the earl of Essex, 385. the parliament dissatisfied about the capture, 387. some wild plans of the commons not concurred in by the lords, 388. the king's message to parliament, ib. his messenger committed by the commons, ib. and his queen impeached by them of high treason for assisting him in the war, ib. the design of Mr. Waller and others in favour of the king, 389—393. the vow and covenant taken by parliament in consequence, 392. and throughout the city and army, 393. Mr. Hamden's death, 396. the earl of Stamford beaten near Stratton, 398. the parliament send sir W. Waller into the west with an army, 401. his condition after the battle of Lansdown, 403. he is routed at Roundway-down, 406. Bristol surrendered to prince Rupert, 408. the two houses send commissioners into Scotland for relief, 410. why the king could make no farther application to parliament, 411. propositions for peace given by the lords to the commons, 417. reasons for and against them, ib. 418. assented to by the commons, ib. if sent to the king would have produced peace, ib. preached against in London, ib. common council petition against peace, ib. the propositions are in consequence rejected by the commons, ib. parliament pass an ordinance for raising an army under the earl of Manchester, 419. certain lords go over from the parliament to the king, ib. the earls of Holland, Bedford, and Clare return again to the parliament, 437. certain counties associated to serve the parliament, 420. the parliament's losses in the west, 423—425. they commit the custody of the Tower to the lord mayor Pennington, 427. the earl of Essex relieves Gloucester, 428. takes Cirencester, ib. battle of Newbury, 429. transactions of the committee of both houses in Scotland, 437. a covenant proposed by the Scots between the two kingdoms, and agreed to, 438. taken and subscribed by the two houses and their assembly of divines, 439. copy of it, ib. the parliament prevails with the city to advance one hundred thousand pounds to the Scots for their co-operation, 441. substance of the treaty between the English commissioners and the Scots, 443. the parliament forces garrison Newport Pannel, 447. affairs in the west, ib. the parliament's proceedings with regard to the conte d'Harcourt, who had come as ambassador from France, 450. the parliament vote a new broad seal, 453. which is delivered to six commissioners, ib. parliament disowns the cessation of arms agreed to by the king with the rebels of Ireland, 458. its letter to the lords justices and council on the subject, 459. their answer, ib. the king's message to both houses, 469. their answer, 470. they impose an excise, 471. Mr. Pym's death, 474. sir W. Waller has the advantage over lord Hopton at Alresford, 479. association of several counties under the earl of Manchester, 480. who is ordered to march into the north to join the Scots, 481. plan of the operation of their armies against the king, 483. success of the earl of Essex in the west, 488. the fight at Cropredy bridge, 489. the battle of Marston-inoor, 491. York delivered to the parliament forces, 492. Balfour with the earl of Essex's horse escapes through the king's army in Cornwall, 499. the earl escapes by sea, 500. Skippon makes condition for his foot, ib. the king sends a message of peace to the parliament, which was not noticed, 503. the second battle of Newbury, 509. the divisions in the parliament, 514, 532. the independent party against peace, 515. the trial of archbishop Laud, 519. condemned by an ordinance of parliament, ib. parliament agrees to a treaty at Uxbridge, 520. names of their commissioners, ib. and of the king's, ib. particulars respecting it, ib. first, of religion, 522. secondly, of the militia, 525, 529. thirdly, of Ireland, 525, 526. the end of the treaty without effect, 530. the self-denying ordinance passes the commons, 532. where it was proposed by Vane and Cromwell, 516. and the lords, 541, 542. Fairfax in consequence made the parliament general instead of the earl of Essex, ib. through Cromwell's means, ib. state of the western counties, 542, 543, 554, 581. the battle of Naseby, 553. prince Rupert delivers up Bristol, 567. the king's horse routed at Chester by Pointz, 576. lord Digby routed at Sherborne, 578. lord Hopton routed at Torrington by sir T. Fairfax, 583. the king sends another message for peace which was laid aside by the houses, 589. their answer to his demand of a safe conduct for the duke of Richmond and others, ib. their answer to his desire of a personal treaty at Westminster, ib. their ordinance upon the renewal of his request, 590. Bellievre's fruitless negotiation with the king and parliament, 605. the parliament, upon the Scots' request, send propositions of peace to the king, now with the Scots army, 607. his answer, ib. they demand, and the Scots deliver him up, 608. a committee and servants appointed by them to attend him, ib. they refuse to let any of his own chaplains attend him, ib. divers garrisons surrender to them, ib. differences arise between the parliament and army, 609. their declaration in consequence of certain resolutions of the army in opposition to their authority, 611. afterwards rased out of their journal book, ib. they appoint a committee to treat with a committee of the army, ib. their intention of seizing Cromwell frustrated by his returning to the army, ib. the general's account to parliament of the king's being seized at Holmby, 612. their alarm at the approach of the army towards London, ib. the different designs of the parliament and army relating to the king, 615. eleven members of the commons impeached by the army, 616. intimidated by the London apprentices, parliament alters the ordinance of militia, 617. the general's sharp letter to them in consequence, ib. the two speakers, with other members of the two houses, join the army, 618. both houses choose new speakers, and their votes, ib. the general conducts the two speakers and other members to their several houses, 619. the parliament's behaviour on the news of the king's withdrawing, 627. they send to the king to pass four acts, 628. the Scotch commissioners protest against them, ib. 629. the king's answer, 629. how received by parliament, 630. who vote that no more addresses should be sent to him, ib. their declaration to the same effect, 631. passed not without opposition, ib. proved odious to the people in general, ib. the present condition of parliament, 639, 640. they send commissioners into Scotland, 644. the revolt of part of the fleet to the king, 646. the parliament prepares a fleet against it, 657. Lambert defeats sir M. Langdale and duke Hamilton, 658. Berwick and Carlisle, which had been seized for the king, delivered up to parliament, 662. Colchester, where the Kentish royalists had retired, delivered up to sir T. Fairfax, 664. the city petitions for a personal treaty, 665. a committee of parliament treats with them about it, ib. the parliament declares for a personal treaty, ib. substance of their message to the king, 666. his answer, ib. the vote of no more addresses repealed, the treaty to be at Newport, ib. whether the parliament commissioners arrive, 677. the first proposition, for revoking all the king's declarations, &c. 678. the king's answer to it, ib. dispute concerning the preamble of it, 679. he consents to it, 680. the second proposition, concerning religion and the church, ib. he offers a proposition of his own, which the commissioners refuse to send to parliament, ib. he sends it by messengers of his own, but it is voted unsatisfactory, ib. their ministers dispute with him about the bishops, ib. his concessions on this point, 681. the third proposition, concerning the militia, ib. his answer, 681, 682. this voted by the parliament unsatisfactory, ib. he consents to it with a preamble, ib. and at last without it, ib. the fourth proposition, concerning Ireland, ib. some other particulars he sticks at, ib. but consents at last, ib. the commissioners now send his own propositions to the parliament, 683. they require a declaration of him against the marquis of Ormond, ib. his answer, ib. they enlarge the treaty fourteen days, ib. the commissioners renew their demand about Ormond, ib. his answer, ib. they urge further about the church, ib. his answer, ib. the parliament's votes upon his former proposition, ib. 684. another prolongation of the treaty four days, ib. the declaration of the army, ib. the commissioners' new propositions against delinquents since January, 1648, and others, especially the marquis of Ormond, ib. his answer, ib. another prolongation for a day, wherein they present two propositions more, ib. one concerning Scotland, ib. his answer, ib. the other touching the church, 685. his final answer, ib. the sum of his letter to his son concerning this whole treaty, ib. the conclusion of it in his own words, ib. 686. a sharp debate on the commissioners' report of this treaty, 688. sir H. Vane's speech concerning it, ib. remonstrance of the army presented to parliament by six officers, ib. vote of the commons upon the king's being removed from Carlisle castle to Hurst castle, 689. another declaration of the army to them, ib. they vote that the king's answer was a ground for peace, ib. many of the members seized by the soldiers when entering the house, ib. the remaining members vote the contrary to former votes, ib. vote that those who were absent at the negative vote should sit no more in the house, 690. vote of no more addresses renewed, ib. the protestation of the secluded members voted against by both houses, ib. votes of the commons about settling a form of government, ib. a committee appointed to prepare a charge of high treason against the king, ib. the charge approved by the commons, ib. rejected by the lords, who adjourned for a week, 691, 692. who find their house locked up on their next day of meeting, ib. the ambassador sent from the States of Holland at the request of the prince of Wales to intercede for the king, not admitted to an audience of parliament till after the tragedy was acted, 691. the queen sent a paper to the same effect to parliament, but it was laid aside, ib. the commons constitute a high court of justice for the trial of the king, 692. their proclamation against proclaiming the prince of Wales king, 699. they abolish the house of peers, ib. their vote against the office of kingship, ib. they make a new great seal, ib. six of their own judges resign, ib. a new oath imposed by them, called the engagement, 700. they appoint a new high court of justice for the trial of duke Hamilton, the earls of Holland and Norwich, lord Capel, and sir J. Owen, ib. their answer to the protest of the Scotch commissioners against the king's trial, 707. whom they imprisoned, but afterwards freed, ib. they appoint Cromwell lord lieutenant of Ireland, 723. they refuse to ratify Monk's treaty with O'Neale, 744. more inclined to make a peace with Spain than France, 747. whither they send Ascham as their agent, ib. resolved to send Cromwell with an army into Scotland, where Charles II. now was, 750. and send ambassador sinto Holland to invite the States to a strict union, 784. without effect, ib. they thereupon pass the act of navigation, ib. the Dutch in consequence order their ships not to strike to the English, 785. a war begun on this account, ib. the parliament's answer to a message from the States, ib. 786. who send again to them for peace, 787. Guernsey and Jersey reduced, ib. and the foreign plantations subdued, 788. the parliament debate about their dissolution, 792. but decide against it, ib. Cromwell and his council of officers dissolve it, 793. a new one chosen by them, 794. conditions and qualifications of the persons nominated, ib. nicknamed Praise-God Barebone's parliament, ib. called together by Cromwell's warrant, ib. who also delivers to them an instrument for their authority, ib. they choose Rouse their speaker, and assume the name of a parliament, 795. their actions and consultations, ib. they deliver up their power to Cromwell, ib. the protector calls a parliament after a new method, 799. his speech to them, 800. Lenthall chosen speaker, ib. their actings, ib. the protector speaks to them, ib. admits none into the house but such as subscribed an engagement to him, 801. dissolves them, ib. summons a parliament, 1656, 837. imposes a subscription upon the members before they sat, ib. proceedings of this parliament, ib. a proposition in parliament to make Cromwell king, ib. a committee confer with him upon it, 838. he is confirmed protector by their humble petition and advice, 840. the contents of it, ib. parliament adjourned, 841. reassembled in two houses, lords and commons, 843. the commons readmit certain members that had been excluded by a clause in the petition and advice, ib. their transactions afterward, ib. dissolved, as being disposed to question the protector's authority, 844. a parliament called by Cromwell's successor, his son Richard, 864. the business recommended to them by him, ib. differences in the commons about the accounts of money, and about the other house, 865. carried that the other house should be allowed, ib. votes of the parliament upon the address of the council of officers to the protector, ib. the protector dissolves the parliament at the instigation of the officers, 866. whereupon his power is no longer regarded, ib. the long parliament restored by the council of officers, ib. some of the old excluded members went into the house with them, but were excluded again, ib. the protector submits to their authority, 867. and Henry Cromwell, who resigns his commission of lieutenant of Ireland, ib. they make Ludlow, and four other commissioners, governors of Ireland, ib. Monk from Scotland declares his obedience to them, ib. so does the navy, ib. they continued Lockhart ambassador in France, 868. they send ambassadors to mediate a peace between the two northern crowns, ib. they pass an act of indemnity to the army, ib. they appoint all commissioners military, to be signed by their speaker, ib. they banish all cavaliers twenty miles from London, ib. send Lambert against sir G. Booth and sir T. Middleton, 871. grow jealous of Lambert's army, 879. the petition and proposals of that army, ib. with which Haslerig acquaints the house, ib. they vote to have no more general officers, ib. they make void all money acts, that there may be nothing to maintain the army, ib. and cashier Lambert and eight other chief officers of the army, ib. they make seven commissioners to govern the army, ib. and send for forces to defend them, ib. Lambert, with some troops, stops the speaker, and makes him go home, 880. a committee of safety constituted by the army, ib. Monk declares for the parliament, 881. Lawson and the fleet also, 884. and Desborough's regiment, ib. the parliament meets again, ib. they order Lambert's troops to their several quarters, ib. commit him to the Tower, 885. and confine to their houses such of their members as had concurred with the committee of safety, ib. they desire that part of Monk's forces, now marching towards London, may be sent back to Scotland, 886. and send Scot and Robinson to meet him, ib. in compliance with Monk's demand, they send the other regiments out of town to receive him, ib. he is conducted to parliament, and complimented by the speaker, 887. his reply, ib. the common council of the city refractory to the parliament, ib. Monk sent by them to reduce it to obedience, ib. the parliament resolve to join others in commission with Monk, ib. his expostulatory letter to them, 888. he delivers his mind to them, 889. the secluded members go to the house, ib. their transactions, ib. 892. they dissolve themselves and appoint a new council of state, 889. attempts of the rump parliament to prevent a new parliament, 891. the parliament's and council of state's prudent actions, 893. the parliament meet, 903. and choose sir Harbottle Grimstone speaker, ib. the king's letter to the commons, 898, 899. and to the lords, 900. which, with his declaration, they receive with great joy, 903. a committee appointed to prepare an answer, 904. the answer, ib. a committee of both houses wait on the king at the Hague, to invite him to return to the throne, 908. (see House of Lords and House of Commons.) Parliament at Oxford summoned by Charles I, 456. both houses meet, 466. substance of the king's speech to them, ib. they send a letter to the earl of Essex, 467.

- his answer directed to the earl of Forth, ib. means agreed on by both houses to raise money, 471. they follow the example of the parliament at Westminster in imposing an excise, ib. the parliament prorogued, 481.
- Parliament of Scotland summoned by the covenanters, 442. the parliament met, and their deliberations, 643. their letter to the prince of Wales, 660. their committee order Monroe to disband, 662. the parliament being summoned, condemn duke Hamilton's engagement, 663. the behaviour of the marquis of Montrose before them, 741. a parliament summoned in Charles II.'s name, 759. it meets at Stirling, and reconciles the lords, ib.
- Parry, sir George, one of the commissioners for the associated county of Devon, 546.
- Parsons, sir William, a lord justice in Ireland, notice of him, 355. removed from that trust, ib.
- Party, the violent, carry all before them, 419.
- Paterculus, Velleius, 831.
- Paullet, (see Pawlet.)
- Paw, — sent by the States of Holland ambassador to the English parliament to intercede for Charles I, 691.
- Pawlet, lord Edward, 505.
- Pawlet, sir John, 477.
- Pawlet, John lord, 506. one of the king's commissioners to treat with the Scots at Rippon, 63. one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. accompanied the marquis of Hertford into the west, 273, 287, 291. and thence into Glamorganshire, 297.
- Peace between England and France and Spain, 27. a treaty of pacification concluded between England and Scotland, 50. the ill consequences of it, ib. the parliament's propositions for peace, 1643. 337. peace made by Cromwell with the Dutch, 1654, 797. peace between France and Spain, some particulars respecting, 1650, 873. (see Treaty.)
- Peard, — 54.
- Peers in council at York set down in writing the affronts and violence offered to them at London, 261. their declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 262. (see Lords.)
- Percy, (see Percy.)
- Pembroke, William Herbert, third earl of, the most beloved and esteemed of any man of the age, 23. married one of the heiresses of the earl of Shrewsbury, ib. his good qualities, 23, 24. his vices, ib. unfortunate in his marriage, ib. made lord Chamberlain, and afterwards lord steward of the king's house, ib. his death, ib. anecdote respecting its being fore-
- told, ib. succeeded in his title by his brother, the earl of Montgomery, ib.
- Pembroke, Philip Herbert, fourth earl of, previously earl of Montgomery, 64, 109, 181, 191, 282, 351, 373, 528. made lord chamberlain, 24. succeeded his brother as earl of Pembroke, ib. one of king James's favourites, ib. superseded by Carr, earl of Somerset, ib. his character, ib. 372. averse from the war with Scotland, 49. one of the commissioners to treat with the Scots at Rippon, 63. one of the king's council at York, 64. his quarrel with lord Mowbray in the house of lords, 105. both sent to the Tower, ib. deprived by the king of his staff of lord chamberlain, 373. supported the oppressions in the stannery courts, 115. one of those sent by parliament with a petition to the king, 318. and with propositions of peace, 337. fear induced him to side with the parliament, 373. gave up himself into the hands of lord Say, ib. made governor of the Isle of Wight, ib. why the chancellor of the exchequer always entertained a great kindness for him, ib. one of the few peers who attended parliament, 467. one of the parliament commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520, 521, 525. tries to persuade the chancellor of the exchequer to consent to all the parliament demanded, 528. totally without credit or interest in the parliament or country, ib. his conduct as chancellor of the university of Oxford, when the university was visited, 622.
- Pembroke, Philip Herbert, fifth earl of, and second earl of Montgomery, 827, 828.
- Pen, — a fleet sent out under him, with a land army under Venables, 832. their orders, 833. they go to Barbadoes, ib. thence to Hispaniola, ib. unsuccessful there, ib. successful in a descent upon Jamaica, 834. they return to England, ib. are committed by Cromwell to the Tower, ib.
- Penal laws, a repeal of, expected by foreign catholics to be a consequence of Charles I.'s proposed marriage with the infanta of Spain, 7. rigidly executed by lord treasurer Weston, 21.
- Pendennis castle, bravely defended against the parliament forces, 609. surrendered on honourable terms, ib.
- Penkaruan, Edward, signed the anabaptists' address to Charles II, 855.
- Pennington, sir John, 178, 192, 269, 272, 284. the king intends to appoint him admiral in the room of the earl of Northumberland, 270. his objections to being appointed, ib. alters his mind, and offers to accept the appointment, 271. how far concerned in the king's losing the navy, ib. 272.
- Pennington, Isaac, alderman, 81, 329, 331, 334, 418. in the highest confidence with the factious party, 86. one of the committee of the house of commons appointed to sit during the recess, 117. made lord mayor in the room of sir R. Gourney, deposed by the lords, 281. chosen lord mayor a second time, 321. the custody of the Tower committed to him by parliament, 427.
- Pennymann, sir William, 345. notice of him, 500. was governor of Oxford at the time of his death, ib.
- Penruddock, — concerned in the rising at Salisbury for Charles II, 824, 825. beheaded in consequence at Exeter, 826.
- Percy, (Peirce,) Henry, afterwards lord, 655, 673, 812, 813. how far concerned in the correspondence between the court and army, 107, 108, 220, 225, 227. notice of his creation as a peer, upon the queen's intercession, 496. removed from the office of general of the ordinance, ib.
- Peterborough, Henry Mordaunt, second earl of, prepares to rise with the duke of Bucks in favour of Charles II, 642.
- Peterborough, bishop of, (see J. Towers.)
- Peters, Hugh, 539.
- Petition of right, its origin, 3. not prejudicial to the crown, ib. the Scots petition the king, upon it a treaty appointed at Rippon, 62. a petition of some citizens against the government of the church by bishops, 81. great disingenuity used in procuring petitions, 82. the petition intended to be subscribed by the officers of the army, 98. a petition presented to the king together with the remonstrance, 130. the king's answer to the petition, ib. a petition published in the name of the apprentices against papists and prelates, 134. the commons petition the king for a guard, ib. his answer, ib. petition and protestation of certain bishops on their constrained absence from the house of lords, 141. the city petitions the king, 148. his answer, ib. the Buckinghamshire petition to the commons, 152, 153. to the lords, ib. and to the king, ib. both houses petition the king about the accused members, 158. the commons petition him to remove sir J. Byron from the lieutenancy of the Tower, and to put all the other forts and the militia into the hands of confiding men, 160. petitions from several counties concerning the militia, 162. petition of the poor in and about the city to the commons, 165. both houses petition the king touching

- the Tower, forts, and militia, &c. 167. his answer, 168. a petition of both houses to him at Theobalds, 176. his answer, 177. to him at York, 187. his answer, 188. to remove the magazine from Hull, 195. his answer, 196. to dissolve his guards, 214. his answer, ib. to him at Beverley, 274. his answer, 275. their petition to him, sent to their general to be presented, but never delivered, 300. to him at Colebrook, 318. his answer, 319. to him at Reading, 321. his answer, ib. from the city to him, 333. his answer, 334. from the general assembly of the kirk of Scotland to him, 359. his answer, 362. from the common council of London against peace, 418. a tumultuous petition of apprentices and others to parliament, concerning the militia, 617. the city petitions for a personal treaty with the king, 665. a petition intended of the Scottish presbyterians by Balcarris and Frazier, that the chancellor of the exchequer might be removed, 805. and of the Roman catholics also against him, 808. Cromwell confirmed protector by the humble petition and advice, 840. the contents of it, ib. the petition and proposals of Lambert's army, 879. parliament receive a petition by Barebone from the fanatics, 887.
- Pezenas, in Languedoc, the property of the prince of Conti, 867.
- Pheasant, sergeant, 338.
- Philip II, king of Spain, 730.
- Philip IV. (see king of Spain.)
- Phillips, colonel Robert, assisted Charles II. in his escape after his defeat at Worcester, 771.
- Phillips, father, the queen's confessor, notice of his death and character, 757.
- Pierce, William, (see bishop of Bath and Wells.)
- Pierrepont, — one of the parliament commissioners to treat with Charles I. at Oxford, 356, 366. and at Uxbridge, 520. notice of him, 529. was in favour of the self-denying ordinance, 532.
- Pignoranda, conde of, 733. he and Fuensaldagna governed all the councils at Brussels, 719. notice of him, ib. 734. governed by Le Brune, ib. waited on Charles II. whilst at Brussels, 720. one of the Spanish council of state, 734.
- Pimentel, don Antonio, 873.
- Pinkney, — quarter master general, 574.
- Pius V. pope, published a bull against the toros in Spain, 730.
- Plague in London, 1641, 116.
- Plantations, the foreign, subdued to the parliament, 788.
- Plate, brought in for the use of parliament, 261.
- Plessy Praslin, marshal of, 726.
- Plot, John, 340.
- Plunket, — notice of, 789.
- Plutarch, 298.
- Plymouth, prince Maurice's unsuccessful attempt against, 447. sir R. Greenvil left to block it up, 503.
- Points, — routs the king's horse at Chester, 576. his movements, 579, 580.
- Poland, John Casimir, king of, 731.
- Poland, Anne Catherine Constance, daughter of Sigismund, king of, married the duke of Newburgh, 819.
- Pollard, — 283, 869. how far concerned in the correspondence between the court and army, 107, 116, 220. imprisoned in consequence, 107.
- Pollard, sir Hugh, 556, 829, 882. accompanied the marquis of Hertford into the west, 273. had a friendship with general Monk, 882.
- Pontefract castle, an account of the taking of, for the king, 667. part of the garrison's attempt upon Rainsborough, 669. the castle delivered up to Lambert, 670.
- Pope, Alexander VII, 863, 876. notice of the duke of Newburgh's discourse with Charles II. concerning making some application to the pope for assistance, 821. the effect of the application, 822.
- Popham, Alexander, active in Somersetshire for the parliament, 290, 291, 401.
- Popham, colonel Edward, a principal officer in the parliament's fleet, 527. of a passionate and virulent temper, ib. one of the independent party, ib.
- Porridge, captain, 571.
- Porter, Endymion, 157. selected to attend prince Charles in his journey to Spain, 7. what situations he had filled, ib. one of those expected against by parliament from making peace with them on any terms, 300.
- Porter, lieutenant general, 555, 571. his charge against lord Goring, 548. lord Goring's charge against him, 567. joins the parliament, 571.
- Portland surrendered to the king's forces, 424.
- Portland, first earl of, (see Richard Weston.)
- Portland, Jerome Weston, second earl of, 391. notice of his wife, 22. removed by parliament from the government of the Isle of Wight, 213, 373. and imprisoned, 213. Mr. Waller his intimate friend, 389. the parliament unable to implicate him in Mr. Waller's and Mr. Tomkins's design, 393. he is therefore enlarged, ib. joins the king at Oxford, 419, 422.
- Portland, (Frances Stuart,) countess of, 22.
- Portmans, the, 400.
- Portsmouth, under colonel Goring, declares for the king, 285. besieged by the parliament's forces, 280. surrendered to them, 296. the soldiers before Portsmouth revolt to the parliament against Lambert, 883.
- Portugal, 100. how disposed towards Charles II, 736. compelled by Cromwell to make peace, 797. what notice taken of Portugal in the peace between France and Spain, 873, 874, 875, 876. the Portuguese ambassador's brother, don Pantaleon Sa, beheaded by Cromwell for murder, 799.
- Portugal, king of, duke of Braganza, 839.
- Portugal, prince of, Theodosius, 736.
- Portugal, queen of, Louisa de Guzman, 736.
- Potter, Christopher, dean of Worcester, one of the king's commissioners in ecclesiastical matters to treat at Uxbridge, 523.
- Poundage, (see Tonnage.)
- Powell, colonel, commanded in South Wales for the parliament, 650. disposed, through discontent, to support Charles II, ib. taken prisoner by Cromwell in Pembroke castle, 655.
- Poyer, colonel, raised himself from a low trade, 650. intrusted by parliament with the government of the town and castle of Pembroke, ib. disposed, through discontent, to support Charles II, ib. taken prisoner by Cromwell in Pembroke castle, 655.
- Preaching, great license in, 80.
- Prerogative, royal, when it should, and when it should not be exercised to screen ministers, 3.
- Presbyterian clergy preach up rebellion, 297. presbyterian ministers dispute with Charles I. about the bishops, 680. divers presbyterian divines went to Charles II. at the Hague, 909. their public audience, ib. their private discourses with him, ib.
- Pressing, the usual method of recruiting the army, 17. not submitted to without opposition, ib. right of, usurped by the house of commons, 131.
- Preston, sir M. Langdale is beaten and taken, and duke Hamilton routed near there, 658.
- Preston, general, John, 722, 743, 773. his character, 675.
- Pretty, captain, 291.
- Price, Herbert, 828.
- Prideaux, — 701. one of the six commissioners to whom parliament intrusted their broad seal, 453. one of the parliament commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. he, Vane, and Saint-John, were but spies on the rest, 527.
- Prideaux, John, made bishop of Worcester, 121.
- Prince Elector, (see Elector.)
- Prince of Wales, (see Charles I. and II.)
- Printing, great license in, 80.
- Privilege, breach of, the house of peers recommending the commons to begin with a supply, voted such

- by the commons, 54. the king's interference whilst the bill concerning pressing was pending, voted such, 131. as also his going to the commons to demand the five members accused of treason, 150.
- Privy-council, its powers enlarged, 28. lord keeper Finch's declaration in its favour, 30. prejudicial to it, ib. requisite principles of a member of the council, 79. the privy-council and some of the bishops advise the king to pass the bill of attainder against the earl of Strafford, 103.
- Privy-counsellors, divers new, of the popular party, sworn, 78. prejudicially to the king, ib. an account and character of the privy-counsellors attending the king, 1643, and of those who stayed with parliament, 368.
- Proclamation, the ill effects of that set forth upon the dissolution of the second parliament of Charles I, 27. Charles I.'s proclamation from Beverley, 273. his proclamation for assembling the parliament at Oxford, 456. proclamation of parliament against proclaiming Charles Stuart king, 699. Cromwell proclaimed protector, 795. Charles II. proclaimed, 906.
- Progers, Henry, 594, 748.
- Projects of all kinds, 28. of knight-hood, ib. of reviving forest laws, ib. of ship-money, ib.
- Proposal in the house of commons for a committee to consider of the present state and power of the militia, 132. the king's proposals of alterations in the parliament's articles of cessation, 358. the petition and proposals of Lambert's army, 879.
- Proposition, the king's, to the house of commons to give up ship-money for twelve subsidies, 55. a proposition made in the commons for borrowing money in the city, 85. defeated by the factious party, 86. the king's proposition and message to both houses, 158. propositions of the commons for adventurers in Ireland, 183. the nineteen propositions sent to the king by both houses, 254, 255, 256. substance of his answer, 257. propositions and orders of both houses for bringing in money and plate for maintaining horse, 260. the humble desires and propositions of parliament to the king, 337. the king puts the two houses in mind of his proposition for a cessation of arms, 356. propositions for peace given by the lords to the commons in a conference, 417. rejected by the commons in consequence of a petition from the common council of London against peace, 418. propositions from Ireland rejected by the king, 512. lord Goring makes propositions to the prince of Wales, 564. the parliament, upon the Scots' request, send propositions of peace to the king at Newcastle, 607. the Scots enforce them by their chancellor, ib. the king's answer, 608. the propositions in the personal treaty with the king at Newport, 678—685. propositions from England to Charles II. for an insurrection in his favour, 823. a proposition in parliament for Cromwell to be king, 838. the propositions annexed to the anabaptists' address to Charles II, 855.
- Protest, debate in the commons against the right of entering a protest against any measure of that house, 126. origin of the custom of protesting in the house of lords, 163. abuse of this custom, 1642, ib.
- Protestants of Germany and France, received into England in the time of Edward VI, 327. encouraged by queen Elizabeth, 328. discountenanced in the time of Charles I, ib.
- Protestation taken by parliament in consequence of the correspondences discovered between the court and army, 101. explanation of it by order of the commons, ib. the petition and protestation of certain bishops against their constrained absence from the house of lords, 141. the bishops that subscribed it accused of high treason by the commons, ib. protestation of certain peers in a matter relative to the duke of Richmond, 164. taken notice of in the commons, ib. the king's speech and protestation at the head of his forces, 295. a protestation taken by the two parties in Devon and Cornwall, previous to a treaty, 344. the commissioners of Scotland enter a protestation against the four acts sent by parliament to the king, 628. the protestation of the secluded members of the commons, 690.
- Provisors of benefices, statute of, a clause from the preamble, 233.
- Pryn, William, an opponent of episcopacy, 38. his character, 80. punished for libelling, ib. his entry into London on his return from exile, ib. 81. he and Mr. Walker prosecuted colonel Fiennes for the surrender of Bristol, 454. one of the parliament commissioners to reform the discipline and doctrine of the university of Oxford, 622.
- Puleston, John, 338.
- Pye, sir Robert, commanded the king's garrison in Leicester, 551.
- Pym, John, 58, 69, 121, 126, 135, 169, 196, 205, 331, 391, 419. opens the debate in the parliament of April 1640. concerning grievances, 53. and again in the new parliament in November, 91. part of his speech, ib. one of those sent by parliament with their petition to the king at York, 59. his part in the proceedings against the earl of Strafford, 69, 70, 87, 91. notice of his character, 74. the younger Vane sought his friendship, 75. a design of making him chancellor of the exchequer, 84, 101, 136. supported the bill for tonnage and poundage, 85. not hostile to the church, 94. the ill use he made of the discovery of the correspondence between the court and the army, 100, 107, 108. said by some to have been bribed to hinder Irish volunteers from enlisting in the service of Spain, 112. chairman of the committee of the commons that sat during the recess, 118. of what advantage it might have been to have gained him and others over, 129. articles of treason charged against him and others by order of the king, 143. farther particulars relative to this charge, ib. 144, 148, 150, 151, 152, 156, 158, 167, 174, 178, 179, 185, 187, 193, 218, 221, 225, 241, 256, 282. his speech on delivering certain petitions respecting the militia to the house of lords, 162. thanked for it by the commons, who order it to be printed, 163. the king demands reparation for an expression in it, 169. the answer of the commons, ib. the king's reply, ib. farther communications respecting it, 181, 187, 188. part of his speech on the king's answer to the petition of the city of London, 335. his death, 474. his character and conduct, 475.
- Pyne, John, 527.
- Q.
- Quartermaine, Dr., the king's physician, 849.
- Queen of England, (see Henrietta.)
- Queen regent of France, (see France.)
- R.
- Radnor, earl of, (see lord Roberts.)
- Ragland-castle bravely defended against Fairfax by the marquis of Worcester, 609. surrendered on honourable conditions, ib.
- Rainsborough, colonel, the army at Hounslow-heath send him to take possession of the city, 619. part of the fleet revolt from him to the king, 646. from what causes, ib. he and some officers put on shore by the seamen, 648. sent by Cromwell against Pontefract castle, 669. an attempt by part of the garrison to carry him off, ib. is killed, ib.
- Ramsey, ——— commanded a troop of the parliament horse at the battle of Edge-hill, 307. made governor of Marlborough, 322. taken prisoner in the capture of the town by lieutenant general Wilmot, 323.
- Ramsey, David, 61.
- Ranucini, J. B. archbishop of Firmo, (see Nuncio.)
- Ranzaw, marshal, governor of Dunkirk, 659.
- Ratcliffe, sir George, 756. accused - of high treason in order that he might not be able to give evidence in favour of the earl of Strafford at his trial, 86. had great interest with the duke of York, 756. he and sir E. Herbert recommend to the duke the pattern of the duke of Lorraine, ib. they propose a match for him with the duke of Lorraine's bastard daughter, 757. the queen complains of him and sir E. Herbert, 776.

- Raynolds, Robert, 461. he and Mr. Goodwyn sent by parliament as a committee into Ireland, 355. commanded the English in the service of France, 842. was cast away, coming out of Flanders, 844. (see Reynolds.)
- Reading, quitted by the parliament forces, and taken possession of by the king, 317. besieged by the earl of Essex, 381. the king attempts in vain to relieve it, 384. articles upon which it surrendered, 385. the breach of them gave rise to similar breaches in future by both parties, ib. possessed again by the king's forces, 429. quitted by them, 483.
- Reeve, or Reeves, justice, 338. notice of, 279.
- Remonstrance against the king carried in the commons by nine voices, 125. ordered to be printed, 126. substance of it, 127. the king's answer, 147. the committee at Grocers' hall design a new remonstrance, 157. the matter they prepared for it, ib. the declaration or remonstrance of the lords and commons, May 19, 1642, 219. their remonstrance, May 26, 231. what effect it had, 238. the king's answer to that of May 19, 239. and to that of May 26, 246. the large remonstrance of the army brought to the commons by six officers, 688.
- Resolution of parliament upon the king's answer to their petition concerning the militia, 177. resolutions taken at Oxford, 550. the first resolutions of the council of officers appointed by the army, 610.
- Retz, cardinal de, friendly disposed towards Charles II, 806. his discourse with him, ib. sent to the bastille in consequence, ib.
- Reynolds, Richard, signed the anabaptists' address to Charles II, 855. one of the presbyterian divines who had a public and private audience of the king at the Hague, 909. (see Raynolds.)
- Rhé, isle of, unsuccessful attempt against, 2, 11.
- Rhodes, sir Edward, 345.
- Rich, colonel, 663, 840.
- Rich, lord, 25. one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263.
- Rich, Robert, grandson of the earl of Warwick, married Frances Cromwell, 842. his death, 861.
- Richard II, 90, 214, 215, 692.
- Richard III, 238.
- Richaute, — 496, 497.
- Richelieu, cardinal, 11. encourages the disaffected in Scotland against Charles I, 51, 326, 592. notice of his death, 449, 591. reasons of his hatred against the English, ib. kept the queen regent and the queen of England out of France, ib. why he raised cardinal Mazarine, ib.
- Richmond, James Stewart, third duke of, and fourth duke of Lennox, 35, 521, 522, 563, 589, 666. high steward and high admiral of Scotland by descent, 32. the only counsellor about the king in Scotland, 49, 123. notice of his character and conduct, 49, 64, 85. and of his behaviour towards the opposite party, 109. compelled to give up the wardenship of the cinque ports, 110. certain expressions of his, the subject of debate in both houses of parliament, 163, 165. his character defended, 164, 165. farther notice of his character, 369. one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. one of those excepted against by parliament from making peace with them on any terms, 300. made lord steward of the king's household, 373. one of the council for the prince of Wales, 514. he and the earl of Southampton sent to the parliament with a message for a treaty, 517, 518. one of the king's commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. his part, 522. excused himself from leaving the king to attend the prince, 538. attended the king's funeral, 698. died before the restoration of Charles II, ib.
- Richmond, (Mary Villiers) duchess of, 369.
- Rippon, the English and Scotch commissioners appointed to meet there, to treat of peace, 62.
- Rivers, John Savage, second earl of, one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. one of those excepted against by parliament from making peace with them on any terms, 300.
- Rivers, countess of, her house plundered by the rabble, because she was a papist, 297.
- Roberts, John lord, afterwards earl of Radnor, 498, 503. he and the earl of Southampton refuse to take the protestation imposed by the commons in consequence of the discovery of the correspondence between the court and the army, 101, 108. present on the parliament side at the battle of Edgehill, 307. one of the few lords who attended parliament, 1643, 467. notice of him, 495. insists that the earl of Essex's army should proceed into Cornwall, 494. he escapes thence with the earl by sea to Plymouth, 500. his estate in Cornwall granted by the king to sir R. Greenville, 561, 583.
- Robinson, — sent with Scot by parliament to meet Monk, marching towards London, 886.
- Robinson, colonel, 549. governor of Launceston, 583.
- Rochelle, 19, 327. besieged by cardinal Richelieu, 11. the duke of Buckingham assassinated when going to its relief, 12. notice of its loss, 127.
- Rochester, earl of, (see Lord Wilmot.)
- Rochford, John Carey, viscount, afterwards earl of Dover, present on the parliament side at the battle of Edgehill, 307. one of the few lords who attended parliament, 1643, 467.
- Rogers, — notice of his death, 400. his character, ib.
- Rogers, — 558.
- Roles, — chief justice, turned out of his office by Cromwell for refusing to act as judge against those who were concerned in the rising at Salisbury, 826.
- Rolls, master of, has the filling up of the six clerks' places, 21.
- Rolls, sergeant, 338.
- Rolph, captain, his rise and character, 687. accused of a design on the king's life, ib. how tried and acquitted, 688.
- Roscommon, James Dillon, first earl of, 465.
- Roscorroth, — one of the commissioners for the associated county of Cornwall, 546.
- Rosewell, (see Williamson.)
- Rospigliosi, Julio, afterwards pope Clement IX, notice of, as the pope's nuncio at Madrid, 749.
- Rossiter, colonel, 579, 580, 613.
- Rotheram, Thomas, 465.
- Roths, John Leslie, sixth earl of, 33, 112. one of the Scotch commissioners sent to London to treat of peace, 76. his character, ib.
- Roundheads, use of the term, 136.
- Roundway-down, battle of, wherein sir W. Waller is routed, 406.
- Rouse, Francis, chosen speaker of the house of commons, 1653, 795.
- Rouswell, colonel, bravely but unsuccessfully defended Litchfield cathedral against prince Rupert, 384.
- Rowe, sir Thomas, Charles I.'s ambassador extraordinary to the emperor, 327.
- Rozetti, count, public agent from Rome at London, 60, 127, 178, 185, 220.
- Rupert, prince, 298, 302, 306, 324, 384, 389, 407, 415, 417, 427, 473, 480, 481, 484, 493, 495, 499, 506, 509, 510, 511, 531, 534, 545, 546, 547, 559, 554, 556, 562, 568, 569, 577, 580, 659, 660, 671, 677, 807, 809. made general of the king's horse at the opening of the civil war, 8 H

270. disapproved of the king's first message to parliament for a treaty, 294. successful in a encounter near Worcester, 299. his name in consequence becomes terrible to the enemy, ib. his independent commission the cause of faction in the king's army, 306. too much listened to by the king, 307. particulars of the battle of Edge-hill as far as he was concerned, ib. 308, 309. the earl of Lindsey offended at his being exempted from his command, 310. contracted a prejudice against Wilmot, 434. frightens the parliament garrison away from Reading, 318. urges the king to advance towards London, 319. takes Cirencester, 340. and Hereford, 382. and Litchfield, 384. and returns to the king, ib. successful in a skirmish at Chalgrave field, where Mr. Hamblen was mortally wounded, 395. jealousies between him and the marquis of Hertford, 412. takes Bristol, 407, 408. the queen jealous of his lessening her interest with the king, 421. particulars of his part in the battle of Newbury, 428, 429. censurable for letting the earl of Essex escape him in Gloucestershire, 434. notice of his character, 444. takes Bedford, 447. relieves Newark, 476. one of those chiefly consulted by the king on military affairs, 482. successful at several places in the north, 491. defeated at Marston-moor, ib. quits the north in consequence, ib. 492. observations on his conduct, ib. made general of the king's army, 495, 510. was not generally liked, 511. withdraws his favour from O'Neile, 535. his answer (penned by the chancellor of the exchequer) to the earl of Essex's expostulatory letter, 540. disposes the king to march northwards, 550. others advising him to go into the west, ib. why he forwarded lord Goring's views, though no friend to him, ib. present at the taking of Leicester, 551. his part in the battle of Naseby, 553, 554. retires to Bristol, ib. 652. the king's letter to him against treating of peace, 563. he delivers up Bristol, 567. the king's letter to him upon this surrender, 569. his commissions revoked by the king in consequence, ib. through lord Digby's influence, 577. a reconciliation between him and Goring, 572. visits the king at Newark to explain his conduct at Bristol, 579. absolved upon a hearing from disloyalty or treason, but not from indiscretion, ib. the king reconciled to him, 600. attends the prince of Wales to the fleet at Helvoetsluyt, 648. had a rooted prejudice against lord Colepepper, 655, 671. much influenced by sir E. Herbert, 655. heads the faction in causing the prince of Wales to undervalue lord Hopton, 660. well inclined to the chancellor of the exchequer, 671, 677. his quarrel with lord Colepepper, 671. takes the command of the prince of Wales's fleet, 674, 676. goes with it to Ireland, 705. and then to the coast of Spain, 735. enters the river of Lisbon, ib. escapes out again away from the parliament's fleet, 736. arrives with his fleet at Nantes, 807. invited by Charles II. to Paris, ib. gives an ill account of his fleet, ib. 810. leaves the king, and goes into Germany, 812. resigns his place of master of the horse, ib.

Russel, sir William, treasurer of the navy, 75, 516.

Ruthen, — the parliament governor of Plymouth, 342. beaten by sir Ralph Hopton at Bradock-down, 343. who takes Saltash from him, ib.

Ruthen, Patrick, afterwards earl of Brentford, earl of Forth in Scotland, (as earl of Brentford,) 394, 417, 565, 573, 581. (as earl of Forth,) 467, 469. made field marshal, 305. appointed by Charles I. general of his army in the room of the earl of Lindsey, who fell at Edge-hill, 312. great friendship between him and lord Hopton, 479. was present with him when worsted by sir W. Waller at Alresford, ib. notice of his being made earl of Brentford, 482, 495. much consulted by the king on military affairs, 482. his character, ib. 495, 511. wounded in the second battle of Newbury, 509. prince Rupert made general in his stead, 510, 511.

Rutland, John Manners, eighth earl of, excused from ill health from being a parliament commissioner to Scotland for relief, 410. one of the six commissioners to whom the parliament intrusted their new broad seal, 453. one of the few lords who attended parliament, 1643, 467.

Ruvignis, — 594.

Rytheby, (see Kettleby.)

Ryves, — one of the commissioners for the associated county of Dorset, 546.

S.

Sa, don Pantaleon, brother of the Portuguese ambassador, beheaded by Cromwell for a murder, 798.

Sacheverel, — 302.

Sackville, sir Edward, (see earl of Dorset.)

St. Alban's, Richard de Burgh, earl of, fourth earl of Clanrickard, 61.

St. Alban's, earl of, (see marquis of Clanrickard.)

St. Alban's, earl of, (see sir T. Jermy.)

St. Andrew's, archbishop of, (see J. Spottiswood.)

Saint-George, colonel, killed at the taking of Leicester, 552.

St. Ghislain recovered to the Spaniards through the instrumentality of the earl of Bristol, 847.

Saint-Hill, — one of the commissioners for the associated county of Devon, 546.

Saint-John, Oliver, 56, 59, 101. seldom known to smile, 56. his character, 74. made solicitor general, 84. defends the earl of Strafford's attainder in point of law before the lords, 93. seconds sir A. Haalerig's bill for settling the militia, 111. one of the committees of the commons appointed to sit during their recess, 117. was the chief instrument to devise and contrive all the propositions and acts of undutifulness towards the king, 129. advises the king to offer an expedient with regard to the bill pending respecting pressing men for Ireland, 131. consequence of this step, ib. declares the power of the militia not to be in the king, 133. one of the commissioners to whom the parliament intrusted their new broad seal, 453. he and Hamblen much governed Pym, 475. one of the parliament's commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. he, Vane, and Prideaux acted as spies on the rest, 527. his solicitorship revoked by the king, 520. was in favour of the self-denying ordinance, 532. the parliament's chief ambassador to the Dutch, to invite them to a strict union, 784. Cromwell never zealous for the Dutch war, but governed in it by him, 787.

Saint-John, Oliver, lord, present on the parliament side at the battle of Edge-hill, 307. killed there, 311. his character, ib. notice of his being made a peer, ib.

St. John's college, the worst endowed in Oxford, at the time of (abp.) Laud being sent there, 36.

St. Paul's cathedral, fines of the high commission court assigned for its rebuilding, 38.

Salisbury, a rising there in favour of Charles II, 824, 825. unfortunate issue of it, ib.

Salisbury, William Cecil, second earl of, one of the counsellors with the king at York, 64. had been appointed at the parliament's desire lord lieutenant of Dorsetshire, 177. one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 262. one of the commissioners sent by parliament to the king with propositions of peace, 337. his character, 373. was servilely obsequious to the court, ib. deserted the king at York, and returned to the parliament, 374. one of the few lords who attended parliament, 1643, 467. one of the parliament commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. he and the earl of Pembroke totally without credit or interest in the parliament or country, 528.

when the house of peers was put down by Cromwell, he got himself chosen a member of the house of commons, 374.

Salisbury, bishop of, (see B. Duppa.)

Saltash taken by the king's forces, 343.

Saltpetre, an act for the free making of, 114.

Sanderson, Dr. Robert, afterwards bishop of Lincoln, one of the chaplains allowed by the army to attend Charles I. at Newmarket, 613.

Sandford, — prognosticated the earl of Pembroke's death, 24.

Sandwich, earl of, (see Edward Mountague.)

Sandys, colonel, commanded the parliament's forces in the encounter near Worcester, 299. died of his wounds, ib. 302.

Santen, a handsome open town, belonging to that part of the duchy of Cleve which was assigned to the elector of Brandenburg, 819.

Savile, John lord, a rival of the earl of Strafford, 104. bereaved by him of all power and place at court, ib. made treasurer of the king's household, 129.

Savile, Thomas lord, afterwards earl of Sussex, his character, 62. a bitter enemy to the earl of Strafford, ib. had held a correspondence with the Scots, ib. one of the commissioners appointed by the king to treat with the Scots at Rippon, 63. sworn a privy counsellor, 78. one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. he and the chancellor of the exchequer alone advised a civil reception of those lords who came over to the king from parliament, 422.

Savoy, duke of, Charles Emanuel II, 878. compelled by Cromwell's interposition to restore the privileges to the valley of Lucerne, 863.

Say, Wm. Fiennes, first viscount, 70, 99, 140, 180, 308, 312, 318, 373, 419, 375, 666. refuses to make the protestation against holding intelligence with the Scots, 47. was not at York with the king on his Scotch expedition, being ill, 63. was the oracle of the puritans, 73. sworn of the privy-council, 78. a design of making him master of the wards, 85, 92, 102. notice of his speech on the earl of Strafford's trial, 87. was an entire enemy to church and state, 93. promised the king to screen the earl of Strafford, under the hope of obtaining the treasurership, 102. how by his advice the king injudiciously interfered in the bill pending in parliament against the earl of Strafford, ib. advised the king to consult the bishops as to the point of conscience in signing the act of attainder against the earl, 140. is refused a safe conduct by the king when appointed by parliament one of their commissioners to treat with him at Oxford, 356. observations respecting this refusal, ib. the earl of Pembroke gave himself up into his hands, 373. one of the few lords who attended parliament, 1643, 467. supposed to be the only one of the independent party in the house of peers, 532. why he tried to prevail on the king to consent to the parliament's demands made in the treaty at Newport, 677, 679. notice of his character and previous conduct, 375. was educated at New college, Oxford, ib. the duke of Buckingham courted his friendship in order to be popular, but cast him off, finding him too imperious, and in favour of too dangerous mutations, ib. to what lengths disposed to go, ib. afterwards fell into as much contempt with those whom he had led, as with those whom he had undone, ib.

Scarborough castle delivered up by sir H. Cholmondeley to the queen, 347.

Scarsdale, earl of, (see lord Deincourt.)

Scawen, — one of the commissioners for the associated county of Cornwall, 546.

Schomberg, Frederic, afterwards first duke of, 818, 847.

Schout, Theodore, 460.

Scilly, after being vigorously defended by sir J. Greenvil, is delivered to sir G. Ayscue, 788.

Scot, — he and Robinson sent by parliament to meet Monk marching towards London, 886, 888.

Scotland, the wilderness of England, its state before the long parliament of Charles I, 31. his visit there to be crowned, 32. his intentions of introducing the English liturgy there, how far and why opposed, 33, 34. his feeling towards Scotland, and consequent determination, 34, 45. state of the church there, 33. the king, during his stay, erects the bishopric of Edinburgh, 35. and prefers some bishops to secular offices unseasonably, ib. the bishops had little influence in Scotland, ib. the liturgy and canons appointed to be drawn up by some of them, and submitted to archbishop Laud, bishop Juxon, and bishop Wren, 42. observations respecting the canons and the liturgy, ib. 43. nothing but a fear of popery would have driven the nation into open rebellion against the king, 43. the liturgy, how received in Edinburgh, 44, 45. Scotland and its affairs never thought of in England, 44. ladies of quality side with the lower orders against the bishops before their husbands, 45. the Scottish covenant formed, ib. a clause in it for the extirpation of episcopacy, ib. this opposition at first thought light of by the other party, ib. colonel Lealey chosen general of the covenant, 46. the king raises an army and navy against them, ib. which would have ended the war at once if they had been vigorously exerted, 47. the earl of Holland retires before the covenanters at Dunce, 48. they write to the three English commanders, ib. a treaty concluded, 50. the consequences of their success, 51. the covenanters joined by the earl of Argyle, ib. their letter to the French king intercepted, 52. English preparations for a new war, 57. lord Conway routed at Newburn, 58. the Scotch, however, down to their conquest by Cromwell, were always beaten by the English, unless assisted with English troops, ib. they petition the king, 62. a treaty appointed at Rippon in consequence, ib. error in this point, 66. names of the commissioners, 63. their proceedings, ib. the earl of Strafford advises the king to prosecute the war, 64. a cessation agreed on, ib. the treaty adjourned to London, ib. the mutual confidence of the covenanters, and their deference to the clergy of their party extraordinary, 66, 67. the Scotch commissioners' reception in London, 76, 77. a gratuity voted by parliament to the Scotch army, 106. the act of pacification between England and Scotland passed the parliament, 111. a public thanksgiving appointed in consequence, 117. the king sets out for Scotland, 111. transactions in Scotland touching Mountrose, Argyle, and Hamilton, 119. how the king was treated in Scotland, 123. divers seditious acts assented to by the king, 124. episcopacy abolished, ib. the king's power in Scotland, during his absence, to be vested in lords of the secret council, ib. the king returns to England, ib. declaration of parliament, after the battle of Edge-hill, inviting the Scots to assist them, 314, 315. condition and inclinations of Scotland, 315. substance of the king's message to the privy-council of Scotland upon occasion of the parliament's declaration to that kingdom, 323. petition from the general assembly of the kirk of Scotland to the king, 359, 360. his answer, 362. negotiations of the Scotch commissioners with the king, that they might be mediators, and for a parliament in Scotland, 365. a passport for the commissioners to go to London, why refused by the king, 366. transactions in Scotland of the committee of both houses of parliament, 438. a covenant for the extirpation of prelacy proposed by the Scots between the two king doms, and agreed to, ib. 439. copy of it, ib. 100,000*l.* paid by the English parliament for the cooperation of the Scots, 441. a parliament summoned by the covenanters, 442. substance of the treaty between the two nations, 443. the Scots enter England, 455. a letter from the peers on the king's side to the council in Scotland, ib. an extract of the declaration of the kingdom of Scotland, 468. an extract of the declaration of England and Scotland, ib. the Scotch commissioners jealous and dissatisfied with the proceedings of the English parliament, 515. an account of the earl of Mountrose's expedition into Scotland, 533. a treaty between the king and the Scots set on foot by the interposition of France, 590. the parties cannot agree on the point of church-government, 592. a farther account of this negotiation, 599. the king puts himself under the protection of the Scotch army at Newark, 601. their treatment of him, 602. he orders Newark to be surrendered, whereupon the Scottish army marches northwards with him to Newcastle, ib. transactions relating to him in the Scotch army, 605. at their desire he orders the surrender of Oxford and all his other garrisons, 607. the parliament upon the Scots' request send propositions of peace to the king, ib. the Scots enforce these propositions, ib. his answer, 608. the parliament demand, and the Scots deliver up the king, ib. the Scotch commissioners' private treaty with him at Hampton-court, 634. observations on it, ib. substance of this scandalous treaty, ib. the Scots' preparations for an expedition into England, ib. 651. the Scotch parliament meet, their deliberations, 643. commissioners sent into Scotland from the English parliament, 644. letter of the Scotch parliament to the prince of Wales, 660. deliberations in the prince's council about it, 661. Cromwell marches into Scotland, 662. is received at Edinburgh, ib. the committee of the Scottish parliament order Mountrose to disband, ib. the Scottish parliament being called, condemn duke Hamilton's engagement, 663. a proposition concerning Scotland in the personal treaty with the king in the Isle of Wight, 684. Charles II. proclaimed in Scotland, and commissioners sent thence to him, 705. state of Scotland, 1649, ib. commissioners had been sent from the Scotch parliament before the death of Charles I. to the English parliament, 706. their private instructions from Argyle's party, ib. they enter their protest against the king's trial, ib. the parliament's answer to it after the king's murder, 707. the commissioners reply, are imprisoned, but afterwards freed, ib. the marquis of Argyle clogs the act of proclaiming Charles II. with a clause for the covenant, 707. Middleton assembles some troops in Scotland, 708. factions in the king's court with reference to Scotland, ib. the parties of the Scots at the Hague, 1649, 709. the king invited to Scotland again upon the old conditions, 737, 738. his answer, 737. Scotch commissioners meet him at Breda, 738. he resolves to go into Scotland, ib. arguments of some against this step, ib. Mountrose arrives in Scotland, 740. publishes his declaration, ib. the continuation of his affairs to his execution, 740. the king arrives in Scotland and takes the covenant, 746. the clergy always about him, 747. their sermons before him, ib. the Scots raise an army against Cromwell sent by the English parliament, 750. what advantage they might have had against him, 751. he routs them at Dunbar, ib. he enters Edinburgh, ib. of what advantage to the king, ib. state of the king's affairs in Scotland, 758. a parliament summoned in his name, 759. it meets at Stirling and reconciles the lords, ib. his coronation, ib. an army raised, of which he is general, ib. defeated at Worcester, 764. an account of Scotland brought to him at Paris, by a Scottish vicar that Middleton brought to him, 780. the requests to him from his friends there, ib. the chancellor of the exchequer appointed to make all despatches for Scotland, 781. the state of Scotland under the protectorate, 799, 803, 831. Scotland, chancellor of, (see earl of Lowden.) Scroop, Emanuel lord, afterwards earl of Sunderland, 96. Scroop, sir Gervas, his extraordinary recovery from the wounds he received in the battle of Edge-hill, 312. Scroop, son of sir Gervas, 312. Scudamore, lord, ambassador at Paris, 328. Seaford, George Mackenzie, second earl of, 709. Seal, (see Broad Seal.) Secretaries of state, the inferiority of their office in the beginning of the reign of Charles I., 26. Sects, divers, increase in the army, 610. Selden, John, much assisted lord Littleton, having a great friendship for him, 228. Charles I. once had an idea of taking the great seal away from lord Littleton, and intrusting it with him, 229. though it was supposed he would not have accepted it, and why, ib. his opposition to commissions of array, 267.

Self-denying ordinance proposed in parliament by Vane and Cromwell, 516. passes the commons, 532. and the lords, 542. Senneterre, (see M. la Ferté.) Sexby, — originally a common soldier, 858. one of the agitators of the army, ib. so intimate with Cromwell, as often to be his bed-fellow, ib. his negotiation with Charles II, ib. Seymour, Francis lord, insisted on his right of voting on the earl of Strafford's trial, though he was a commoner when the accusation was first brought up, 87. one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. accompanies the marquis of Hertford into the west, 273, 287. and into Glamorgan-shire, 297. his character, 371. one of the king's commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. Seymour, colonel, 449. Seymour, Harry, of the king's (Charles II.) bedchamber, 422, 687, 772. sent to the king from his friends in England, 810. Seymour, sir John, 408. Seymour, queen Jane, 608. Shaftsbury, earl of, (see sir A. A. Cooper.) Sheffield, colonel, 395. Sheldon, Gilbert, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, informs Mr. Hyde, (lord Clarendon,) that the university of Oxford was ready to contribute its plate to the king, 301. one of Charles I.'s commissioners in ecclesiastical matters to treat at Uxbridge, 523. allowed by the army to attend the king at Newmarket as one of his chaplains, 613. Sheldon, major Thomas, died of wounds received in the battle of Lansdown, 404. Sherborne, lord Digby routed there, 578. Ship-money, the levy of, by the king 28. pronounced legal by the judges, when tried by Hambden, ib. 54. the evil consequences of this decision, 28. ship-money made most odious by lord Finch's speech, 29. the writ for levying it drawn up by Noy, attorney general, 30. the king offers parliament to give up his claim of ship-money for twelve subsidies, 55. but dissolves the parliament whilst debating on the measure, 56. an act annulling all proceedings for its collection, 115. Shrewsbury, taken by the parliament's forces, 527. Shrewsbury, the noble family of, 23. Shropshire, the condition of, at the end of 1642, 347. Shurley, George, 465. Sidney, Algernon, 893. Six clerks, the, these situations were in the gift of the master of the rolls, 21. Skelton, Richard, solicitor general, succeeded by Littleton, 228.

Skinner, Robert, bishop of Oxford, one of the bishops who signed the protestation against their constrained absence from the house of lords, 141.

Skippon, captain Philip, 154, 218, 250. notice of him, 152. appointed major general of the London militia, ib. 213. ordered to attend Westminster with a guard, 152. employed in the siege of Reading, 382. makes conditions for the earl of Essex's foot, intercepted in Cornwall, 500.

Slanning, sir Nicholas, 404. governor of Pendennis castle, 342. assists in raising volunteers in Cornwall, ib. aids sir Ralph Hopton in becoming master of that county, 343. his part in the battle near Stratton, 397. and at Lansdown, 403. and in the siege of Bristol, 408. where he fell, 409. his character, ib.

Slanners, the, 609.

Slingsby, captain, refuses to obey the earl of Warwick, as admiral, in compliance with the king's command, 272.

Slingsby, lieutenant colonel, his part in the siege of Bristol, 408.

Slingsby, sir Harry, tried before a high court of justice by Cromwell on account of his loyalty, 850. condemned, 851. executed, 852. an account of him, ib.

Smith, ———, 554.

Smith, Dudley, slain in the battle of Roundway-down, 406.

Smith, captain John, rescued the royal standard at the battle of Edge-hill, 309.

Smith, sir John, brother of lord Carrington, died of wounds received in the battle of Alresford, 480. notice of him, ib.

Smith, major, 64.

Soap, the odious project of, chiefly framed and executed by papists, 60.

Soldiers before Portsmouth revolt to the parliament, 884. the soldiers in London resolve to restore the parliament, and wait on the speaker, ib. (see Army.)

Solicitor general, (Robert Skelton,) 228.

Somerset, duke of, (see earl of Hertford.)

Somerset, Robert Carr, or Ker, earl of, 23. the only one of the favourites of James I. who did not incur the public odium, 4. privy to the murder of sir J. Overbury at the instigation of his wife, ib. condemned for this crime, ib. why he was disliked at court, ib.

Somerset, (Frances Howard,) countess of, instigated her husband to be privy to the murder of sir J. Overbury, ib. condemned for the murder, ib.

Somerset, lord John, son of the marquis of Worcester, 351, 352.

Soubize, M. de, 12.

Southampton, Thomas Wriothesley, fourth earl of, 589, 626, 698, 810.

refuses to take the protestation imposed by parliament in consequence of the discovery of the correspondence between the court and the army, 101, 108. gains over to the king his nephew lord Spencer, 261. one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 262. urges the king to send a message of peace to parliament, 291. one of those who carried the message, 292. how received in the house of lords, 293. his character, 369. married lord Dunsmore's daughter, (Elizabeth Leigh,) 371. one of the princes of Wales's council, 514. he and the duke of Richmond sent to the parliament with a message for a treaty, 517, 518. one of the king's commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. excused himself from quitting the king to attend the prince of Wales, 538. Titchfield one of his seats, 624. one of those the king desired might attend him in the Isle of Wight, 666. present at his funeral, 698. receives the garter from Charles II. on his restoration, 910.

Southampton, (Elizabeth Vernon,) countess of, 624.

Southampton, (Elizabeth Leigh,) countess of, 371.

Southerland, (Sutherland,) John, seventeenth earl of, joined colonel Straghan against the marquis of Mountrose, 741.

Spa, after its cold waters are drank, the hot baths of Aken are resorted to by many, 817.

Spain, its counsels always influenced by the clergy, 7. an account of prince Charles's (Charles I.) journey into Spain, 5. peace between England and Spain, and why, 2. notice respecting the war, 9, 10. its origin was a private quarrel of the duke of Buckingham's, 15. the feeling of the English with respect to this war, 16. Spain favourable to the parliament against the king, 326. particulars of lord Cottington's and Hyde's embassy, ib. some account of the masquerade exercise, 729. of running the course, ib. and of the toros, ib. state of the court there, 1649, 733. ambassadors treated with more respect at Madrid than at any other court, 749. Spain sends an ambassador extraordinary to Cromwell, but fails in the proposed end, 833. a treaty between Spain and Charles II, 835. the Spanish West India fleet beaten by a squadron belonging to the English parliament, 836. the captured bullion sent to London, 837. lord Muskerry joins his regiment with the Spanish, 846. St. Ghislain recovered to the Spaniards through the earl of Bristol's means, 847. the Spanish defeated by the French at Dunkirk, 859. observations on this war with France, 872. some particulars respecting the treaty between the two nations settled by cardinal Mazarine and don Lewis de Haro, 873, 874.

Spain, Philip IV. king of, 7, 15, 714, 732, 734. kept his ambassador at London throughout the rebellion, 700. who bought for him many of king Charles's pictures, ib. notice of his running several courses with don Lewis de Haro, 729. his audience of Charles II.'s ambassadors, 732. his answer to a communication from them, 739. he desires them to depart, 752. dismisses the chancellor of the exchequer courteously, 754. contends with France for Cromwell's friendship, 803.

Spain, queen of, Margaret of Austria, 15.

Spain, queen of, Mary Anne of Austria, notice of, 732.

Speaker of the house of commons usually a lawyer, 68.

Speech, Mr. Pym's, on delivering certain petitions to the house of lords, printed by order of the commons, 162, 163. the king's speech and protestation at the head of his forces, 295. the substance of his speeches to the gentry and commonalty of the several counties through which he passed, 304. the substance of his speech to the parliament at Oxford, 466. Cromwell's speech upon the king's answer respecting the four acts sent to him by parliament, 630. sir H. Vane's speech upon the commissioners' report of the treaty at Newport, 688. substance of Cromwell's speech to a new parliament called by him, 800. his speech upon passing the humble petition and advice, 841.

Spencer, Henry lord, afterwards first earl of Sunderland, 430. 811. gained over from the parliament by his uncle the earl of Southampton, 261. (as earl of Sunderland,) slain in the battle of Newbury, 430. notice of him, ib.

Spiller, sir H., 3.

Spinola, marquis, 9.

Spotswood, sir Robert, notice of, 606. was made secretary of state of Scotland by the king in the room of the earl of Lanrick, ib. taken prisoner, as an adherent of the marquis of Mountrose, ib. and put to death, ib.

Spottiswood, John, archbishop of St. Andrew's, notice of, 35. made chancellor of Scotland, ib.

Spurstow, ———, a presbyterian minister, his rude behaviour to Charles I, 680.

Stacy, colonel, condemned and executed as an adherent of Charles II, 852.

Stafford garrisoned by some gentlemen for Charles I, 349.

Stafford, sir Edward, vice-chamberlain to queen Elizabeth, contri- buted to the rise of lord Cottington, 754.

- Staines, Dr. quarter-master-general, 626.
- Stamford, Henry Grey, first earl of, 279, 340, 342, 343, 344, 399, 402, 415, 447. marches into Cornwall with an army, 397. beaten near Stratton, 398. how he attempted to exculpate himself, ib. besieged in Exeter by prince Maurice, 401. he surrenders to him on articles, 425. one of the few lords who attended parliament, 1643, 467.
- Stamford, lady, (Anne Cecil,) 780.
- Stannery-courts, an act against divers encroachments and oppressions in them, 114.
- Stapleton, — 288.
- Stapleton, sir Philip, 126. hostile to the earl of Strafford, 76. active for the bill to take away the court of York, 96. one of the committee to attend Charles I. into Scotland, 119. notice of him, ib. one of those sent with the parliament's answer to the king concerning Hull, 206. and with their petition to him at Beverley, 274. opposed the self-denying ordinance in the house of commons, 532. one of the leaders of the presbyterian party in that house, 616. withdrew beyond sea, when the speaker and several members of the commons repaired to the army, 618. died at Calais, ib.
- Stapley, — his engagement for Charles II, 849. discovers what he knew of the plot, 850, 851.
- Star-chamber, its powers enlarged, 28. its proceedings under queen Elizabeth as rigorous, but more orderly and grave, 29. to whom its errors under Charles I. were chiefly owing, 30. dissolved by act of parliament, 105, 114. its exorbitances, 113. its origin, 114. its abolition a popular measure, ib.
- Stawel, sir John, 291, 506, 543, 546, 556. accompanied the marquis of Hertford into the west, 287. [the government of Taunton committed to him, 400. was eager for the association of the four western counties under the prince of Wales, 531. notice of him, ib.
- Stayner, captain, assisted in the defeat of the Spanish fleet at Santa Cruz, 842.
- Steel, — 880.
- Stenny, the duke of Buckingham so called by James I, 7.
- Stevens, sir John, 890.
- Stevens, Edward, 408.
- Steward of the king's household, (see Lord steward.)
- Steward, Dr. clerk of the closet to Charles I. and dean of the king's chapel, one of the king's commissioners in ecclesiastical matters to treat at Uxbridge, 522. his answer in defence of the church of England to Mr. Henderson, 524. recommended by Charles I. to Charles II. to instruct him in matters relating to the church, 649, 717. his objection to Charles II.'s proposed declaration, ib. his death, 779.
- Stewart, lord Bernard, afterwards earl of Litchfield, 498, 553. commanded the king's troop of guards, 306. was at the battle of Edge-hill, 311. his part in the fight at Cropredy bridge, 489. notice of his being made earl of Litchfield, 553. fell at Chester, where the king's horse were routed by Pointz, 577. his character, ib.
- Stewart, lord George, (see lord Aubigny.)
- Stewart, lord John, was in the battle of Edge-hill, 311. died of wounds received in the battle of Alresford, 480. his character, ib.
- Storm, a terrible one on the day of Cromwell's death, 862.
- Stradlin, captain, deprived of his ship for his loyalty, 272.
- Stradling, sir Edward, taken prisoner by the parliament forces at the battle of Edge-hill, 311.
- Strafford, Thomas Wentworth, earl of, lord lieutenant of Ireland, 62, 64, 65, 81, 84, 85, 95, 96, 99, 101, 106, 107, 112, 118, 128, 133, 140, 142, 149. the earl of Holland hostile to him, 49. opposes the removal of sir J. Coke from the secretaryship, 51. notice of his being made earl of Strafford, ib. sir H. Vane his implacable enemy, 56, 60, 61, 375. why he preferred being lieutenant general in the second expedition against the Scotch covenanters, to being general, 57, 58. lord Conway very dear to him, 57. the earls of Essex and Holland his enemies, and why, ib. 60, 61. the army incensed against him, 59. one of the committees of state, 60. notice of his government in Ireland, ib. lord Savile his bitter enemy, 62, 371. complaint of the Scotch commissioners against him, 86. Wilnot and O'Neile his enemies, 64, 534. one of the counsellors with the king at York, ib. advises the prosecution of the war, ib. the queen hostile to him, 67. debate in the house of commons concerning him, begun by Pym, ended in his impeachment, 69, 70, 87, 88, 89, 93. his reply in the house of lords to the announcement of his intended impeachment, 70. committed to the black rod, ib. extraordinary proceedings of the commons against him, 72, 77, 86. Denzil Hollis did not intermeddle in his trial, he having married his sister, 76. the Scotch commissioners' charges against him in parliament, 77. proceedings there towards his trial, ib. sir J. Hotham his enemy, 156. lord Littleton made a baron in order to be of service to him at his trial, 87. who nevertheless would not act as a peer, ib. was instrumental to Littleton's rise, 228. his trial before the lords,
87. bill of attainder passed against him by the commons, 91, 93. those who voted against it placarded as Straffordians, or enemies to their country, ib. the king willing that he should be exiled or imprisoned for life, but declares he could not give his assent to an act of parliament impeaching him of treason, 96, 97. Mr. Hyde in vain endeavours to dissuade the earl of Essex from voting against him for treason, ib. the bill against him delayed in the house of lords, ib. two accidents contributed to its passing, ib. viz. a correspondence between the court and certain officers in the army, ib. and the death of the earl of Bedford, 101. endeavours made to dissuade the king from declaring before parliament that he could not sign the bill condemning the earl for treason, 102. lord Say promised to screen him, and why, ib. the house of lords pass the bill against him, intimidated by the mob, 103. he advises the king to pass the bill, ib. who signs it by commission, ib. the earl beheaded, ib. his magnanimous behaviour at [the block, 103. his character, 104. sir P. Stapleton one of those who took part against him, 119. treated with civility at his trial by Jeffery Palmer, 126. the duke of Richmond vehemently opposed his attainder, 164. recommended the earl of Leicester as his successor in Ireland, 354. the marquis of Hertford did not concur in his prosecution, 369. the earl of Southampton, though not his friend, opposed the violent proceedings against him, 370. he obtained a peerage for lord Seymour, being his great friend, 371. why lord Falkland was so severe against him, 431. Mr. Pym accused of acting with personal animosity against him at his trial, 475.
- Straffordians, or enemies to their country, those so called who voted against the bill for the earl of Strafford's attainder, 93.
- Straghan, colonel, sent against the marquis of Mountrose, 741. routs him, ib. (see Straughan.)
- Strange, James Stanley, lord, afterwards seventh earl of Derby, succeeds as earl of Derby, 302. accused of high treason by the commons, 304. undertook to reduce Manchester, ib. and to suppress all commotions in Lancashire and Cheshire, 347. his ill success and want of conduct, 348, 476, 480. retired to the Isle of Man at the end of the war, 760. meets Charles II. in Lancashire, 761. is sent by him to raise forces, ib. his ill success at Wigan, 762. wounded, ib. taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester, 766. executed, 763, 766. his character, ib.
- Strangeways, sir John, 85. one of the commissioners for the associated county of Dorset, 546.

 Stratton, the earl of Stamford beaten near there, 398.
 Straghan, captain, 269. (see Straghan.)
 Streater, colonel, 892.
 Strickland, — the parliament's agent in Holland, 326, 705.
 Strickland, sir Robert, 662.
 Strode, sir George, wounded at the battle of Edge-hill, 311.
 Strode, or Stroud, William, 76, 126. one of those ephori who most avowed curbing and suppressing of majesty, 58. one of the committee of the commons appointed to sit during their recess, 117. moved that the committee for drawing up a remonstrance might be revived, 121. one of the five members of the commons accused of high treason by order of the king, 143. farther particulars relative to the charge, ib. 144, 148, 150, 152, 153, 156, 158, 167, 174, 178, 179, 185, 187, 193, 195, 218, 221, 241, 256, 282. his evil character, 151. his part in military affairs, 313, 401.
 Sturghon, John, signed the anabaptists' address to Charles II, 855.
 Sudely castle surrendered to sir W. Waller, 486.
 Suffolk, Theophilus Howard, first earl of, had been lord treasurer, 20, 504.
 Suffolk, James Howard, third earl of, 504. one of the few lords who attended parliament, 467.
 Sunderland, earl of, (see lord Scroop.)
 Sunderland, earl of, (see lord Spencer.)
 Sura, 295.
 Sussex, earl of, (see lord Savile.)
 Sutherland, (see Southerland.)
 Swassenburgh, count of, archduke Leopold's ambassador at Madrid, 750. who is obliged to dismiss him, though he loved him of all the world, 834.
 Sweden, 51.
 Syme, — 549.
 Synderoom, — 858. his design against Cromwell, 861. his death, ib.

T.

Tacitus, 325.
 Taffe, Theobald viscount, afterwards earl of Carlingford, 353.
 Tarah, lord, 836.
 Taunton taken by the marquis of Hertford, 400.
 Temper of both houses of parliament, 1640, 73. of the city of London 1643, 149. of the army and court at Oxford upon the king's return thither, 1643, 434. of the army and court 1644, 511. of the city 1647, 616. of the nation 1648, 641. of Charles II.'s friends 1658, 849.
 Tewkesbury and Hereford taken by sir W. Waller, both which he presently left, 352.

Thelwell, colonel, 489, 509.
 Theodosius, (see prince of Portugal.)
 Thomas, — signed the anabaptists' address to Charles II, 855.
 Thomas, Prince, 847.
 Thornhill, colonel, 555.
 Throgmorton, sir William, severely wounded in the fight at Wigan, 762, 763. escapes into Holland, ib.
 Thurlow, John, secretary to Cromwell, 829, 851, 869.
 Tichborne, sir Henry, notice of, 355. made a lord justice in Ireland, ib. 465.
 Tichburn, — 880.
 Tildesley, sir Thomas, goes to Monro, 661. killed in the fight at Wigan, 762. his character, 763.
 Times, felicity of the, before the long parliament, notwithstanding some invasions on the subject, 30. compared with the times of queen Elizabeth, ib. and of king James, ib.
 Titchfield, a seat of the earl of Southampton's, 624.
 Titus, captain, 759.
 Tomkins, — a design discovered in London, by which he, Mr. Waller, and others, meant to benefit the king, 389. the real project, 390. a vow and covenant taken by parliament on its discovery, 392. and throughout the city and army, 393. he and Mr. Chaloner tried and executed, ib.
 Tomlinson, colonel, Charles I. committed to his custody at St. James's, 695.
 Tonnage and poundage, origin and custom of, 105. a new act of parliament respecting, ib. 106.
 Topping, lieutenant colonel, killed in the second battle of Newbury, 509.
 Torre, don Diego de la, Spanish envoy in Ireland, 735.
 Torrington, sir J. Digby routs the parliament forces there, 425.
 Tassitur, fortified by prince Rupert, 447.
 Tower of London, sir W. Balfour dismissed by Charles I. from being its lieutenant, 133. colonel Lunford put in his place, ib. who resigns, and sir J. Byron is appointed, ib. the interference of the house of commons respecting it, 150, 154, 160, 168. the king is prevailed upon by them to remove sir J. Byron, and appoint sir J. Coniers to the lieutenancy, ib. 427. the custody of the Tower committed by parliament to the lord mayor Pennington, ib.
 Towers, John, bishop of Peterborough, one of the bishops who signed the protestation against their constrained absence from the house of lords, 141.
 Townsend, sir Horatio, 886. a design of surprising Lynne by him and lord Willoughby of Parham, 868. both of them apprehended, 871. one of the committee sent by parliament to wait on Charles II. at the Hague, 908.

Trajan, emperor, 295.
 Traquair, John Stuart, first earl of, high treasurer of Scotland, 50, 714. the only layman consulted by abp. Laud about introducing the English liturgy into Scotland, 44.
 Treaty of pacification entered upon, and concluded with Scotland, 1639, 50. a treaty appointed at Rippon, 62. adjourned to London, 65. a treaty between the two parties in Devon and Cornwall, 344. the parliament agrees with the king that there should be a treaty at Oxford, upon proposals for a cessation, 356, 357, 358, 366. which comes to nothing, ib. the sum of the demands and concessions of both sides upon the first article of the treaty, 376, 377, 378. the treaty expires, 380. substance of the treaty between the English commissioners and the Scots, 443. particulars of the treaty at Uxbridge, 520. a treaty between the king and the Scots set on foot by the interposition of France, 590. the commissioners of Scotland's private treaty with the king at Hampton-court, 634. which was renewed and signed by him in the Isle of Wight, ib. the substance of it, 635. particulars of the treaty at Newport, 677. a treaty signed April 1657, between Spain and Charles II, 835. particulars of a treaty between France and Spain, 873. an account of the close of it in respect of Portugal and the prince of Condé, 874. (see Peace.)
 Tredagh taken by storm by Cromwell, after a brave defence, 736.
 Trelawney, — why unjustly expelled the house of commons and imprisoned, 180.
 Tremouille, duke de, 766.
 Trevannion, colonel John, 343. undertakes with others to raise volunteers for Charles I. in Cornwall, 342. assisted sir Ralph Hopton to become master of that county, 372. his part in the battle near Stratton, 397. and in the siege of Bristol, 408. where he was killed, ib. notice of him, 409.
 Trevannions, the, 609.
 Trevor, Thomas, baron, 441, 453.
 Trial of the earl of Strafford, 87. of Mr. Tomkins and Mr. Chaloner, 393. of abp. Laud, 519. of king Charles I, 695. of duke Hamilton, the earls of Holland and Norwich, lord Capel, and sir J. Owen, 700, 701. of Mr. Mordaunt, sir H. Slingsby, and Dr. Hewet, 850.
 Tullibardine, William Murray, second earl of, 22.
 Tumult about Lambeth-house, 58. about the house of peers, 102. about Whitehall, ib. great tumults about the house of peers, 134. the tumults increase about Whitehall and Westminster, 135. Cromwell suppresses a tumult of levellers, 628.
 Tunis, Cromwell's fleet under Blake enters the harbour of, and burns their fleet, 834.

 Turenne, marshal, 782, 815. escaped into Flanders, when some of his party were imprisoned by cardinal Mazarine, 731, 732. receives the duke of York who joined his army with all respect, 778. the Spaniards at Dunkirk forewarned by the prince of Condé of what plan of operations he would adopt against them, 859. observation on him and the prince of Condé, ib. he defeats the Spaniards at Dunkirk, 860. offers assistance to the duke of York in any reasonable enterprise in England, 872.
 Turenne, madam, 863.
 Tyrenes, Anthony, 460.

V.

Vall-Periso, marquis de, one of the Spanish council of state, 733. notice of him, 734. had a great detestation of the English rebels, ib.
 Vandruske, — 543, 547.
 Vane, sir Henry, 54, 56, 72, 78, 104, 282, 375, 432. notice of him, 49. made secretary in the room of sir J. Coke, through the queen and the marquis Hamilton, 51. his declaration concerning the proposed supply in the house of commons, 56. misrepresents the proceedings to the king, ib. what his motives might be, ib. an implacable enemy to the earl of Strafford, 375. one of the council of state, 60. one of the counsellors about the king at York, 64. his part in the earl of Strafford's trial, 89, 90, 91. one of the committee of the house of commons to sit during the recess, 117. why he gave himself up to the factious party, 129. deprived of the secretaryship, ib. notice of his character and conduct, 375. he died despised by his son, who had been his chief conductor to destruction, 376.
 Vane, sir Henry, the younger, 75, 532, 880. his character, education, and early life, 75, 442. the mischiefs he did in New England, 75. what circumstance made him join the factious party, ib. his part in the earl of Strafford's trial, 91, 92. was for root and branch as it was termed, 94. his father died condemned by him, to whose destruction he was the chief conductor, 376. one of the commissioners sent by parliament into Scotland for relief, 410. chiefly instrumental in establishing the covenant between England and Scotland in favour of presbyterianism, 442, 443. his object, 443. one of the committee who attended the earl of Manchester's army, 481. hated of all men by the earl of Essex, 495. lord Roberts in great conjunction with him, ib. the Scotch commissioners jealous of him, 515. he and Cromwell were leaders of the independents, ib. 590. takes care to have men of his own principles put into the government of the city of London, 515. his speech proposing the self-denying ordinance, 516. one of the parliament commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520. he, Saint-John, and Pridesaux acted as spies on the rest, 527. withdraws with the speaker of the commons to the army, 618. the marquis of Argyle made a fast friendship with him and Cromwell, 642. being a commissioner in the personal treaty at Newport, he uses all his arts to obstruct and delay it, 666. the only one that did not desire a peace, 677. his speech upon the commissioners' report, 688. thinks Cromwell's power too much, 792. reproached by him with a breach of faith and corruption, 793. his conduct upon Cromwell's violent dissolution of parliament, 799. readmitted into parliament by virtue of a clause in the humble petition's advice, 843. he and Hasle-rig govern the parliament, 1659, 879. farther notice of him and his views, 880. Lawson one of his dependents, 884. confined to his house by parliament for having concurred with the committee of safety, 885.

 Van Trump, his fleet worsted by Blake, 785. comes to sea with another fleet, 797. is beaten and slain, ib.
 Varney, — (see Verney.)
 Vavasour, sir Charles, 477.
 Vavasour, sir William, taken prisoner at the battle of Edge-hill, 311. commanded the forces in South Wales, 417. assisted at the siege of Gloucester, ib.
 Vaughan, baron, (see earl of Carbery.)
 Vaughan, sir George, wounded in the battle of Lansdown, 404.
 Udall, sir William, one of those who carried the king's message of peace to parliament, 292.
 Venables, general, commanded the land army sent by Cromwell with Pen's fleet, 832, 833. unsuccessful at Hispaniola, ib. succeeds at Jamaica, 834. he and Pen committed to the Tower by Cromwell, ib.
 Venn, captain, 136, 334. one of the committee of the house of commons appointed to sit during the recess, 117. was member for the city of London, 136. led those men that went tumultuously to Westminster and Whitehall, at the time that the bill against the earl of Strafford was debated, ib.
 Vere, Horatio lord, 57, 504, 696, 882.
 Vere, lady, two of the children of Charles I. intrusted to her care by parliament, 615. removed from her and placed with the earl of Northumberland, 616.

Vere, Anne, married sir T. Fairfax, 696. (see lady Fairfax.)
 Vere, Susan, married the earl of Montgomery and Pembroke, 24.
 Verney, or Varney, sir Edmund, or Edward, knight marshal, Charles I.'s standard-bearer at Nottingham, 289. bore the standard at the battle of Edge-hill, 307, 310. where he was killed, ib. 309. notice of him, 310, 311.
 Vic, sir Henry de, the king's resident at Brussels, 756, 847.
 Vieu Ville, marquis of, fell in the conflict at Awborne Chase, serving as a volunteer to Charles I. having attended the queen out of Holland, 428.
 Villa Magna, marquis of, 732.
 Villiers, family of, its extraction, 4.
 Villiers, Edward, carried Charles I.'s despatches to the fleet, 271, 284.
 Villiers, lord Francis, notice of, 642. he, with his brother the duke of Bucks, and others, rise for Charles II, ib. at Kingston, 663. he is killed there, ib.
 Villiers, sir George, father of the great duke of Buckingham, notice of his marriages and offspring, 4. anecdote of the appearance of his ghost, predicting his son's death, 17.
 Villiers, George, (see duke of Buckingham.)
 Vines, — notice of him, 523. one of the parliament commissioners in ecclesiastical matters to treat at Uxbridge, ib.
 Viole, president, 876.
 Virginia delivered up to the parliament forces, 1653, 788.
 Universities, the two, contribute their money and plate to Charles I, 301.
 Vote, passed in the house of commons against the court of York, 96. concurred in by the lords, ib. three hundred thousand pounds voted to the Scotch army for a gratuity besides their monthly allowance, 106. votes of both houses concerning the militia, 176, 182. the king's answer to the parliament's declaration and votes concerning Hull, 205. the votes at which the king took exception, 204. the votes of both houses for raising an army, 274. for procuring money, 301. the commons vote a new broad seal, the lords concurred with them, 453. vote of no more addresses to the king, 630. seconded by a declaration, ib. the vote of no more addresses repealed, 666. the parliament's votes upon the king's propositions offered at the treaty of Newport, 683. votes of the commons upon the king's being removed from Carisbrook castle to Hurst castle, 689. vote, "that the king's answer was a ground for peace," ib. many members being seized by the soldiers, the - remaining members vote the contrary to former votes, ib. vote, "that those who were absent at the negative vote should sit no more in the house," 690. vote of no more addresses renewed, ib. the protestation of the secluded members voted against by both houses, ib. votes of the house of commons for settling the government, ib. vote against the office of kingship, 699. votes of the parliament upon the address of a new council of officers to the protector Richard, 865. they pass a vote to have no more general officers, 879.

- Vow, (see Covenant.)
- Vowel, — tried before a high court of justice for holding correspondence with Charles Stuart, 798. condemned, ib. executed at Charing-cross, ib. his magnanimous behaviour, ib.
- Urban VIII. pope, 7.
- Urry, colonel, sir William, 510. having served in the parliament army at the battle of Edge-hill, he goes over to the king, finding himself not so well regarded as he expected, 394. and undertakes to guide prince Rupert to the enemy's quarters, ib. knighted by the king for his success, 395. notice of him, ib. deserts back again to the parliament, and discovers all he knew of the king's army, 508. being taken among the marquis of Mountrose's officers he is executed, 742. palliation of his tergiversations, 510.
- Usher, colonel, killed in the siege of Litchfield cathedral, 384.
- Usher, James, archbishop of Armagh, 438.
- Uxbridge, particulars of the treaty of, 520—530. without effect, ib. (see Charles I. or Parliament.)
- W.
- Wagstaffe, colonel, sir Joseph, 572. wounded at the siege of Litchfield cathedral, 384. assisted at the siege of Bristol, 408. sent to Taunton, 545. attends the earl of Rochester into England to aid any rising in favour of Charles II, 823. goes into the west for that purpose, 824. notice of him, ib. assists at the raising of Salisbury, ib. dissuaded from hanging the parliament judges, which were in the town, 825. perhaps injudicially, ib. escaped abroad again upon failure of this enterprise, ib.
- Wainman, captain Samuel, notice of, 503. killed in the pursuit of Balfour, ib.
- Wainman, (Wenman,) Thomas lord, one of the parliament commissioners to treat at Uxbridge, 520.
- Wake, Baldwin, 584.
- Wake, captain, by the king's command refuses to obey the earl of Warwick as admiral, 272.
- Wales, prince of, (see Charles I. and II.)
- Walker, Clement, one of the prosecutors of colonel Fiennes, 454.
- Walker, sir Edward, garter king at arms, and secretary to the council of war, 490. removed from Charles II. when in Scotland, 747.
- Waller, — 422. a design discovered in London by which he, Mr. Tomkins, and others, meant to benefit the king, 389. the real project, 390. a vow and covenant taken by parliament on its discovery, 392. and throughout the city and army, 393. he is banished in consequence, 394.
- Waller, sir Hardress, 354, 574.
- Waller, sir William, 297, 308, 356, 382, 401, 407, 417, 419, 422, 427, 429, 434, 441, 454, 466, 476, 477, 478, 479, 481, 483, 485, 486, 489, 490, 494, 498, 501, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 513, 515, 531, 540, 543, 544, 545, 551, 554, 613. sent by the parliament against Portsmouth, 285, 287. takes Chichester, 340. surprises and routs lord Herbert's little army, 352. takes Hereford and Tewkesbury, both which he presently left, ib. takes Hereford, 382. comes before Worcester, and is repulsed, ib. sent into the west, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403. some account of him, 401. called by his party William the Conqueror, ib. worsted at the battle of Lansdown, 403. his farther movements, 404, 405. routed at Roundway-down, 406. an enmity in consequence between him and the earl of Essex, ib. made governor of the forces and militia in London, 419. retakes Arundel castle, which had been taken by lord Hopton, 479. has the advantage over him at the battle of Alresford, ib. his movements against Abingdon and Oxford, 483—485. marches towards Worcester after the king, 486, 488. worsted in the fight at Cropredy bridge, 489. his part in the second battle of Newbury, 508. opposed the self-denying ordinance, 533. deprived of his commission by it, 540, 542, 546. one of the leading men in the house of commons, 616. his being made lord lieutenant of Ireland opposed by Cromwell, 641, 723. imprisoned by the commons, 690. one of those who conferred at Northumberland house about the restoration of Charles II, 894.
- Walsh, sir Robert, lord Colepepper's quarrel with, 671.
- Walsingham, — 806.
- Walton, — one of the seven commissioners appointed by parliament to govern the army, 879. he, Haslerig, and Morley go to Portsmouth, which declares for the parliament against the army, 881.
- War with Spain, why declared by parliament, 9. war declared with France, 11. war with France and Spain prejudicial to England, 16.
- the levying of war in England, from what day to be dated, 153. origin of the Dutch war with the English republic, 785.
- Warbeck, Perkin, 238, 253.
- Wards, court of, odious to the nobility and gentry, although an unquestionable regal right, 61.
- Ware, colonel, 399.
- Ware, sir James, 465.
- Warneford, — 340.
- Warren, Henry, notice of, 882.
- Warwick, Robert Rich, second earl of, 111, 269, 270, 271, 275, 276, 305, 380, 541, 646, 650, 657. a great patron of the puritans, 73. yet shewed no aversion from episcopacy, 94. concurred in the prosecution of archbishop Laud and the earl of Strafford, 74. sworn a privy counsellor, 78. made warden of the cinque ports, 109, 110. one of the committee of the house of lords to sit during the recess, 117. appointed vice-admiral of the fleet without the king's consent, 192. ordered by the parliament to transport the magazine from Hull to London, 197. appointed by the parliament lord high admiral, upon the king's revocation of the earl of Northumberland's commission, 272. appointed to command an army, but gave up his commission upon the parliament's after-resolution that the earl of Essex should be the only general, 321. his character, 374. attempts with his fleet the relief of Exeter, but does not succeed, 424. his patent of lord high admiral, the first thing sealed with the parliament's new broad seal, 453. one of the few peers who attended parliament, 1643, 467. has great influence in Essex, 480. one of those recommended to the king to be intrusted with the power of the militia for a certain time, 530. his cruel treatment of Irish captives, 539. he and the earl of Manchester were the two pillars of the presbyterian party, 618. they and others withdraw from the parliament to the army, ib. promised to aid the earl of Holland in his rising in favour of Charles II, 642. and why, 646. the parliament prepare a fleet under him against the revolted fleet, 657. the prince of Wales writes to him, ib. his answer, ib. the prince went to sea towards Holland, after having attempted to fight him, ib. he follows him, ib. comes upon the coast of Holland, 672. unable to save the life of his brother, the earl of Holland, 702. his part in the inauguration of Cromwell as protector, 841. his death, 861. much lamented by Cromwell, who was his fast friend, ib.
- Warwick, Charles Rich, fourth earl of, one of the committee sent by parliament to wait on Charles II. at the Hague, 908.

- Washington, colonel, his part in the siege of Bristol, 408.
- Watches, the house of lords direct a writ to be issued out to appoint them, 135. the commons discharge them, ib.
- Watson, — 626, 630.
- Web, — 518.
- Web, colonel William, 501, 502. (as major general) 574, 585.
- Weemes, or Wemmes, — much obliged by Charles I, 489. yet sides with the parliament, ib. taken prisoner in the fight at Cropredy bridge, ib. commanded the artillery in the Scotch army of Charles II, 759. was a confessed good officer, ib.
- Wenman, (see Wainman.)
- Wentworth, — 248.
- Wentworth, George, 465.
- Wentworth, colonel Henry, 305.
- Wentworth, Thomas lord, 570, 571, 572, 574, 776. sent by lord Goring to the prince of Wales with certain demands, 566. which he is persuaded not to deliver, ib. not willing to give up the command devolved to him by lord Goring, 573, 574, 581. his horse beaten at Ashburton, 576. appointed to command the horse, lord Hopton being made general of the remains of the western army, 581, 582. he submits to this charge, contrary to expectation, ib. sent with others from France by the queen to convey the prince of Wales thither from Jersey, 599, 603. how far concerned in the factions in the prince's fleet, 655. resolved to attend Charles II. into Scotland, 738. had the command of the regiment of guards raised by the king from his subjects in Flanders, 845.
- Wentworth, (see earl of Strafford.)
- West, Charles I.'s affairs there, 397, 423, 447. state of the western counties when the prince of Wales went to Bristol, 543. the affairs of the west about the time of the battle of Naseby, 554, 581. designs in the west upon Plymouth and Exeter in favour of Charles II, 869.
- Westfield, Thomas, made bishop of Bristol, 121.
- Westminster, tumults about, 102, 134, 135. distractions there upon notice of the army's coming towards London, 612.
- Westmoreland, Mildmay Fane, second earl of, one of those who signed the declaration that Charles I. had no intentions of war, 262.
- Weston, sir Richard, afterwards made earl of Portland, 19, 105. advised the dissolution of the third parliament of Charles I, 3. to escape impeachment, ib. what effect the public odium had upon him, ib. why such advice was not to have been expected from him, ib. made lord treasurer through the duke of Buckingham, 19, 20. whom he so much disoblged, that he probably would have been removed from that post had the duke lived, 19. his rise, ib. first sent as ambassador into Flanders, 20. his character, ib. suspected of favouring the Roman religion, 21. yet never trusted by the catholics, ib. against whom he enforced the penal laws, ib. his debts twice paid by the king, ib. who also gave him Chute forest in Hampshire, ib. a ridiculous anecdote respecting him and Mr. Caesar, 21. honours conferred upon him, 22. why the earl of Holland made continual war upon him, 26, 60. tries in vain to undermine archbishop Laud's influence with the king, 40. his death, 22, 40.
- Weymouth surrendered to the king's forces, 424. delivered to the earl of Essex, 488. surprised by the king's party, 527. lost again through lord Goring's neglect, 530, 543.
- Whaley, colonel, notice of his rough nature, 624. commanded the guards who had the custody of the king at Hampton-court, ib. opposed Cromwell's being made king, 838. he, Ingoldsbay, and Goffe advise the protector Richard not to dissolve the parliament, and promise to support him against the new council of officers, 866. are imprisoned by that council in consequence, ib.
- Wharton, Philip lord, 212, 353, 686. one of the commissioners to treat with the Scots at Rippon, 63. concurred in the prosecution of archbishop Laud and the earl of Strafford, 74. one of the committee of the house of lords to sit during the recess, 117. was at the battle of Edge-hill, 307. carried the intelligence of it to the house of lords, 313. one of the few lords who attended parliament, 1643, 467.
- Wharton, sir Thomas, 463.
- Wheeler, — intruded himself about the prince of Wales, 557. accused of beastliness, ib. forbid to come to court, ib. his accusation of sir H. Windham, 558. how settled, ib. how far the chancellor was concerned in these affairs, ib.
- Whetcomb, Tristram, 178, 185, 220.
- Whetham, colonel, governor of Portsmouth, received Haslerig, Walton, and Morley there, 881. and declared for the parliament against the army, ib.
- Whitaker, Laurence, 71.
- Whitchot, colonel, governor of Windsor castle, would not allow king Charles to be buried according to the form of the Common Prayer Book, 698.
- White, — a grave lawyer, notoriously disaffected to the church, 80. chairman of the committee of the commons about religion, ib.
- White, — servant to Charles I, 330.
- White, (see Whyte.)
- Whitehead, colonel, present with the parliament troops at the siege of Basing-house, 501.
- Whitford, colonel, one of the marquis of Mountrose's officers, 742. why not executed with the rest, ib. had joined in the murder of Charles I, ib.
- Whitlock, Bulstrode, one of the parliament commissioners to treat with the king at Oxford, 356, 366. and to treat at Uxbridge, 520. reason for his adhering to the parliament, 529. was in favour of the self-denying ordinance, 532. his part in the inauguration of Cromwell as protector, 841. the committee of safety make him keeper of their great seal, 881.
- Wibrant, Daniel, 460.
- Wichwyck, sir Peter, controller of the king's household, one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 263. had been ambassador at Constantinople, 371. notice of him, 372. died very shortly after the treaty at Oxford, ib.
- Widrigton, (see Withrington.)
- Wight, Isle of, (see Newport.)
- Wild, sergeant, the parliament request of the king to make him chief baron of the exchequer, 338. one of the commissioners to whom the parliament intrusted their new broad seal, 453. he chiefly having averred their legal power to make one, ib. made chief baron of the exchequer by the parliament, 629. presided at the trial of captain Burly, condemned for stirring up the people of the Isle of Wight in favour of Charles I, ib. his instructions to the grand jury to acquit Rolph, charged with a design on the king's life, 687, 688.
- Wildman, John, a leveller, an account of, 801. signed the anabaptists' address to Charles II, 855.
- Wilks, colonel, one of the commissioners appointed by Monk to treat with the officers of the army at London, 881. imprisoned by him for having consented to something contrary to his instructions, 883.
- William of Wickham, founder of New college, Oxford, 375.
- Williams, John, bishop of Lincoln, afterwards archbishop of York, 3, 5, 117, 135. unfit for the keepership of the great seal, 19. removed however from it owing to the displeasure of the duke of Buckingham, ib. takes the lead against archbishop Laud's alterations with respect to the communion-table and other ecclesiastical matters, 39, 138. observation respecting his treatise, Holy Altar, name and thing, 39. proposes in the house of lords, that the bishops might be excused from attending the earl of Strafford's trial, 87, 140. his ingnomious advice to the king to sign the bill condemning the earl for treason, ib. would probably have been murdered by the mob about the house of peers, if he had not been rescued, 135, 140. an unfavourable account of him, 138. notice of his imprisonment by the star-chamber, ib. censure of certain points of his conduct, 139. his insolent conduct after he was made archbishop of York, 140. the bill against the bishops received in the commons out of hatred to him, ib. he advises the bishops to protest against the legality of the proceedings of the house of lords during their constrained absence, ib. copy of the protest drawn up by him, ib.

Williamson, don Henrique, afterwards called Rosewell, the resident of Denmark at Madrid, notice of, 731.

Willis, sir Richard, governor of Newark, 579. why the king resolved to remove him from this charge, ib. his resistance to this intention, 580. ordered by the king never to come into his presence again in consequence of his behaviour, ib. a petition and remonstrance in his favour by several officers, ib. discovery of his treachery in betraying the plans for the restoration of Charles II., 869. his character, ib.

Willoughby, Francis, 465.

Willoughby, Mountague Bertie, lord, afterwards second earl of Lindsey, 698. one of those who signed the declaration that the king had no intentions of war, 262. commanded the king's guards in the battle of Edge-hill, 307. taken prisoner in endeavouring to rescue his father, 309, 311. (as earl of Lindsey,) was at the battle of Naseby, 553. one of those the king desired of parliament might attend him in the Isle of Wight, 666. present at his funeral, 698.

Willoughby of Parham, Francis lord, 673. executes the ordinance of the militia in Lincolnshire, 273. one of the few lords who attended parliament, 1643, 467. was of great esteem amongst the presbyterians, though not tainted with their principles, 649. left the parliament and went to Holland, ib. appointed by the duke of York his vice-admiral, ib. retained the post out of duty to the king against his inclination, 674. succeeded by prince Rupert, 667. a design of surprising Lynne by him and sir H. Townsends, 868. both apprehended before they effected it, 871.

Wilmot, Henry, afterwards lord and subsequently earl of Rochester, 88, 283, 289, 382, 772, 780. taken prisoner in the rout at Newburn, 63. restored to the king by the Scotch commissioners, 64. very indebted towards the earl of Straf-ford, ib. how far concerned in the correspondence between the court and the army, 107, 116, 220. want of courage imputed to him, 289, 434. wounded in the rencounter near Worcester, 299. commanded the left wing of horse at the battle of Edge-hill, 307, 308. prince Rupert irreconcilably prejudiced against him, 407, 482. was not fast in the king's favour, 407. and why, 495. made lieutenant general, 322. takes Marlborough, which had been garrisoned by the parliament, 322, 323. route sir W. Waller at Roundway-down, 406, 407. retires to Oxford to attend the king, ib. much consulted by the king on military affairs, 482. his character, ib. 495, 512. loved debauchery, ib. his hostility against the secretary of state and master of the rolls, (lord Digby and sir J. Colepepper,) 488. charged with ill-humour and negligence in not beating up the enemy's quarters, 483. advises that the king should march towards London, 488. why he urged peace, 495. arrested for high treason, 496. against the wishes of the army, ib. upon lord Goring's being put in command over him, he obtains leave to retire into France, ib. sent with others from France by the queen, to bring the prince of Wales thither out of France, 599. how far concerned in the factions in the prince of Wales's fleet, 655. resolved to attend Charles II. into Scotland, 738. assists him to escape out of England after the battle of Worcester, 768, 769, 770, 771. one of the king's new council, 776. solicits the king to make him an earl, 783. who makes him earl of Rochester, and sends him to the diet at Ratisbon, 803. his return, 816. obtains leave of the king to go into England to aid a rising in his favour, 823. he designs for the north, 824. his ill success, 826. an accident that befell him in his return to London, ib. deceived by Manning, 827, 828. has the command of one of the four regiments raised by the king from his subjects in Flanders, 845.

Wimbleton, Edward Cecil, viscount, murmurs against him for the failure at Cadiz, 16. had been a soldier in Holland, ib.

Winchester taken by Cromwell, 588.

Winchester, John Paulet, fifth marquiss, of, commanded a garrison in Baing-house, his seat, 501. relieved from a siege by colonel Gage, ib. again besieged and relieved, 511.

Winchester, Honora de Burgh, marchioness of, 501.

Windebank, (Winnebank,) Christopher, son of sir Francis, bred at Magdalen college, Oxford, 733.

sent into Spain, ib. reduced to poverty by marriage, ib. changed his religion, ib. useful to Charles II.'s ambassadors there, ib.

Windebank, sir Francis, secretary of state, 85, 90, 128. one of the committee of state, 60. being accused by the house of commons, withdrew beyond sea, 71. anecdote concerning him and a priest, 72.

Windham, colonel Edmund, 345, 556. accompanied the marquiss of Hertford into the west, 287. high sheriff of Somersetshire, 400. made governor of Bridgewater, ib. notice of him, ib. 506. the blockade of Taunton intrusted to him, ib. 543. which he is forced to raise, ib. 556. particulars of his design of being made secretary of state, 721. the king chiefly diverted from appointing him by lord Cottington's ingenious story, ib.

Windham, colonel Francis, prevailed on Mr. Lutterell, owner of Dunstar castle, to deliver it up to the king, 400. is made governor of it, ib. which he surrendered upon fair conditions at the end of the war, 770. notice of him, ib. assisted Charles II. in his escape out of England after the battle of Worcester, 770, 771.

Windham, sir Hugh, concerned in the complaint against Wheeler, 557, 558.

Windham, Mrs., Charles II.'s nurse, 546. diverted him from business, and prejudiced him against his council, ib. her object, ib.

Wingate, captain, member of the house of commons, taken prisoner in the rencounter near Worcester, 299.

Winnelank, (see Windebank.)

Winnif, Thomas, made bishop of Lincoln, 121.

Winter, John, 157.

Wise, — mayor of Gloucester, 416.

Wishart, Dr., 709.

Wit, (see De Wit.)

Withrington, William, lord, goes with the earl of Derby to support Charles II.'s cause in Derbyshire, 761. killed in the fight at Wigan, 763. his character, ib. had been a member of the house of commons, ib. had quitted the kingdom with the marquiss of Newcastle, ib. and had returned to Scotland with Charles II., ib.

Withrington, sir Thomas, speaker of the house of commons, 1657, 840. his part in the inauguration of Cromwell as protector, 841.

Wogan, captain, was, when a youth, engaged in the parliament service, 804. and was greatly in Ireton's friendship, ib. joined the marquiss of Ormond in support of the king's cause in Ireland, ib. joins Middleton in his scheme for the king in Scotland, ib. where he died in consequence of a wound, 805.

Wolfelte, Cornificus, ambassador ex-

- traordinary from Denmark at the Hague, encourages the marquis of Mountrose to go to Denmark for aid to the royal cause, 716, 739. cause of his subsequent ruin, 716.
- Wolsey, cardinal, 90.
- Wood, sir Henry, the queen's treasurer, 778.
- Worcester, a rencounter near there, wherein prince Rupert gets the better, 299. which proved of great advantage to the king, ib. sir W. Waller comes before it, but is repulsed, 383. Charles II. defeated there by Cromwell, 764, 765.
- Worcester, Henry Somerset, first marquis of, 351. generally reputed the greatest monied man in the kingdom, ib. why perhaps disposed to lend to the king, ib. garrisoned his house, Ragland-castle, 652. the king makes a short stay with him, ib. bravely defended it against Fairfax, 609. and surrendered on honourable conditions, ib.
- Worcester, second marquis of, (see lord Herbert.)
- Worrington, by Launceston in Devon, granted by Charles I. to sir Rd. Greenvil, 560.
- Wren, Matthew, bishop of Norwich, and afterwards of Ely, notice of him, 42. the Scotch liturgy and canons when framed were to be submitted to him, abp. Land, and bp. Juxon, ib. 44. complaints against him, 82. one of the bishops who signed the protestation against their constrained absence from the house of lords, 141. proceeded passionately against the foreign artisans in the diocese of Norwich, to the injury of trade, 382.
- Wright, sir Benj., 726, 727. some account of, ib.
- Wright, Rt. bishop of Litchfield and Coventry, one of the bishops who signed the protestation against their constrained absence from the house of lords, 141.
- Wyat, sir Dudley, 584, 593, 596.
- Wych, (see Wich.)
- Wyndham, (see Windham.)
- Y.
- Yeomans, — alderman of Bristol, hanged for a correspondence with prince Rupert, 389.
- York, an occurrence there, which was a sad presage of subsequent misfortunes, 288. delivered up to the parliament forces, 492.
- York, court of, a vote passed in parliament against, 96.
- York, duke of, afterwards James II., 282, 513, 648, 720, 778, 789, 808, 811, 815, 847, 858, 859, 869, 877, 897. sent to Hull by Charles I. and well received by sir J. Hotham, 203. he and the prince of Wales in danger of being taken prisoners at the battle of Edgehill, 309. signed the letter sent by the house of lords at Oxford to the earl of Essex, 467. left by the king at Oxford, 485, 552. fell into the parliament's hands at the surrender of that place, 615, 620. and was committed to the care of the earl of Northumberland, ib. how treated by him, ib. the king's conversation with him at Hampton-court by leave of parliament, ib. who recommended him, if possible, to escape to Holland, ib. whither he escapes in woman's apparel by the assistance of Bamfield, 645. well received by the princess royal of Orange, his sister, ib. sir J. Berkley made his governor in the absence of lord Byron, ib. goes to the English fleet at Helvoetsluys, 648. appoints lord Willoughby of Parham his vice-admiral, 649. sent to the Hague by the prince of Wales, ib. 659. his condition there, and the factions among his followers, 670. had been instigated by Bamfield to be possessed of the government of the fleet, but was convinced with much ado, that it was neither safe for him nor his father's service, 674. particulars respecting him left with the queen, 755. sir E. Herbert and sir G. Ratcliff have great interest with him, 756. they recommend to him the pattern of the duke of Lorraine, ib. goes to Brussels in order to visit the duke, ib. his two counsellors propose a match for him with the duke's bastard daughter, 757. he visits his sister at the Hague, ib. the factions in his family at Breda, 758. he returns to Paris to the queen, ib. the necessities and factions of his family, 776. urged to enter into the French service, ib. deliberations in the council whether he should enter, 777. the chancellor of the exchequer's opinion satisfactory to all parties, 778. he goes into the army, ib. received with every respect by marshal Turenne, ib. his governor, lord Byron, dies, 783. he is pleased with war, ib. sir J. Berkley designs mademoiselle de Longueville for his wife, ib. he was not averse from marriage, but would not act without the king's and queen's consent, ib. cardinal Mazarine gives him notice that he must quit the French service, 846. obtains of the king that sir H. Bennet should be sent envoy to Madrid, 847. leaves Paris, and goes to the king at Bruges, ib. charged several times on horseback at the battle of Dunkirk, 860. retired to Newport, ib. goes to Boulogne, 870. confers with Turenne, who offers assistance for any probable enterprise in England, 872. returns to Brussels, ib. the king of Spain offers to make him his admiral, 866, 878. which he accepts, 878, 885. as admiral he takes possession of the English fleet, which conveyed Charles II. to England, 909. ten thousand pounds sent him by the English parliament, ib.
- York, archbishop of, (see J. Williams.)
- Z.
- Zouch, Edward lord, 371.

II.

INDEX TO THE LIFE.

- ABBOT, Gen. archbishop of Canterbury, his behaviour, 932.
- Abbeville, 1250.
- Acts, first act of settlement, 1057. second act, 1058. third act, 1067. act of indemnity, ib. of uniformity, 1077. for liberty of conscience, ib.
- Adventurers in Ireland send a committee to the king, 1016. an account of them, ib. another class of adventurers appears, 1028. their answer to the demands of the Irish catholics, 1052.
- African company erected, 1102. a charter granted to them, ib.
- Albemarle, duke of, (see general Monk.)
- Alcala, university of, 984.
- Allen, cardinal, protects the English at Rome, 916. his kindness to Mr. Henry Hyde, ib.
- Antrim, marquis of, a statement of his case, 1064.
- Antwerp, 980, 985, 1007.
- Argyle, earl of, 1022, 1113. sent to the Tower, 1022. his character, ib. sent into Scotland to be tried, 1023. tried upon articles of treason and murder, is condemned and executed, 1110.
- Arlington, lord, (see sir H. Bennet.)
- Arminians, 928.
- Army, native and inclination of it on the king's return, 997.
- Arundel, earl of, earl marshal, thanks Mr. Hyde for his treatment of him, 935.
- Arundel, Richard, created lord Arundel of Trerice, 1133. the eminent services of him and his family, ib.
- Ashburnham, Mr., 948, 950, 965, 972, 1161. his friendship with sir John Colepepper, 940. invades the office of the chancellor of the exchequer, 965. his credit with the king, 971. the king's character of him, 972.
- Ashley, lord, commissioner of appeals, 1127. obtains a grant appointing him treasurer of prize-money, 1128. favours the bill for liberty of conscience, 1129. speaks for it in the house of lords, 1130. supports the bill for the preventing the importation of Irish cattle, 1200.
- Avignon, 1251, 1255.
- Aylesbury, sir Thomas, hart. master of requests to the king, 919. marries his daughter to Edward Hyde, ib.
- Ayliffe, sir George, marries his daughter to Edward Hyde, 918. she dies within six months, ib.
- Ayliffe, John, 948.
- Ayscue, sir George, much consulted by the duke of York, 1132.
- B.
- Bankers, a clamour raised against them, 1166. necessary to the king's affairs, ib. advantages arising from them in various ways, ib. the method of treating with them, ib.
- Barbadoes, lord Willoughby the governor, 1239.
- Basadouna, Pietro, the ambassador of Venice at Madrid, his character, 982.
- Batteville, the baron of, the Spanish ambassador, 1040. some account of him, ib. joins with the earl of Bristol in obstructing the king's marriage with the infanta of Portugal, 1041. causes to be printed all the memorials he had presented on that affair, 1043. for which he is ordered to leave the kingdom, ib.
- Baynard, Thomas, of Wanstrow, 915. marries Anne Hyde, ib.
- Beaufort, duke of, admiral of France, joins the French fleet at Brest, 1173.
- Benham, co. Berks, 915.
- Bennet, Mr., 987.
- Bennet, sir H., 1122. his character, 1094. ignorant of the constitution and laws of England, he still hoped to be able to govern it, 1095. his intrigues against the chancellor, 1096. an intrigue in the court to advance him, 1100. made secretary of state in the room of secretary Nicholas, 1101. cajoles sir R. Paston, who moves for a supply to the amount of two millions and an half, 1121. favourable to the bill for liberty of conscience, 1129. is created lord Arlington, 1133. joins with sir W. Coventry against the treasurer, 1165. laments to the chancellor the king's course of life, 1191. the chancellor repeats the conversation to the king, who had just entered the room, ib. lord Arlington puts it off with raillery, 1191.
- Bergen, a particular account of the attempt upon the Dutch there, 1147. the ill success of it, 1665. lord Sandwich refuses to allow a second attempt, 1149. lord Clarendon's reflection on this affair, ib.
- Berkley, sir Charles, traduces the duchess of York's reputation, 1011. soon confesses the falsehood of the charge, 1013. begs pardon of the duchess, 1014. makes professions also to the chancellor, ib. is made privy purse, 1101. caresses and amuses sir R. Paston, 1127. is created earl of Falmouth, 1133. is killed in the first engagement with the Dutch, 1140.
- Beverley, 952, 953, 954.
- Bewett, Mr., of great weight in Holland, 1175. his character, 1176. endeavours to bring about a peace, ib. enters into a correspondence with the English court with De Wit's consent, ib. suspects the sincerity of De Wit, 1177. and resolves to make peace in opposition to him, ib. settles a secret correspondence with the English court, ib. which is accidentally discovered by De Wit, 1178. his papers seized and ciphers detected, ib. he is executed, ib. all his friends obliged to fly, ib.
- Bishops, bill against them passed by the king, 942. the effect of this on the several parties, ib. new bishops appointed to vacant sees, 1047. a clamour raised against them and the clergy by their tenants, 1048. the injustice of it, ib. a bill passed for restoring them to their seats in parliament, 1070. some of them are against all alterations in the liturgy, 1074. others press earnestly both for alterations and additions, 1075. new bishops appointed, 1047. state of the bishops in general, and their chapters, ib. a clamour raised against them by their tenants, ib. more passion than justice in it, ib. oppose the bill for liberty of conscience, 1130. by which they incur the king's displeasure, 1131.
- Bombay, 1037.
- Booth, sir George, 1074.
- Bourbon, 1235.
- Bourdeaux, 984.
- Bourdeaux, monsieur, ambassador from France to the Cromwells, 1035. has new credentials ready on the arrival of the king, ib. desires an audience, ib. commanded to leave the kingdom, 1036.
- Boulogne, 1250.
- Boyle, Mr. Richard, son of the earl of Burlington, killed in the first engagement with the Dutch, 1141.
- Brecknock, earl of, 1049.
- Breda, 1007. appointed the place for treating, 1219. state of the negotiations, 1224. the treaty advanced, 1228. concluded, and peace made, 1229.
- Bridgman, sir Orlando, his character, 969.
- Bristol, 963.
- Bristol, earl of, remains some days at Dieppe with the chancellor, 976. proceeds with him to join

- the prince, but is prevented, and arrives at the Hague, 979. an account of his behaviour abroad, 1039. declares himself a Roman catholic, ib. accompanies the king to Fuentarabia, ib. devoted to the Spanish interest, 1040. joins with the Spanish ambassador in obstructing the king's marriage with the infanta of Portugal, 1041. speaks lightly to the king of the infanta's person, ib. is sent by the king to see some ladies in Italy, 1042. raises objections against the bill for restoring the bishops to their seats in parliament, 1070. some account of his general conduct, 1103. his extravagant conduct to the king, 1109. accuses the chancellor of high treason, ib. absconds upon the king's warrant to apprehend him, ib.
- Broughill, the lord, one of the commissioners from the state of Ireland, 1025. his character, ib. made earl of Orrery, 1057.
- Broke, the lord, 955.
- Brown, sir Richard, lord mayor of London, 1033. suppresses the insurrection of the fanatics in London, ib.
- Bruges, 978.
- Brussels, 985.
- Buccleugh, countess of, is contracted to Mr. Crofts, the natural son of the king, 1107.
- Buckingham, duke of, takes the lead in an opposition to the chancellor, 1197. his hatred to the duke of Ormond, ib. supports the bill for preventing the importation of Irish cattle, 1200. receives a challenge from the lord Ossory, ib. of which he informs the house of lords, 1201. the house, after considering the affair, sends both to the Tower, 1202. a scuffle between him and the marquis of Dorchester, ib. both committed to the Tower, ib. he obstructs the bill for lord Roos's divorce, 1208. a particular relating to him which hastens the fall of the chancellor, 1230. his behaviour towards the king, ib. a warrant issued to apprehend him, 1231. is removed from all his employments, ib. a proclamation issued for apprehending him, ib. desires the chancellor to interpose in his behalf, 1232. the chancellor's advice to him, ib. he surrenders himself, ib. is examined at the council-board, 1233. the king is satisfied with his defence, ib. after the dismissal of the chancellor he is restored to all his employments, 1236. and is much inflamed against the chancellor, 1237. and is induced to concur in the prosecution, ib. sends for sir Robert Harlow in hopes of gaining some information against the chancellor, 1239.
- Butler, James, marquis of Ormond, 998, 1000. one of the king's council at the restoration, 992. character of him, 993. made lord steward of the household, 1005. his courage and constancy in the king's service, ib. his friendship with the chancellor, ib. and 1015. is sent by the king to inform the chancellor of his daughter's marriage with the duke of York, 1009. made a duke, 1018. urges the chancellor to resign his office, ib. and to wait wholly upon the person of the king, ib. appointed of the committee to enter into a treaty with the Portuguese ambassador for the king's marriage with the infanta, 1038.
- Butler, Dr., a physician at Cambridge, 917.
- Byron, sir John, 966.
- Byron, lord, 987.
- C.
- Cadiz, 933.
- Caen, 976.
- Cesar, sir Charles, master of the rolls, dies, 957.
- Calais, 976, 1246, 1250, 1252, 1253.
- Calamy, Mr., his disingenuity respecting the king's declaration concerning ecclesiastical affairs, 1035.
- Calthurst, Anne, widow of Matt. Calthurst, marries Laurence Hyde, 915.
- Calthurst, Matthew, of Claverton near Bath, ib.
- Canaries patent, a particular relation of the passing of it, 1134.
- Canary merchants; the principal of them petition for a charter, 1136. the king approves of it, ib. opposed by the city of London, ib. the chancellor refuses to put the seal till the merchants had satisfied the city, 1137. some differences in the company after their incorporation, ib. which are referred to the king, 1138. the king satisfies all parties, ib.
- Canterbury, the king's arrival there, 994.
- Capel, the lord, 973, 974. his stay in Jersey, 975. by advice of his friends in England, who wished to obtain permission for him to return to England, he removes to Middleburgh, ib. returns into England, 976.
- Castilian, Anne, of Benham, 915. marries Rob. Hyde, ib.
- Carey, sir Lucius, eldest son to the lord viscount Falkland, an intimate friend of Edward Hyde, 925. some account of his education, ib. his fortune, ib. character, ib. marries against his father's wishes, ib. goes to Holland with his wife, 926. returns to England, retiring to a country life and his books, ib. his father's death calls him from his retirement, ib. returns to his studies, ib. mode of living, and his acquaintance, ib. his progress in learning, ib.
- Carew, Thomas, one of Edward Hyde's chief acquaintance, 923. his character, 924.
- Carleton, sir Dudley, ambassador at the Hague, 929.
- Carteret, sir George, 974, 1161. governor of Jersey, 975. receives the chancellor into his house, ib.
- Castro, the marquis de, 1256.
- Cavendish, sir Charles, 985. his character, 988. the chancellor persuades him to return into England, ib.
- Chaloner, Dr., principal of Alban hall, Oxford, 916. dies of the plague, ib.
- Charles I. calls a parliament upon the rebellion in Scotland, April 1640, 934. dissolves it in May, 935. calls another in November, ib. sends for Mr. Hyde, 937. his discourse with him, ib. gets him to undertake the care of episcopacy in parliament, till he goes to Scotland, ib. thanks him by secretary Nicholas for his zeal in his service, ib. offers him the place of solicitor general, which he declines, 938. intrusts lord Falkland, sir J. Colepepper, and Mr. Hyde with the conduct of his affairs in parliament, 939. passes the bill against the bishops, 942. accompanies the queen to Dover, 943. receives a message from the parliament respecting the removal of the prince of Wales from Richmond, ib. writes a sharp answer, ib. which Mr. Hyde prevails upon him to alter, 944. meets the prince at Greenwich, ib. his discourse with Mr. Hyde there, ib. directs him to prepare and send him answers to such declarations or messages as the parliament should send to him, ib. promises secrecy, and that he will himself transcribe all the answers, ib. is surprised in the midst of this discourse by the earls of Essex and Holland, ib. goes to Theobalds, 945. begins his progress northward, 946. takes the prince with him, ib. sends for Mr. Hyde to attend him at York, 948. sends Mr. Ashburnham to Mr. Hyde, with the declaration of the 26th of May, and wishes an answer to be prepared as soon as possible, 949. displeased with the lord keeper, 950. is reconciled to him by Mr. Hyde, 951. goes to Beverley, 952. thence to Hull, ib. his progress into Northamptonshire and Leicestershire, 954. returns to York, ib. his wager with lord Falkland concerning Mr. Hyde's style, ib. some of the king's movements, 955. determines to make secretary Nicholas master of the wards, 956. and Mr. Hyde secretary of state, ib. graciously receives the commissioners sent by the parliament to treat with him, 958. complains that their powers are so restrained, ib. is against a cessation of arms, 959. is urged by Mr. Pierrepont to make the earl of Northumberland lord high admiral of England, ib. which sir E. Hyde advises him to comply with, 960. which the king refuses, ib. the true cause of his rejecting it, ib. description of his affection for the queen, 961. his promise to the queen that he would never make any peace but by her mediation, ib. dismisses the Scottish commissioners, who attended him with a request to abolish episcopacy, 963. is much troubled at the disunion between the princes Rupert and Maurice, ib. goes to Bristol, ib. his last conference with the chancellor, 972. commands him to attend the prince into the west, 969. sends him two manuscripts containing all the passages in the years 1645, 1646, 976. much pleased with the chancellor's vindication of him in his answer to the parliament's declaration, ib. the removal and solemn interment of his body proposed, but his body not to be found, 1049. Charles, prince of Wales, (afterwards Charles II.) sent under his new governor the marquis of Hertford to Richmond, 943. ordered to attend his majesty at Greenwich, ib. meets the king there, 944. is sent by the king into the west, 973. goes thence to Scilly, ib. and afterwards to Jersey, 974. embarks for France, ib. Charles II. receives the account of the murder of the king his father, 979. sends the chancellor and lord Cottington ambassadors to Spain, ib. speaks to the chancellor respecting his daughter's appointment as maid of honour to the princess royal, 990. commands the chancellor to write an answer to Cromwell's declaration of decimating the king's party, 991. is restored to his kingdom, 992. his council at the restoration, 993. mortified at the solicitations of some royalists at Canterbury, 994. more mortified at a list of privy-counsellors recommended to him by general Monk, ib. is much displeased, and gives the list to the chancellor, ib. desires him to discourse the matter with the general and Mr. Morrice, 995. is afterwards satisfied with Monk's explanation, ib. his triumphant entry into London, ib. is mortified at the disunion of his friends, 998. a review of the causes of this disunion, ib. various instances of the unhappy constitution of the king's friends, 1002. which much troubles the king, 1003. neglecting business, he gives himself up to pleasure, ib. fills the courts of justice with grave and learned judges, 1004. confirms the general in all the offices assigned him by the parliament, 1005. sends two of the chancellor's friends to inform him of his daughter's marriage with the duke of York, 1009. his behaviour upon it towards the chancellor, ib. makes him a present of twenty thousand pounds, 1011. creates him a baron, ib. his satisfaction at seeing the change in the queen's behaviour towards the duke and duchess of York, 1014. reproves the chancellor for not being pleased at it, ib. commissioners sent to him from Scotland and Ireland, 1020. disposes of several great offices of the kingdom of Scotland, 1022. is inclined from lord Lauderdale's discourse to delay the reestablishment of episcopacy in Scotland, 1024. greatly perplexed at the contradictory addresses from Ireland, 1029. hesitates whom to send to Ireland as his deputy, 1030. fixes upon the lord Roberts, 1031. is concerned at the delay in passing the bill of indemnity, 1032. interposes with parliament respecting it, ib. at last gets it passed, ib. confers with the chancellor upon the proposal of marriage made to him by the Portuguese ambassador, 1036. is himself pleased with it, 1037. appoints a committee by the chancellor's advice to consider of it, ib. and to enter into a treaty with the ambassador, 1038. refuses to enter into a war with Spain, ib. writes to the king of Portugal, the queen regent, and the infants, 1039. appears much colder towards the treaty, 1041. sends the earl of Bristol to see some ladies in Italy, 1042. receives the Portuguese ambassador coldly on his return, ib. by degrees returns to his old resolution, and receives him with his usual freedom, 1043. is greatly incensed at the Spanish ambassador's printing the memorials he had presented against the match, ib. requires him forthwith to depart the kingdom, ib. receives some particular overtures from the court of France respecting the treaty with Portugal, ib. lays the whole matter before his privy-council, 1045. and is advised without more delay to conclude the treaty, ib. his speech to the new parliament, 1046. urges them to confirm the act of indemnity, ib. imparts to them the news of his intended marriage, ib. his coronation, 23d of April, 1048. proposes a solemn interment of his father, 1049. whose body cannot be found, ib. appoints lord Roberts deputy of Ireland, 1050. offers him the privy seal, ib. enters warmly into the affairs of Ireland, ib. hears all parties, ib. his friends restored by act of parliament, 1051. appears inclined to favour the Irish catholics, 1052. is distressed with regard to the settlement in Ireland, 1055. passes the first act of settlement, 1057. appoints three lords justices, ib. hears again the different parties, 1058. passes the second act, ib.

hears the different parties a third time, 1060. increases the difficulty of a settlement by some improvident acts of bounty, 1066. allows an extraordinary clause to be inserted in the grant, ib. passes the third act of settlement, 1067. after great persuasion prevails with the parliament to pass the bill of indemnity, 1069. adjourns the parliament, 1071. the true grounds of his favour to the Roman catholics, ib. his speech on the meeting of the parliament, 1073. in which he complains to them of his debts, ib. the reasons why those debts were so great, ib. sends for the house of commons to attend him at Whitehall, 1076. his speech to them, ib. confirms the act of uniformity, 1079. permits the presbyterian ministers to have too free access to him, 1080. their importunities disquiet him, 1081. promises them to suspend the act of uniformity, ib. endeavours to fulfil his promise, ib. demands the judgment of his lawyers, and finds it out of his power, 1082. his speech to parliament, 1083. prorogues it, 1084. receives the queen from Portugal at Portsmouth, 1085. conducts her to Hampton-court, ib. endeavours are used to alienate his affections from her, ib. some circumstances which contribute to a misunderstanding between them, ib. imparts all his troubles to the chancellor, 1088. the chancellor endeavours to reconcile the king and queen, ib. 1092. but is unsuccessful, ib. four subsidies granted to him, 1097. his speech at the prorogation of the parliament, ib. has an intention of preparing against the next meeting of parliament two bills against the papists and sectaries, ib. designs to have the papists convicted, 1098. measures taken to frustrate his design, ib. upon which he declines any further thought of the bill, 1099. grants a charter to the African company, 1102. becomes an adventurer in it, 1103. is not inclined to enter into a war with the Dutch, ib. sells Dunkirk to France, 1105, 1106. consults the chancellor respecting his natural son, Mr. Crofts, 1107. whom he publicly owns, and creates duke of Monmouth, 1108. appoints Scotch bishops, 1111. is favourable to the petition of the Scotch for withdrawing the English garrisons, 1112. his speech at the meeting of parliament, 1114. confirms several acts, 1115. prorogues the parliament, 1116. transmits the merchants' remonstrance against the Dutch to sir George Downing at the Hague, ib. takes measures to dispose parliament to grant supplies for a war, 1119. has a supply granted of two millions and an half, 1121. which inclines him to engage in a war with the Dutch, ib. approves of the bishop of Munster's proposals for an alliance against the Dutch, 1123, 1125. obliges the chancellor to seal a grant appointing lord Ashley treasurer of prize-money, 1128. measures taken to prejudice him against the chancellor, 1129. a proposal made to the king for liberty of conscience, ib. which he approves of, ib. is offended with the chancellor and treasurer for opposing it, 1130. and also with the bishops, 1131. he prorogues the parliament, ib. approves of the Canary merchants' petition for a charter, 1136. some differences in the company referred to him, 1138. he satisfies all parties, ib. greatly afflicted at the death of the earl of Falmouth, 1142. removes to Hampton-court on account of the plague, 1144. removes to Salisbury, 1145. removes with his court to Oxford, 1149. his speech to both houses at Oxford, 1150. anxious for peace, on the French ambassador's leaving the kingdom, 1153. hopes to divide France and Holland, ib. is moved by the duke of York to make sir George Savile a viscount, 1157. which the king will not consent to, ib. offended with the earl of Sandwich, 1159. is at length satisfied with the apology the earl makes for his imprudent conduct, 1161. is persuaded to remove lord Sandwich from the command of the fleet, ib. but resolves to dismiss him with honour, ib. thinks of appointing prince Rupert and the general joint admirals, 1163. commands the solicitor general not to oppose the proviso offered by sir George Downing in the bill for a supply, 1167. consults further the private committee upon it, 1168. is much offended with the chancellor for his sharp reproof of sir George Downing, 1170. but is satisfied with the chancellor's explanation, ib. is persuaded to desire the treasurer would resign, 1171. and wishes the chancellor to advise him to it, ib. the chancellor earnestly beseeches him to reconsider it, 1172. he is prevailed upon to lay aside the intention, ib. removes from Oxford to Hampton-court, ib. the plague having decreased, he returns to Hampton-court, 1173. is desirous of uniting with Holland against France, 1175. is prepossessed against the queen on her miscarriage, 1179. allows great license in the court, ib. an attempt to raise jealousies in him of his brother, 1180. his temper and disposition, ib. endeavours used to lessen the king's esteem of the duchess of York, ib. much alarmed at the fire of London, 1186. despairs of preserving Whitehall or Westminster-abbey, ib. he is seriously affected by that dreadful calamity, 1189. measures taken to efface such good impressions in him, 1189. and to lessen his esteem of the privy-council, ib. complains to the chancellor of the liberties taken with his character, 1191. the chancellor seriously remonstrates with him, 1192. his false reasoning, that princes have many liberties which private persons have not, &c. ib. his speech to the parliament, 1195. begins now to understand the damage he had sustained by the plague and the fire, ib. consults his private committee upon the bill brought into the house of commons for examining the public accounts, 1196. is against the bill prohibiting the importation of Irish cattle, 1198. passes the Irish bill with a speech, 1208. his speech at the prorogation of the parliament, 1209. appoints commissioners for inspecting the public accounts, ib. is involved in great difficulties, particularly with regard to the war with Holland, 1210. consults the private committee in these straits, ib. takes a resolution to act on the defensive, ib. strengthens various forts and places on the coast of Essex and Sussex, ib. inspects the fortifications of Sheerness, 1211. receives overtures from France, 1215. which he approves of, 1216. difficulties about settling a place for a treaty, ib. progress of the negotiation, 1217. is highly offended with the breach of the overtures made by France, 1218. and resolves to continue the war, ib. receives new overtures from France, ib. consults the East India company in relation to Poleroone, 1219. consults the privy-council upon the overtures made by France, ib. which advises him to enter upon the treaty, ib. agrees upon Breda as the place of treating, ib. appoints lord Hollis and Mr. H. Coventry his plenipotentiaries, 1220. upon the death of lord Southampton he resolves to put the treasury into commission, 1223. the chancellor advises him against it, ib. commissioners appointed, 1224. in great perplexity at the attack upon Sheerness by the Dutch, 1225. is advised to convene parliament during the prorogation, 1226. he consults the privy-council upon it, ib. is advised by the privy-council to conclude the treaty for peace, 1229. issues a warrant to apprehend the duke of Buckingham, 1231. grows weary of the prosecution, 1232. is satisfied with the duke's defence before the privy-council, 1233. sends the duke of York to the chancellor to desire him to resign, ib. his conference with the chancellor at Whitehall, 1234, 1235.

leaves him in displeasure, ib. sends secretary Morrice to demand the great seal of the chancellor, 1236. in his speech at the meeting of parliament he reflects on the chancellor, 1237. is offended, because a motion for thanks to him for removing the chancellor was opposed in the commons, 1238. declares his belief in the chancellor's innocence, 1240. which he afterwards disowns, ib. is prevailed upon to encourage the prosecution of the chancellor, 1241. expresses a wish that he would withdraw, 1244. sends to him to that effect by the bishop of Winchester, ib.

Chatham, attempt made upon it by the Dutch, 1225.

Chillingworth, Mr. William, one of Edward Hyde's intimate friends, 925. wrote his excellent book against Mr. Nott the Jesuit at sir Lucius Carey's house, 926. spent all his younger time in disputation, 930. becomes a sceptic in the greatest mysteries of faith, ib. falls off to the church of Rome, ib. goes to St. Omer's to perfect his conversion by the conversation of the greatest men there, ib. finds no satisfaction, and returns with as much haste from them to the church of England, ib. thought all war to be unlawful, 930. shut up in Arundel-castle, ib. falls into the rebels' hands, ib. is cruelly treated by them, and dies shortly after in prison, ib. character, ib.

Cholmondeley, sir Hugh, 949, 951.

Churchill, Mr., 1096.

Cirencester taken by the king's forces, 958.

Clarendon, earl of, (see E. Hyde.)

Claverton, near Bath, 915.

Clergy, a clamour raised against them by their tenants, 1047. the injustice of it, 1048.

Clifford, Mr., 1096.

Clotworthy, sir John, 1036. one of the commissioners from the state of Ireland, 1025. his animosity against the bishops, the cross, and the surplice, 1026.

Colepepper, sir John, 939, 941, 942, 944, 947, 953, 957, 973, 974. called to the privy-council, 938. is entrusted, together with lord Falkland and Mr. Hyde, with the conduct of the king's affairs in parliament, 939. his character, services, and principles, 940. friendship with Mr. Ashburnham, ib. advises the king to pass the bill against the bishops, 942. prevails by means of the queen, ib. watches the earls of Essex and Holland, 947. a design formed of sending him to the Tower, ib. it is defeated, ib. he goes to York, 952. made master of the rolls, 957. unwillingly resigns the chancellorship of the exchequer, ib. is made one of the junto, 966.

Colepepper, the lord, one of the king's council at the restoration, 992. character of him, 993. his great parts and present wit, ib. trusted by the late king to wait on the prince, ib. in good correspondence with the chancellor, ib.

 Commings, monsieur, ambassador from the French, in England, 1139.
 Commissioners of appeals appointed, 1127. the injustice of their sentences, ib.
 Commissioners for inspecting the public accounts appointed, 1209.
 Committee of the lords for relaxing the penal laws against the Roman catholics, 1072. is discontinued, ib.
 Common Prayer, endeavours of the presbyterians to abolish it, 996.
 Commons, house of, (see Parliament.)
 Compton, sir William, master of the ordinance, 1074.
 Convocation summoned, 1047.
 Conway, the lord, 933. reprehends Dr. Langton for not giving proper respect to king James's letter, 916.
 Cooper, sir Anthony Ashley, sworn of the king's council, 995. made chancellor of the exchequer, 1006.
 Cote, sir Charles, 1025. made earl of Monrath, 1057.
 Coronation of Charles II, 1048. the ceremony and expense attending it, ib. two unlucky accidents which attended it, ib.
 Cosins, Dr., forbid by the queen to officiate to the protestants in her suite at Paris, 984.
 Cottington, the lord, chancellor of the exchequer, 920. made one of the commissioners for managing the treasurer's office, ib. made one of the junto, 966. remains at Dieppe with the chancellor, 976. proceeds with him to join the prince, but was prevented arriving at the Hague, 979.
 Cotton, Charles, one of Edward Hyde's chief acquaintance, 923. his character, ib.
 Coventry, 948.
 Coventry, lord keeper, 928. one of the commissioners for managing the treasurer's office, 920.
 Coventry, Harry, 1096. sent ambassador to Sweden, 1123. success of his embassies there, 1146.
 Coventry, Mr. William, his character, 1094. great influence with the king, 1095. his intrigues against the chancellor, 1096. admitted of the privy-council and the private council at the request of the duke of York, 1158. where he constantly opposes the chancellor and the treasurer, ib. casts unjust reflection on lord Sandwich, 1159. joins with lord Arlington against the treasurer, 1165. his malice against the chancellor, ib. appointed a plenipotentiary to treat for a peace, 1220. incenses the house of commons against the chancellor, 1219.
 Country, great discontents expressed in the country upon the great taxes, &c. 1099. danger of an insurrection, ib.

 Court, the, great license in it, 1179.
 Cowley, the poet, his character, 923.
 Coyet, a Swedish senator, sent ambassador into England, 1212. his character, ib.
 Crane, Mr., an apothecary at Cambridge, 917. bred up under Dr. Butler, ib.
 Crawford, Lindsey, earl of, some account of him, 1022.
 Crofts, Mr., a natural son of Charles II. brought into England by the queen mother, 1107. he is contracted to the countess of Buccleugh, ib. is publicly owned by the king, and created duke of Monmouth, 1108.
 Crofts, the lord, 1107.
 Cromwell, Oliver, the first cause of his enmity to Mr. Hyde, 936. publishes a declaration justifying his order for decimating the king's party, 991.
 D.
 D'Aumont, marshal, 1250.
 D'Elbœuf, duke, ib.
 Denmark very jealous of Sweden, 1146. connives at the attack upon the Dutch at Bergen, 1147. joins the Dutch, 1173.
 Derbyshire, 948.
 De Ruyter, the Dutch admiral, returns from Guinea, and thus increases the strength of the Dutch fleet, 1145.
 Descartes, 988.
 De Wit, the pensionary of Holland, persuades the Dutch to prepare another fleet, 1145. his malice against Van Trump, 1145. pretends to desire a peace, 1176. allows Mr. Bewett to enter into a correspondence with the English court, ib. a breach between him and Bewett, 1177. detects Bewett's secret correspondence, 1178.
 Dieppe, 976.
 Digby, sir Kenelm, one of Edward Hyde's chief acquaintance, 923. his character, 924.
 Digby, lord, 939, 974. his friendship with Mr. Hyde, 938. reads Mr. Hyde's answer to the parliament's remonstrance, ib. reports it to the king, ib. made secretary of state, 966. his discourse with the chancellor concerning the prince's going to France, 969.
 Dinton, in the county of Wilts, the birthplace of lord Clarendon, 915. improper rectory of, ib.
 Dissenters, (see Presbyterians.)
 Disunion of the king's friends, 997. a review of the causes of this disunion previous to the restoration, 998.
 Ditchley, 948.
 Dorchester, the marquis of, a scuffle between him and the duke of Buckingham, 1202. is sent to the Tower, ib.
 Dorset, earl of, 933, 957.
 Dort, synod of, 929.

Dover, 942, 943.
 Downing, sir George, the king's resident in Holland; his character, 1116. endeavours to bring about a war, 1117. a short account of him, 1165. very grateful to lord Arlington and sir William Coventry, ib. his project to new-model the treasury, ib. offers a proviso in the bill for a supply, 1167. which is passed, 1170. is sharply reprehended by the chancellor, ib.
 Drinking, many of the king's friends much addicted to it, 1002.
 Duck, Mr., pays down three thousand pound in part for the office of master of the rolls, 957. which is repaid to him, ib.
 Dunkirk, the sale of, with an account of the whole proceeding, 1105. et seq.
 Dunsmore, the lord, 957.
 Durnford near Salisbury, 915.
 Dutch, the; first rise of the war with them, 1102. the merchants desirous of it, 1103. the duke of York for it, ib. the king against it, ib. it is also opposed by the chancellor, 1104. the design for the present is dropped, ib. the merchants remonstrate to the king against the Dutch, 1116. insolent behaviour of the Dutch on the coast of Guinea, 1117. one of their forts on the coast of Africa seized by an English captain, ib. they prepare a strong fleet for Guinea, 1118. their treacherous behaviour, ib. upon which their ships are seized, 1119. they commence hostilities in Guinea, ib. refuse to redeliver, according to the treaty, the island of Poleroone, ib. still disclaim all thought or purpose of war, ib. and seem highly offended with their governor of Poleroone, ib. their fleet puts to sea under Opdam, 1140. the first general engagement, ib. advance with great courage and resolution, ib. many of their best ships burnt or taken, ib. the remainder of their fleet escapes by night, ib. their great loss, (eighteen ships), ib. persuaded by De Wit to prepare another fleet, 1145. make a reformation in their navy, ib. Denmark joins them, 1173. the bishop of Munster compelled by the French to make peace with them, 1175. jealous of France, ib. their fleet puts to sea, 1182. the second general engagement, ib. which lasts four days, 1183. both sides claim the victory, ib. a third general engagement, in which the English are victorious, ib. their fleet puts to sea again, 1184. France and Holland jealous of each other, 1213. refuse to restore Poleroone according to overtures made through France, 1217. in the negotiations at Breda defer agreeing to a cessation, 1224. make an attempt upon Sheerness and Chatham, 1225. (see Holland.)
 8 K

- E.
Earles, Dr. John, one of Edward Hyde's intimate friends, 925. frequently staying with sir Lucius Carey, 926. his character, 928.
Earles, Mr., 928.
Earl marshal's court; Mr. Hyde's speech against it, 934. succeeds in suppressing it, 935.
East India company, counselled by the king in relation to Poleroone, 1219. give up their claim to Poleroone, 1228.
East India prizes sold for the service of the war, 1161.
Edge-hill, 954, 956.
Elizabeth, queen, animosity of pope Sixtus V. to her, 916.
Elliot, Mr., 950, 951.
England in the enjoyment of the greatest measure of felicity that it had ever known, A. D. 1639, 934. the condition of it in respect to its neighbours in 1665, 1122.
English, the, protected by cardinal Allen at Rome, 916. take a Dutch fort on the coast of Africa, 1117. prepare a strong fleet for the coast of Guinea, 1118. seize the Dutch ships, 1119. expedition used in getting ready a fleet, 1132. it puts to sea, ib. many noblemen go in it as volunteers, ib. it engages and beats the Dutch, 1140. persons slain on the side of the English, ib. reasons why the victory was no further improved, 1142. the fleet again prepared, 1143. which puts to sea under the command of the earl of Sandwich, 1144. ill success at Bergen, 1148. success after that attempt, 1158. preparations for setting out the fleet again, 1173. it puts to sea under the command of prince Rupert and the general, 1181. second general engagement, 1182. which lasts four days, 1183. both sides claim the victory, ib. third general engagement, ib. the English victorious, ib. make an attempt on the island of Schelling, 1184. burn the chief town, and a large fleet of merchantmen, ib. the English fleet dispersed by a storm, ib. a resolution taken to act on the defensive, 1186. great consternation throughout the kingdom in the attack of the Dutch upon Sheerness and Chatham, 1226.
Escalona, duke of, 984.
Essex, earl of, 931, 947, 949, 950, 965. surprises Mr. Hyde, in conference with the king, 944. his character, 945.
Eureux, 1254.
Europe, general state of, A. D. 1639, 934.
Eustace, sir Morrice, lord chancellor of Ireland, 1057. appointed one of the lords justices of Ireland, ib.
F.
Fairfax, sir Thomas, son of lord Fairfax, 949, 950.
Falkland, lord, 927, 928, 939, 941, 944, 947, 948, 953, 954, 955, 957, 963. deputy of Ireland, 925. called to the privy-council, 938. is intrusted, together with sir J. Colepepper and Mr. Hyde, with the conduct of the king's affairs in parliament, 939. some account of his temper and principles, ib. a design formed of sending him to the Tower, 947. it is defeated, ib. goes to York, 952. prepares an answer to the nineteen propositions of parliament, 953. his wager with the king respecting Mr. Hyde's style, 954. solicits the king to make Mr. Hyde chancellor of the exchequer, 957. attends the king to Bristol, 963. is killed in the battle at Newbury, 966. his character, ib.
Falmouth, earl of, (see sir Charles Berkley.)
Fanatics, they defend the cause of the regicides, 1033. cause their last speeches to be published, ib. have a conference of assassinating the general, ib. an insurrection of them raised by Venner in London, ib. for which he is executed with his associates, ib.
Fanshaw, sir Richard, an account of his embassy into Spain, 1162. from whence he is recalled, 1163.
Felton, John, kills the duke of Buckingham, 917.
Ferrers, lord viscount, attends the duke of York as a volunteer, 1132.
Fiennes, Nathaniel, his conversation with Mr. Hyde, 937.
Finch, the lord keeper, 936.
Fleet prepared against the Dutch, 1132. again prepared, 1143.
Flemming, a Swedish senator, sent ambassador into England, 1212. his character, ib.
Florence, the ambassador of, at Madrid, his character, 983.
Flushing, 977, 978, 979.
Fonde, monsieur le, 1250, 1251, 1254, 1255.
Fouquet, monsieur, superintendant of the finances in France on the death of cardinal Mazarine, 1043. makes some overtures to the chancellor concerning the treaty with Portugal, ib.
France; war with England, 917. worries Spain, 934. infests Italy, ib.
French, the, send ambassadors into England under pretence of mediation between the English and Dutch, 1139. prepare a fleet, 1173. negotiations of the French at this time, 1174. prevent the neighbouring states from assisting the bishop of Munster, ib. force him to make peace with the Dutch, 1175. their fleet narrowly escape in a storm, 1184. Holland and France jealous of each other, 1213. make overtures, 1215. make new overtures, 1218. invade Flanders, 1228. French ambassador urges the chancellor to retire to France, 1245.
French ambassadors, the, neglect an opportunity of making peace, 1143. seem desirous of mediating a peace, 1146. a further negotiation with them, 1149. complain of the damage the subjects of France had sustained by the king's ships, and remonstrate warmly against the English, 1151. have a conference with the English ministers in consequence of their remonstrance, 1152. receive their final answer, and leave the kingdom, 1153.
Frescheville, Mr., created lord Frescheville, 1133.
Fuy, sir George, of Kyneton, 915. marries Susanna Hyde, ib.
G.
Gabell, chief minister of the king of Denmark, 1146.
Garraway, Mr., 1197.
Gassendas, 938.
Germany, state of in 1639, 934.
Gilasp, a seditious preacher in Scotland, is executed, 1110.
Glenornie, earl of, one of the Scotch commissioners, 1021. his character and some account of him, ib. made chancellor of Scotland, 1022.
Gloucester, 965.
Glyn, Mr., 948.
Godolphin, Sidney, one of Edward Hyde's intimate friends, 925. his character, 927. death, ib.
Goring, the lord, 973.
Gourny, alderman, lord mayor of London, his character, 946.
Grandison, William, viscount, 918, 943, 944. sent express by Mr. Hyde with a letter to the king at Theobald's, 945. surprised by the parliament forces, 958.
Grana, the marquis of, the emperor's ambassador at Madrid, his character, 982.
Gravesend, 943.
Greenvil, sir Richard, 973.
Greenwich, 943, 944.
H.
Hague, the, 929, 979.
Hales, John, of Eton, an intimate friend of Edward Hyde, 925. Greek professor in the university of Oxford, and fellow of Merton college, 929. assisted sir H. Saville in his edition of St. Chrysostom's works, ib. present at the consultations of the synod at Dort, ib. would never take any cure of souls, ib. a great contemner of money, ib. interview with archbishop Laud, ib. his discourse on schism, ib. made prebend of Windsor, 930. his character, 929.
Hamden, Mr., 936, 939.
Hamilton, the marquis of, 918. Edward Hyde introduced to him, ib. comes into the queen's confidence, 919. found Mr. Hyde early in private with the king, 947.
Hammond, Dr. frequented the house of sir Lucius Carey, 926.
Hampton-Court, 1144.
Harlow, sir Robert, sent for by the duke of Buckingham, and questioned as to the chancellor's conduct in appointing lord Willoughby governor of the Barbadoes, 1239.

Harcourt, the count of, sent in an embassy from the court of France, 966. arrives in London, ib.

Haro, don Lewis de, waits upon the chancellor, at Madrid, 983.

Harvey, Daniel, a merchant, complains to archbishop Laud of the earl of Portland, 920. mentions Mr. Hyde to the archbishop, ib.

Harvey, Mr. Justice, one of the judges of the common pleas, 917.

Haslerig, sir Arthur, 936.

Henderson, Alexander, the Scottish high priest, 961.

Henrietta Maria, queen to Charles I, takes the marquis of Hamilton into her confidence, 919. endeavours to persuade Mr. Hyde to accept the office of solicitor general, 938. resolves to go abroad, 941. prevails on the king to pass the bill against the bishops, 942. goes to Dover accompanied by the king, 943. puts to sea, ib. description of the king's affection for her, 961. the king promises not to make any peace but by her mediation, ib. lands in the north, ib. forms a design of drawing the prince into France, 970. is displeased at the chancellor's going to Spain, 980. her strong opinion of his sincerity, ib. her reception of him on his return from Spain, 984. complains to him of the duke of York's conduct, ib. is much offended with sir Edward Herbert and sir George Ratcliff, ib. sends Mr. William Mountague to confer with the chancellor, 985. greatly incensed at the duke of York's marriage, 1010. congratulated by the privy-council on her return, 1011. receives the chancellor graciously, ib. greatly offended with the duke of York's behaviour towards the duchess, 1113. suddenly alters her behaviour, 1014. the reason of it, ib. is reconciled to the duchess, 1015. and to the chancellor, ib. brings a natural son of the king's into England, 1107. leaves England, 1139. prevents the duke of York's going to sea again, 1143. endeavours to bring about a peace between England and France, 1214. sends the earl of St. Alban's into England for that purpose, ib. forbids Dr. Cosins to officiate to the protestants in her suite, 984. on which the chancellor remonstrates with her, ib. her majesty's answer, ib.

Herbert, sir Edward, attorney general, advises the king to declare the parliament dissolved, 968. his character, ib.

Hereford, bishop of, sent to the chancellor to persuade him to leave the kingdom, 1244.

Hertford, marquis of, 994, 1049. governor to the prince of Wales, 943. has leave from Cromwell to attend the king's funeral, 1049. inserted in the list of privy counsellors recommended to the king by Monk, 994.

Holland, 929, 934.

Holland, earl of, 947, 953, 954, 955. surprises Mr. Hyde in conference with the king, 944. his journey to Beverley, 953. the king's reception of him, 954.

Hollis, Mr., 948.

Hollis, lord, appointed a plenipotentiary to treat for peace, 1220.

Hopton, sir Arthur, 975.

Hopton, sir Ralph, 965. committed by the commons to the Tower, 947.

Hopton, the lord, 930, 972, 973, 975. his stay in and departure from Jersey, ib.

Howard, lord Edward, 949, 951.

Howard, sir Robert, 1197.

Hubert, a Frenchman, makes a strange confession that he had caused the fire of London, and had been hired in Paris a year before to do it, 1187. upon which he is executed, 1188.

Hull, 952, 953, 954.

Humakerke, Laurence Van, advises prince Rupert to make an attempt on the island of Schelling, 1184.

Huntingdon, 947.

Hussey, sir James, one of the masters in chancery, brings the plague to Oxford, 1625, 916. dies in New college, ib.

Hyde, Alice, aunt to lord Clarendon, 915. married to John St. Loe, ib.

Hyde, Anne, aunt to lord Clarendon, 915. married to Thomas Baynard, ib.

Hyde, Anne, daughter of the chancellor, appointed maid of honour to the princess royal, 990. is married to the duke of York, 1007. her character traduced by sir Charles Berkley, 1011. upon which the duke resolves to deny the marriage, ib. is delivered of a son, ib. accepts sir Charles Berkley's submission, 1014. the queen mother is reconciled to her, 1015. endeavours used to lessen the king's esteem of her, 1180.

Hyde, Edward, (afterwards earl of Clarendon,) born at Dinton, co. Wilts, 915. third son of Henry Hyde, 916. born 18th of Feb. 1608, ib. educated by a school-master, to whom his father had given the vicarage of the parish, ib. sent to the university of Oxford at the age of thirteen, ib. designed to the clergy, ib. was to make his own fortune by his industry, ib. candidate for a demyship of Magdalen college, ib. recommended by king James to Dr. Langton, the president, ib. but was not chosen, ib. remains at Magdalen hall, ib. under the tuition of Mr. John Oliver, ib. chosen demy the following year, though there was no vacancy, ib. upon the death of his elder brother Henry, is sent by his father to the inns of court, ib. enters at the Middle Temple, ib. in consequence of the plague did not go there till Michaelmas term, 1625, ib. takes his degree of bachelor of arts, 917. character at that time, ib. arrives in London, ib. seized with a quartan ague, ib. goes to Pirton, ib. recovers, and returns to the Middle Temple, ib. gets acquainted with some officers, ib. retreats from their company without hurt or prejudice, ib. cannot bring himself to an industrious pursuit of the law study, ib. loved polite learning and Roman history, ib. goes the Norfolk circuit in 1626, ib. arrives at Cambridge, and lodges in Trinity college, ib. seized with the small-pox, ib. put under the care of Mr. Crane, ib. in great danger, ib. recovers and goes to his father's house at Pirton, ib. receives the account of the death of the duke of Buckingham, ib. returns to his studies at the Middle Temple, 918. loses his uncle and patron sir Nicholas Hyde, ib. marries the daughter of sir George Ayliffe, ib. loses his wife within less than six months from the small-pox, at Reading, ib. employed in a cause in the court, ib. the occasion of his introduction to the marquis of Hamilton, 919. marries the daughter of sir Thomas Aylesbury, bart. ib. betakes himself seriously to his profession, ib. laments his father's death, ib. his name mentioned by Mr. D. Harvey to abp. Laud, 921. is sent for by the archbishop, ib. the conversation between them respecting the complaints against the earl of Portland as treasurer, ib. is taken particular notice of by the archbishop, 922. in consequence receives encouragement in his profession, ib. method of spending his time, ib. some account of his chief acquaintance, 923. of these he looked upon Mr. Selden with most affection and reverence, 925. afterwards he forms a more intimate friendship with others, whose characters are given, ib. fortunate in his acquaintance and friendships in his profession, 931. the countenance he received from certain great men made him look- ed upon by the judges in Westminster-hall with great condescension, ib. reconciles abp. Laud to the earl of Hertford, ib. his free expostulation with the archbishop, ib. his reverence for, and opinion of him, 932. gives up his whole heart to his profession, ib. his family, three sons and a daughter, 933. reflections on the younger part of his life, ib. his own character, ib. chosen to serve for two places in the parliament of 1640, viz. Wotton-Basset and Shaftesbury, 934. chooses to serve for the former, ib. his first speech in the house against the earl marshal's court, &c. ib. endeavours to prevail on abp. Laud to oppose the dissolution of the parliament, 935. is chosen to serve in the second parliament of 1640, ib. the parliament prejudiced against him, ib. renews his motion for the suppression of the earl marshal's court, ib. succeeds in abolishing it, ib. receives the thanks of the earl marshal for his treatment of his person on that occasion, ib. lays aside his gown, and wholly gives himself up to public business, ib. in the chair of the committee against the court of York, 936. and of that against the judges, ib. and against the marshal's court, ib. and of that concerning the lord president and council of the marches of Wales, ib. and of many other committees, ib. particularly of an enclosure, in which arose the first cause of Oliver Cromwell's enmity to him, ib. in the chair in the grand committee of the house for the extirpation of episcopacy, ib. the discontented party make great court to him, ib. his conversation with Nathaniel Fiennes respecting his attachment to the church, ib. and with Harry Martin about the proceedings of the houses, 937. is sent for by the king, ib. their discourse, ib. undertakes for the care of the church and episcopacy till the king goes for Scotland, ib. receives the king's thanks by secretary Nicholas, ib. draws up an answer to the parliament's remonstrance, 938. reads it to lord Digby, ib. refuses to have it communicated to the king, ib. the king hears of it, and sends for it, ib. it is read before the privy-council, ib. and is printed, ib. sent for by the king, who offers him the place of solicitor general, which he declines, ib. refuses another post, 939. is intrusted, jointly with lord Falkland and sir J. Colepepper, with the conduct of the king's affairs in parliament, ib. account of his disposition and principles, 940. sent by the parliament to the king with a message respecting the removal of the prince of Wales from Richmond, 943. prevails with the king to alter his answer to the parliament, 944. the king's discourse with him in the privy gallery at Greenwich, ib. is directed by the king to prepare answers for him to the parliament's declaration and messages, ib. is surprised in the midst of his discourse by the earls of Essex and Holland, ib. sends the king an account of a message from parliament respecting their privileges, 945. his advice thereupon, ib. a design formed to send him to the Tower, 947. it is defeated, ib. required by his majesty to attend him at York, 948. disposes the lord keeper to send the great seal to the king, and himself attend the king, ib. begins his journey to York, ib. stops at Ditchley, ib. stops at Nostall, ib. sends the king an answer to the declaration of the 19th of May, ib. receives from the king the declaration of the 26th of May, and is desired to answer it speedily, ib. writes to the king from Nostall in favour of the lord keeper, 950. goes to York, ib. his reception there, 951. he reconciles the king to the lord keeper, ib. is required by the committee from parliament to attend the house, ib. his answer, ib. advises the king not to publish the answer to the parliament's nineteen propositions, 953. lord Falkland's expostulation with him thereon, ib. his conversation with the earl of Holland, ib. is exempted from pardon by a vote of the houses, ib. his conversation with sir Edmund Varney, 954. laments the loss of many of his writings, 955. declines the office of secretary of state, 956. accepts the office of chancellor of the exchequer, 957. is sworn of the privy-council, and knighted, ib. advises the king to comply with Mr. Pierrepont's proposal of making the earl of Northumberland lord high admiral of England, 960. delivers his opinion on the Scottish commissioners' request for the abolition of episcopacy, 962. attends the king to Bristol, 963. his office invaded by Mr. Ashburnham, 965. loses his dear friend lord Falkland, 966. refuses the office of secretary of state a second time, ib. is made one of the junto, 967. dissuades the king from dissolving the parliament, ib. is commanded to attend the prince into the west, 969. his conversation with lord Digby, concerning the prince's going to France, ib. he endeavours to reconcile the king and the duke of Richmond, 972. without success, ib. his last conference with the king, ib. his promise to the king at parting, 973. sets out from Oxford, ib. arrives at Bath, where he has the first fit of the gout, ib. arrives at Bristol, ib. goes to Scilly, ib. and from thence to Jersey, 974. receives the prince's permission to remain there, ib. remains there about two years, in great intimacy with sir George Carteret, 975. betakes himself to a continuance of the history begun at Scilly, ib. builds a lodging in Elizabeth castle, ib. receives great assistance from the king, in information and documents, towards his History, 976. publishes an answer to the parliament's declaration, that they would receive no more addresses from the king, ib. leaves Jersey, and goes to Caen, thence to Rouen and to Dieppe, ib. whence he embarks for Dunkirk, 977. (and afterwards proceeds to join the prince's fleet, ib. but is taken by some frigates of Ostend, ib. plundered and carried into that port, ib. is set at liberty, and promised satisfaction, ib. but cannot obtain it, notwithstanding his repeated remonstrances, 978. goes to Flushing, 979. from thence to Middleburgh, ib. embarks aboard the Hind frigate to attend the prince in the river Thames, ib. is driven back, ib. arrives at the Hague, ib. is appointed ambassador to the court of Spain, ib. which is much murmured at, ib. but is himself much pleased with the commission, 980. sends for his wife and children to Antwerp, ib. attends the masquerade at Madrid, 981. and the toros, ib. is visited by the other ambassadors at Madrid before his audience, 982. demands his audience, 983. prepares mourning for himself and train to appear in at the audience, ib. changes his purpose at the request of don Lewis de Haro, ib. applies himself to learning Spanish, ib. leaves Madrid, 984. attacked with the gout at Pampeluna, ib. notwithstanding continues his journey, and arrives at Paris, ib. his reception by the queen mother, ib. speaks with her upon her forbidding Dr. Cosins to officiate to the protestants in her family, ib. her majesty's answer, ib. confers on the subject with sir Walter Mountague, 985. goes to Brussels, ib. has an audience with the archduke, ib. joins his family at Antwerp, ib. goes to the duke of York at Breda, ib. persuades him to return to the queen mother, ib. remains with his family at Antwerp, 987. his friendship with sir Charles Cavendish, ib. whom he persuades to go to England, 988. gives an account of his proceedings to the king, 989. his answer to the queen, who endeavoured to attach him to her interest, ib. state of his family at Antwerp, 1007. he removes with them to Breda, ib. declines the offer made to his daughter by the princess royal, of the situation of a maid of honour, 990. which his wife accepts, and he at length gives his consent, 991. answers Cromwell's declaration, ib. is one of the king's council at the restoration, 992. highest in office, and thought to be so also in trust, the reasons why, 993. his intimacy with the marquis of Ormond, ib. some intimations made to the king at the Hague of his being very much in the prejudice of the presbyterian party, with advice to leave him there till he himself should be settled in England, which the king receives with indignation, ib. his request to the king to decline giving him any protection, ib. his resolution of withdrawing himself, ib. receives from the king the list of privy counsellors recommended by Monk, 994. by the king's desire has a conference with Morrice concerning this list, 995. takes his seat in the house of peers with a general acception and respect, ib. is thought to have most credit with the king, 1004. all matters referred by the king to him, ib. resigns the office of chancellor of the exchequer, 1006. he foresees a storm of envy and malice against him, ib. is informed by the king of his daughter's marriage with the duke of York, 1009. is struck to the heart with the news, ib. and breaks out into violent passions, ib. acts severely towards his daughter, and orders her to keep her chamber, 1010. his language upon this affair in the presence of the king, 1009. the king presents him with twenty thousand pounds, 1011. and creates him a baron, ib. is well received by the queen mother on her return, ib. his conference with the duke of York, and answer to his highness's threats, 1012. absolutely refuses to make any application towards appeasing the queen's anger, 1013. the queen suddenly alters her behaviour towards him, ib. the reason given him by abbot Mountague, ib. receives sir Charles Berkley's professions civilly, 1014. his reply to the king's reproof, ib. desires leave to retire beyond the seas, ib. is introduced by the earl of St. Alban's to the queen mother, 1015. who is reconciled to him, ib. not elated by the marriage of his daughter, ib. some instances of his disinterestedness, 1016. refuses an offer of crown lands, ib. declines being made a knight of the garter, 1017. also declines being made an earl, 1018. but finds he cannot prudently refuse it longer, ib. urged by the marquis of Ormond to resign his office of chancellor, ib. and betake himself wholly to wait upon the king, ib. which he refuses, 1019. anxious in council and in parliament to remove all obstructions in the way of the bill of indemnity, 1032. is consulted by the king concerning a treaty of marriage with the infants of Portugal, 1036. whom he desires to refer it to a committee, 1037. appointed of the committee, ib. some overtures made to him by monsieur Fouquet, the French minister, concerning the treaty with Portugal, 1043. with which he acquaints the king, 1044. his integrity in refusing money (ten thousand pounds) offered him by the French minister, ib. which he complains of to the king, but is desired by him to continue his correspondence, 1045. expresses himself warmly upon the duke of Ormond's being made lord lieutenant of Ireland, 1059. his vindication of himself with regard to Irish affairs, 1068. his speech to parliament previous to its being prorogued, 1084. is hated by the queen, 1087. the king imparts to him all his inquietness of mind respecting the queen, 1088. endeavours to reconcile their majesties, 1088—1092. but is unsuccessful, 1092. his interest declines on the appointments of sir Harry Bennett and sir Charles Berkley, 1101. however he still retains the king's favour, ib. opposes the war with the Dutch, 1104. the duke offended with him for it, ib. he satisfies the duke, ib. a full statement, in vindication of himself, of the proceedings relative to the sale of Dunkirk, 1105. his advice to the king regarding his natural son Mr. Crofts, 1108. is accused of high treason by the earl of Bristol, 1109. who absconds, 1110. receives proposals from the bishop of Munster for an alliance against the Dutch, 1123. which he communicates to the king, ib. beseeches the king to reconsider his appointment of lord Ashley to be treasurer of the prize-money, 1128. is obliged by the king to seal the grant, ib. measures taken to prejudice the king against him, 1129. opposes the bill for liberty of conscience, ib. speaks against it in the house of lords, 1130. and drops some unguarded expressions, ib. the king offended with him upon it, 1131. refuses to put the seal to the Canary merchants' charter till they had satisfied the city of London, 1136-37. a vindication of the chancellor in this affair, 1138. his reflection upon the attempt made on the Dutch at Bergen, 1149. substance of his speech to the parliament which met at Oxford, 1150. prospect of the king's affairs about this time, 1152. an attempt to make a breach between the chancellor and the treasurer, 1154. the occasion of it, ib. is consulted by the duke of York respecting two suits he intended to make to the king, 1156. is against removing the earl of Sandwich from the command of the fleet, 1162. his conference with the earl, 1163. the malice of lord Arlington and sir William Coventry against him, 1165. is desired by the king to persuade the treasurer to resign, 1171. he earnestly entreats the king against it, ib. and at length prevails, 1172. his interest declines while the courtiers affect to represent it at the highest, 1190. repeats to the king the conversation which had passed between him and lord Arlington on the king's course of life, 1191. he seriously remonstrates with the king, 1192. delivers his opinion very freely to the king in the private committee against the bill for examining the public accounts, 1196. which is soon reported to his prejudice, 1197. in the debate of the Irish cattle bill, he defends the commons by desiring the peers to restrain their encroachments, 1204. he offends the lords by advising them not to insist unreasonably upon privilege, 1205. advises the king against putting the treasury into commission, 1223. is against the king convening the parliament during the prorogation, 1227. the storm beginning to arise against him, 1229. the house of commons incensed against him by the agency of Mr. William Coventry, ib. his fate hastened by the singular behaviour of the duke of Buckingham, 1230. the chancellor's advice to the duke, who had requested him to interpose in his behalf with the king, 1232. declines to give the king any advice as to staying the prosecution, till the duke had surrendered himself, ib. loses his wife, 1233. the duke of York sent to him to desire him to resign, ib. many persons of eminence interpose in his behalf, 1234. he attends the king at Whitehall, ib. the conference between them, ib. the king leaves him in displeasure, 1235. the duke of York interests himself in his behalf, ib. the great seal taken from him, 1236. the duke of Buckingham is much inflamed against him, 1237. and is persuaded to concur in the prosecution of him, ib. the king also expresses great displeasure against him, ib. and reflects upon him in his speech to the parliament, 1238. one Tomkins moves the house to thank the king for removing him, ib. unfair methods used to induce the house to adopt that motion, ib. persons sought after to furnish matter of impeachment against him, 1239. is accused of high treason by Mr. Seymour, ib. many advise him to make his escape, ib. which he refuses to do, ib. the king declares his belief in his innocence, 1240. which he afterwards disowns, ib. articles of the charge against him, ib. proceedings against him in the house of commons, 1241. Mr. Seymour accuses him of high treason at the bar of the house of lords, 1242. debates in that house concerning his commitment, ib. he is again advised to withdraw, 1243. but refuses, ib. the king offended with him for the part he is reported to have taken with respect to the duke of Richmond's marriage, ib. his letter to the king upon that subject, ib. the king expresses a wish that he would withdraw, 1244. the bishop of Hereford sent to him to advise him to leave the kingdom, ib. which he refuses to do without receiving a command from his majesty, 1245. is urged by the French ambassador to retire to France, ib. but cannot be prevailed upon, ib. receives a notice from the king to withdraw, ib. he unwillingly obeys, and leaves the kingdom, 1246. he lands at Calais, ib. an instance of his generous behaviour to his enemies, ib. his address to the house of lords on his withdrawing, 1247. which is burned by order of both houses, ib. writes to the French court for leave to remove to Roan, 1250. which is granted to him, ib. on his journey he receives orders to leave France instantly, ib. appeals to that court in consequence of the ill state of his health, ib. the occasion of the ill treatment he meets with in France, 1251. proceedings against him in England, ib. a bill of banishment passed against him, ib. receives reiterated orders to quit France instantly, ib. again represents the ill state of his health to the French court, ib. the French king renews his commands for his speedy departure, ib. receives an express, with a particular account of all the transactions in parliament against him, 1252. is advised by the duke of York to hasten his return, and undergo his trial, ib. for that purpose he returns to Calais, ib. where he is confined to his bed by a dangerous illness, ib. is notwithstanding required to leave the place, and retire out of the French territories, ib. the French court suddenly alters its behaviour towards him, 1253. and permits him to go to what place he would, ib. which is a great relief and comfort to him, ib. he returns to Roan, 1254. from thence proceeds towards Avignon, ib. is greatly abused, and almost murdered by some English at Eureux, ib. removes from thence to Bourbon, 1255. and from thence to Avignon, ib. where he is received with the greatest kindness, 1256. visits Montpellier, ib. where he receives great civilities and respect, especially from lady Mordaunt, ib. he writes a vindication of himself, 1257. his answer to the several articles of the charge against him, 1257—1275. enjoys great tranquillity of mind, 1275. two apprehensions discompose him, ib. first, the insufficiency of his fortune, ib. this was composed in the assurance he had of the affection and piety of his children, ib. the second, the fear of being again persecuted in his banishment, ib. this removed by an entire acquiescence in the good pleasure of God, 1276. reflections on the wonderful and unusual proceedings and prosecution against him, ib. which raise his confidence in God, ib. his reflections on his conduct from the time of the king's restoration, ib. blames himself for the vast expense he had made in the building of his house, ib. esteems himself most happy in what he calls his three acquiescences, or retreat from public business, 1277. his first acquiescence was his residence in Jersey; his second was, when he was ambassador in Spain; and his third was his last recess, by the disgrace he underwent, and by the act of banishment, ib. in all these he had learned more, knew himself and others better, and served God and his country with more devotion, ib. a summary recapitulation of his life, ib. his writings, 1282.

Hyde, Henry, father to lord Clarendon, 915. of the Middle Temple, ib. master of arts in Oxford, ib. has an inclination to travel, ib. goes to the Spa for his health, ib. passes through Germany into Italy, to Florence, Syenna, and Rome, 916. averse to the Roman catholics, ib. protected at Rome by cardinal Allen, ib. returns to England, ib. persuaded by his mother to marry, ib. marries Mary, daughter of Edward Langford, ib. lives a private life at Dinton, ib. his character, ib. serves as burgess in several parliaments, ib. has four sons and five daughters, ib. removes to Pirton, 917. in a very dangerous state of health, 919. removes to Salisbury, ib. dies suddenly, aged sixty-nine, 920. character, ib.

Hyde, Henry, brother of lord Clarendon, 916. died aged twenty-six or twenty-seven, ib. was master of arts in the university of Oxford, ib.

Hyde, Joanna, aunt to lord Clarendon, 915. married to Edward Younge, ib.

Hyde, Laurence, of West-Hatch, grandfather to lord Clarendon, 915. his education, ib. a clerk in one of the auditor's offices of the exchequer, ib. married Anne widow of Matthew Calthurst, ib. had four sons and four daughters, ib. purchased the manor of West-Hatch, ib. where he died, ib. left the bulk of his estate to his eldest son Robert, ib. and the inappropriate rectory of Denham to his second son Laurence, ib.

Hyde, Laurence, uncle to lord Clarendon, 915. afterwards sir Laurence, and attorney general to queen Anne, ib. a lawyer of great name and practice, ib. possessed from his father the inappropriate rectory of Dinton, ib.

Hyde, Laurence, brother of lord Clarendon, 916. died young, ib.

Hyde, Nicholas, uncle to lord Clarendon, 915. treasurer of the Middle Temple, 916. afterwards lord chief justice of the king's bench, 915, 916. death and character, 918.

Hyde, Nicholas, brother of lord Clarendon, 916. died young, ib.

Hyde, Robert, of Norbury, co. Chester, great grandfather to lord Clarendon, 915.

Hyde, Robert, uncle to lord Clarendon, 915. married Anne Castilian, ib.

Hyde, Susanna, aunt to lord Clarendon, 915. married to sir G. Fuy, ib.

I.

James I. recommends Edward Hyde to Dr. Langton, 916.

Jermyn, Mr. Thomas, 974.

Jermyn, Mr., master of the horse to the duke of York, 1048.

Jersey, 973—976.

Ignoto, the illegitimate son of lady Roos, 1207.

Indemnity, act of, transactions in parliament concerning it, 1031. great delays respecting it, 1032. is at last passed, ib.

Inspruck, the archduke of, character of his minister at Madrid, 983.

Insurrection, danger of, 1099.

Johnson, Ben, one of Edward Hyde's chief acquaintance, 923. his character, ib.

Ireland, 973, 974. commissioners sent thence to the king, 1020. state of that kingdom, 1025. commissioners sent from different parts of the kingdom, ib. commissioners from the state, ib. deputies from the bishops and clergy, 1026. a committee deputed by the adventurers, ib. a committee from the army in present pay there, "for the arrears due to them," 1028. a committee from the officers who had served the king, ib. a committee for the Irish catholics, 1029. Monk still continues lord lieutenant, 1030. lord Roberts made deputy, 1031. affairs of, taken into consideration, 1050. church lands restored, and new bishops appointed, 1051. the Irish catholics favoured by the king, 1052. the different pleas of the Irish, ib. a great number of the Irish catholics who had served the king restored, 1055. the first act of settlement passed, 1057. three lords justices appointed, ib. partiality of the commissioners appointed by the first act, 1058. a second act of settlement transmitted to the king, ib. new commissioners appointed to execute it, ib. second act passed, ib. they publish their intended method of proceeding, 1060. their sentences and decrees favourable to the Irish, ib. reflections on their proceedings, ib. too many of the Irish rebels restored to their estate, 1061. many who had served the king condemned by the commissioners, ib. many of their decrees made upon settlements notoriously forged, 1062. the defence of the commissioners on these proceedings, ib. their defence by no means satisfactory, 1063. their decree in favour of the marquis of Antrim extremely complained of, 1064. the difficulties of a settlement increased, 1066. by some acts of bounty from his majesty, ib. which are attributed to the earl of Orrery, ib. the different parties agree upon an expedient for a settlement, 1067. the third act passed, ib. the privy-council remonstrate against the bill prohibiting the importation of Irish cattle into England, 1108.

Italy, infested by the arms of Spain and France, 934.

K.

Killigrew, Harry, 949.

Killigrew, Mrs., one of the maids of honour to the princess royal, 989. dies of the small-pox, ib.

Kingston, co. Wilts, 915.

Kyneton, co. Wilts, 915.

L.

Lambert, general, 1074. close prisoner in the Tower, 997. still has his faction at work, ib.

Lane, Mr., attorney to the prince of Wales, and afterwards chief baron of the exchequer, a friend of Edward Hyde's in his profession, 931. upon the death of lord Littleton, is made keeper of the great seal, ib. dies in banishment, ib.

Langford, Edward, of Trowbridge, 916.

Langford, Mary, married to Henry Hyde, father of lord Clarendon, 916.

Langton, Dr., president of Magdalen college, Oxford, 916. king James recommends Edward Hyde to him, ib. pretends that the letter came too late, ib. receives reprehension from lord Conway for not giving more respect to the king's letter, ib.

Laud, William, archbishop of Canterbury, 920. one of the commissioners for managing the treasurer's office, ib. character upon undertaking that duty, ib. receives information and complaints from Mr. Harvey, ib. sends for Edward Hyde, 922. is reconciled to the earl of Hertford through Mr. Hyde, 931. his greatest want, a true friend, ib. Mr. Hyde's free expostulation with him, 932.

Lautherdale, earl of, one of the Scotch commissioners, 1021. his character and some account of him, ib. is made secretary of state in Scotland, 1022. opposes the re-establishment of episcopacy in Scotland, 1023. strives to get it delayed, ib. his discourse makes some impression on the king, 1024. his design is discovered by the other commissioners, ib. and prevented, ib.

Lawson, sir John, 1038. much consulted by the duke of York, 1132. killed in the first engagement with the Dutch, 1141. his character, ib.

Lee, the lady, (afterwards countess of Rochester,) 948.

Leicester, earl of, 927.

London, the plague there in 1625, 917. the small-pox rages there in 1628, ib. opposes the Canary merchants' petition for a charter, 1137. a terrible fire breaks out Sept. 1, 1666, 1185. which continues four days, 1186. it decreases, ib. various surmises and idle stories respecting it, 1187. the inestimable loss sustained by the fire, 1188.

Lopez, Dr., a learned Jew and physician, 984.

Lords, house of, (see Parliament.)

Lorn, lord, son of the marquis of Argyll, restored, and created earl of Argyll, 1113.

Loudon, earl of, 927.

Low Countries, 927.

Lumley, the lord, 933.

Lutterworth, 948.

Lindsey, earl of, 1049. has Cromwell's leave to attend the king's funeral, ib. lord high chamberlain of England, 1017. is created knight of the garter by the chancellor's means, ib.

Lionne, monsieur de, 1251. secretary of state in France on the death of cardinal Mazarine, 1043.

Littleton, lord keeper, prevailed upon by Mr. Hyde to send the great seal to the king at York, and attend himself upon his majesty, 948. out of favour at court, 950. Mr. Hyde reconciles the king to him, 951.

Liturgy, an account of the revival of it, 1074. some of the bishops are against all alterations in it, ib. others press both for alterations and additions, ib. inveighed against by all the factious preachers of all persuasions, 1075. presented to the house of lords with the king's confirmation, 1077. consented to by them, ib.

M.

Madrid, 982.

Maltravers, the lord, 957.

Manchester, the earl of, 931, 936. made lord chamberlain, 1005. one of the committee appointed to enter into a treaty with the Portuguese ambassador concerning the king's marriage, 1037.

Mandeville, the lord, son of the earl of Manchester, 936.

Manly, sir Richard, 936.

Marlborough, taken by the king's forces, 958.

Marlborough, the earl of, killed in the first engagement with the Dutch, 1141.

Martin, Harry, his conversation with Mr. Hyde, 937. owns himself a republican, ib.

Martin, sir Henry, 935.

Masquerade, the, at Madrid, description of it, 981.

Maurice, prince, disunion between him and prince Rupert, 963.

May, Thomas, one of Edward Hyde's chief acquaintances, 923. his character, 924.

May, Mr., presumes to speak lightly to the king of the fire of London, 1189.

Maynard, John, a friend of Edward Hyde's in his profession, 931. afterwards bowed his knee to Beal, and swerved from his allegiance, ib.

Mazarine, cardinal, 1043.

Mervin, sir Audley, one of the commissioners from the state of Ireland, 1025.

Middleburgh, 979.

Middleton, declared by the king one of the Scotch commissioners, 1022. created earl of Middleton, 1023. proposes the rescinding the act of the covenant, and reestablishment of episcopacy in Scotland, ib. discovers Lautherdale's design of delaying it, 1024. and prevents it, ib. the king's commissioner in Scotland, 1110. is well received there, ib.

Molina, the comde of, ambassador from Spain to England, his character, 1213. endeavours at a separate treaty with Holland, ib.

Monk, general, recommends a list of privy counsellors to the king, 994. his reasons for doing so, 995. is made knight of the garter, and admitted of the council, ib. is confirmed by the king in all the offices before assigned him by the parliament, 1005. sworn also gentleman of the bedchamber, and master of the horse, ib. continues lord lieutenant of Ireland, 1030. resigns that appointment when duke of Albemarle, 1058.

Monmouth, duke of, (see Crofts.)

Montague, Mr., master of the horse to his majesty, dies, 1154. his brother appointed in his room, 1155.

Montpelier, 1256, 1275.

Montrath, earl of, one of the lords justices of England, 1176. his death, 1177.

Montrevil, 1250.

Mordaunt, Mr., created a viscount, 1002. unjustly censured and reproached, ib. a most zealous servant to the king, ib.

Mordaunt, lady viscountess, her great civilities to the chancellor at Montpelier, 1256.

Morley, Dr. (see bishop of Winchester,) 948. one of Edward Hyde's intimate friends, 925. frequently staying with sir Lucius Carey, 926. his character, 928. preaches a sermon at the coronation, 1048.

 Morrice, Mr., a particular friend of general Monk's, 995. his conference with the chancellor on the list of privy counsellors given to the king by Monk, ib. receives the signet from the king, and is sworn of the council and secretary of state, ib. his character, 1100.
 Mountague, Abbot, 1251, 1254, 1276. gives the chancellor a reason for the alteration of the queen's behaviour, 1013.
 Mountague, sir Sidney, 949.
 Munster, the bishop of, makes proposals for an alliance against the Dutch, 1123. which the king approves of, ib. engages to invade the United Provinces, 1145. the French deter the neighbouring states from assisting the bishop, 1174. who notwithstanding remains firm to his engagements with England, ib. but is at length forced by the French to make peace with the Dutch, 1175.
 Muskerry, the lord, killed in the first engagement with the Dutch, 1140.
 N.
 Navy, state of, from the king's restoration, 1125. state of it at the commencement of the Dutch war, 1127. fleet prepared, 1132.
 Naseby, 973.
 Newark, 974.
 Newbury, battle of, 965.
 Newcastle, the king and the army retire thither, 974.
 Newcastle, the marquiss of, 985.
 Nicholas, secretary, desired by the king to thank Mr. Hyde for his zeal in his service, 937. the king's character of him, 944, 957. is made master of the wards, ib. one of the king's council at the restoration, 992. character of him, 993. his reputation, integrity, and experience, ib. his trust with the late king, ib. his friendship with the chancellor, ib. appointed one of the committee to enter into a treaty with the Portuguese ambassador relative to the king's marriage with the infanta, 1037. his character, 1100. resigns his office of secretary of state, 1101.
 Norbury, in the county of Chester, the family estate of the Hydes since the conquest, 915.
 Northumberland, earl of, 955. Pierrepoint solicits the king to make him lord high admiral, 959. complains to the king of lord Ossory, 1048. proposes that the old Book of Common Prayer might be confirmed without any alteration or addition, 1077. known to be of the presbyterian party, ib.
 Nott, Mr., the Jesuit, Mr. Chillingworth's book against him, 926.
 Nostall, 948, 950.

O.

Oliver, John, fellow of Magdalen college, Oxford, 916. tutor to Edward Hyde, ib.

 Opdam, admiral, puts to sea with the Dutch fleet, 1140. engages the English, ib. perishes in his ship, which is burnt, ib.
 Ordination, debates in the house of lords on the clause of the act of uniformity requiring episcopal ordination, 1077.
 Ormond, marquis of, is informed of the prince's arrival in the island of Scilly, 973. is restored to his estate, 1051. accepts the office of lord lieutenant of Ireland, when duke of Ormond, 1059. upon the chancellor's regret at the appointment, he states to him his reasons for accepting it, ib. sets out for Ireland with the commissioners, ib. an attempt by Dick Talbot to assassinate him, 1193. the duke of Buckingham's hatred to him, 1197.
 Ormond, marchioness of, present at the duchess of York's delivery, 1011.
 Orrery, earl of, (see lord Broghill,) one of the lords justices of Ireland, 1057. the cause of some im-provident acts of bounty in the king, 1066. and this without the chancellor's knowledge, 1067.
 Ossory, lord, eldest son of the duke of Ormond, challenges the place before the lord Percy at the coronation, 1048. is ordered by the king to desist from his pretence, 1049. sends a challenge to the duke of Buckingham, 1200. is sent to the Tower, 1202.
 Ostend, 977, 978.
 Oxford, 949, 954. the parliament commissioners in Oxford, 958, 961, 974. plague brought there by sir James Hussey, 916.

P.

Palmer, Geoffrey, attorney general, a friend of Edward Hyde's in his profession, 931.
 Pampeluna, 984.
 Papists, the king meditates two bills against them, 1097. their imprudent behaviour, 1098. a design formed to have them convicted, ib. which they frustrate, ib.
 Paris, 974, 975.
 Parliament, the, in the year 1625, adjourned to Oxford in consequence of the plague, 916. called by Charles I. upon the rebellion in Scotland, April 1640, 934. dissolved in May following, 935. another called in November, ib. temper and constitution of it, ib. discovers a prejudice against Mr. Hyde, ib. make a recess during the king's absence in Scotland, 937. their remonstrance of the state of the nation, and its particular grievances, printed, 938. answered by Mr. Hyde, ib. pass and send to the king the two bills for granting the militia, and the removing the bishops out of the house of peers, 942. the latter bill passed by the king, ib. sends Mr. Hyde with a message to the king respecting the removal of the prince of Wales, 943. the king's answer delivered to the houses, 945. send a committee to the king about violating their privileges, ib. discomposed at the spirit and firmness of the king, 946. their conduct thereupon, ib. send commissioners to Oxford to treat with the king, 958. but with very restrained powers, ib. vote that no more addresses should be made to the king, 976. which is answered by the chancellor, ib. meeting of both houses after the restoration, 995. character of the house of commons, 996. and of the presbyterian party in it, ib. transactions in it concerning the act of indemnity, 1031. delays respecting it, 1032. at last passes it, ib. is adjourned, ib. meet again, 1035. raise several sums for the army and navy, 1034. pass several acts for the settling a future revenue for the crown, ib. vote to raise that revenue to twelve hundred thousand pounds, ib. give seventy thousand pounds towards the discharge of the coronation, ib. thank the king for his declaration concerning ecclesiastical affairs, 1035. a new parliament summoned to meet, ib. it meets on the 8th of May, 1046. the two houses express their joy at the king's intended marriage, ib. passes an act to restore the king's friends, 1051. enters with alacrity upon all affairs which refer to the king's honour, safety, or profit, 1069. asserts the king's prerogative, ib. unwilling to confirm the act of indemnity, ib. prevailed upon by the king to do so, 1070. commons pass a bill for restoring bishops to their seats in parliament, ib. which is objected to in the house of lords by the earl of Bristol, ib. but which is passed, 1071. parliament is adjourned, ib. meets again on the 30th of July, 1661, 1073. pleased with the king's speech to them, ib. sent for to attend the king at Whitehall, 1076. his speech to them, ib. house of lords consents to the Liturgy as presented to them by the king, 1077. debates there upon the act of uniformity, ib. upon the clause requiring episcopal ordination, ib. the lords pass the bill, 1078. amendments made in it by the house of commons, ib. bill returned to the lords, ib. debates upon the amendments made by the commons, ib. the lords agree to most of the amendments of the commons, 1079. who submit to all the lords had done, ib. and so the king is obliged to confirm the bill, ib. great animosities in parliament about private bills, 1083. their vour towards the king not-standing most respectful and ful, ib. the king's speech to y, ib. Feb. 18, 1662, the parliament is prorogued, 1084. meets n, Feb. 18, 1663, 1093. state e house, and character of the leading men in the house of commons, ib. an alteration in the ugement of that house owing e intrigues of sir Harry Ben-and Mr. Coventry, 1097. res on the proceedings in parliament, ib. it grants the king subsidies, ib. is prorogued, ib.

 to the king the articles of treason brought against the tellor by the earl of Bristol, favourable to the withdraw-f the English garrisons from und, 1113. meet again in h 1664, ib. the king's speech, repeal the triennial bill, passes several acts, ib. is gued, 1116. meets again in nber, 1665, 1118. measures to dispose parliament to supplies for a war, 1119.
 vote a supply of two millions half, 1121. a bill presented house of lords for liberty of ence, 1130. which is opposthe treasurer and bishops at e reading, ib. also at its second reading, ib. the chancellor against it, ib. the parliament is prorogued, 1131. add to Oxford on account of ague, 1144. meets them, the king's speech to it, ib.
 a further supply, 1151.
 an act for attainting the h who resided in Holland, tinued in the Dutch service, short review of its progress, 1165. a bill brought in supply, 1167. sir George ng offers a proviso, ib. which sed by the solicitor general, commons pass it, ib. some lords remonstrate against it, at last is passed by the 1170. the parliament is sed, ib. meets again Sept.
 16, 1195. the king's speech, contents in the house of commons, ib. a committee appointed to inquire into the cause of the plague, 1196. a bill brought in for settling the public accounts, opposition in both houses,
 a bill brought in against exportation of Irish cattle, ib.
 privy-council of Ireland resists against the bill, 1198.
 privy-council of England in their opinions, 1199.
 after great opposition,
 y the commons, ib. as also for inspecting the public accounts, ib. the propriety of dissolving the parliament at this time ed, ib. great animosities house of peers upon the not importing Irish cattle, the house of lords send lord

Ossory and the duke of Buckingham to the Tower, 1202. sends him again to the Tower with the marquis of Dorchester, ib. arguments against the Irish bill in the house of lords, ib. particularly against clauses in it derogatory to the prerogative, ib. these clauses are amended by the lords, 1203.
 the commons adhere to their bill,
ib. an instance of the violent passion of the house of commons in this affair, ib. it is at length consented to by the house of lords, 1204. in the debates the chancellor defends the commons by desiring the peers to restrain their encroachments, 1205. a bill of divorce for lord Roos brought into parliament, 1207. some of the lords against a precedent of this nature, 1208. but it is at length passed, ib. the king passes the Irish bill, ib. a supply is granted, 1209. parliament is prorogued with a speech, ib. is summoned to meet, 1228. meets, and is immediately prorogued, 1229. at the meeting of parliament the king in his speech reflects on the chancellor, 1238. both houses thank the king for his speech, and for removing the chancellor, ib. a charge of high treason brought against the chancellor in the house of commons by Mr. Seymour, 1230. articles of the charge stated,
 1240. proceedings thereupon, ib.
 Mr. Seymour accuses the chancellor at the bar of the house of lords, 1242. debates in that house concerning his commitment, ib.
 differences between the houses, ib.
 the house of lords receives from the chancellor an address on his leaving the kingdom, 1247. which is burned by order of both houses, 1249. a bill of banishment passed against the chancellor, 1251.
 Paston, sir Robert, moves for a supply of two millions and a half, 1121. which is agreed to by the parliament, ib. he is caressed by sir Harry Bennet and sir Charles Berkley, 1122.
 Peard, 949.
 Pembroke, earl of, 945, 954, 955.
 lord chamberlain of his majesty's household, 951.
 Pen, sir William, much consulted by the duke of York, 1132.
 Pendennis, 973.
 Pennington, sir John, 946.
 Percy, the lord, 1048.
 Peterborough, the earl of, attends the duke of York as a volunteer, 1132.
 Piercy, Mr., sent by the king for
 Mr. Hyde, 937.
 Pierrepoint, Mr., sent by the parliament to treat with the king, 958.
 proposes that the king should make the earl of Northumberland lord high admiral of England, 959.
 Pirton, in North Wiltshire, 917.

Pistoja, 982.
 Plague at London, 1625, 916. extends to Oxford, ib. breaks out 1666, 1131. increases in London, and spreads about the country, 1144. it decreases, 1173. the number supposed to have died of it, ib.
 Poland, 934. ambassador of, at Madrid, his character, 983.
 Pollard, sir Hugh, 1096.
 Portland, the earl of, killed in the first engagement with the Dutch, 1141.
 Portugal, defection of, from Spain,
 934. the ambassador from that power to the Cromwells kindly received by the king, 1036. proposes to the king a marriage with the infanta of Portugal, ib. which is approved of by the king, 1037.
 treaty of commerce settled, 1039.
 ambassador goes into Portugal for further powers, ib. on his return is received coldly by the king, 1042. measures in Portugal relative to the marriage, 1045.
 not able to pay the queen's portion, 1085. permitted by the earl of Sandwich to send merchandise &c. to England, by the sale of which the money might be raised,
ib.
 Presbyterians; their party in the house of commons after the restoration, 996. its character, ib.
 urges the settlement of ecclesiastical government according to the covenant, ib. two instances of the disingenuity of the presbyterian ministers, 1034. the unhappy policy of making partial concessions to them, 1075. none of them gained by the concessions now made, ib. inveigh publicly in their pulpits against the Common Prayer, ib. complain that the king had violated his declaration, 1079. reflections on the behaviour of the presbyterian ministers, 1080. who have too free access to the king, ib. their importunity distresses the king, 1081. their great disingenuity, 1082. endeavour to raise discontents among the people, ib. but most of them at length conform, ib.
 Privateers, too much encouragement given to them at the commencement of the Dutch war, 1127.
 Privy-council, advise the king to conclude the treaty with Portugal, 1046.
 Pym, Mr., recapitulates in the house the grievances, &c. in the state, 934.
 Q.
 Queen from Portugal arrives at Portsmouth, 1085. endeavours used to alienate the king's affections from her, ib. some circumstances which contribute towards a misunderstanding, 1086. the chancellor endeavours to reconcile the king and queen, 1088, 1089.
 8 L

- but is unsuccessful, 1092. the queen miscarries, 1179.
- R.
Ramekins, fort of, 979.
Ranzaw, marshal, 977. receives the chancellor with great civility, ib.
Ratcliff, sir George, 984, 986, 987.
Ree, Isle of, 917, 933.
Regicides, the, tried and executed, 1033.
Rents, a sudden fall of, 1099.
Restoration, excessive joy throughout the nation upon it, 995.
Richmond, 943.
Richmond, duke of, 943, 963. has Cromwell's leave to attend the king's funeral, 1049. made one of the junto, 966. the beginning of his friendship with the chancellor, 971. his character, ib. his coldness towards the king, and the cause of it, ib.
Roan, 1250, 1251, 1252, 1253.
Roberts, the lord, some account of him, 1030. is made deputy of Ireland, 1031. his character, 1050. is offered the privy seal, ib. which he accepts, 1051.
Roman catholics, the true ground of the king's favour to them, 1071. committee of the lords to relax the penal laws against them, 1072. they disagree among themselves, ib. upon which the committee is discontinued, ib.
Roman catholics of Ireland send a committee to the king, 1029.
Rome, dangerous to all the English nation who did not profess themselves Roman catholics, 916.
Roos, the lord, eldest son to the earl of Rutland, moves for a bill to set aside the issue of his lady, 1206. a bill brought in for this purpose, 1207. some lords against a precedent of this nature, 1208. the bill obstructed by the duke of Buckingham, ib. but is at length passed, ib.
Rospigliosi, Julio, nuncio for the pope at Madrid, his character, 982.
Rothes, the earl of, one of the Scotch commissioners, 1022. made president of the council in Scotland, ib.
Rupert, prince, disunion between him and prince Maurice, 963. offers his services to the king to command a fleet against the Dutch, 1118. expected to have been joined with the earl of Sandwich in 1665, to command the fleet then sent out, 1144. heart-broken at being refused, ib. commands the fleet jointly with the general, 1181. desires to go himself with part to meet the duke of Beaufort, ib. a neglect in forwarding an order to him to rejoin the fleet, 1182. he returns on the third day of a general engagement between the two fleets, 1183. the engagement lasts another day, and both parties claim the victory, ib. a third general engagement, in which the English are victorious, ib. makes an attempt upon the island of Schelling, 1184.
Ravigny, Mr., 1251.
- S.
St. Alban's, earl of, introduces the chancellor to the queen mother, 1015. labours to prevail on the king to receive monsieur Bourdeaux as ambassador from France, 1035. sent into England by the queen mother in hopes of bringing about a peace between England and France, 1214. returns to France, 1215.
St. John, Mr., 938.
St. Loe, John, of Kingston, co. Wilts, 915. marries Alice Hyde, ib.
Salisbury, 1145.
Salisbury, earl of, 955.
Sandwich, earl of, 1038. admiral of the fleet, made ambassador to Portugal, to receive the queen and conduct her to England, 1047. takes possession of Tangier, 1084. a design formed of not giving it up to him, 1085. comes to Lisbon at a critical conjuncture, ib. finds the Portuguese unable to pay the queen's portion, ib. allows merchandise, &c. to be brought to England, by the sale of which the portion may be raised, ib. appointed to the command of the fleet which is sent out against the Dutch, 1144. declines making a second attempt upon the Dutch at Bergen, 1149. success of the fleet after the attempt at Bergen, 1158. not able to come to an engagement with De Ruyter, ib. but takes many of his ships, 1159. sir William Coventry's unjust reflections upon him, ib. his imprudent conduct after his return in rewarding his officers out of his prizes, ib. the king is offended with him, ib. the duke also highly offended, ib. his character, 1160. is very injuriously treated, ib. clears himself fully of the charge of misconduct at sea, ib. but confesses he had been much to blame in distributing any part of his prizes, 1161. with which the king is satisfied, ib. the king is persuaded to remove him from the command of the fleet, ib. but resolves to dismiss him with honour, ib. a conference between him and the chancellor, 1163. is sent ambassador extraordinary into Spain, ib.
Savile, sir George, the duke of York moves the king to make him a viscount, 1157.
Savile, sir Harry, 929. his edition of St. Chrysostom's works, ib. ascribed to him by Mr. Hales, ib.
Sav, the lord, 956.
Schelling, island of, an attempt made upon it by the English fleet under prince Rupert, 1184. the chief town, and a large fleet of merchant ships burned, ib.
Scilly, isle of, 973, 974.
Scotch bishops consecrated, 1111.
Scotland, rebellion there in 1640, 934. state of affairs there, 1663, 1110. Middleton the king's commissioner well received, ib. proceedings of the Scotch parliament, ib. petition the king to restore episcopacy, 1111. they prepare an abjuration of the covenant, ib. settle a standing force, ib. upon which the commissioner returns to London, ib. Scotch bishops consecrated, ib. Scotch desire the English garrisons may be withdrawn, ib. the commissioner and bishops return to Scotland, 1113.
Scottish commissioners desire the abolition of episcopacy, 962. return to London with manifest dissatisfaction against sir Edward Hyde for his advice to the king, 963. commissioners sent to the king, Charles II, 1020. state of Scotland at that time, ib. some account of the Scotch commissioners, 1021. they all, except Laughterdale, agree to the reestablishment of episcopacy in Scotland, 1023.
Selden, John, one of Edward Hyde's chief acquaintance, 923. his character, ib. looked upon with much affection and reverence by Mr. Hyde, 925.
Selkirk, earl of, chief of the Scotch commissioners, 1021. his character and some account of him, ib.
Seymour, Mr., accuses the chancellor of high treason in the house of commons, 1239. carries up the charge to the bar of the house of lords, 1242.
Shaftesbury, Mr. Hyde returned to serve for it, 934. but declines, ib.
Sheerness, the fortifications there inspected by the king, 1211. attempt made upon it by the Dutch, 1225.
Sheldon, Dr. Gilbert, one of Mr. Hyde's intimate friends, 925. frequently stayed with sir Lucius Carey, ib. his character, 928. warden of All Souls' college, Oxford, ib. communicates the king's sentiments to the chancellor at Derby, 976.
Sixtus V. pope, has great animosity to queen Elizabeth, 916.
Slanning, sir Nicholas, 1133.
Small-pox rages in 1628 in London, 918.
Soissons, the count of, sent by the French king as ambassador in the room of monsieur Bourdeaux, 1036.
Southampton, earl of, 994, 995, 1049. has Cromwell's leave to attend the king's funeral, 1049. is inserted in the list of privy counsellors recommended by Monk to the king, 994. is made lord high-treasurer, 1006. is sent by the king to inform the chancellor of his daughter's marriage with the duke of York, 1009. his friendship with the chancellor, 1015. one of the committee appointed to enter into a treaty with the Portuguese ambassador respecting the king's marriage, 1037. opposes the bill for liberty of conscience, 1129. the king is displeased with him on that account, 1131. an attempt to make a breach between him and the chancellor, 1154. the occasion of it, ib. an attempt to remove him, 1165. the king desires the chancellor to persuade him to resign, 1171. the plan laid aside, 1172. he dies, 1220. his character, ib. and general review of his life, 1222.

INDEX TO

Spa, the, 915.

Spain, 979. war with England, 917. worries France, 934. infests Italy, ib. state of that court, and of the different ambassadors resident there, 982. endeavours to the marriage of the king, 1112. II.) with Talbot, Peter, a J. ter, 1193.

Talbot, Thomas, a his character, 11

Tangier, 1037. tal by the earl of Sa design formed of to him, 1085.

Tellier, John de, 12 state in France cardinal Mazarine.

Temple, sir Richard Theobalds, 944, 946.

Thynne, sir John, tl name that was ki the house of Long. ib.

Tomkins, Mr., move commons to thani removing the chan

Toros, the, descriptio Treasurer, of mis-

... 1223.

... appointed, 1224.

... co. of Wilts, 916.

... earl of, hardly dealt with by the Irish commissioners, 1061.

V.

Van Trump, admiral, De Wit's malice against him, 1145.

Varney, sir Edmund, his conversation with Mr. Hyde, 954. killed at Edge-hill, ib.

Vavasour, colonel William, 979.

Vaughan, John, one of Edward Hyde's chief acquaintance, 923. his character, ib.

Venner, raises an insurrection of the fanatics in London, 1033. for which he and several of his associates are executed, ib.

Vic, sir Henry de, 987.

Villiers, John, duke of Buckingham, killed by John Felton, 917.

U.

Uniformity, act of, debates upon it in the house of lords, 1077. a clamour raised about the clause of assent and consent, 1078. passed by the lords, ib. amendments made in it by the house of commons, ib. debates thereupon when the bill is returned to the lords, ib. confirmed by the king, 1079. is in general well received, 1080.

W.

Waller, Edmund, one of Edward Hyde's intimate friends, 925. his character, 927.

Wanstrow, co. Somerset, 915.

Warwick, earl of, 954. proposed by the parliament to succeed the earl of Northumberland in the command of the fleet, Wenman, sir Francis, one of Edward Hyde's intimate friends, 925. his character, 927.

Wenman, lord, 955. sent by the

Mr. Hales, 949.

Winston, Dr., 930.

Worcester, 974.

Worstenholme, sir John, 948, 950.

Wotton Basset, Mr. Hyde serves for it in parliament, 934.

Wren, Mr., makes public the king's declaration of the chancellor's innocence, 1240. which much displeases the king, ib.

X.

Ximenes, cardinal, the college and other buildings erected by him at Alcala, 984.

Y.

York, 944, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954.

York, court of, committee against it, 936.

Yorkshire, an insurrection intended there, 1113. but is prevented, 1114. some of the rioters executed, ib.

York, duke of, left by the king his father at Richmond, 946. sent for by the king, ib. his education neglected, 986. account of his conduct to the queen mother, ib. cause of his leaving Paris, ib. returns to Paris, 987. marries the chancellor's daughter, 1006. desires the chancellor not to be offended with his daughter, 1010. in consequence of sir Charles Berkley's insinuations against her, he resolves to deny the marriage, 1011. is incensed against the chancellor, 1012. grows melancholy, ib. is much pleased with sir Charles Berkley's confession of the falsehood of the charge he brought against the duchess, ib. to whom he writ that he would speedily visit her, 1013. pleased with the queen mother's change of behaviour towards him, 1014. proposes to the chancellor to accept of the garter, 1017. is dis-

TO THE LIFE.

Mr. Coventry to spend of 1665 at York, insults the chancellor suits which he intends to the king, 1156. moves to make sir George Savile ant, 1157. which is refus-desires that his secretary, William Coventry, may be tted of the privy-council,
 t. which is granted, ib. high-ended with the earl of Sand-1159. an attempt to raise ousies of him in the king,
 180. his temper and disposition,
b. is sent by the king to the chancellor to desire him to resign, 1233. interests himself in behalf of the chancellor, 1235. asks the king whether he desires to be chancellor's life, or that he be condemned to perpetual ment, 1240. continues his in the chancellor's behalf unfortunately falls sick small-pox, ib. receives fr king an intimation of his w the chancellor would wi 1245. which he commun him by the bishop of Win

ib.

Young, Edward, of Durnfor
 Salisbury, 915. marries Hyde, ib.

Z.

Zested, Hannibal, ambassa Denmark to France, his in England, 1123.

THE END.

